HISTORY OF KENTUCKY

ILLUSTRATED

1885.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY LIBRARIES
JOHN M.
OLIN LIBRARY
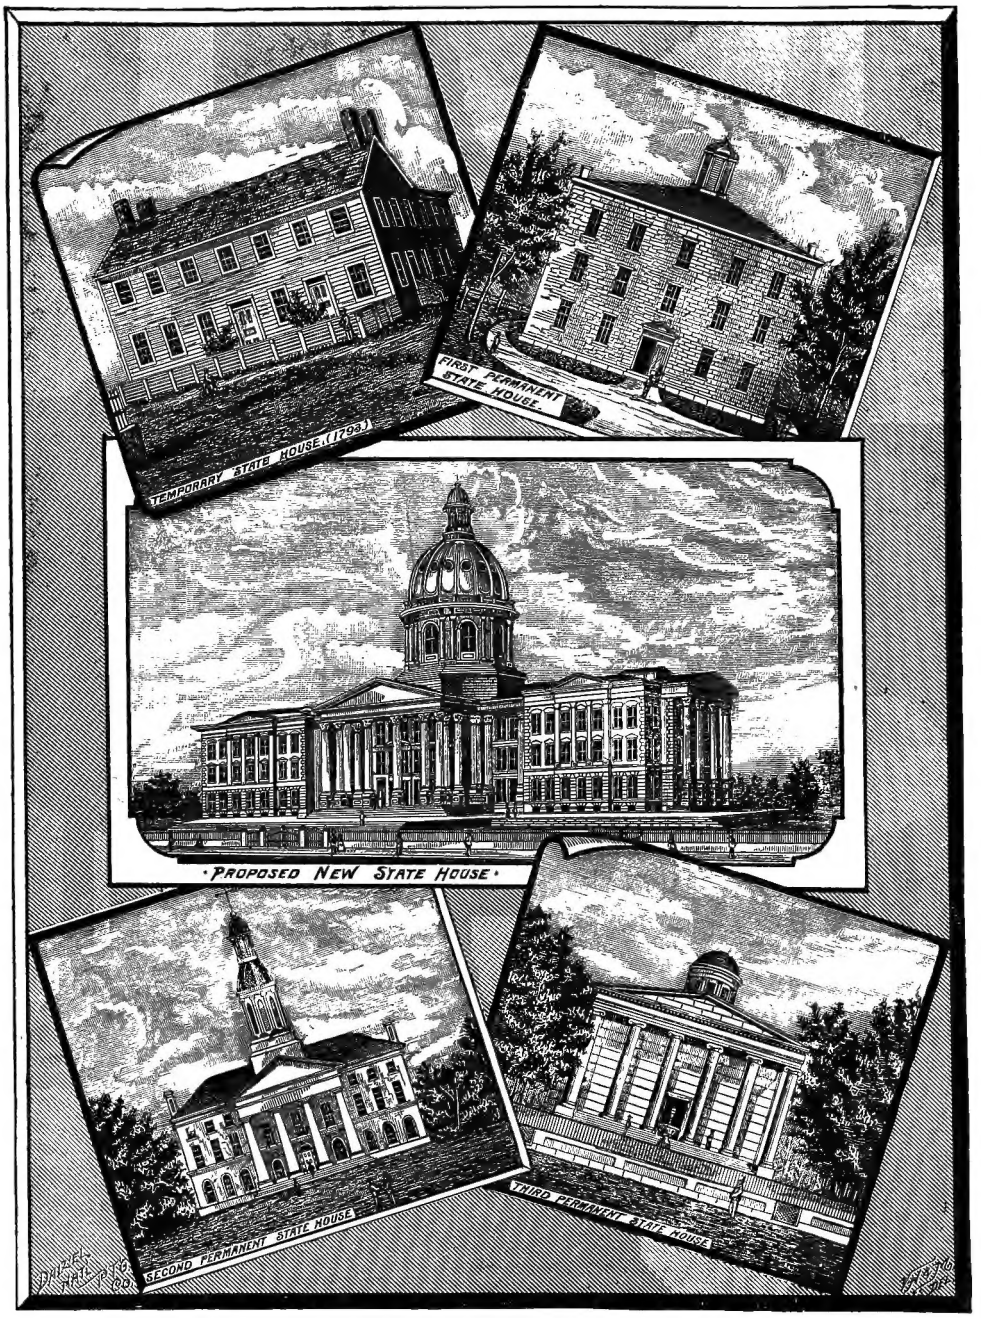
ITHACA, N.Y.



CORNELL UNIVERSITY LIBRARY
3 1924 052 729 112

The original of this book is in the Cornell University Library.

There are no known copyright restrictions in the United States on the use of the text.

http://www.archive.org/details/cu31924052729112

KENTUCKY STATE HOUSES.

KENTUCKY.

A HISTORY OF THE STATE,

EMBRACING

A CONCISE ACCOUNT OF THE ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE VIRGINIA COLONY; ITS EXPANSION WESTWARD, AND THE SETTLEMENT OF THE FRONTIER BEYOND THE ALLEGHANIES; THE ERECTION OF KENTUCKY AS AN INDEPENDENT STATE, AND ITS SUBSEQUENT DEVELOPMENT.

—BY—

J. H. BATTLE W. H. PERRIN. G. C. KNIFFIN

ILLUSTRATED WITH NUMEROUS ENGRAVINGS.

LOUISVILLE, KY., CHICAGO, ILL.:
F. A. BATTEY PUBLISHING COMPANY.
1885.

Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1885, by

F. A. BATTEY AND W. H. PERRIN,

In the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington

81

PREFACE.

THE purpose and design of this volume have been the presentation of the history of Kentucky in narrative form, its adaptation to the tastes and demands of the general reader, and, as far as consistent, to incorporate statistical facts for the benefit of those who would seek in its pages reference matter.

In the preparation of the work, though a liberal estimate of the time and labor requisite for its execution had been made at the outset, it has been found necessary to extend the research far beyond the period first allotted. The desire of the publishers has been to give to their patrons a history conscientiously prepared, and a volume faithfully executed in all its aspects. Much of the subject matter incorporated was submitted, before its publication, to those who were deemed critics upon the topics treated, in order to detect if possible any errors of statement that might inadvertently creep in. That perfection has been attained in all of our efforts we do not claim, but that a fair measure of accuracy and completeness has been reached, consistent with a work of this magnitude, we do maintain.

Those who are interested in the very exciting events which transpired in Kentucky during the period of the civil war, and in which her troops took part elsewhere, will find a fund of information between the covers of this book which has not heretofore been accessible to the general public, and much that has never before been published in any form. The difficulties to be overcome in collecting this material were almost insurmountable, owing to the fragmentary and chaotic condition of the documentary sources at command. Especially was this the case with that which had reference to the Confederates and their service.

Appendix B, which is almost wholly made up of statistical matter pertaining to army service, is taken largely from the State Adjutant-General's reports, and though possibly containing some inaccuracies in names and dates, has been corrected in some particulars, and is presented in as nearly a perfect form as possible.

THE PUBLISHERS.

NOVEMBER, 1885.

CHICAGO:
JOHN MORRIS COMPANY, PRINTERS
118 AND 120 MONROE STREET

CONTENTS.

HISTORICAL.

CHAPTER I.—1450-1624. PAGE.

ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE FIRST COLONY IN VIRGINIA.—The Fifteenth Century—Early Voyages of Discovery—Objects of Exploration—The First Colonial Charter—First Settlement Made—The Lost Colony of Roanoke—Colonial Interests Under James I—First Colony Planted in Virginia—Early Dissensions—Woes of Capt. John Smith—Reorganization of the London Company—Accessions to the Jamestown Plantation—Smith's Administration and Retirement—The Starving Time—Wreck of the "Sea Venture"—Arrival of the "Patience" and "Deliverance"—Lord De la Warre—The High Marshal of Virginia—Needs of Virginia Colony—Despotism of Argall—Importation of Maids—Condition of Virginia—Relations with the Indians—Massacre of 1622—Important Changes in Colonial Charter—The Two Regimes Considered—Property Rights Granted to Colonists—First Legislative Body in America—Early Legislation—The London Company's "Ordinance"—Influence of Edwin Sandys—King's Hostility to Liberal Measures—Company's Charter Sequestered—A View of the Colony—Condition of Trade—Character of Colonial Government, etc..... 17

CHAPTER II.—1625-1802.

VIRGINIA AS A DEPENDENCY OF THE CROWN.—Stages of Colonial Development—Administration of Harvey—Contest with the Governor—Hostility to the Maryland Colony—Arrival of Sir William Berkeley—Loyalty of Virginia—Surrender to the Commonwealth—Effect on Virginia Affairs—Political Reaction Under Charles II—Royal Favoritism—The Bacon Uprising—Attempts at Reconciliation—The "Test or Recognition"—End of the Rebellion—Accession of James II—Assembly Restored to Power—English Administration of Colonial Affairs—Attempts to Form a Union—Situation at the Accession of George III—Commercial Tyranny of England—Domestic Industries—Fixed Revenue Refused—Virginia's Individuality—Development of the Aristocracy—Influence of the Cavalier Element—Character and Extent of Immigration—Internal Growth—Social Institutions and Characteristics—Fashionable Dissipations—Results of Democracy—Character of the Established Church—Growing Power of Dissenters—Bond-labor—History of Slavery—Survival of the Institution—Its General Influence, etc..... 38

CHAPTER III.—1670-1782.

BEYOND THE ALLEGHANIES—VIRGINIA'S CONQUESTS IN THE WEST.—Early Bounds of Virginia—Tramontane Explorations—Hostility of the Indians—The French in America—Character of French Colonization—Their Colonial Policy in the West—Conflict with the Iroquois—In Contact with the English—The War of Civilizations—Opposing Forces in the Ohio Valley—English Attempts at Colonization—Claims of the English—Descent of the French—Braddock's Campaign—Conquest of the Valley by the English—Extension of English Settlements—Land Company Enterprises—Forest Diplomacy—Preparations for the New Struggle—The Situation in Kentucky—Clark's Arrival on the Border—Recognition of the Kentuckians—Organization of the Western Expedition—Rendezvous on Corn Island—Official Instructions to Clark—The Illinois Country—Capture of Kaskaskia—Descent of the British from Detroit—The March to Vincennes—Capture of the Post by Clark—Organization of Illinois County, etc..... 67

CHAPTER IV.———1818.

THE DARK AND BLOODY GROUND—ITS PREHISTORIC ANNALS.—Origin of Name—Archæological Speculations—Theory of Prof. Rafinesque—Peopling of the New World—Changes in Chronological Systems—The Elder Man—Superficial Evidence of His Presence—Important Discoveries of Fossils—Remains of the Mound-Builders—Typical Structures—Unclassified Remains—Antiquity of These Relics—Ethnical Peculiarity of the Race—Fate of this Prehistoric People—Vast Indian Migration—Traditionary Lore of the Tribes—Aboriginal Inhabitants Found in Possession—Indian Titles Extinguished, etc..... 91

CHAPTER V.—1754-1775.

EXPLORATIONS AND FIRST SETTLEMENT OF KENTUCKY.—Fluctuation of Frontier Line—Obscurity of the Country Purchased—Salling's Adventure—Exploration of Walker—Visits of Gist and James Smith—Arrival of John Finley—Efforts to Establish an Inland Colony—Daniel Boone and Companions—Murder of Stewart—Adventures of the Boones—The Long Hunters—Early Land Surveys—Bullitt and the Shawanese—Adventure of the McAfees—Simon Kenton's Advent on the Frontier—Activity of Surveyors in 1774—The First Settlement Planted—Attacked by the Indians—Dr. Connolly at Fort Pitt—Clark's Defense of Cresap—The Dunmore War—Action of Kentucky Pioneers—Revival of Pioneer Interest—Return of Prospectors and Surveyors—The First Colony Established—Indian Attack at Little Fort—Henderson's Journal—Benjamin Logan Arrives in Kentucky—Important Emigrant Parties—Naming of Lexington—Exodus of 1775—Domestic Circle First Completed, etc..... 106

CHAPTER VI.—1775-1777.

COLONIZATION OF KENTUCKY—THE BORDER STRUGGLE.—The Transylvania Colony—Its Political Organization—Important Meeting of Proprietors—A Petition to Congress—Regulation of Land Sales—Opposition to the Project—Conciliatory Measures by Company's Agent—The Harrodsburg Petition—Character of the Company—Mr. Hogg's Mission to Philadelphia—His Report to the Copartners—Erection of Kentucky County—Proprietors Dispossessed and Compensated—Indian Depredations on New Settlements—Increase of Settlements Noted—Girls Captured at Boonesborough—Patterson's Company Attacked by Savages—The Virginia Powder Secured—Diary of George Rogers Clark—Woodchoppers Attacked—An Indian Stratagem—Boonesborough Seriously Assailed—The Long Siege of St. Asaph's—Heroic Conduct of Logan—Character of Indian Sieges—Reprisals by the Whites, etc..... 133

CHAPTER VII.—1778-1780.

KENTUCKY'S PART IN THE WAR FOR INDEPENDENCE.—Character of the Frontier Struggle—Ominous Opening of 1778—Capture of the Salt-makers—Boone's Escape from His Captors—Scouting to Paint Creek Town—Duquesne's Attack on Boonesborough—Predatory Incursions of the Savages—Kenton's Unsuccessful Horse-Stealing—Terrible Experience as a Captive—Escape from Detroit—Increase of Kentucky Stations—Lexington, Ruddle's, Martin's, etc., Founded—Large Immigration in 1779—Rogers' Terrible Defeat—Experience of Capt. Benham—Bowman's Expedition Across the Ohio—Unfortunate Termination and Retreat—Responsibility for the Failure—The Hard Winter, 1779-80—Wonderful Immigration via the Ohio River—Fort Jefferson Built—Ruddle's and Martin's Stations Captured—Clark's Expedition Against Miami Towns—Inconclusive Results, etc..... 154

CHAPTER VIII.—1781-1783.

THE PRICE OF LIBERTY.—Desperate Fortune of Last Years of the War—New Attack on Detroit Planned—Activity of Indian Bands—The Whole Border Alarmed—Laughrey's Defeat and Capture—Fort Jefferson Attacked and Abandoned—Fort Nelson and the Armed Galley—Interior Stations Attacked—Estill's Memorable Combat—The Disastrous Termination—Aggressive Boldness of the Savages—Hoy's and Bryant's Stations Attacked—An Instance of Female Heroism—Attempt to Re-enforce the Station—Savages Retire and are Pursued—Battle of Blue Lick—The Suspected Ambush—Complete Overthrow of the Whites—The Fallen Leaders—Attack on Beargrass Stations—Effect of the Raid on the Pioneers—Invasion of the Indian Country—Death of Col. Floyd—Peace Proclaimed and Clark Retired, etc..... 174

PAGE.

CHAPTER IX.—1775-1783.

THE PIONEER AND PIONEER DAYS.—Character of the Pioneers—Imlay's Survey of Kentucky—Lexington Region—"The Rapids" and Contiguous Country—Kentucky Barrens—Character of the Game—Spontaneous Development of Society—Order of Social Evolution—Joe Logston and his Class—Simon Kenton—Daniel Boone—Character and Dress of "First Settlers"—James Harrod—Effect of Early Conditions on Population—Female Heroism—Precocious Adventurers—Reality of Pioneer Life—The Immigration of 1780—Kentucky Boats—Planting a Frontier Home—Agricultural Beginnings—The Pioneer's Wealth—Woman's Worth and Work—Inside the Cabin—Duties of the Housewife—The Dress of the People—Constitution of Society—Social Forms and Habits—Courtship and Marriage—The Use of Intoxicants—Religious Influences—Sunday on the Frontier—The Camp Meeting—State of Intellectual Development—Pioneer Industries—The Public Lands—Land Laws of 1779—Virginia's Ill-advised Legislation—Kentucky Land Titles, etc..... 192

CHAPTER X.—1784-1795.

THE ERA OF SOCIAL EVOLUTION.—A Remarkable Period of Development—Effect of Great Immigration—Internal Improvement and Trade—Money and the Merchants—Salt Manufacture—Improvements in Agriculture—Wagon and River Traffic—Incidents of River Life—Col. Plug, the Wrecker—Character of the Boatmen—Mike Fink—Home Comforts of the People—Society's New Airs—Public Amusements—The Other Side of the Picture—Peace Efforts of the Government—Hostilities Renewed—Reprisals in 1786—The Wabash Campaign—Horse Stealing by the Savages—Depredations in 1788—Hostilities in 1789—Forts and Troops North of the Ohio—Kentucky Expeditions—Measures of the Government—Preparations for a Federal Campaign—Story of the March—Harmar's Defeat—The New Plans Adopted—Scott's Successful Expedition—Wilkinson's Campaign—St. Clair's Attack of the Indians—His Terrible Defeat—Causes and Effects of the Disaster—Kenton on the Border—Peace Efforts Renewed—The Army on the Miami—A Final Peace Conference—Gen. Wayne's Preparations—Advance of His Army—Battle of Fallen Timbers—Victory of the Americans—The Treaty of Greenville, etc..... 225

CHAPTER XI.—1784-1792.

EARLY POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT.—Gradual Extension of Frontier Lines—First Institution of Government—The District and its Court—Condition in 1784—First Convention to Consider Separation—Address to the People—A New Convention Assembled—James Wilkinson and His Influence—Political Agitation of 1785—Act of Separation—Character of the Second Act—The Navigation of the Mississippi—Unauthorized Action of Clark—Wilkinson's Commercial Venture—The Federal Constitution—Kentucky Thwarted by Congress—Vexation of the People—Spirited Contest of 1788—The Formation of Parties—Proceedings of the Seventh Convention—The Spanish "Conspiracy"—English Intrigue by Connolly—Final Act of Separation—Organization of the State—Its Territorial Limits—Population and Growth of Towns—Limestone, Washington, Paris—Lexington and its Manufactories—The Route to Tennessee—Henderson, Frankfort, etc.—Louisville, Its Early Features—Shippingsport, etc..... 263

CHAPTER XII.—1792-1812.

THE NEW STATE AND ITS PROBLEMS.—A Constitution Adopted—Some of its Provisions—George Nicholas—Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court—The Kentucky Resolutions—Gen. Shelby, the First Governor—The Spanish Conspiracy Again—Judges Sebastian, Innes and others Implicated in the Intrigue—Final Treaty with Spain—Opening of the Mississippi River to Free Navigation—Peace and Prosperity of the Commonwealth—Another Attempt of Spain to Draw Kentucky from her Allegiance to the Federal Government—Its Failure—Gen. James Garrard Elected Governor—Character of the Kentucky Resolutions—The Second Constitution of the State—Wherein it Differed from its Predecessor—Gov. Greenup—Jefferson Re-elected to the Presidency—The Federalist and Democratic Parties—Treason of Aaron Burr—His Designs on Kentucky—Trial and Acquittal at Frankfort—Excitement of the Time—Indian Depredations—Battle of Tippecanoe—

PAGE.

The War of 1812—Some of the Causes which Led to It—Hull's Surrender—Fort Meigs and the Thames—Battle of New Orleans—Peace, etc..... 296

CHAPTER XIII.—1812-1860.

POLITICAL ANNALS OF THE STATE.—Organization of Parties—Gov. Madison—Relief and Anti-Relief—Banks Chartered—Party Strife—Gen. Adair—Bank of the Commonwealth—Decision of Judge Clark—Impeached by the Legislature—Champions of the Old and New Court Parties—Political Peace and Tranquility—Robertson and Wickliffe—Triumph of the Old Court—National Politics—Campaign of 1824—Defeat of Jackson—Henry Clay—His Political Career—Metcalfe Elected Governor—National and Democratic Republicans—Election of 1832—United States Bank—Whig and Democratic Parties—Gov. Clark—General Bankruptcy—The "Hard Cider" Campaign of 1840—Judge Owsley Elected Governor—Election of 1844—Clay and the Slavery Question—The Coming Storm—Death of Clay—John J. Crittenden—Constitution of 1849—First Election Under the New Regime—A Democratic Governor—The Know-Nothing Party—Its Platform of Principles—Bloody Riot in Louisville—Election of 1856—Democratic Triumph—Gov. Magoffin—Presidential Election of 1860, etc..... 311

CHAPTER XIV.—1833-1848.

ANNEXATION OF TEXAS AND WAR WITH MEXICO.—Character of the Early Texans—State of Coahuila and Texas—Stephen Austin—The Texan Revolution—Siege of the Alamo—Battle of San Jacinto—Capture of Santa Anna—Independence of Texas—Overtures to the United States—Guerrilla Warfare—President Tyler—Correspondence of the Mexican Minister with the United States Government—Annexation of Texas—Gen. Taylor Ordered to the Rio Grande—War Declared Against Mexico—Opposition in the United States—Commencement of Hostilities—Call for Volunteers—Patriotism of Kentucky—The Louisville Legion—Second Infantry and First Cavalry—Capt. Williams' Company—Second Call for Troops—Gens. Taylor and Butler—Field Officers—Opening Battles of the War—Fall of Matamoras—Monterey—Kentuckians Captured—Gen. Scott at Vera Cruz—Troops Withdrawn from Gen. Taylor—March to Saltillo—Personnel of the Contending Armies—Battle of Buena Vista—Fatality Among Kentucky Troops—Fall of the City of Mexico—Close of the War—Return of the Soldiers—Monument to Kentucky Dead, etc..... 331

CHAPTER XV.—1860-1862.

FIRST PHASES OF THE CIVIL WAR IN KENTUCKY.—Slavery, the Primal Evil—Prominent Kentuckians—The State Military—Vote of 1860—The First Call for Troops—Gov. Magoffin's Dispatch to the President—Kentucky's Neutrality—Troops for the Confederacy—Border State Convention—The Peace Party—"Southern Rights" People—Military District of Kentucky and Tennessee—Gen. Anderson—Camp Dick Robinson—Lieut. William Nelson—First Kentucky Regiments—Courage of the Mountaineers—The Militia Reserve—State Guards and Home Guards—Gen. S. B. Buckner—State of Affairs in Kentucky—Gen. L. H. Rousseau—Correspondence Between Buckner and McClellan—Federal Troops Enter Kentucky—Protest of the Governor—Letters from Presidents Lincoln and Davis—Loyalty of East Tennessee—Lieut. Carter—Cumberland Gap—Camp Jo Holt—Occupation of Paducah and Smithland—Confederates at Bowling Green—Federal Troops Occupy Muldraugh's Hill—Gen. Sherman Succeeds to the Command in Kentucky—Affairs in Southwestern Kentucky—Arms for the Kentucky Troops—Gen. Thomas Takes Command at Camp Dick Robinson—A Skillful Piece of Financiering—Position of the Knoxville Whig—Gen. Zollicoffer's Movements—Great need of Transportation—Maneuvering of Thomas and Zollicoffer—Joshua F. Speed—An Incident of his Intimacy with President Lincoln, etc.... 349

CHAPTER XVI.—1861-1863.

MILITARY OPERATIONS IN KENTUCKY AND TENNESSEE.—Visit of Secretary Cameron and Adjt.-Gen. Thomas to Louisville—Interview with Gen. Sherman—Demand for More Men—Sherman Charged with Insanity—Relieved from Command at Louisville—Gen. Johnston's Army—Discouraging Outlook to the Confederate Commander—Gen. Buell Takes Command of the Department of the Ohio, etc.—Operations in West Virginia—Gen. Grant—Confederate Troops Sent to Tompkinsville—Forrest and His Famous Cavalry—Skirmish at Sacramento—Southeastern Kentucky—Battle of Mill Springs—The Troops Engaged—Death of Gen. Zollicoffer—Skirmishing Between Marshall and Garfield—Fall of Forts Henry and Donelson—Surrender of Confederates Under Gen. Buckner—Battle of Shiloh—Result of the First Day's Fighting—Gen. Buell's Timely Arrival—Kentucky Union Troops Engaged—Eastern Kentucky

PAGE.

Again—The Federal General Morgan—Gen. Kirby Smith—Battle of Richmond—Recruits for the Confederate Army—Battle of Perryville—Gen. Rosecrans' Advances—Kentucky Troops at Stone River—Losses Sustained in the Battle—Operations Around Vicksburg—Constant Fighting—Part Taken by Kentuckians—Fall of the Confederate Stronghold, etc..... 383

CHAPTER XVII.—1862-1865.

KENTUCKY TROOPS IN TENNESSEE AND GEORGIA CAMPAIGNS.—Middle Tennessee Wrested from the Confederates—The Battle of Chickamauga—Kentucky's Killed and Wounded—Loss in Van Cleve's Divisions—Croxton's Brigade—Fatality Among Kentucky Officers—The Federal Army Retires to Chattanooga—Capture of Moccasin Point—Gallantry of Hazen's Brigade—Longstreet Sent Against Burnside at Knoxville—Battle of Lookout Mountain—The Confederates Take Position on Missionary Ridge—Kentucky Troops that Participated in the Battle—Gen. Thomas—Siege of Knoxville—Repulse of Longstreet—Jo Johnston Succeeds Bragg and Crosses Swords with Sherman—Battle of Resaca—Alatoona Pass—Kenesaw Mountain—The Fighting Around Atlanta—Heavy Losses—Sherman's March to the Sea—Kentucky Troops Accompanying Him—Gen. Thomas' Army—Its Perilous Position—Engagements at Spring Hill and Franklin—Fall of Confederate Officers—Schofield's Blunder—Battle of Nashville—Retreat of Hood's Army—Tribute to Confederate Officers and Soldiers, etc..... 421

CHAPTER XVIII.—1861-1865

MORGAN'S CAVALRY AND THE KENTUCKY CONFEDERATE BRIGADE.—Lexington Rifles, the Nucleus of Morgan's Command—Departure for the Southern Army—The Company Mounted—At Shiloh—Morgan as a Scout—His Company Becomes a Regiment—Designated the Second Kentucky Cavalry—First Raid into Kentucky—Recruits Added and a Brigade Formed—Political Divisions in Prominent Families—Morgan Captures Cynthiana—Bewilderment of the Federal Forces—Retreat of Morgan from the State—Receives Orders from Bragg to Destroy the Railroad—The Twenty-eighth Kentucky Infantry Captured—Again Invades Kentucky—Joins Kirby Smith at Lexington—Duke Captures Augusta—Retreat of the Confederate Army—Morgan Promoted and His Force Increased to a Division—Capture of Hartsville—Again Raids Kentucky—Catches a Tartar at Green River—Crosses the Ohio into Indiana—Captured at Buffington Island—Escapes from Prison and Reorganizes His Force—Death of Morgan—The First Kentucky Brigade—Gen. Breckinridge in Command—Expedition to Baton Rouge—At Stone River—Charge of the Brigade at Chickamauga—Heavy Loss—Its Gallantry at Missionary Ridge—Depleted Ranks, etc..... 450

CHAPTER XIX.—1865-1884.

PEACE PROBLEMS AND RECONSTRUCTION.—Guerrilla Depredations—Punishment of the Robber-Bands—Election of 1865—Petty Indignities and Military Interference—The Freedman's Bureau—Negro Testimony in the Courts—The "Peculiar Institution"—Future of the Negro—The Ku-Klux-Klan—Its Mysterious Workings—Kentucky's Loss of Property During the War—Reorganization of Political Parties—Repeal of the Acts Disfranchising Confederate Soldiers—Vote of 1867—John L. Helm Elected Governor—Presidential Contest of 1868—State Elections—The "Fraud" of 1876—Campaigns of 1880 and 1884—Public Education—The Common School System—Education vs. Lawlessness—General Interest in the Public Schools—Improvement of the Colored People Intellectually—Their Advance in Education—Berea College—Its Organization and Buildings—A Liberal Educational Institution—Immigration—The Kentucky Swiss Colonies, etc..... 473

CHAPTER XX.—1785-1885.

INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT OF THE STATE.—Influences that Led to Mental Improvement—The Press—Revolution in Newspapers Caused by the Civil War—Kentucke Gazette, the First Paper in the West—Why it was Established—John Bradford—The Kentucky Herald—First Louisville Paper—The Paris Citizen and Lexington Observer—Louisville Advertiser, the First Daily in Kentucky—Shadrach Penn—The Focus—Albert G. Hodges—The Louisville Journal and George D. Prentice—Influence of the Two Upon the Country—Prentice's Career as a Journalist—The Courier—W. N. Haldeman—Suppression of the Courier in 1861—Its Re-establishment in Louisville—The Democrat—John H. Harney—Consolidation of the Journal and Courier—A Nine Days' Wonder—Other Louisville Newspapers—The True American—Its Suppressior—The Country Press—Literary People—

PAGE.

Educational—High Grade Institutions of Learning—Transylvania University—Kentucky Academy—Center College—Modern Institutes—The State Agricultural and Mechanical College, etc..... 487

CHAPTER XXI.—1800-1885.

RECENT GROWTH AND PROMISES FOR THE FUTURE.—Roads and Early Legislation Concerning Them—Turnpikes and Toll Gates—Macadamized Roads—River Navigation—Improvement of Inland Streams—Canal from the Ohio to the Atlantic—The Canal Around the Falls—Steamboat "New Orleans"—Consternation Caused by its Appearance on the Ohio River—Other Steamboats—Railroads—Their Origin—Lexington & Ohio Road—Its Eventful History—The Charleston & Cincinnati—Louisville & Nashville—An Extensive Corporation—Guthrie, Helm and Newcomb—Chesapeake & Ohio, and Other Kentucky Roads—Bridges—The States' Charitable Institutions—Insane Asylums—The Deaf and Dumb, Blind, Feeble Minded and Other Institutes—American Printing House for the Blind—Mammoth Cave—Material Resources of Kentucky, etc..... 510

APPENDIX A.

1—Shell Heaps. 2—Genealogy of the Boone Family. 3—Adventures of Early Surveyors. 4—Decker's Settlement. 5—Big Bone Lick. 6—First Plat of Louisville. 7—Names of First Settlers. 8—Indian Grants to the Whites. 9—Boonesborough Fort. 10—The Girty Family. 11—Rogers' Defeat, etc. 12—White Oak Station. 13—Estill's Defeat. 14—Attack on Bryant's Station. 15—Battle of Blue Lick. 16—The Barrens or Meadows of Kentucky. 17—Grape Culture. 18—Simon Kenton 19—Daniel Boone. 20—James Harrod. 21—Kentucky Boats. 22—Population. 23—Pioneer Sports and Pastimes. 24—Land Titles. 25—Panax Quinquefolium (Ginseng). 26—Division of the State into Counties. 27—Gen. James Wilkinson. 28—Daniel Clark's Memoir. 29—Act Admitting Kentucky into the Union. 30—The Resolutions of 1798. 31—Present Constitution of the State 32—Historical Sketch of Mammoth Cave, etc..... 548

APPENDIX B.

UNITED STATES ARMY DURING THE CIVIL WAR. 1—Alphabetical List of General and Staff Officers from Kentucky, Appointed and Commissioned by the President. 2—Battle List of Kentucky Troops. 3—Deaths in Kentucky Union Troops During the Civil War. 4—Roll of Honor; List of Officers of Kentucky Regiments Who were Killed in Action or Died of Wounds. 5—Deaths in Kentucky Union Troops, 1861-1865. 6—Deaths in the Armies of the United States, 1861-1865. 7—Confederate States Army. 8—General Officers from Kentucky, Appointed and Commissioned by the Confederate Government. 9—General and Staff Officers Appointed from Kentucky. 10—Kentucky Troops Organization. 11—Killed, Wounded, etc. 12—Battle of Perryville..... 586

ILLUSTRATIONS—VIEWS.

Kentucky State Houses..... (frontispiece).
American Printing House for the Blind..... 539
Ashland—The Home of Henry Clay..... 323
Berea College..... 483
Blind Asylum..... 537
Boonesborough Fort..... 143
Centre College..... 214
Chimney Rock..... 132
Colored Department, Deaf and Dumb Asylum..... 420
Columbus and the Mississippi River..... 449
Courier-Journal Building..... 490
Deaf and Dumb Asylum..... 46
Entrance to Mammoth Cave..... 543
Feeble Minded Institute..... 546
Filson's Map of Kentucky..... 264
Kentucky Military Institute..... 415
Ladies' Hall—Berea College..... 483
Masonic Widows' and Orphans' Home..... 262
Modern Country Schoolhouse..... 481
Monument to Daniel Boone..... 200
Old-Time Covered Wagon..... 230
Pioneer Schoolhouse..... 220
Plan of Mammoth Cave..... 583
State College..... 508
Soldiers' Monument..... 348
View on the Tennessee River..... 295
View in the Swiss Colony—Laurel County..... 485
Western Lunatic Asylum..... 78

ILLUSTRATIONS—PORTRAITS.

Boone, Daniel..... 111
Clay, Henry..... 319
Shelby, Isaac..... 298

NOTE.—Chapters I, II, III, IV, V, VI, VII, VIII, IX, X, XI, and the greater part of Appendix A were written by Mr. Battle; Chapters XII, XIII, XIV, XIX, XX, XXI, and the remainder of Appendix A were written by Mr. Perrin. Chapters XV, XVI, XVII, XVIII and Appendix B were written by Mr. Kniffin.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

PAGE.
Butler County..... 633
Caldwell County..... 688
Crittenden County..... 717
Hancock County..... 742
Hopkins County..... 759
Livingston County..... 807
Logan County..... 838
Lyon County..... 845
McLean County..... 869
Muhlenburgh County..... 894
Ohio County..... 927
Union County.....1021
Webster County.....1023

ILLUSTRATION—VIEW.

Princeton Collegiate Institute..... 688

PAGE.

ILLUSTRATIONS—PORTRAITS.

Adams, David..... 807
Blue, J. W., Sr..... 719
Carter, Garland..... 721
Croft, T. S..... 725
De Boe, W. J..... 727
Eaves, Charles..... 903
Gillim, W. F..... 874
Hill, Sam. E..... 959
Hubbard, E. C..... 962
Huey, J. K..... 823
Johnson, B. F..... 783
Jonson, J. C..... 880
Laffoon, Polk..... 785
McNary, William C..... 787
McNary, William T..... 787
Moore, W. I.....1040
Parker, J. H.....1043
Pendleton, John E..... 989

HISTORY OF KENTUCKY.

CHAPTER I.

ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE FIRST COLONY OF VIRGINIA.

AT the dawn of the fifteenth century, the world groped in intellectual darkness; the strong walls of the monastery secluded the priceless archives of knowledge; the despotic policy of the Roman Church riveted its cruel fetters upon the conscience and sought to smother that spark of immortality granted to mortals—the mind. In 1450, Gutenberg invented typography and the printing press, and the human intellect, set free, emancipated the conscience and rocked the fabric of the church to its foundations. But this did not complete its mission; the enfranchised soul sought larger fields and grander achievements, and, taking up the cry that came echoing down the centuries, made it the watchword of progress: "Give me where I may stand, and I will move the world!"—and God, moving "in a mysterious way His wonders to perform," granted a new world in answer to the universal prayer.

Columbus' discovery of Saint Salvador, in 1492, was the confirmation of theories entertained for a period dating back three centuries before the Christian era, and no sooner was the demonstration thus made clear than adventurous sails in search of new lands were multiplied upon the sea. In June, 1497, nearly fourteen months before Columbus, on his third voyage, sighted the mainland, John Cabot, a native of Venice but a resident of Bristol, England, discovered North America, probably in latitude 56°, "among the dismal cliffs of Labrador." In the year following, Cabot's second son, Sebastian, set forth from England, Columbus from Spain, and Vasco da Gama from Portugal, each in quest of "that hidden secret of nature," the short route to India. In May, Vasco da Gama reached Hindostan by way of the cape of Good Hope; in August, Columbus discovered the mainland of South America, and in the same summer Cabot explored the Atlantic coast of North America from a northern latitude as far south as the entrance to the Chesapeake Bay. Of these pioneers of the sea, Cabot alone failed to receive the recognition which his discoveries deserved. Vasco da Gama became the hero of Portugal's national epic; Columbus found secure fame in Tasso's lines; while Cabot's name, emerging from the half century of obscurity that early enveloped it, is now scarcely known save to the scholar.

Of the three, Cabot alone failed of the immediate object of his voyage; for, whatever the language in which the object of his search may have been expressed, Columbus sought something more than a new commercial route. Early educated for a mariner, and entering upon a nautical life when only fourteen years of age, he came to mature years learned in the geographical investigations which marked the age, and possessed with an invincible idea that the shortest route to Asia lay across the Atlantic. To demonstrate the validity of this idea, to satisfy the longings of a lofty ambition which he believed inspired and led of God, were the great motives that supported him in his career and approved his achievements. And so, while he failed in the demand of spirits "not finely touched," he won the plaudits of the learned. The unmistakable demand of the age, however, was for the discovery of a way to reach India without paying commercial tribute to the Ottoman empire. This Gama achieved by a southeast passage, and received the lavish praise of his countrymen. Cabot, seeking a northwest passage, was turned back by Arctic obstructions, and fell upon a coast that, to the narrow conceptions of the age, offered no compensatory advantage for the object he sought, and which was so much desired. Yet this coast, barren of gold mines and rich commerce, was destined to exceed the wealth of the Indies in valuable returns. But years were to elapse and nations were to be taught in the school of experience, before the full importance of his discoveries could be comprehended. In the meantime, the shoals of cod, which he first brought to notice, and to which he gave the name that still exists in the Spanish tongue, attracted the attention of the world, and sustained the flagging interest in these shores which offered no glittering attraction to the commercial spirit of the period.

The discoveries of Cabot and Columbus, though not in the direction of the prevailing thought of the time, served nevertheless to attract the curiosity of all Europe; and Spain, Portugal, France, England and Holland gave official countenance and aid to the numerous adventurers that came forward to seek new fortunes and fame in the new world. These early voyages produced little returns for the considerable expenditure involved, save interesting specimens of no pecuniary value, and the activity of European complications served to prevent a calm consideration of the real advantages to be secured from their results. Gradually the object of these explorations underwent a change: the futility of the search for a northwest passage, and the discovery and conquest of Peru and Mexico, with their fabulous stores of gold, gave new zest and direction to the efforts of later maritime adventurers. Greed for gold, to be secured by acts scarcely to be distinguished from acts of piracy, enlisted the cupidity of the old world, and hundreds of the most depraved as well as bravest of the adventurers that swarmed throughout Europe, descended upon the North American continent. But the dreams of Central and South Americas found no realization on these northern shores; beset by obstacles which no human device could surmount, a disheartened and destitute remnant only survived to tell the story of their failure. Led by the romantic superstitions of the age, other few sought in the new world the spring of eternal youth and another Eden, only to learn by an experience, fraught with misery and death, that to wealth and happiness there is no royal road. Yet years of effort and hundreds of lives were expended in these fruitless adventures before the grand project of planting new states in this land dawned upon the intelligence of the world.

Early in the sixteenth century, England, freed from the entangling alliance with Spain, began to turn her attention to the commercial advantages to be found in America, and in 1541, by an act of parliament, began to foster the fisheries of Newfoundland. These continued to attract the attention of the sober-minded of Europe for years, and after 1574, England alone sent from thirty to fifty ships to this fishing ground. The hope that some hidden treasure might still be found here was never entirely absent from the minds of the explorers; but while Elizabeth and the majority of English adventurers were still dazzled with the hopes of gold, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, "with sounder judgment and better knowledge, watched the progress of the fisheries, and formed healthy plans for colonization." To him, in June, 1578, the queen granted a charter, "to be of perpetual efficacy, if a plantation should be established within six years." Associating with himself his step-brother, Sir Walter Raleigh, he set out at the head of a goodly band of followers to seek a site for his plantation.

It was not until the following year that the expedition, fated to fail, sailed from England. One vessel was lost and the remainder were forced to return with the object of the voyage unattained. In 1583, another fleet set forth under the happy auspices of the queen, bearing practical men of science. But fate again proved unpropitious. But one vessel made the voyage and returned, the others deserting at the outset or going down at sea, carrying with them the men of science and the brave admiral. Undaunted by repeated failure, Raleigh obtained a patent similar to the one granted to Gilbert, and in 1584 projected a third expedition, which sailed by a circuitous route, touching at the Canaries and West Indies; thence the course lay northward along the coast of the Carolinas, the July air greeting the voyagers with "so sweet and strong a smell, as if they had been in the midst of some delicate garden." The islands inclosing Pamlico Sound were touched and explored, and a colony planted upon Roanoke.

The story of this attempt to colonize America is short and inconclusive. Grenville, Lane, Hariot and Cavendish, names noted in the annals of state, of art, of history and of science, took part and notably contributed to the information respecting this newly discovered land. Grenville commanded the expedition; Lane was appointed governor of the colony; and Hariot and Cavendish accompanied to picture the natives and note the country. Explorations, not unmarked by brutality and superstition, were made into the surrounding region before the return of the fleet. For a time, the novelty of the situation and the necessary activity involved in preparing accommodations for the colony kept discontent in abeyance, but injudicious cruelties practiced upon the natives soon raised up a breed of threatening phantoms to vex the weak-hearted, while the realization of their isolated position gave rise to general despondence.

At this juncture, the fleet of Sir Francis Drake unexpectedly made its appearance, its commander desiring to make a friendly visit to the plantation of his friend. There was at first no disposition on the part of the colonists to forsake their trust; on the contrary, a fair sized vessel, with experienced naval officers, and all needed supplies for a retreat to England in case of necessity, was cheerfully provided by Drake and joyfully accepted by the colonists. In the midst of these negotiations a violent storm arose which forced the fleet to stand out to sea for safety. When it had subsided, the vessel set apart for the use of the colony was not to be found, and nothing would satisfy the importunities of the colonists, save the embarking of the whole number and transporting them to England. This was accordingly done, only to miss, by a few days, a ship, laden with every needed supply, dispatched to the settlement. This had been sent out by the provident care of Raleigh, and two weeks later was followed by three well-furnished ships, under the command of Sir Richard Grenville, who commanded the original expedition. In addition to a liberal and intelligent provision of supplies, Grenville brought a reinforcement of numbers, and after an unavailing search for the colony, and placing fifteen men upon the island as a garrison, the fleet returned to England.

Notwithstanding this "lame and impotent conclusion," this first attempt at colonization was not without good results to the general cause. The description of the country and its inhabitants by the returned colonists was of the most favorable kind. The salubrity of the climate, the abundance and variety of edible productions, the hospitality and tractability of the natives, as well as their timidity and small efficacy as enemies, were each enlarged upon to a credulous public, which now eagerly pressed forward to supply the recruits for a new expedition, which Raleigh immediately prepared to send out. Some eighty-nine men and seventeen women formed the colony, which sailed in 1587, under John White as governor. On reaching Roanoke, no trace of the fifteen men landed by Grenville could be found, save certain bones which lay scattered in the abandoned fields. All the colonial buildings were found in a ruined condition, with evidence of having been long deserted, and no further traces of these men were ever discovered. In his instructions to this later expedition, Raleigh had indicated the shores of the Chesapeake Bay as the site for the settlement, but the naval officer, eager to engage in the West Indies trade, refused to go further than Roanoke Island, and the new colony began its career amid the ruins of its predecessor. Unhappily it fell heir also to the animosity of the natives which the acts of the first colonists had engendered, and some unfortunate complications with the Indians occurred even before the departure of the ship which brought these later immigrants.

In the departing vessel the governor took passage for England, for the assigned purpose of seeking further assistance for the colony. His leaving his daughter and newly born granddaughter on the island was the pledge of his good faith in leaving the little band he was selected to guide and guard. He found the kingdom absorbed in its contest with Spain, and it was not until after the defeat of the "Invincible Armada" that the cause of the less important community gained the ear of the public. Not so with Raleigh; engaging heartily in the defense of his country, he did not on that account lose sight of the demands of humanity, and made "five several attempts" to relieve them. Each time his efforts were thwarted, and the colony, including the first white child born on the soil of the United States, Virginia Dare, miserably perished, leaving no story of their fate, save "that such things had been and had perished."

In 1589, after expending £40,000 in promoting these various schemes of colonization, Raleigh found his fortunes so far broken as to prevent further efforts of his own, and granted to Sir Thomas Smythe and others certain concessions under his charter. No immediate advantage to American colonization grew out of this arrangement, but a number of influential and wealthy men were brought into intimate acquaintance with the plans for the new world, and their interest in the subject gave it a new impetus.

For years, the Newfoundland fisheries alone kept alive the English interest in America, and kept the way open for the occupation of Virginia, as the whole coast had been named by the virgin queen. Nearly every expedition to the shores of Newfoundland did something incidentally toward extending the exploration of the American shore, and it was due to these amateur discoveries that the first successful outcome of these colonization efforts gained the interest and support of some of its most eminent sustainers. It was through them that Bartholomew Gosnold, an experienced naval officer, and Sir Ferdinando Gorges enlisted in this kind of enterprise; through them Sir John Popham, lord chief-justice of England; Edward Maria Wingfield, a merchant; Robert Hunt, a clergyman; John Smith, a soldier of the Continental wars; George Popham, a relative of the chief-justice, and Raleigh Gilbert, whose name suggests his relation to the "shepherd of the sea" and the brave and pious admiral became identified with the American colonization plans which eventually crystallized into the twin charters for the planting of the first and second colonies of Virginia.

In 1606, the queen dead, Raleigh imprisoned in the Tower, and his patent forfeited by his attainder of treason, these persons and "certain knights, gentlemen, merchants, and other adventurers of the city of London and elsewhere," applied to James I for "his license to deduce a colony into Virginia." Catching something of the spirit that actuated other sovereigns of Europe, the king granted a liberal charter under date of March 9, 1607. At the request of the company, on May 23, 1609, the king by letters-patent superseded his former grant, and incorporated the company under the name of "the treasurer and company of adventurers and planters of the city of London for the first colony in Virginia." The members of the original company in the west of England had withdrawn and formed an independent organization, to which was assigned the privilege of founding the "second colony in Virginia."

The king selected from the North American continent a territory extending along the Atlantic coast from the thirty-fourth to the forty-fifth parallel of latitude, which, for the purpose of colonization, he divided equally between the two companies. By the first charter, the colony was to be planted anywhere south of the forty-first parallel of latitude in the district assigned, and its jurisdiction was to extend, on either side of the site selected, to the north fifty miles; and to the south, the same distance; into the land 100 miles, and to include islands at the same distance in the sea. By the second charter the territory assigned the London Company included "all the lands in Virginia from Point Comfort," a name assigned by John Smith to a point at the mouth of the James River, "along the sea coast to the northward 200 miles, and from the same point along the sea coast to the southward 200 miles, and all the space from this precinct on the sea coast up into the land, west and northwest, from sea to sea, and the islands within 100 miles of it, with all the commodities, jurisdictions, royalties, privileges, franchises and pre-eminences within the same, and thereto and thereabouts, by sea and land, appertaining in as ample manner as had before been granted to any adventurer: to be held of the king and his successor, in common socage, yielding one-fifth part of the gold and silver to be therein found, for all manner of service," etc. The colony of the London company was planted in the early part of 1607, under the first charter, which was not materially affected by the changes wrought in the terms of the second.

The company appears to have profited little from the experience of earlier attempts at colonization. The site of Raleigh's unfortunate colony was again selected for the experiment, but a happier fate drove the fleet northward in a storm, to escape which it took refuge in the "Mother of Waters" (Chesapeake), where the safety of the harbor and the beauty of the country induced the colonists to remain. Of the character of colonists demanded for the success of such an enterprise, the managers of the company had quite as little comprehension as of the proper site to be selected. An expectation that gold, or other valuables, was to be secured by conquest appears to have been entertained by the company, and England's poet probably voiced the prevailing sentiment when he bade the departing colony God speed, "to get the pearls and gold." The company, therefore, which set out in the "Discovery," the "Good Speed," and the "Susan Constant," under the command of Christopher Newport, consisted of 105 men, forty-eight of whom were classed as "gentlemen," twelve as "laborers," and four as "carpenters," while a few other mechanics, with "soldiers and servants," completed the number.

Scarcely had the ships which brought them departed, when this ill-assorted company began to experience the misery which their faulty organization entailed. Dissension had begun on the outward voyage; the other leaders had insanely conceived the idea that Smith designed to murder them and make himself "King of Virginia." He was accordingly arrested and remained under arrest until a jury of colonists acquitted him and mulcted his accusers sometime after their landing.

With this inauspicious beginning, harmony was not to be expected. The particular site* for the plantation was chosen against the earnest protest of Gosnold; the council was distracted by factions; and the wide diversity of social character and position of the colonists forbade anything like union of sympathies or purpose. The sealed instructions sent out with the colony, to be opened on arrival at their destination, revealed the names of the local council. To this distinction the king had named Bart. Gosnold, a brave old sea captain; John Smith, the bold, fearless and faithful soldier; Edward Wingfield, a faint-hearted merchant; Christopher Newport, "an empty, idle man;" John Ratcliffe, "not worth remembering but to his dishonor;" John Martin, incompetent and distrusted, and George Kendall, traitorous and malicious. Through the jealousies of the council, the weak-hearted Wingfield, the least capable of the number to sustain the onerous duties of the position, was elected president, and under his administration the career of the colony was that of a ship without a helmsman.

*Named Jamestown in honor of the king.

Surrounded by abundant material for comfortable shelter, the men lived in tents until they rotted to pieces over their heads. Surrounded by hostile Indians, the colonists, unprotected by palisades and unused to the new exposure, were compelled to maintain a constant guard; while incessant broils in the council and company heightened the general confusion and distrust. Added to these grievances were the dangers arising from the unfortunate location. Here the poisonous exhalations of the marshes, the impurity of the water, and the supplies deteriorated by the sea-voyage, combined to breed a terrible mortality that rapidly thinned the number which, at the outset, was at the minimum point to insure the success of the venture. Gosnold was among the first to fall a victim to the evils he foresaw from the first, and by fall, fifty men had perished, while despair filled the hearts of the survivors. Smith alone rose equal to the emergency, and, though sick with the prevailing disorder himself, cared for the sick and dying, ministering to the diseased minds and bodies when there were scarcely "ten men could neither go nor stand."

In September, the inefficient Wingfield was deposed by general consent, and replaced by Ratcliffe. The council does not seem to have supplied the vacancies in its membership, as they were empowered to do, and their number was now reduced to three men: Gosnold had perished; Newport had sailed with the fleet; Wingfield had been deposed; and Kendall had been tried and shot. The new president and Martin, unpopular with the colonists and deficient in executive ability, left affairs to be directed by the redoubtable John Smith alone. He had been relieved from arrest, and under his guidance the despairing colony took a new lease of life. Setting a rigorous example, he infused activity and resolution into the infant settlement; something of discipline was maintained; buildings were constructed; and, pushing outside the newly erected palisades, Smith opened communication with the savages, supplying the fort with an abundance of corn, and gaining the respect of the Indians. Having thus quieted the discontent of the colonists, and laid in an ample store of provisions for the winter, he set about obeying the royal instructions to explore the surrounding country. In one of his expeditions at this period he was captured by the natives. Undaunted by his peril, he wrested victory from defeat; spent his captivity in learning the features of the country, and in the end secured a valuable alliance, which subsequently led to the marriage of the chieftain's daughter, Pocahontas, to one of the colonists.

In the meanwhile, the fleet had proceeded to England, but had no sooner reached there than the company, with commendable zeal, sent out two vessels with fresh supplies and reinforcements for the colony. Newport, still in command, reached Jamestown early in 1608, to the great joy of the colonists; their number was reduced to thirty-eight; "the silly president" had not only done much to counteract the good results of Smith's energetic direction, but in his absence had planned with Wingfield to seize the pinnace left with the colony, and escape to England. Smith returned on the day planned for their departure, and "with the hazard of his life, with sabre, falchion and musket-shot," foiled this third attempt at desertion. New efforts, under the thin disguise of legal forms, were made to destroy Smith, but seizing Ratcliffe and Wingfield and their new accomplices, he placed them under guard in the pinnace. Matters were in this state of "combustion," when Newport reached Jamestown after an uninterrupted voyage.

The uninstructed policy of the company made Newport's arrival contribute hardly more of comfort than misery to the colony. Some 120 emigrants were sent, consisting of "vagabond gentlemen, unaccustomed to labor and disdainful of it, with three or four bankrupt jewelers, goldsmiths and refiners sent out to seek for mines." Such an importation at this time, was of the nature of a disaster to the solid prosperity of the colony. Newport remained fourteen weeks, and by his conduct justified the epithet of "empty man" applied to him by the early chroniclers. The orderly methods of practical industry were set aside; "there was now," says Smith, "no talk, no hope, no work, but dig gold, wash gold, refine gold, load gold," and Newport finally returned to England with a cargo of worthless dirt and the disgraced Wingfield. The "Phœnix," which sailed from England in company with Newport, had been delayed by storms and arrived afterward. Her commander, "an honest man and expert mariner," Francis Nelson, was not lured by the "fantastical gold," and at Smith's suggestion took on a cargo of cedar, and the first written history of the colony: Smith's "True Relation of Virginia." Ratcliffe had been restored to office; the old soldier, embarking with a crew of fourteen upon the pinnace, followed the "Phœnix" on its homeward voyage as far as the capes, and then turned to explore the rivers that find an outlet in the Chesapeake Bay. Returning to Jamestown in July, he again set out to complete his undertaking, sailing in both voyages some 3,000 miles. He returned again in September, 1608, and compiled the results of his labors in the first intelligent map ever produced, which, in its main features, remains unimpeached to this day.

In Smith's absence, the president had "riotously consumed the stores," and the colonists were about to take vengeance upon him, when the exploring party returned. Smith at once interfered to save his old opponent, but the dissatisfaction was not allayed until Ratcliffe was deposed and Smith elected in his stead. Order was once more installed in direction, when Newport again appeared, bringing supplies and colonists. The latter numbered seventy, of whom two were women, but with this exception were no more suited to the demands of the settlement than the previous shiploads. A few natives of Germany and Poland were included in the company, who were intended to engage in the manufacture of pitch, tar, soap-ashes and glass for exportation. Had the colony been in condition to provide their own support, such industries were more likely to prove remunerative to the company than any attempt to develop mines of the precious metals; but to a colony just emerging from a period of starvation, the depleted numbers of which were for the most part only reinforced by "poor gentlemen, indolent, dissolute and insubordinate, or else broken tradesmen, fitter to breed riot than to found a colony," this greediness for returns was exasperating. In relation to this feature of the company's policy, Smith wrote: "When you send again, I entreat you, rather send but thirty carpenters, husbandmen, gardeners, fishermen, blacksmiths, masons and diggers-up-of-tree-roots, well provided, than a thousand such as we have." But the company were explicit in their requirements. With Newport it sent out a demand that a return cargo, equal in value to the cost of the present expedition, should be sent, on pain of being left in Virginia as banished men. The reply of Smith was much better tempered than the state of the case would warrant. "We have not received," he wrote, "the value of £100. From toiling to satisfy the desire of the present profit, we can scarce ever recover ourselves from one supply to another. These causes stand in the way of laying in Virginia a proper foundation; as yet you must not look for any profitable returning." This was considered a "rude answer" by the titled gentlemen who controlled the destiny of the colony in England. The demand of the company was accompanied by the additional stipulation for one of the lost colony of Roanoke, a lump of gold, or the discovery of the south sea beyond the mountains. When this was made known by Newport, Smith was beside himself with rage and declared the demand preposterous, and did more wisely than attempt such impossibilities. He secured a cargo of tar, pitch, lumber and ashes and sent it back. With the vessel he sent Ratcliffe, writing the home council, "I have sent you him home lest the company should cut his throat."

The situation of the company somewhat mitigates the harshness of their demand. The colony had cost it a very considerable sum, and thus far had made very slight return. This was far from satisfactory to a corporation, the primary object of which was to enrich itself with no great delay. Only one or two of the members had ever visited the American coast, and none had a clear idea how returns of a satisfactory nature were to be secured. The company was also without any reliable report of colonial affairs. Newport, it was said, "hath £100 a year for carrying news," but, jealous and incompetent, he did nothing but bear the malicious tattle of those who rebelled against proper discipline, which the "poor counterfeit impostor," Ratcliffe, abundantly confirmed. These, with the deposed Wingfield, gained the ear of the council by their polished manners and plausible tales, and prepared it to resent the truth in the rougher guise and less palatable facts of Smith's answer. Could the company have been guided by his judgment, and their affairs in the colony have been directed, unhindered, by his hand, the plantation would undoubtedly have reached a greater prosperity at an early age. As it was, the colony owed its preservation and chance of final success to John Smith, who, amid misrepresentations and malice which did not hesitate to instigate his assassination, rose superior to every obstacle and saved those who were unwilling to save themselves.

At this juncture the company took a middle course: it did not make good its threat of abandoning the colony, nor did it accept Smith's advice; it reorganized, increasing its membership, "so that the nobility and gentry, the army and the bar, the industry and commerce of England, were represented." Among the new members were Robert Cecil, earl of Salisbury; the earls of Southampton, Lincoln and Dorset; Sirs Oliver Cromwell, uncle of the future "Protector," Thomas Gates and George Somers, Lord Delaware and others. Whatever value the company placed on Smith's "rude answer," the reorganization was undoubtedly induced by the conviction that "nothing was to be expected from Virginia but by labor." To wait for returns by this slow process demanded ampler resources of influence and money than the old company could command, and it was probably with a tacit understanding of this sort, that the new company was formed.

At all events, the reorganized company at once took the advanced position indicated by Smith, and prepared to strengthen the colony. The large accession of wealth and nobility to the membership of the company gave it great prestige, which, with the fuller reports obtained of the country, led to a widespread desire to join the fortunes of the Virginia colony. The company, therefore, had no difficulty in dispatching a fleet of nine vessels, bearing more than 500 emigrants. On the outward voyage the fleet was "caught in the tail of a hurricane;" one vessel sank; the "Sea Venture," bearing Sir Thomas Gates, Sir George Somers and Christopher Newport (who were appointed commissioners to direct the colony until Lord Delaware, the newly appointed governor, should arrive by a later vessel), was wrecked on the Bermuda Islands; seven vessels arrived at their destination in safety, bringing, among others, the former "silly president," Ratcliffe.

While matters were thus going forward in England, Smith was laboring in Jamestown to bring order out of the chaos induced by the last addition to the colony. Three additional members for the local council had been brought by Newport, but the people would trust only Smith, and he continued president. The arrival of the seven ships found the little colony enjoying a system of order and good rule to which it had hitherto been a stranger. The cultivation of Indian corn, under the instruction of two of the natives, had been introduced, and some forty or fifty acres planted. The Scriptural rule, "that if any would not work, neither should he eat," was rigorously applied; the soft-handed gentry had learned to dexterously wield the ax; and six hours' daily labor was the undeviating law for all able-bodied members of the colony.

This halcyon period was seriously interrupted by the arrival of the fleet. Ratcliffe lost no time in landing and proclaiming the reorganization of the company and the approaching retirement of Smith; with him came his old associate, Martin, and a new accomplice, Archer. Ratcliffe at once assumed the old struggle, claiming authority under the new company. Smith was not a man to be irregularly superseded, and the contest of authority immediately became a question of relative strength. There was no doubt as to the sympathies of the old colonists, who were about to cut Ratcliffe's throat when Smith sent him to England. Of the something more than 300 new-comers, there was more doubt. Some of them were "gentlemen of good means and great parentage," but the larger number were "unruly gallants packed thither by their friends to escape ill destinies at home." The latter class sided with Ratcliffe, and mob rule seized upon the town. The "unruly gallants would dispose and determine of the government sometimes to one, sometimes to another: to-day the old commission must rule, to-morrow the new, the next day neither; in fine, they would rule all or ruin all." This was more than Smith could patiently endure; he suddenly arrested Ratcliffe and other leaders, and placed them in confinement to await trial. To relieve the crowded state of Jamestown, and profitably employ the largely increased numbers, West, a relative of the new governor, was dispatched with 120 men to establish a plantation at the falls of the river; a similar company, under Martin, was sent to plant a colony at Nansemond, near the sea.

The incompetency of these leaders led to the miserable failure of both projects; the lower colony, deserted by Martin and left without a leader, was destroyed by the Indians almost to a man; the other fared scarcely better. On a trip to relieve the upper settlement, Smith received the wound which obliged him to leave Virginia before the arrival of his successor. His powder-bag, exploding near him while asleep, terribly lacerated his side and thigh, making it necessary for him to repair to England for successful treatment. His great anxiety at this juncture was the care of the colony. He steadily refused to confer authority upon Ratcliffe, and at the last moments, when aboard ship, he persuaded George Percy to defer his own departure and accept the reins of colonial government until relieved by the arrival of the new official.

The retirement of Smith was in no sense a retreat. Notwithstanding the antagonistic elements with which he had to deal, the incompetency of his supporters and the malice of his opponents, he left "all things prepared for peace or war." Jamestown contained two or three score of houses, some of two stories, besides a church and store-house. The whole was surrounded by a stout palisade of logs, fifteen feet high; at the neck of the peninsula, the only point left unguarded by the river, was a fort, with cannon regularly mounted. The armament consisted of twenty cannon, and 300 stand of small arms—muskets, swords and pikes—with a full supply of ammunition. In the river were three vessels and seven boats, with a complete assortment of fishing nets. In the store-house was an abundant supply of provisions, besides 500 or 600 hogs, horses, sheep and goats. Within the inclosure were nearly 500 men, women and children, of whom 200 men had been trained to Indian warfare under his own eye. With such an equipment failure could come only through misgovernment; under Percy, this followed. The lawless element again seized the government, and made short work of ruining all that the patient foresight of Smith had accomplished. The ample stores laid by were squandered, the friendly relations with the Indians were interrupted, and the colony was once more threatened with destruction from within and without. The horrors of the famine succeeded; one after another of their resources were exhausted; "hogs, hens, goats, sheep, or what lived—all was devoured;" the savages responded to entreaties for succor with "mortal wounds, with clubs and arrows;" and when all else had failed, they fed on human flesh. An Indian, killed and buried, was exhumed and eaten, "and so did divers one another, boiled and stewed with roots and herbs." Thirty escaped in one of the vessels to begin a career of piracy; but with this exception the whole number, save sixty persons, perished of misrule.

In May, 1610, the occupants of the Sea Venture reached Jamestown. They had succeeded in reaching shore after being wrecked, had found abundant supplies in the natural products of an island, and in nine months had constructed two vessels from the cedars of the island and the bolts and rigging of the wrecked ship. In these, the "Patience" and "Deliverance," the whole company, consisting of more than 100 persons, came with Gates and Somers to the colony, bringing a store of such supplies as were saved from the wreck and the island afforded. At Jamestown they found a shocking scene of misery and death: only a feeble, emaciated remnant of the once prosperous colony survived, and these declared "this in ten days more would have supplanted us with death." Somers volunteered to return for further supplies to Bermuda, where he died, and the crew, unmindful of Virginia, sailed direct for England. With reviving strength the Virginians clamored to be removed from a place where "none had enjoyed one day of happiness," and so strongly did the whole situation plead in their behalf, that the entire company embarked to return to England. Every feature of the place was hateful to the sufferers, and the remaining structures were about to be given to the flames, but "God, who did not intend that this excellent country should be abandoned, put it into the heart of Sir T. Gates to save it."

By the charter under which the company was reorganized, the machinery of colonial government was slightly changed. A governor and council were appointed, besides a gubernatorial staff, selected probably by the governor. The reorganized company selected Lord Delaware governor for life and captain-general of the colony. He immediately assumed the state of a viceroy, with Sir Thomas Gates as lieutenant-governor, Sir George Somers as admiral, Christopher Newport as vice-admiral, and Sir Ferdinando Wyman as master-of-horse. The lieutenant-governor, admiral and vice-admiral were dispatched with the fleet as noted above. Subsequently the governor set out with three ships, stored with a year's provisions for the colony, besides a number of emigrants. On reaching the settlement near the mouth of the James River, Delaware learned of the state of affairs as well as of the contemplated removal, and promptly sent forward one of his ships to stop the movement and announce his approach with relief. Hardly had the deserting squadron reached the lower quarter of the river when it met the governor's messenger, and, turning back, by night they were once more in their old quarters, with happier prospects in view. This happy deliverance seemed little less than marvelous to the sorely beset colonists, and new and old settlers united to ascribe the event to the interposition of a kind Providence.

There is, perhaps, no better indication of the improvement wrought by the reorganization of the company than in the improved social condition of those who constituted the new colonial government. Smith possessed all the requisites of a successful governor, save that social prestige which plays so important a part in a community constituted as was that of Jamestown. Lacking this, he was obliged to extort, by the forcible show of power, that recognition of his authority which his position alone ought to have insured. This prestige the new governor possessed in an eminent degree, as well as "approved courage, temper and experience." The "pomp and circumstance" of the new administration, therefore, served a more valuable purpose than to tickle the vanity of the gallants. While the silk and lace of the new government made some of the older colonists complain that the plantation "was not grown to that maturity to maintain such state and pleasures," they imposed upon the other class a sense of power which they were prepared to respect.

The new governor, with great wisdom, addressed himself to repair the disaster that had befallen the colony. Every mark of that "starving time" was removed; buildings were repaired, the stockade renewed; and the church building, refitted and decked with flowers, was made the center of instruction and administration. Under the mild but firm rule of Delaware, matters once more assumed the air of tranquillity and prosperity. Methodical industry was once more established; comfort and order were everywhere manifested; and the incongruous elements seemed to blend in one harmonious community. But this happy state of affairs was doomed to an early interruption. The cares of the colony and the insidious poisons of the malarial atmosphere proved too much for his feeble constitution, and Lord Delaware was forced to return to England.

The administration, in the absence of Gates and Somers, was placed again in the hands of Percy. The colonists at once took counsel of despair, and all the horrors of his former term of office seemed to loom up to overwhelm them. That experience, however, had probably taught a valuable lesson to the survivors which might have served to prevent the full repetition of the period of anarchy and death, but fortunately the colony was not called to long test its dearly bought wisdom. Before the departure of Delaware was known in England, Sir Thomas Dale was despatched as "high marshal of Virginia," with supplies. Delaware left in March, 1611, and Dale arrived in the following May. The colonists had begun to relapse into idleness, the necessary work of the plantation was forsaken, and Dale found them playing bowls in the grass-grown streets of Jamestown. The lawless element immediately tested the mettle of the "high marshal" by an attempt at mutiny, but the old soldier, armed with a "code of martial law," restored order with a "cruel, unusual and barbarous" hand. His early report to the company sets forth the weakness of the colony and the great discontent of its members, but on the other hand it gives great encouragement that the ultimate success of the enterprise is certain if only the company persevere, adding his estimate of the prize to be won as follows: "Take four of the best kingdoms in Christendom, and put them all together, they may no way compare with this country, either for commodities or goodness of soil."

This report received the confirmation of Delaware and Gates, who were competent judges of the facts, and the lieutenant-governor was immediately dispatched to the colony with a fleet of six ships, bearing 300 emigrants and abundant supplies, among which were 100 kine. The arrival of Gates was hailed with a military salute; and being the superior officer, he assumed the control of affairs. Dale subsequently, with the permission of the lieutenant-governor, chose 350 men from the increased number at Jamestown and planted a settlement on a high plateau, within what is now known as Dutch Gap, a fertile and picturesque spot nearly surrounded by the James River. Here he founded a town, which he named Henrico, in honor of Prince Henry. Soon afterward he established another plantation a little further down the river, near the mouth of the Appomattox, called Bermuda.

Under the severe discipline established by Dale, and the wisdom with which it was directed by Gates, the colony was placed upon a secure and permanent basis. It was not only rapidly approaching the point of self-support, but was showing a vigorous vitality in projecting military movements in support of English pretentions to New England shores. The prosperous condition of the colony was marked also in its material improvement. The buildings and palisades wantonly destroyed were replaced, and plantations began to dot the banks of the James at intervals almost to the sea.

With all this improvement the colony was yet unable to make any gainful return for the vast outlay of the company; the burden began to be seriously felt, and, in 1614, a petition was presented to parliament praying for the aid of the government. The petition was received with marked tokens of interest and favor, but home affairs of a pressing nature intervened and no action was taken on the address of the company. The great need of the colony, Lord Delaware declared in advocating the petition in parliament, was only "a few honest laborers, burdened with children." The colony had been projected and maintained, thus far, more as a military occupation of the land, than as the germ of an independent state, and colonists, selected by the criterion of the garrison, with few exceptions, had been entirely men. The disintegrating influence of a society thus abnormally constituted, and unrestrained by the close organization of the military code, wrought its legitimate results; and at this time not one in twenty of the considerable number of emigrants brought to Virginia remained alive. The natural result of this policy was that the colony, though planted with care and cultivated at great expense, refused to take root. The adventurous character of the colonists could be restrained by a firm government, but it could not supply home ties nor the responsibilities of a family to anchor the immigrant. Deprived of these moorings, the whole colony was in a chronic state of discontent, rebellious under a firm government, and riotous under a weak one; in Jamestown the settler found no "continuing city," and the hope universally cherished was to return with a competency to England.

This state of affairs could not fail to reach the knowledge of the company and challenge their thoughtful attention. It is probable that the return of Gates to England in 1614, followed by the petition to parliament, marks the awakening of the company to the importance of a change of policy. The movement of reform was not allowed to cease with the inconclusive petition. Sir Thomas Smythe, who, as treasurer of the company, had directed the destinies of the colony with something of autocratic power, was succeeded by Sir Edwin Sandys, but not until the old policy had furnished another example of misrule and consequent distress to "point the moral."

Sir Thomas Gates remained in command in the colony until 1614, when he received permission to visit England. In his absence the government devolved upon Dale. The "high marshal" was "a man of great knowledge in divinity, and of a good conscience in all things," according to his chaplain, Whittaker, and while stern in executing the penalties of martial law against offenders, he maintained a stable government, with peace abroad and order at home. In 1616, Dale turned over the government to George Yeardley, and returned to England. Since his arrival in Virginia, the plantations had increased from one to eight. These were located along the James River: Henrico, Bermuda, West and Shirley Hundreds, Jamestown, Kiquotan, and Dale's Gift—the last on the sea-coast, near Cape Charles. Henrico, under Dale, had become the residence of the governor, and a college for the education of the natives for the missionary work had been established here. At Jamestown was a settlement of fifty men under the control of Francis West.

Certain radical reforms, instituted at the suggestion of Dale, rendered the colony quiet and industrious, and Yeardley seems to have been able to devote his whole attention to increasing the prosperity of the people. Tobacco was found cultivated by the Indians, and some experiments in its culture had been made by certain of the colonists. On his accession to the government, Yeardley took prompt measures to introduce the general cultivation of the plant, and with such success, that, three years later, Virginia shipped 20,000 pounds to England, where it was rapidly becoming an article of general use. His official term was short, however. Through the intrigue of the beneficiary, Yeardley was succeeded by Samuel Argall, in whose hand martial law became the scourge of a demon.

The new appointee arrived at Jamestown in 1617, with the authority of "deputy governor, and admiral of Virginia." He had been the commercial agent of Sir Thomas Smythe, and in 1613 had commanded an expedition from the colony which destroyed a peaceful French settlement upon Mount Desert Island, off the coast of Maine. These seem to have been his only qualifications for the discharge of the important duties of colonial ruler. The colonists had become peaceful farmers under the wise administrations of Dale and Yeardley, and the new official had nothing to distract his attention from the sole purpose of his stay—the securing of plunder. He found martial law a dead letter; this he immediately revived, and used the vast power of his position to oppress the colonists for the enrichment of himself and accomplices. Circumstances combined to retain him in power even after his malfeasance was known in England, and with the gross perversion of arbitrary power continued for two years "importing more hazard to the plantation than ever did any other thing that befell that action from the beginning."

"The condition of Virginia," says Bancroft, "became intolerable; the labor of the settlers continued to be perverted to the benefit of the governor; servitude for a limited period was the common penalty annexed to trifling offences; and in a colony where martial law still continued in force, life was insecure against his capricious passions." Notwithstanding the clearness of his guilt, Argall found strong support in the company, and it was only "after a strenuous contest" that he was displaced, and the "temperate and just" rule of Yeardley reinstated.

This experience precipitated the "irrepressible conflict" between the two factions that had grown up in the London Company. The people of England were, at that time, engaged in that struggle which arrayed the constitution against the prerogative and resulted in the beheading of Charles I in the succeeding reign. The same principles were involved in the division of the company, and the struggle here was but an eddy

> Of the mighty stream
> That rolls to its appointed end.

In this case the people succeeded earlier and without violence, and from the election of Sir Edwin Sandys, as treasurer of the company, dates the change in the colonial policy of the organization.

One of the earlier acts of the new regime was the importation of "maids" to Virginia. Home ties were the pressing need of the colony, and at the instigation of the new treasurer ninety young women, "pure and incorrupt," were induced to embark for the new country. Their transportation was effected at the cost of the company, which was reimbursed by colonists who took them in marriage. This venture, undertaken somewhat as a commercial speculation, proved so successful that a second company of sixty were sent out. The company desired "that the marriage should be free, according to nature," and that the maids should not be "deceived and married to servants, but only such freemen or tenants as have means to maintain them, * * * not enforcing them to marry against their wills." It was further provided that "in case they cannot be presently married," that they should "be put with several householders that have wives until they can be supplied with husbands." "These new companions were received with such fondness," however, as made such provision of temporary homes unnecessary. They were all "presently married," the price of a wife rising from 100 to 150 pounds of tobacco. This was a debt of honor and was first paid, the company giving preference, in the matter of employment, to married men. The good effect of the company's fostering of domestic ties soon became strikingly apparent; "the people fell to building houses and planting corn;" the restless, discontented settlers became "provident fathers of families, solicitous about the prosperity of a country which they now considered their own."

On the accession of the new direction in the home council, the company, after twelve years of labor and the expenditure of £80,000, could only exhibit, as a result, a colony of 600 inhabitants, including men, women and children. "In James citty were only those houses that Sir Thomas Gates built in the tyme of his government with one wherein the governor allwayes dwelt, and a church built wholly at the charge of the inhabitants of the citye, of timber, being fifty foote in length and twenty in breadth." In the town of Henrico were only "three old houses, a poor ruinated church," "with some few poore buildings in the islande." "For ministers to instruct the people, only three were authorized; two others had never received their orders," and the affairs of the colony were declared to be "in a poore estate."

The new administration immediately addressed itself with energetic good sense to reform old abuses, to enlarge the privileges and increase the numbers of the colonists. In one year as many as 1,260 persons were conveyed to Virginia, and 1,100 were sent out annually. In 1619, there were eleven plantations; three years later eighty plantations extended 140 miles on both sides of the James River, and toward the Potomac, wherever rich farming lands attracted the settler. The culture of silk, grapes and cotton was invited, and seed and persons skilled in their cultivation sent to the new land. Nor was the higher culture overlooked; good progress was made toward the endowment of the Indian University, which, with the several churches, received a liberal grant of the public lands. So prosperous was Virginia in these years, that the friends of the enterprise declared the new State had at length been placed upon a secure foundation, and that the "hopeful country of Virginia" would furnish "full employment for all needy people; provide estates for all younger brothers, gentlemen of this kingdom; and supply this nation with commodities we are fain to fetch from foreign nations, from doubtful friends, nay, from heathen princes." A new danger, however, threatened to cloud this bright picture. The new governor found "the natives upon doubtful terms," a condition of affairs that subsequently resulted in open hostilities.

The conduct of the early explorers toward the Indians, while in perfect keeping with the spirit of the age, was such as to permanently alienate the savages from the whites had they been of a less peaceable disposition. The bigotry of the church, the dominant power of the time, claimed the population of the newly discovered lands as subjects, if Christians; if heathen, as slaves; and there was scarcely an accessible harbor of North America that did not contribute to the slave-marts of Europe. The English were least addicted to this form of villainy, and on the other hand they were the least energetic in converting them into subjects. The feeling that the savages had no rights which a civilized subject was bound to respect was universal, and actuated all the early dealings of the English in North America. The first colonists under Raleigh's patent were hospitably entertained by the natives, and yet in an eight days' trip to the interior, for trifling or fancied injuries, an Indian village with all the standing corn was destroyed. Even then the savages offered no retaliation, moved to this course, probably, by fear; but the suggestion that the lost colony of Roanoke had been adopted and protected by the Hatteras tribes, was not considered inconsistent with the character of the natives.

The Jamestown colony was planted in a region occupied by upward of forty different tribes. The colonists came without diplomatic introduction; yet, in seventeen days, they explored the river, smoked the calumet with one tribe, selected the site of their colony, and seized upon the whole country with no greater resistance than a single flight of arrows from the startled natives. The more powerful of the tribes in the vicinity of Jamestown were the Chickahominies, who, through the wise management of Smith, early became the steady friends of the whites. The folly of the colonists gave rise to occasional hostilities, in which the two races inflicted mutual injuries as acts of war; but the conversion and marriage of Pocahontas to Rolfe restored amity, and cemented the races in so close a union that the powerful tribes ruled by Powhatan "demanded to be called Englishmen." The rights of the Indians, however, were little respected by the whites, who did not scruple at times to appropriate the soil, cabins and grain of the natives, without the fact or form of treaty or compensation. The policy of too many of the colonial authorities seemed only directed "to overmaster the subtile Powhatan," and such success followed their schemes that it was believed he must become a vassal of the colony, or "leave his country to their possession."

So long as Smith remained in Virginia, the Indians proved of the utmost advantage to the colony, repeatedly succoring the starving colonists by timely gifts of corn and game; and even after the strong ties which commanded their friendship were severed by the removal of Smith and the death of the Indian princess, Powhatan still remained at peace with the whites. In 1618 this chieftain died, and the influence of Argall, careless of, or unlearned in the early traditions of the colony, prepared the way for a serious disturbance of the existing amicable relations. Later colonists had learned to despise the power of the savages, and the wise law which forbade the instruction of an Indian in the use of fire-arms was ignored. Savages were freely employed as hunters, Yeardley affording a conspicuous example of this folly.

The death of Powhatan gave place to less peaceful influences among the natives, who began to realize that some check must be put upon the rapid encroachments of the whites, or the Indian would be forced "to seek a stranger countrie." These influences had been secretly at work for two or three years, when, on May 22, 1622, the savages fell upon the unsuspecting whites and with relentless fury slaughtered men, women and children to the number of from 300 to 500. The attack was planned to reach all the plantations at once, and fell upon the remoter ones without warning. At Berkeley an intimation of danger was disregarded, but the Jamestown settlement, notified through a colonist whom a friendly Indian desired to save from the general destruction, was put in a state of defense. Where the natives found the colonists prepared to resist, they abandoned the attack; at other points the settlers, though surprised, made a vigorous resistance and saved a remnant of their numbers; but in the main, plans of the savages were crowned with cruel success, and many of the plantations were utterly destroyed. An exaggerated fear took the place of the former over-confidence, and the settlers, far and near, forsaking their homes, crowded into the limited quarters at Jamestown, eager to sacrifice the results of their labor in the new world for the security offered in the old. Some returned to England; others, contracting disease in the poorly provided quarters in which they were obliged to remain, died; and of eighty prosperous plantations at the time of the attack, only eighteen remained tenanted.

The report of these affairs united all classes of England in sympathy with the colonists, and aroused a pious indignation against the heathen. The new administration of the company, strikingly in advance of public sentiment in most things, was, in respect to the Indians, quite as vindictive. In addressing the colonists, it "redoubled their courages," urged them not to forsake their plantations, but "to embellish the Sparta upon which they had lighted." It counseled the most rigorous reprisal, declaring "the innocent blood of so many Christians doth in justice cry out for revenge." "We must advise you," continued the instructions, "to root out a people so cursed, at the least to the removal of them far from you. Wherefore, as they have merited, let them have perpetual war without peace or truce, and without mercy, too. Put in execution all ways and means for their destruction, not omitting to reward their neighboring enemies upon the bringing in of their heads." The whole public busied itself in providing more substantial aid than advice. The king, with a parsimonious attempt at liberality, contributed some cast-off arms from the Tower; corporations and private citizens of London contributed money and supplies; and the company, aided by private enterprises, undertook to send out large reinforcements of emigrants.

The colonists did not await instructions from England to return the attack of the Indians. Four expeditions carried destruction into the Indian country; the savages lost their villages, and in the fall of 1623, victimized by their own system of warfare, suffered a cruel massacre through a piece of treachery on the part of the revengeful whites. It is doubtful whether at the end of this year the losses of the whites were counterbalanced by the sufferings of the natives, but the resources of the latter being less, the damage was more irreparable. The colonial statutes bear evidence to the fact that the policy of the company in regard to the Indians was fully adopted by the Virginians. For nearly two years, it "lost the name of action" only through the intervention of more pressing objects than revenge. The whites learned, also, that they were "not suddenly to be destroyed with the sword, by reason of their swiftness of foot, and advantages of the wood, to which upon all assaults they retired." Peace proved far more destructive to the Indian dominion than war, and receding before the gradual extensions of the plantations, never again disputed the sovereignty of the tidewater valley of Virginia. From this period, the stability of the colony never stood in doubt; the steady, healthful immigration became independent of the company's transportation and solicitude, and attention became centered in the political development of the colony.

The charter under which the settlement of Jamestown was planted placed the government in the hands of a council of the company in England, with a resident council to administer colonial affairs. The appointment of the latter was retained by the king, who also reserved the right to overrule and direct the home council in the most trivial affairs. The rights of coining money and making war were granted to the colony; and to the immigrant were granted the rights of English citizenship, which were to descend to their children. The second charter, granted two years later, transferred to the organized company the powers formerly reserved to the king. The council of the company was to be constituted and controlled by the voice of a majority of its members; this body was to have the power to appoint and displace the governor and council for the colony; to establish laws and forms of proceedure, which should be operative not only in the colony, but also upon the sea in passing to and from the colony. The company was authorized to carry thither any persons who should consent to go, securing to such persons all the rights of natural born subjects, and in all doubtful parts the charter provided that it should be construed in such manner as should be most for the benefit of the grantees.

The governor was clothed with the most dictatorial powers; in office, his authority was unquestionable in the colony; guided by the tenor of the company's instructions, he was made the sole judge of their intent, and in the absence of specific provisions, was granted unlimited discretion, even in capital and criminal cases. In cases of mutiny or rebellion the governor was authorized to employ martial law, of the necessity of which he was made the sole judge, and the sole executor of its mandates. The civilization of the age and the novelty of the experiment must afford the only extenuation for such an example of despotic legislation, and it is creditable to the early governors that the character of the early colonists did not provoke a fuller exercise of these powers. Until the coming of Dale this despotic authority lay dormant; but the "high marshal of Virginia" brought with him the military code as practiced in France and the Lowlands, which Sir Thomas Smythe had printed and provided upon his own authority. Dale was an old soldier of the army in Flanders, and exercised his powers with all the brutality then in use in the armies of Europe. In one instance a bodkin was thrust through an offender's tongue, who was then "chained to a tree till he perished;" and others were punished "by hanging, shooting, breaking on the wheel, and the like." The Church of England had been planted with the first colonists, and the sway of the sword was extended to its administration. Stripes were provided for negligences, and death for infidelity, to be administered at the direction of a court martial. Saving the barbarous form of punishment, Dale seems to have administered the code with justice, but the organization of the settlement was unfitted for the operation of a law, provided in the charter only for occasions of mutiny or rebellion, and the people were greatly distressed.

The severity of this administration was greatly relieved by the reforms instituted. The early custom of "bringing all things to the common store" encouraged idleness; the larger number "presuming that, however the harvest prospered, the general store must maintain them," refused to work, and the labor of a few only could be brought to the maintenance of the colony. The gross injustice of this arrangement, with the lack of enterprise to identify the colonists with the country, operated against the prosperity of the community. Most of the first colonists who came to Virginia were maintained at the cost of the company, and were its servants. To each of these, Dale granted three acres of land for their own use, with an allowance of two bushels and a half of corn from the public stores; one month of the year was allowed each one for the cultivation of this tract, the other eleven being required by the company. To immigrants coming at their own cost, or to persons bearing their expense, a bounty of 100 acres was offered, which was subsequently reduced to fifty acres, when the success of the colony became assured. A grant for meritorious services, not to exceed 2,000 acres to any one individual, was provided for, and any one by the payment of £12 10s. to the company could secure 100 acres, with the privilege of another 100 acres when the first was occupied and improved. Of the later colonists many were tenants, who paid two and a half barrels of corn to the public granary, and one month's labor, which was not to be required in seed time or harvest. In 1615, through the influence of Dale, the company granted 50 acres in fee-simple to each colonist who would settle and clear them, and pay a nominal rent. Such was the small beginning of private property in this colony; but meager as was this concession, it did much to rescue the reputation of Dale from the general odium which his severity had brought upon it.

The administration of Argall, which followed the short uneventful rule of Yeardley, clearly indicated the fatal weakness in the colonial government, and the election of Sandys to the excutive office of the company was the signal for the preparation of "instructions for the better establishment of a commonwealth" in Virginia. Yeardley, who now bore the title of sir knight, as well as governor-general, was made the bearer of the good news. On his arrival in Virginia, he forthwith proclaimed the new policy—"that those cruell lawes, by which the ancient planters had soe longe been governed were now abrogated, and that they were to be governed by those free lawes which his majesties subjects lived under in England;" and, "that the planters might have a hande in the governing of themselves, yt was graunted that a generall assemblie shoulde be helde yearly once, whereat were to be present the governor and counsell with two burgesses from each plantation, freely to be elected by the inhabitants thereof, this assemblie to have power to make and ordain whatsoever lawes and orders should by them be thought good and profitable for their subsistence."

The summons for the election of burgesses was issued by the governor in June, and on the 30th of July, 1619, the first legislative body of America convened at Jamestown. The session was held in the colonial church, the members of the body occupying the choir.

The assembly exercised fully the right of judging the proper election of its members; and they would not suffer any patent, conceding manorial jurisdiction, to bar the obligation of obedience to their decisions. They wished every grant of land to be made with equal favor, that all complaint of partiality might be avoided, and the uniformity of laws and orders never be impeached. The commission of privileges sent by Sir George Yeardley was their "great charter," or organic act, which they claimed no right "to correct or control;" yet they kept the way open for seeking redress, "in case they should find aught not perfectly squaring with the state of the colony." Leave to propose laws was given to any burgess, or by way of petition to any member of the colony; but, for expedition's sake, the main business of the session was distributed between two committees; while a third body, composed of the governor and such burgesses as were not on those committees, examined which of former instructions "might conveniently put on the habit of laws."

The legislature acted also as a criminal court. The Church of England was confirmed as the church of Virginia; it was intended that the first four ministers should each receive £200 a year; all persons whatsoever, upon the Sabbath days, were to frequent divine service and sermons both forenoon and afternoon; and all such as bore arms, to bring their pieces or swords. Grants of land were asked not for planters only, but for their wives, "because in a new plantation it was not known whether the man or woman be the most neccessary." Measures were adopted "toward the erecting of a university and college." It was enacted, that, of the children of the Indians, "the most towardly boys in wit and graces of nature should be brought up in the first elements of literature, and sent from the college to the work of conversion" of the natives to the Christian religion. Penalties were appointed for idleness, gaming with dice or cards and drunkenness. Excess in apparel was restrained by a tax. The business of planting corn, mulberry-trees, hemp, and vines was encouraged. The price of tobacco was fixed at 3 shillings a pound for the best, and half as much "for the second sort." When the question was taken on accepting the "great charter," "it had the general assent and the applause of the whole assembly," with thanks for it to Almighty God, and of those of the whole colony whom they represented: the more so, as they were promised the power to allow or disallow the order of the court of the London company.*

Thus the Virginians sprang at one bound from a state of vassalage to the freedom of a republic; and right here was planted the germ of the next century and a half's contest in the form of a petition to the company that the assembly might be authorized "to allow or disallow of their orders of court, as his majesty hath given them power to allow or disallow our laws." This the governor had promised, and on July 24, 1621, the company added its confirmation by an "ordinance and constitution." The intent of this notable instrument was "by the divine assistance to settle such a form of government as may be to the greatest benefit and comfort of the people." The "constitution" provided for the appointment of a governor as before; for two councils—the one, called the council of state, to assist and advise the governor, and its members to be placed and displaced by the company; the other, to be called the general assembly, to be convened yearly by the governor, and to consist of the council of state, the governor, and two burgesses out of every town, hundred, or plantation, to be chosen by the respective inhabitants. In the general assembly, which was authorized to treat, consult, and conclude all "emergent occasions concerning the public weal," the greater number of votes were to decide its action, upon which the governor had a negative voice. No such law, however, was to be valid until ratified by the company; and on the other hand, it was provided that when a government was "well framed and settled" under this instrument, "no orders of court afterward shall bind the said colony, unless they be ratified in like manner in the general assemblies."

In this radical measure was seen the result of Sir Edwin Sandys' influence, to whom King James preferred the devil as treasurer of the company. He and his supporters in the company were not political allies of the king, who viewed their accession to power with a disfavor which he took no pains to conceal. By the charter of 1609, he had given the company "full powers and authority" to confer upon the colony all privileges not in violation of "the laws and statutes of this our realm of England;" and by a third charter, in 1612, he had conferred the jurisdiction of the Bermuda islands upon the company, together with the privilege of sitting in council as often as it chose, and to hold four "general courts" in the year for official deliberation. Under the administration of his friends, the jus divinum was not likely to suffer any infringement, but by the election of Sandys the situation was radically changed. "The Virginia courts" became the "seminary to a seditious parliament," and called for the royal suppression—but how?

The defeated minority, of which Argall, knighted by the king, was a prominent figure, gave the dissatisfied James an ill-considered pretext for interference. At the quarter session of the company, held in May, 1620, his majesty nominated four persons, one of whom he expressed the desire to have elected treasurer in the place of Sandys. The company, consisting of about 1,000 members, was represented at this meeting by upward of half of its membership, including twenty great peers, nearly a hundred knights, and many others of renown, who were nearly unanimous in their support of the object of the king's opposition. The company denied the king's right to such nomination, and adjourned to the court in course. In the meantime a committee of eminent individuals conferred with the king and made the illegality of his action appear so plainly that his majesty covered his mistake by retiring behind a very clumsy explanation of his interference. To avert serious contest with the crown, however, Sandys withdrew, and the earl of Southampton was elected in his place. This was no more satisfactory to the king, for the new treasurer made it the condition of his accepting the trust that Sandys and Nicholas Ferrar, a celebrated lawyer, should be associated with him in the direction of the company's affairs.

* Bancroft's History of the United States, Vol. I, p. 112, Edition 1884.

"Under their harmonious direction" the new policy of the company was consistently carried forward, but not without the inspired opposition of the minority. The king had determined to nullify the progressive tendency of the company, and it is probable that the "ordinance and constitution" sent to Virginia in the following year was hastened by their forecast of the probable result of the king's hostility. A petition of the minority for the redress of their grievances, together with a libellous description of Virginia by a court sycophant, gave the king the desired opportunity to seize upon the company's records, arrest the deputy treasurer, Ferrar, and investigate the administration of the colony for the purpose of making up a case.

A committee of royal tools were sent to Virginia, in the fall of 1623, to collect evidence to warrant the contemplated action of the king against the company. Upon the general assembly the commissioners used every artifice to obtain an expression in favor of the revocation of the company's charter, but this body was wise enough to observe that their political privileges, of no long standing, derived their present validity from that instrument and the acts of the company under it, and prudently declined to be intimidated or cajoled into conformity with the commissioners' designs. The assembly refused to afford any aid or comfort to the king's purpose, but expressed the utmost solicitude lest the governors should be restored to absolute power, and entreated their sovereign that "they might still retain the liberty of popular assemblies, than which nothing could more conduce to the public satisfaction and public utility."

To prevent disorders arising "upon rumor of supposed change and alteration," the assembly warned the colonists not to "presume to be disobedient to the present government." There was little danger of such an occurrence, when the only alternative appeared to be a return to the former military despotism. Either side had its partisans; but the majority of the people were not strongly excited in the matter; there being three parties interested in colonial affairs, it mattered little what passed between the first and second, provided it did not affect the third. If the prerogative of the company passed into the hands of the king, the colonists held that no just cause of quarrel existed so long as their rights were not infringed; but in the destruction of the company their present bulwark of defense would be swept away, and the far-sighted planter might have had good cause to indulge the fear that the very citadel of their liberties might in the same way be successfully assailed.

After various attempts to evade the responsibility of arbitrarily revoking the charter, the king, under the disguise of the law, robbed the company, and nullified its appeal to parliament by the announcement to that body that he had resolved to "take care of the government of the country." The catspaw minority of the company had little cause to plume themselves upon the success of their royal accomplice. Sir Francis Wyat, who had been the company's appointee to bear the ordinance to the colony, was confirmed in office; and he and his council were authorized "as fully and amplye as any governor and council resident there, at any time within the space of five years now last past." This period was that in which a representative government had existed in Virginia, and the principle, already tenaciously held by the people, received a valuable sanction in this limitation. What ultimate changes the king contemplated, or what the hidden meaning in his statement to parliament that "they should all see he would make it one of his masterpieces, as it well deserved to be," cannot be accurately determined; death prevented the fulfillment of his engagement.

The population of the colony, at this time, was about 2,500 souls. Since the original settlement in 1607, accessions had been yearly received, but the various exhausting experiences had tended seriously to reduce the numbers, so that of some 5,000 settlers brought to Virginia less than half remained. A large proportion of these were actual settlers located upon lands of their own, and engaged in agriculture. Plantations were situated widely apart, and cabins, by law required to be surrounded by stockades, indicated the site of planters' residences. These were constructed of logs, covered with boards and "matted on the side after the fashion of the Indian wigwams." The interior was ample and furnished with a curious blending of the crude materials of the new country and the higher civilization of the old. Substantial furniture, a table service approaching elegance, and ponderous, stoutly bound volumes bore the marks of English workmen; the high ruff, the small, high, wooden heel, and short, satin skirt of the hostess were of English exportation; the gold laces and brilliant buckles, which marked the distinguished position of the planter, were of the same origin. The fare set before the guest was of the virgin soil,—beef, bacon, a brown loaf, Indian corn cakes, with ale and stronger drinks from across the sea. The "unobtrusive third" followed the meal; the cob or wooden pipe, filled with the native weed from a "lily pot," and lighted with a splinter of juniper wood, or with more elegance by a coal of fire held in a pair of silver tongs made for the purpose, was presented and the guest requested to drink it. A boat, manned by a crew of indented servants, carried the planter or guest on the river to his destination; or else on horseback, guided by a trusted servant and accompanied some miles by his hospitable host, the traveler picked his way along scarcely distinguishable bridle trails.

Stock was not abundant, though sufficient for the necessities of cultivation; game, hogs and wild fruits, with the vegetables that grew luxuriantly in the fertile soil, abounded. Corn and tobacco were the great staples produced, the first for food for man and beast alike; the latter the principal source of income from exportation. The privilege of coining money remained unimproved from the fact that there was nothing to coin. Tobacco became the circulating medium of exchange, and was made a legal tender by the general assembly, the rate of exchange being fixed by a special enactment. No internal trade existed; and the only village was the straggling hamlet of Jamestown, with its rude wooden government buildings and score of cabins. One or two sites of possible villages rejoiced "in that strange spell, a name," but were unmarked or only rendered the more obscure by a cabin or two.

The control of trade legislation was reserved to the royal government from the first. By the first charter it was provided that a "duty of five per cent to be levied within their precincts," on the traffic of strangers not owing obeisance to the British crown, was, for one and twenty years, to be wholly employed for the benefit of the several plantations; at the end of that time was to be taken for the king. By the second charter, the colonists were forever freed from all taxes and impositions on any goods or merchandise imported into or exported out of the colony, except the five per cent due for customs on all goods imported into the British dominions. The payment of this tariff gave the privilege, within thirteen months, to re-export the same goods into foreign countries, without further exactions for dues of any kind whatever. The colonists, at this period, depended for all articles of necessity upon the crude household manufactures of hemp, wool and cotton. For articles of luxury, the only supply was to be found in the mother country, from whence the well-to-do imported their own stock, paying the bill by a return cargo of tobacco.

Before the planting of this colony, King James' hostility to the use of the weed had moved him to write not only a "Counter-blast to Tobacco," but also to lay, by royal edict, an excessive tax upon its use in his kingdom. Subsequently, when this product became Virginia's sole stock in trade, its sale in England was forbidden unless this tax was paid. This unjust burden placed upon the feeble resources of the colony was somewhat relieved in 1624, when, through the exertion of Sir Edwin Sandys, the Virginian product was amply protected against the competition of foreign tobaccos in the English market.

The local government was made up of a strong mixture of civil and military rule, the outgrowth of the "military code" and the "new ordinance." The people were grouped by boroughs, plantations and hundreds, each ruled by a commander, whose rank was set forth by the bravery of gold lace forbidden to others. His duties were to "see that all such orders as heretofore have been or hereafter shall be given by the government and council be duly executed and obeyed." He was also "commissioner," the prototype of the justice of the peace, with jurisdiction of all controversies under the value of 100 pounds of tobacco; in war he was captain of the contingent required from his hundred, and in peace the executive and judge. The whipping-post and pillory menaced the evil-doer, to which was sometimes added the excision of a part or all of one or both ears.

In the transactions of the general assembly there was no trace of the neophyte or republican; in the face of King James' commissioners it was declared that "the governor shall not lay any taxes or ympositions upon the colony, their lands or commodities, other way than by the authority of the general assembly, to be levied and ymposed as the said assembly shall appoynt." To encourage home industry, a matter which had vainly exhausted the devices of the early governors, it was enacted "for the encouragement of men to plant a store of corn, the price shall not be stinted, but it shall be free for every man to sell it as deare as he can." Swearing, drunkenness, and "scandalous speech against the governor and council" were threatened with the pillory, and the planter was forbidden to "dispose of any of his tobacco before the minister be satisfied."

Such was the colony planted by the London Company: seventeen years of labor and more than half a million dollars had been expended in the effort, and just as complete success seemed about to be attained, arbitrary power wrested the fruit of patient perseverance from its hand. The promised success, however, was of a character calculated to satisfy the heart rather than the pocket. The receipts of the company from Virginia had not equaled the disbursements on its account, and were not likely to restore the balance for some years to come; and the sequestration of the charter therefore brought a relief from responsibilities which greatly mitigated the royal outrage. At the same time, there must have been present a keen regret that the growing state, whose liberty was only half established, should so early fall into the hands of unfriendly power. But the liberal-minded majority had builded wiser than they knew; the ordinance of 1624 constituted the magna charta of the newly-planted England; under its benign influence, the plantation became "a nursery of freemen," whose power to-day shapes the destiny of continent and molds the character of the wide earth.

CHAPTER II.

VIRGINIA AS A DEPENDENCY OF THE CROWN.

AS a dependency of the crown, the history of Virginia is marked by three periods: from the accession of Charles I to the revolution of 1688; from the revolution to the accession of George I; and under the house of Hanover to the American Revolution. During the first period, legislative independence in Virginia fluctuated between hope and fear—never quite secure from the invasion of the royal prerogative, and never entirely subjugated to its will. During the second period, the colonists, more firmly settled in the administration of home affairs, began to resist foreign encroachments upon their territory and to develop those powers of self-reliance which were destined to be used with such marked effect some half century later. The third period covers the era of resistance to the parliamentary prerogative, which culminated in armed resistance and revolution.

Charles I came to the throne in March, 1625. He found the royal exchequer impoverished and a rebellious faction preparing to resist the arbitrary rule of the crown; and these immediate objects so engrossed his attention that the Virginia colony, recently made the special charge of the king's care, was largely ignored. In the beginning of his reign the new sovereign did announce that he would adopt the policy of his father, but more pressing cares intervened, or pecuniary reasons, arising out of his desire to monopolize the sale of tobacco, induced him to forego the prosecution of his expressed purpose. Whatever the reason, it happened that while the king asserted the rights of the royal prerogative to the utmost limit in England, Virginia enjoyed legislative independence unquestioned, if unrecognized; and recognition came later. Through the agency of the general assembly the colonists "levied and appropriated taxes, secured the free industry of their citizens, guarded the forts with their own soldiery at their own charge, and gave publicity to their statutes." A revised code, sanctioned by the royal representative, confirmed their early privileges, and Virginia thus early gained as large liberty as was secured to the English by the triumph of the commonwealth. The period was one of immense prosperity; immigration increased to wonderful proportions; home markets were invigorated, and the large increase of exports found unabated demand in England.

Wyat was continued as governor until the early part of 1626, when he was succeeded by Yeardley, an appointment that was accepted by the colonists as a guarantee that "the former interests of Virginia were to be kept inviolate," the king adding his confirmation of this impression by limiting the powers of his appointee to the use of "the same means that were formerly thought fit for the maintenance of the colony." A little less than two years later, Yeardley died, eulogised by the general assembly and regretted by the people. Francis West, a brother of Lord Delaware, was chosen by the council as his successor, adding another precedent in favor of home government, though acting in accordance with the king's commission. In the following year, West was succeeded by a Dr. Potts, who was replaced, as soon as the king learned of West's departure, by the appointment of Sir John Harvey.

The administration of Harvey, from 1629 to 1639, is a memorable one in colonial history. The Virginians remembered him as one of the over-zealous commissioners sent to the colony by James I to gather material for the discomfiture of the London Company; and his appointment suggested that it was made by the king in requital of former services to his father. Such a governor could hardly be looked upon as the harbinger of good rule, or a desirable successor to Wyat and Yeardley. Two features of his commission confirmed the unfavorable impression; by this instrument he was empowered to fill vacancies occurring in the council, and was granted the fines assessed by his court as official emolument. Beverly describes him as "extortionate, unjust and arbitrary," and, armed with such dangerous power and privilege, he had sufficient incentive to lead an avaricious disposition into the most oppressive course of exactions. Puffed up with the pride of power, "he was so haughty and furious to the council and the best gentlemen of the country that his tyranny grew at last insupportable." The particular grievances recorded against him, by a historian of the time, are that he "issued proclamations in derogation of the legislative powers of the assembly; disbursed the colonial revenues without check or responsibility, and multiplied penalties and exactments and appropriated fines to his own use." It may be questioned if these alone would have raised up the determined opposition which followed; to these he added a supreme disregard for the rights of property, and not only granted large tracts of land to all comers for a private consideration, but also included in these grants the estates of certain planters. His favorable disposition toward the schemes for the dismemberment of the colony intensified the general feeling, and gave rise to a determination to resist his encroachments upon the rights of the colonists.

A public meeting was held and participated in by the chief men of the colony, at which was read a petition, numerously signed, denouncing the governor for the injustice of his administration. For this, the governor promptly arrested the important members of the indignation meeting, and convened the council to suppress such mutinous gatherings. Indignant beyond measure at this summary attempt to put them down, the people, led by several councilmen and a body of troops, made a descent upon the governor's residence, released the prisoners, and arrested Harvey on a charge of treason. All attempts on the part of the accused governor to effect a compromise proved vain, and the brief record of the council relates only: "On the 28th of April, 1635, Sir John Harvey thrust out of his government, and Capt. John West acts as governor till the king's pleasure be known." The governor repaired to England, and commissioners were selected to present the case of the colony against him; but the two parties do not appear to have confronted each other there. The representatives of the colony were delayed, Harvey appeared before the privy council, cleared himself of the grave charges of treason and smuggling, and was returned by the indignant king, to whom the sending of the governor hither appeared "an assumption of regal power," which should be rebuked by the reinstatement of the obnoxious governor, "though to stay but a day." Harvey, accordingly, came back in 1637, shorn, however, of his power to fill vacancies in the council, and remained nearly two years without provoking further antagonism.

The Virginians regarded any infringement of their original territory with no less jealous eye than the infringement of political rights, and the founding of the colony of Maryland, in this administration, aroused an opposition which for over thirty years refused to acquiesce in the inevitable. The territory granted the first colony in Virginia extended from the Florida line to the Hudson River. In 1613, the Hollanders took possession of this river, and "built forts there, called Prince Maurice and New Netherlands," establishing a flourishing fur trade with the natives. "Thus," it was claimed, "are the English nosed and out-traded by the Dutch." Later, a colony of Swedes occupied Delaware; and in 1630, Sir Robert Heath was granted all that portion of Virginia south of the 36th parallel. All these were considered invasions of the territory of Virginia, and when, in 1632, Sir George Calvert, Lord Baltimore, was granted the territory of Maryland, the Virginians began to fear that the recklessness of the king and the greed of his favorites would not stop short of appropriating the lands already occupied by themselves. The reckless avarice of Harvey gave color to these suspicions, and the general assembly earnestly protested against the grant as an infringement of the rights of Virginia and a discouragement to the planters who had labored to build up the colony.

The founder of the new colony was a "popish recusant of high character;" under royal charter he had established a colony upon the southern point of Newfoundland, but the climatic discouragement of that latitude had induced him to look about for a more favorable location. To this end he visited Virginia in 1630, where, the character of his mission being known, he was received with scant hospitality. He found the colonists possessed of a spirit of bigoted intolerance, and no sooner was his presence bruited abroad than a general commotion ensued. The distinguished visitor was given the lie publicly and threatened with violence, and the council, while punishing the offender against the peace and good manners, tendered Lord Baltimore the oath of supremacy and allegiance, which, as a good Catholic, he declined to take. This was equal to a dismissal from the colony, and he accordingly left for England, stopping long enough on his way, however, to explore the country on the opposite side of the Chesapeake Bay. On his return he represented to the king that the country north of the Potomac was inhabited only by savages; that years must elapse before the Virginians could occupy it; that other nations were preparing to plant settlements there, and that the surest way to frustrate them was to found an English colony in the territory.

To such potent arguments the Virginians could reply only by protest. By the canceling of the company's charter, the right of the soil was vested in the crown; and, aided by the influence of home statesmen as well as that of Harvey, Lord Baltimore succeeded in his quest, though his death in the meanwhile transferred the undertaking to his son. Circumstances devolved the responsibility of further opposition, also, upon other shoulders. The king's "trusty and well-beloved William Clayborne," with a considerable following, occupied Kent Island, and founded so vigorous a settlement that in 1632 it sent a member to the general assembly of Virginia. This contestant engaged in trade with the Indians, for which he provided a well-equipped vessel, and announced that, as he occupied the soil of Virginia under patent of the king, he would resist any attempt to rob him of his rights.

In 1634 the second Lord Baltimore sent his brother, Leonard Calvert, with "twenty gentlemen" and several hundred laborers to take possession of the king's grant to him. Clayborne's trading vessel was seized, and the colony on Kent Island surprised by night and driven out. The resolute defender of Virginian rights sent an armed pinnace to rescue the captured boat, but in the skirmish which followed the rescuers were defeated with the loss of three men. Beaten for the time, Clayborne waited until the absence of the governor of Virginia gave him an opportunity to renew the struggle. Accordingly, in 1645, he seized the Maryland government vi et armis, and forced the representative of Lord Baltimore to retreat to England. The return of Berkeley, then governor, turned the tables, and the defender of the ancient limits, deprived of home support, was violently expelled by the proprietary forces. In all the protracted struggle, Clayborne was supported by the patriotism of the Virginians, who claimed the territory as a part of the colony's possession, and by that religious bigotry which united Puritan and Episcopalian in opposition to the Catholic.

Other marks of individuality appeared in the administration of Harvey; the colonists not only assumed "regal power" and developed a patriotism that countenanced the rebellious attempt to nullify the king's patent, but the colony began also to put off the forms of its tutelage, and to assume the garb of maturity. Early in the administration (1628–29) commissions were issued to the different plantations and hundreds to hold monthly courts, and in 1634 eight shires, their form of government copied from the shires of England, were erected. Over each of these was placed a "lieutenant, the same as in England, to take care of the war against Indians;" the sheriff, sergeant and bailiffs were also constituted and elected "the same as in England." Harvey was recalled in 1639, and Sir Francis Wyat conducted the government until Sir William Berkeley arrived, in 1642.

The new governor was a "courtier," a member of an old English family, deeply imbued with a profound belief in the jus divinum of kings, and schooled in the graces, amenities and prejudices of the well-bred cavalier. At his country estate of 1,000 acres, near Jamestown, he surrounded himself with great social state, and did much to foster the growing aristocratic tendency, which gradually prevailed in the customs of the wealthier classes of the old Virginians. The people were not averse to this display. During the administration of Harvey, the colonists had gained a broader comprehension of Virginia's future possibilities as an integral part of the British kingdom, and readily associated this display with the growing importance of the colony. The exercise of governmental functions had been a powerful means of educating the people in self-confidence, and public spirit, though less marked, had kept pace with the social tendency of the colony. Untouched by the influences which moved England to rebellion, "Virginia was whole for the monarchy," though it only needed similar grievances, thirty-four years later, to break out in armed resistance. But, for the time, the man and the hour had met in happy conjunction. The people, wearied and outraged by the coarse brutality of the retiring governor, were captivated by the urbanity of Berkeley; ruffled by their inconclusive bout with Harvey, and excited over the dismemberment of their territory, the Virginians were surprised into good nature by Charles' address to "our trusty and well-beloved, our governor, council and burgesses of the grand assembly of Virginia" (his first recognition of the colonial legislature, July 5, 1642), and accepted the liberally devised instructions to Berkeley as the amende honorable.

It was under such happy auspices that the long (1642–1677) and eventful career of the new governor opened in Virginia. His instructions associated the council with the governor in supplying the vacancies in that body; provided for the annual meeting of the assembly with unabated privilege, the governor to have a negative voice; for the erection of courts inferior to the quarter sessions; for the administration of justice according to the English usage; and for the probate of wills. To carry out these instructions the governor and assembly united in harmonious action, and for seven years the golden age of colonial existence went on without interruption. In 1643, the shires took the name of counties, and as immigration found its way into new regions, the number increased; stock of all kinds multiplied; the cattle were estimated at 20,000 head, with horses and other kinds in proportion; the fertile soil yielded rich returns of wheat, tobacco and corn, the latter "five hundred fold;" the cultivation and manufacture of silk was encouraged, and the infant industry was destined to supply the coronation robe for the restored Stuart, if the tradition be true; and trade, "the calm health of nations," attracted ten vessels from London, two from Bristol, twelve from Holland, and seven from New England.

In the meantime, affairs in England were rapidly approaching the revolutionary climax; the news found its way to Virginia, but awakened no response in the hearts of the colonists. The Virginians were prosperous and happy, and good churchmen enough to believe that "godliness with contentment is great gain." In 1643, the parliament's board of commissioners could offer no advantage which the colony did not already possess; and when the company, which fostered its infancy, sought to revive its charter, the colony promptly protested that "there is more likelihood that such as are aquainted with the clime and its accidents may upon better ground prescribe our advantages, than such as shall sit at the helm in England." The period of colonial minority had passed and the colony was now able to judge for itself; the legislature had exercised its coveted privileges unhindered, and secured such sanction to the principles of home government as removed all doubt of their stability; the king's policy in Virginia had been quite satisfactory, and the colonists had no disposition to join the cause of the Puritans in the attainment of objects in which they had no interest. The execution of Charles I, therefore, awoke in Virginia a sympathy for the victim of the English people's rage, and the royalist refugees, who fled to Virginia in great numbers, found every home a "hostelry," and had "choice of hosts without money or its value."

The king was beheaded in January, 1649; the general assembly, which met in the following October, took early opportunity to denounce "the late traitorous proceedings" against "the late most excellent and now undoubtedly sainted king;" and provided that all persons who should "by word or speeches, endeavour to insinuate any doubt, scruple or question of, or concerning, the undoubted and inherent right of his majesty, that now is, to the colony of Virginia, and all other his majesty's dominions," should suffer punishment. In 1650, the exiled monarch recognized the loyalty of Virginia and sent his commission to Sir William Berkeley from Breda, and the colony prepared to be "the last country, belonging to England, that submitted to obedience of the commonwealth." This rebellious attitude toward the new state of things could not long pass unnoticed. In the latter part of this year parliament adopted measures to reduce "Barbadoes, Antigua, Bermudas and Virginia" to obedience. One after another made submission to the new authorities with slight resistance at the Bermudas only, and in 1652 a frigate brought the menace of war to the shores of Virginia. The brave old governor made prompt preparations for resistance; the defenses of Jamestown were equipped and manned; the Dutch ships in the harbor were unloaded of goods and mounted with cannon, and nothing was needed to precipitate the devastation and misery of war but the folly of the commonwealth's commissioners. Fortunately this had been guarded against, both in the selection of the officials and in the terms of their instructions; the demand of the commonwealth was for parley, not surrender. The burgesses of the several plantations were called to assist and advise in the matter, and "upon long and serious debate, and in sad contemplation of the great miseries and certain destruction," surrender was agreed upon.

This result would seem to be a foregone conclusion; the Virginians differed with the commons of England only in personal sentiment; both claimed England as their fatherland, and its settled ruler as the common sovereign of both; Virginia did not aim at independence, and the commonwealth sought only to prevent the dismemberment of the kingdom; there was, therefore, no cause for war. When clearly formulated, the demands of each party were found entirely compatible with the highest interest of both, and instead of a recourse to arms, this real union of sentiment was set forth in articles of agreement "for the surrendering and settling of that plantation under the obedience and government of the commonwealth of England."

By these articles it was provided "that the plantation of Virginia, and all the inhabitants thereof * * * shall have and enjoy such freedoms and privileges as belong to the free-born people of England; * * * 4ly, That Virginia shall have and enjoy the antient bounds and lymitts granted by the charters of former kings; * * * 8ly, That Virginia shall be free from all taxes, customs and impositions whatsoever, and none to be imposed on them without consent of the grand assembly, and so that neither fortes nor castles bee erected or garrisons maintained without their consent;" and this agreement was therein acknowledged "a voluntary act, not forced nor constrained by a conquest upon the countrey." This convention, consisting of sixteen articles, with a supplementary paper granting immunity for acts done under the commission of the exiled king, was confirmed by the "long parliament," save the important stipulations in regard to the "antient bounds and lymitts," and those contained in article "8ly," quoted in full. These were referred to a committee and were not acted upon before the parliament was dissolved; but whatever this grave omission might have imported, subsequent events secured to the colony the substantial results sought, with the exception of the original boundaries.

Clayborne, who was one of the commonwealth commissioners, the Virginia business being settled, renewed his struggle for the possession of "that sweete, that rich, that large country" of Maryland. Under the general authorization of parliament to reduce "all the plantations within the bay of Chesapeake," he seized the governor of that colony and revolutionized the government, but not without a stubborn fight, in which the proprietary forces were defeated. In 1658 the end appeared; the power of the Puritans began to fail; the Catholics took courage, organized, and surrendered the colony to Lord Baltimore; the death of Cromwell followed in the same year, and the restoration, in 1660, settled this vexed question forever.

The revolution was effected in Virginia without the slightest commotion; the articles for the "settling of that plantation" had made no provision for its future government, but the assembly, as "the representatives of the people," declared "the right of electing all officers of this colony should appertain to the burgesses," and, "after long and serious debate," "unanimously voted and concluded that Mr. Richard Bennett, Esq., be governor for this ensuing year" (1652). Bennett was one of the commonwealth's commissioners, and Clayborne, another, was made secretary of state, the council being composed of sympathizers with the exiled king and "roundheads." The old cavalier-governor disposed of his "house in James Cittie, the westernmost of three brick houses I built there," and retired to his country estate to vent his petulant humor in criticisms of the existing government. The new administration, with no friends to favor nor foes to punish, "kept the noiseless tenor of its way." The "mercenarie attorneys" were the common enemy of all, and were harassed as they were under Berkeley.

There was a "looseness and unsettledness" in the character of the government under the commonwealth recognized by all, and while the protector had "come to some resolutions for supplying that defect" death intervened to prevent his carrying them into execution. The assembly in the meanwhile directed affairs; in 1655, Edward Digges succeeded Bennett as governor, and in 1656, Samuel Matthews was elected. The latter was graced with the title of captain, and was "an old planter of nearly forty years' standing, a most deserving commonwealth's man, who kept a good house, lived bravely, and was a true lover of Virginia." In 1658, the assembly excluded the governor and council from its session; the "old planter governor" resisted the innovation and dissolved the assembly, but the "representatives of the people" were not thus to be coerced. Members were forbidden to leave Jamestown, and convening in secret session the colonial legislature declined to submit the whole question to Cromwell, declaring the assembly was "not dissolved by any power yet extant in Virginia but our own." The burgesses were not without their remedy; they declared themselves in possession of full power to elect and appoint all officers in the colony until orders to the contrary should be received from the supreme power in England; "that all former elections of governor and council be void and null; that the power of the governor for the future shall be conferred on Coll. Samuel Matthews, Esq., who by us shall be invested with all the just rights and privileges belonging to the governor and captain-general of Virginia." This occurred on the first day of April, and on the third, the old planter captain accepted the promotion to colonel, and took the oath in accordance with the determination of the burgesses.

On the death of Cromwell, his son and successor was recognized; the restoration was in view, and the resignation of Richard Cromwell being followed by the death of Matthews, the old cavalier was called from his retirement and placed at the head of the government once more. The burgesses took care, however, to reaffirm "that the supreme power of the government of this country shall be resident in the assembly," and to enact that "all writts shall issue" in its name, "until such a command or commission come out of England as shall be by the assembly adjudged to be lawful." In the absence of a settled government in England, this guarded declaration of supremacy was not inconsistent with the old governor's political faith, and acquiescing in the innovations accomplished by the burgesses, he declared himself "the servant of the assembly."

The restoration of Charles II was hailed with joy in Virginia. During the rule of the commonwealth the people had lost none of their love for the cause of the deposed monarch, and the unsettled state of the government kept alive the expectation of a return to the only settled form known to the people —a monarchy. The large accession of royalists, "men of the first rate, who wanted not money nor credit," whose singularly wise conduct had provoked no antagonisms, reinforced the natural sentiment. Berkeley was re-elected in March, 1660; in the following May, the restored king forwarded to him a royal commission, and in 1661 a new assembly was convened. The old one, it is said, "was full cavalier," but the constitution of the new one exhibited the change silently wrought in Virginia by the restoration. In the first general assembly convened in the reign of Charles II, "large land-holders and cavaliers" appeared almost exclusively; of the members of the preceding assembly, only eight were re-elected, and only five retained their seats; of those prominent in the extension of colonial privileges, but two appeared in this body. England was restored; Virginia was revolutionized.

The colony was on the high road to rebellion, but its progress was only incidentally marked through the course of the sixteen years which followed. The restoration found colonial power in the hands of "the people of Virginia;" the governor placed and displaced by the general assembly, and his salary voted from one session to another; the council dependent upon the same power; the courts conformed to English law; taxes levied on the poll and only by the burgesses; the assembly directly responsible to the people, elected once in two years and each member paid by his constituents. These privileges had survived both monarchy and commonwealth, and the people, who sought an explicit grant of security from the successor of Cromwell, deemed a charter from the restored Stuart unnecessary; and so Virginia relied upon the integrity of her king and assembly, while the less loyal colonists in the North were securing liberal charters as the price of their unwearied importunities. The mistake of this overweening confidence was fatal to the peace of the Virginia colony.

In 1662, the new assembly, by a permanent imposition on tobacco, provided an unquestionable emolument for the appointees of the crown, and having freed the governor from his financial restraint, the same assembly prolonged its own existence by declaring the law requiring the election of burgesses once in two years "utterly abrogated and repealed." Other innovations followed, all tending in the same direction—the exclusion of the people from the government. New laws freed the burgess from the financial restraint of his constituents by providing for his payment out of a general levy; and in 1670, the franchise was restricted to "free-holders and housekeepers." Such was the progress in ten years; the movement had not gone unnoticed by the people, who were disposed to make "choyce of persons not fitly qualified for so great a trust," in the opinion of the royalist assembly, and hence the restriction. This last innovation was a serious one, and challenged the immediate attention of the people. From the first years until 1655, all settlers had been heard in the general direction; until 1619, in the matters of the plantations and hundreds, and subsequently in the election of burgesses. In 1655 the franchise was restricted to housekeepers, but in the following year the privilege was restored, because it was "something hard and unagreeable to reason that any person shall pay equal taxes, and yet have no vote in elections." Fourteen years had not antiquated the logic of this reasoning, but the royalists found a class of "persons, who, having served their time, are freemen of this country." Many of these were their old enemies who had been brought to Virginia in the restored times, as indented servants, and now, restored to freedom, made "tumults at this election;" it was safer, therefore, to "grant a voyce in such election only to such as by their estates, real or personal, have interest enough to tye them to the endeavor of the public good."

This centralization of power reached the courts also. The governor and council formed the superior and chancery courts, from which, for a time, there was an appeal to the assembly; the minor courts consisted of eight unpaid justices of the peace, who held monthly sessions in each county for the disposition of minor causes and county business. These magistrates were appointed by the governor during his pleasure, the one oldest in commission succeeding to the position of sheriff, and others in regular rotation. This court, without responsibility to the people, levied the taxes for county purposes, and disbursed them too often for the enrichment of peculating officials. To this was added the exacting machinery of an established church. The later laws, which had lost much of the severity of bigotry, were repealed, and the old ones restored; the vestry was constituted a close corporation with perpetual charter, and endowed with powers to assess taxes without regard to the will of the parishioners.

It is impossible to conjecture how far this irresponsible tyranny would have gone, had not the similar policy of the king supplied a partial corrective. The oppressive trade measures of the crown brought home to the privileged class the folly of alienating the great body of freemen entirely, and subsequent events were to convince them that where plunder was involved even the touch of aristocracy did not make kin. In 1673 the king wantonly granted all the "dominion of land and water commonly called Virginia" to Lords Arlington and Culpepper for thirty-one years. Such a grant was portentous of the greatest evils; these court favorites, for the annual rent of 40 shillings, were endowed with all the privileges and powers of the Crown over 40,000 people for a generation. The outcry against the villainy was spontaneous and prolonged, and joined in by freeman, housekeeper and burgess. The cavalier assembly protested to the king in language very similar to that of freemen; "they humbly requested not to be subjected to our fellow-subjects, but for the future to be secure from our fears of being enslaved." A commission was sent to England to secure a charter by which the encroachments of the new proprietors might be restrained, but the people, excited by new grievances, took the remedy into their own hands, and the news of "Bacon's rebellion" stopped the charter in the government offices.

In 1674 the general exasperation found some expression, but calm advice and counsel checked the outbreak. Some minor reforms were granted, but the great burden of oppression remained; the determination of the people was taking form, however, and want of opportunity alone denied it expression. This want was supplied at last; the Indians were showing a disposition to renew hostilities; a rumor of their approach was followed by the slaughter of settlers on the frontier plantations. The natives extended their ravages, and planters gathered to follow the foe to his retreat and inflict summary punishment, but they had no leader, and the governor was charged with caring more for his beaver trade than for the lives of the people. Bacon visited the assembled planters, and the general voice proclaimed him leader; but the expedition was not to be undertaken without the sanction and commission of the governor, and the young leader, assuming the responsibility thrust upon him, applied for the necessary warrant to proceed. The governor replied in "polite and complimentary terms" and did not send the commission; but Bacon, "of a precipitate disposition," thanked the governor for the promised commission, and set forth at the head of a force of "most good housekeepers" to achieve the signal discomfiture of the savages a few days later.

Bacon was a young man, not yet thirty, "of quality and merit, brave and eloquent, * * * master and owner of those inducements which constitute a compleat man (as to intrinsecalls), wisdom to apprehend and discretion to chuse." The governor had now reached the age of about seventy years, with the political principles of his youth no less firmly held, but with temper and judgment somewhat impaired. The temper of the times in England had not escaped his attention, and something more than a regard to the Indian trade prompted his diplomatic reply to Bacon's request. He "doubted Bacon's temper, as he was popularly inclined," and "the peoples' dispositions." His letter to Bacon had been unequivocal on the essential point of the commission; he had not sent it nor promised it, and the "popularly inclined" young cavalier's affected misunderstanding of its terms alarmed the old royalist. This was a repetition of Cromwell's rebellion in disguise, and taking a "bond of fate," the hasty viceroy fulminated a proclamation declaring Bacon and his followers rebels, and commanding them to disperse. A messenger, bearing this ominous summons, overtook the war party before it had passed the frontier; a large number of the "most good housekeepers" faltered at this summons and turned back, but the leader, with a few steadfast planters, went forward, achieved the victory, and slowly returned.

In issuing his proclamation, Gov. Berkeley assumed the whole responsibility, and forthwith raised a force of horsemen to put down the recalcitrant few. But the people had not been uninterested observers of these proceedings, and no sooner was the governor set out than his ears were assailed by the mutterings of a political storm in his rear. The lower counties had risen in rebellion, and complained not only of the defenseless state of the country against the Indians, but demanded also that the general Assembly, which had maintained its existence for fifteen years, should be dissolved, and that the forts should be dismantled.

To this higher demand the governor was forced to submit. Turning about, he returned to Jamestown, dissolved the obnoxious assembly, issued writs for a new election, and ordered the forts dismantled. Bacon, though under ban as a rebel, presented himself as a candidate for burgess from Henrico, and was elected. Throughout the colony the freemen ignored the law disfranchising them, and elected representatives of the people, among whom were some of their own class. The burgesses met in June, 1676, and Bacon, accompanied by thirty of his supporters, went to take his seat in the new assembly. This was an act of contumacy to which the governor was not prepared to submit, and the whole party was arrested; some were put in irons, and others, with Bacon, released upon parole. Certain politic people interfered; Bacon, who was a member of the council, was persuaded to acknowledge his error in proceeding against the Indians without a commission, was restored to his place in the council, and promised a commission as "general of the Indian wars."

The governor's persuasion partook too much of the nature of duress, against which the old cavalier secretly rebelled; Bacon, while ostensibly reconciled to Berkeley, had good grounds to fear that the end was not yet reached. The commission was delayed from day to day; Bacon assigned a fictitious reason for his desire to return to his plantation, and permission to retire from his duties as councillor was given by the governor, who meditated his re-arrest when thrown off his guard. Matters could not rest here; as one of his followers expressed the situation, "he was in overshoes, and must be over boots," and three or four days later Bacon returned to Jamestown at the head of some 600 armed men to demand the commission. Berkeley vainly attempted to organize a force for resistance, but the whole country rang with the name of Bacon, and the governor was forced to submit. It was force alone, however, that wrought his submission. The brave old man denounced the young leader and his followers as rebels to their faces; challenged Bacon to a single combat, and opening his clothing, invited him to deliver the fatal shot. To this indignant bravado, the "rebel" replied in language that does credit to his cause: "Sir, I came not, nor intend, to hurt a hair of your head, and, for your sword, your honor may please to put it up; it shall rust in the scabbard before I shall ever desire you to draw it. I come for a commission against the heathen, who daily inhumanly murder us, and spill our brethren's blood, and no care is taken to prevent it."

KENTUCKY INSTITUTION FOR DEAF MUTES, DANVILLE.—SEE PAGE 535.

This forced conciliation was carried to the extent of drafting a letter to the king, cordially endorsing the "rebels" and their general, which the governor and council were obliged to sign. Berkeley was not to be so easily over-reached; he wrote the king that he was "encompassed with rebellion," and besought him to send troops to support the government; he then posted his proclamation, declaring Bacon, who was then carrying devastation among the Indians in accordance with his commission, a traitor. Following the precedent of Charles I, the governor repaired to Gloucester County, and planted his banner to rally the loyal colonists in defense of the colonial interests which his excited imagination declared in peril. But the same fate followed his efforts here; Bacon was all the cry, and the disheartened old man fled to Accomack as the last resort. Here he gathered a motley crew of a few influential persons, planters, seafarers and long-shoremen, and descended upon Jamestown, which he occupied.

Bacon, astounded by the new folly of the governor, turned his back upon the enemy of the frontier, vexed to the heart "to think that while he was hunting wolves, tygers and foxes, which daily destroyed our harmless sheep and lambs, that he and those with him should be pursued with a full cry, as a more savage or a no less ravenous beast." For him the situation had indeed grown critical; he "was fallen like corn between the stones," as the old historian puts it, "so that if he did not look the better about him, he might chance be ground to powder." Happily he had "wisdom to apprehend and discretion to chuse;" he marched his forces to the middle plantation, and issued his proclamation convening all who had "any regard for themselves, or love to their country, their wives, children and other relations," to consider "Sir William's doting and irregular actings." On August 3, 1676, "most of the prime gentlemen of those parts" appeared; they were for the most part in sympathy with Bacon, but hesitated to go the length to which necessity compelled the general. To him it was death or rebellion, and yet he asked only for protection in the performance of duties for which he was duly commissioned, and which the state of the country made necessary. A "test or recognition" to be subscribed by all was agreed upon. This at first proposed that none of the subscribers should aid Berkeley in disturbing the general and his army. But Bacon demanded something more than neutrality; they must agree "to rise in arms against him, if he with armed forces should offer to resist the general; and not only so—if any forces should be sent out of England at the request of Sir William or otherways, to his aid, that they were likewise to be opposed" until the whole affair should be adjudicated by his majesty, the king. This was a startling step to the planters, not placed in such straitened circumstances as the general, but they believed in the justice of his cause, and his impassioned eloquence did the rest. The whole obligation was assumed, but with the express understanding that it was not to impair their allegiance to the crown.

His rear thus protected, the general proceeded to the frontier, and attacked and routed a tribe of savages, and then came to the "verge of the English plantations," where his troops, save a small detachment, were sent to their homes for rest. Here the news of Berkeley's coming to Jamestown, with seventeen ships and 1,000 men, startled the successful general from his dreams of peace. This meant war, and peace henceforward could be purchased only by the submission of Bacon or Berkeley. The governor had already shown the fate in store for "the general and his army" by the hanging of one of his supporters on the sea-shore, and Bacon needed no urging to prompt action. He immediately set out with his bodyguard for Jamestown, while couriers rode in all directions to summon his forces. The capital was at once besieged, and the governor, recognizing that the solid men of the country were arrayed against him, and finding the great mass of the adventurers in his ranks rapidly deserting, again fled disconsolate to Accomack.

And now the last blow was about to be struck; Accomack was to be invaded; the governor seized, and the whole matter to be referred to the king. But revolution was to be deferred for a century. Bacon, sick from exposure and the over-exertion of the year, died in October, not without a well-grounded suspicion of poisoning at the hands of his enemies. His body was buried by his friends with great secrecy that it might not be dishonored by his foes, a cautionary proceeding which foreboded the end. Deprived of the wisdom and discretion of its general, the army rapidly melted away before the prestige of the governor. One after another of the prominent supporters of the uprising were seized by Berkeley and destroyed; age had not cooled his blood, and the rebellion had made him a fury; it was believed he "would have hanged half the country if they had let him alone."

The king in the meanwhile had heard of the uproar, and in January, 1677, a fleet with a regiment of English soldiers brought a commission to settle the trouble. Even the king turned against the bloodthirsty Berkeley, and his prejudgment of the case had consigned Bacon and other prominent "rebels" to the gallows, and the governor to trial. Berkeley was recalled, summary punishment was inflicted upon prominent supporters of the general, and peace once more reigned in Virginia.

All this had passed in the space of a year; the new assembly held only a short session, but still accomplished much. The newly elected burgesses knew what was expected of them, and impartially censuring both parties to the disturbance, they proceeded to establish practical reforms; they broke up the monopoly in the Indian trade; arbitrary vestries were reorganized; official fees were regulated; the elective franchise was restored to freemen; and election returns were guarded with new restrictions. The net result of the rebellion, however, was disastrous. The form of government was seriously limited by new instructions from the king; assemblies were allowed to meet but once in two years, and then to sit but fourteen days unless for special business, and care was to be taken that the members "be elected only by freeholders." Under the new regime the reforms instituted by the Bacon assembly were nullified and nearly every abuse restored.

Sir Herbert Jeffries succeeded Berkeley; in 1678 Sir Henry Chicheley followed; in 1679 Lord Culpepper; in 1684 Lord Howard. During this period the "ancient dominion" suffered the "malignant humors of a proprietary government." The burdens of the colonists were doubled to pay the perquisites demanded, and every department of colonial activity was so oppressed by arbitrary exactions that despair nearly gave rise to another outbreak. The summary punishment of a few malcontents quieted the disturbance, and the powers of the assembly were still further restricted. In 1684, the proprietors having exhausted the plunder to be readily gotten out of the colony, Virginia became once more a royal province, destined, however, to still contribute to the ill-gotten gains of the court favorites. Howard was the first of these, and the most exorbitant fees were exacted of the colonists to supply his demands. The accession of James II in 1685 made no change in the monotonous course of despotism. Howard was continued in office and the sway of the royal prerogative reached its climax in Virginia in his administration. "The executive, the council, the judges, the sheriffs, the county commissioners and local magistrates were all appointed directly or indirectly by the crown. Virginia had no town meetings, no village democracies, no free municipal institutions. The custom of a colonial assembly remained, but it was chosen under a restricted franchise; its clerk was appointed by the governor, and its power impaired by the permanent grant of revenue which it could not recall." (Bancroft.) Such was the condition of the colonial government when the revolution of 1688, overturning the tyranny of the royal prerogative, established the supremacy of law.

On the accession of William and Mary, the assembly hastened to dispatch an agent to England to "supplicate their majesties to confirm unto the country the authority" of government "as near as may be to the model of the parliament of England." The specific stipulations of the assembly sought generally the recovery of privileges enjoyed at the date of the restoration. These " their majesties" did not hesitate to grant, and without defining the ultimate scope of the colonial assembly's authority, the royal instructions recognized it as an integral part of the Virginian government, and interfered little with its particular functions. Under this fostering toleration the colonists found themselves once more able to achieve their own destiny through a free assembly. The independent spirit of the people began to revive, and it was observed that "pernicious notions, fatal to the royal prerogative, were improving daily." Little by little affairs gravitated toward the golden age of the colony under the commonwealth, and in 1710, Gov. Spotswood noted for the information of the queen's ministers that "the inclinations of the country are rendered mysterious by a new and unaccountable humor (the Governor was born in the year of Bacon's rebellion), which hath obtained in several counties, of excluding gentlemen from being burgesses, and choosing only persons of mean figure and character."

In the meantime the elements of growth came in to restore the assembly to its early vigor. The single colony had increased to twelve, each independent of the other, but all united in the demand for the co-ordinate authority of the colonial assembly. Thus a spirit of emulation stimulated each colony to persevere by independent measures in seeking the desired end, the achievement of one proving indirectly the gain of every other. The population of Virginia had now reached about 50,000 persons, and the permanent revenue granted by the cavalier assembly, and increased under Culpepper, was no longer the menace to colonial liberties that it once was. The large increase of expenditures demanded additional supplies, which the assembly now took care to grant for limited periods, and for specifically defined purposes, the disbursements being made by their own treasurer, who acted independent of the officers of the crown. Another fact contributed to the same end; the office of governor had now become a sinecure, which was enjoyed by the appointee in England, and his lieutenant was restrained by the beneficiary, who cared for nothing so much as the perquisites of his office. Thus, under the last days of the Stuarts, the general assembly regained much of its lost power, never to lose it again.

With the accession of the house of Hanover, began a period of the grossest political corruption. The supremacy of parliament gave new prominence to the ministry, and the cabinet became gradually invested with much of the privileges which formerly accrued to the crown. Colonial appointees came to be very generally selected from the relations or dependents of persons in power, or from a class of political pirates who engaged to surrender the larger part of the legal emoluments of office for the opportunity of enriching themselves by irregular methods. The grossest abuse of official trusts followed; but plunder being the sole pursuit, these crown representatives proved less determined in their opposition to the aggressive policy of the assembly.

Legislative independence gained an advantage also at this time by the change in the official management of colonial affairs in England. In 1696 the general supervision of the colonies had been placed in the hands of the " board for trade and the plantations," consisting of certain of the ministry with eight appointed commissioners. Subsequently, the functions of this board were restricted simply to legislative and clerical duties pertaining to the administration of the colonies; in the cabinet, the American colonies were represented by the secretary of State for the southern department; and to the privy council was reserved the framing of measures to enforce the instructions of the board of trade. It thus happened that on one side was the legislative power and on the other the executive power; between them stood the secretary, necessary to connect the cause and the effect of the administration of colonial affairs, but subject to neither, and often busy with projects which led him to ignore the colonies altogether. Amid all this official circumlocution the crown could not maintain effective control of the growing insubordination of the colonies, and unsatisfactory "instructions" were easily evaded or compliance refused outright.

America was now rife with the bickerings between governor and assembly; governors came armed with instructions to the assemblies to provide "a permanent revenue, solid, definite and without limitation." This demand was refused, with more or less circumlocution, in every case. Limited grants, only in return for the sanction of legislation which gradually sapped the foundation of arbitrary power, were made, but even these were so completely guarded as to give little satisfaction to the representatives of the crown. The result was a series of complaints from the governors, and protests from the assemblies. "To preserve the dependency of America," declared the badgered and defeated officials, "the constitution must be new modelled." To this the assemblies calmly replied, basing their arguments upon the rights of all Englishmen gained through Magna Charta, and upon the co-ordinate authority of the assembly with parliament. These premises were not allowed by English statesmen, but there was that in the undemonstrative attitude of the colonies that forbade rash procedure, and the question of a fixed revenue continued to vex the souls of crown officers.

The struggle with France for the possession of the Ohio valley added its influence to bring matters to a crisis. The "great woods" was the indeterminate title which stood for the vast expanse of field and forest west of the line of the Alleghanies, from the lakes to the gulf. Traders brought the intelligence of the French quietly pushing eastward from the Illinois country, and southward from the lakes at Detroit and Niagara into the valley of the Ohio. This progress of the French people was viewed with jealousy both in England and America, but the lack of harmony between the mother country and the colonies prevented union of action. The French were keen observers of all this, and placed their dependence more upon the division of their opponents than in their own strength; "the English," said they, "can raise two men to our one; but they are too dilatory to prevent any enterprise of ours." It was the opinion of the leading men on both sides of the ocean, that the colonies should unite to resist the French, but even a liberal plan of union for this purpose, conceived by Benjamin Franklin, failed to satisfy the jealous demands of the colonies, though its independence startled the statesmen of England.

In 1754, the board of trade proposed a complicated scheme for the same purpose, the chief feature of which was "a certain and permanent revenue." No determined effort was made to materialize this proposition, and resort was finally had to the prerogative. Gen. Braddock was commissioned to take command of the American forces to be employed against the French, and the colonial governors were notified that it was the king's pleasure "that a fund be established for the benefit of all the colonies collectively in North America."

The opposition which had defeated a plan devised to meet the difficulties of the situation by one who sympathised with the colonial prejudices, was not likely to be dispelled by the king's peremptory demand. "The assembly of this dominion," said Gov. Dinwiddie, "will not be directed what supplies to grant, and will always be guided by their own free determinations; they would think any restraint or direction an insult on their privileges, that they are so fond of." When

Braddock reached America in 1755, he called a convention of the governors, and expressed his indignation "that no such fund was already established." The governors could only protest their inability to accomplish it, and the convention, in which Virginia was represented, united in a paper to the king; "such a fund," said the governors, "can never be established in the colonies without the aid of parliament. Having found it impracticable to obtain in their respective governments the proportion expected by his majesty toward defraying of his services in North America, they are unanimously of the opinion that it should be proposed to his majesty's ministers to find out some method of compelling them to do it, and of assessing the several governments in proportion of their respective abilities." This was fatal advice; and the initiatory act of the inevitable conflict thus clearly defined was reserved for the reckless ministry of that royal bigot who,

> Like the base Indian threw a pearl away,
> Richer than all his tribe.

In the end, while the colonies declined the proposition of the ministry, they consented to loan the English government sufficient to carry on that struggle which left no barrier to the English sway between the Gulf of Mexico and the North Pole.

Thus matters stood when George III came to the throne of England in October, 1760; a sovereign who sought to revive theories of government that had practically been laid aside for three-quarters of a century; and who thrust the royal dictum in the face of a defiant nation, whose power was but vaguely guessed.

At this time Virginia was the most docile of the English colonies; the governor and council were appointees of the crown; they constituted the court of last appeal in the colony, and the lower courts were held by judges appointed by the governor and held office during his pleasure. Admirality courts, a later invention of the trade laws, were constituted by the lords of admirality in England, while the comptroller and collectors of customs, found in every considerable harbor, were appointed by the commissioners of customs; officers of the militia and magistrates were appointed by the governor. The elective franchise was still confined to freeholders, and the assembly consisted of two houses sitting separately, the burgesses and the council of state. There was less of bickering between governor and assemby than in other colonies, but no more subservience to the royal prerogative. The governor holding his office as a sinecure, exercised a wholesome restraint upon his lieutenant, and the permanent grants to the crown removed the oft recurring collision which agitated the less loyal colonies.

The cavaliers were still here, and the old sentiment of loyalty to the mother country was still the prevailing one, but the royal policy was rapidly blending the classes that had been widely separated in 1676, and immigration was gradually reinforcing the yeomanry. The sturdy emigrants whom royal oppression was driving out of Scotland, Ireland and Germany were finding homes in the valley, and settling on the frontier, far from the restraints and influences of the older centers of civilization; were drawing in the inspiration of freedom from the very atmosphere of woodland homes. The "man of the people" had arisen, and initial opposition to royal tyranny was to be transferred from the representatives to the constituency.

In 1763 Patrick Henry declared, in the famous "parson's cause," that the burgesses were "the only authority which could give force to the laws for the government of this colony," and denounced the king as a tyrant amid the cries of treason from the opposing counsel. In 1765 he offered five resolutions in the assembly opposed to the stamp act of parliament, the purport of which was summed up in the conclusion that "the general assembly of this colony has the sole right and power to lay taxes and impositions on the inhabitants of this colony." The assembly still counseled delay, but the passionate eloquence of Henry, with which he declared amid cries of treason, "Cæsar had his Brutus, Charles the First his Cromwell, and George the Third may profit by their example," precipitated action. Gov. Fauquier dissolved the independent assembly which had caught the sentiment of the people, but freedom had gained a voice, never to be stifled. Jefferson, the "apostle of Democracy," reinforced Henry, and the people under these leaders swept away opposition. But this was not a converting power; the cavalier element had resisted the eloquence of Bacon, and democracy had no charm for the gentlemen in powdered wigs and ruffles of lace who still exerted the dominant influence in colonial affairs. The ruthless policy of the king supplied the deficiency; the indiscriminating oppression of trade laws afforded the bond of union which made the colonies practically unanimous for independence.

On the accession of Charles I, Virginia, whose population was less than 3,000, had no trade of importance save to itself. Tobacco was the only staple source of income, and this product was shut out of the whole world save England. In the closing years of the preceding reign, the colony with the Somer Islands—Bermuda—enjoyed the monopoly of this market, which was confirmed by Charles. The increasing growth of the colony, together with the stimulated production, soon glutted the restricted market; the price of tobacco gradually declined, and the utmost distress afflicted the colonists. Tobacco was then the circulating medium of exchange, the money of the country, and continued the standard of business exchanges, with slight exceptions, until 1656. The evil grew under the administration of Harvey, and under his successor a "stint" was resorted to for relief. The whole product of the colony was limited to 1,500,000 pounds of tobacco; the rotten, unmerchantable and half the good crop was legally burned. The two years following, the whole product was limited to 1,300,000 pounds, and "all creditors were to take forty pounds for a hundred."

During the rule of the commonwealth rigorous navigation laws were enacted, but under the toleration which Cromwell accorded to all colonial affairs, these were evaded, and Virginia enjoyed "as free trade as the people of England." Trade with the Indians, which had been trammeled with license, was made free, and the traffic with the Dutch was conducted under a slight cover of evasion. Under the reign of Charles II, however, a radical change was effected. The "navigation acts" restored the commercial restrictions of the commonwealth, and, under the closer scrutiny of a royal regime, became a mighty engine of grinding oppression.

By these acts it was provided that "no merchandise shall be imported into the plantation but in English vessels, navigated by Englishmen, under penalty of forfeiture." The greed of the English merchant was not yet satisfied; the carrying of trade was monopolized, and the trade in supplies to the colonies practically secured, but now the privilege of fixing the price of colonial products was demanded, and so such American products as did not compete with English industries were restricted to the market of England under penalty of forfeiture. These products were specifically named, others being added as developed, and included all the staples of the country. Again, in 1663, lines were more strictly drawn; there was danger that the trade in supplies might be partially diverted, notwithstanding the English had command of the carrying trade, and supplies were required to be bought in England alone. This left the colonies still the privilege of supplying each other so far as their limited resources would allow, but in 1763 this last vestige of privilege was cut off; traffic between the colonies was made subject to a duty equal to that placed upon the same commodities in England.

Against these oppressions Virginia could make no formidable resistance; against them and the system of government which made them possible, Bacon entered his protest by force of arms, and the near success of the rebellion showed how far these measures had united the sentiments of royalists and people. Its failure prevented the "consummation devoutly to be wished;" the cavaliers returned to the support of royal tyranny, and the people to the galling yoke of oppression. The royal favorite conceived that the growth of the colony would be accelerated by the establishment of towns, and certain town sites were appointed from which all tobacco should be shipped. The penalties affixed to disobedience of these laws were so severe as to drive traders out of the country, and small planters, unable to market their crop, saw the fruit of their labor rot on their premises or wrested from them by the minions of the law. Complaints remained unredressed, and despair drove the poor and ignorant to destroy the growing plant wherever found when the season was too far advanced to replant. Then followed the attacks upon the privileges of the assembly, which united all classes again in opposition to the despotic measures of the king, only to again fall apart under the seductive smiles of the royal representative. But each time the division between the classes grew less.

The revolution of 1688 brought relief to the strained situation, and free trade once more sprang into existence. This forestalled rebellion, but did not bring freedom from oppression. The wasted energies of the people and country were restored, and something of prosperity began to dawn, when, in 1696, commercial tyranny was again brought back to power. New inventions added rigor to its enforcement. It was provided that even after the payment of export duties products should not be taken to a foreign market, and customs officials were authorized to enter warehouse and wharf to enforce these stipulations. Still the fear of evasion haunted the commercial oligarchs, and courts of admiralty were established "that offences against these acts of navigation might no longer be decided by judge and jurors who were themselves often the greatest offenders."

But in spite of these inventions, or rather in direct result of this tyranny, the colonists began to turn their resources to domestic account. "The people" it was said, "more of necessity than of inclination, attempted to clothe themselves with their own manufactures." In 1699, therefore, a blow was aimed, at domestic manufactures, lest the flocks and fireside industries should "inevitably sink the value of the lands" in England. Hence it was enacted that "after the first day of December, 1699, no wool, or manufactures made or mixed with wool, being the product or manufacture of any of the English plantations in America, shall be loaden in any ship or vessel, upon any pretext whatsoever—nor loaden upon any horse, cart or other carriage—to be carried out of the English plantations to any other of the said plantations, or to any other place whatsoever." Still, in 1719, it was reported of the colonies that "the inhabitants worked up their wool and flax, and made a coarse cloth for their own use; that they manufactured great part of their leather; that they were hatters in the maritime towns; and that six furnaces and nineteen forges were set up for making iron." This called forth renewed restrictions, and every manufacture was forbidden, save those of bolts and nails, a concession reluctantly granted to the long and determined opposition of the northern colonies. And thus the monotonous course of commercial oppression was pursued until even hops were allowed to be shipped only to England.

The grievous burdens entailed by this policy were rendered the more intolerable because they resulted in no revenue to the English government. The colonists were bred to support vampires; the trade enriched the English merchant, while the system gave origin to and supported "a crew of villains," who did not hesitate "to betray his (the king's) interests and break the acts of trade," provided they could make greater gains from bribes than from the exorbitant fees they were authorized to exact and retain. This state of affairs was not unknown to the home government, but the system, it was thought, served a purpose other than to provide revenue, equally desirable; it was declared in a resolution of parliament that "the erecting of manufactories in the colonies tended to lessen their dependence."

There could be no greater mistake either in political economy or in theory of government. As was declared by a colonial agent, "London" indeed "arose out of the plantations, and not out of England," but as a means of continuing the dependence of the colonies the policy was a conspicuous failure. The "most pernicious doctrines" increased daily under this oppression; Massachusetts was declared to be "a kind of commonwealth, where the king is hardly a stadholder," and royal governors repeated the same story elsewhere. The ministry was repeatedly warned that "the American assemblies aimed at nothing less than being independent of Great Britain as fast as they could."

The colonies were in this attitude, when England, burdened with the cost of continental wars, sought relief from the expense of colonial maintenance. The stupendous trade folly brought in no revenue; the colonists refused a fixed and permanent fund; and now a direct tax was proposed. Independence, which had disturbed the imagination of royal governors from one end of the country to the other, and which Franklin declared could not be achieved "unless they (the colonies) could first strengthen themselves by a confederation of all the parts," was about to be accomplished through the agency of its opponents. The stamp act was passed to raise a revenue; it was resisted and repealed. Then followed the duty laid on paper, glass and tea, for the same purpose; this was resisted, and again England conceded all but the principle—the cause of resistance. The duty on tea alone was retained, and the English premier declared, "a total repeal cannot be thought of till America is prostrate at our feet." The issue was now made up; freeman and cavalier, Puritan and churchman, proprietary and royal colony, north and south—all united in resistance. The war was inevitable. "Virginia gave the signal to the continent" in 1765, and ten years later declared, "the cause of Boston is the cause of all."

Virginia did not live entirely on the surface of political agitation, however. The old-time adventurers amid many vicissitudes had taken a deep root in its soil, and during the nearly two centuries which had elapsed at this time, had developed the thrifty State which now defied its king. In the preceding pages have been traced the causes which transformed the English colonist into an American patriot; similar causes in other colonies wrought a similar result. The Virginian exhibited no striking marks of individuality in this development; the people of the thirteen colonies were of common stock, and were actuated by common motives to seek the same end, but here the cognate development ended, and individuality began. In the home influences, in the limitations of nature, and in social traditions, Virginia had a marked individuality which prevailed through all these years, and which made itself felt as a molding influence upon the nation that grew out of that oppression which "effaced the boundaries of the several colonies."

In 1628, Virginia was a colony of 3,000 inhabitants; it had just passed from the dominion of a proprietary company to that of the king; its people were composed of indented servants, freemen, tenants, planters, and a few large landholders. A large majority of the people came to the New World with no capital but their own industry, and with no prestige save their own achievements. The class of indented servants, at times reinforced by new importations, was gradually changing, the laws tending to facilitate their early enfranchisement, when they became eligible for any elective office. Planters were generally settled upon lands held under a not burdensome quit-rent, but were gradually acquiring freeholds. The liberal land laws allowed settlers to locate lands at their own pleasure; and settling widely apart, without the natural rendezvous of towns, the forms and restraints of society had scarcely become established, and the colonists early imbibed a carelessness of government to which the adventurous character of a large part of the population naturally inclined them. The people were not without governmental traditions, however; they were Englishmen by birth, and rendered willing allegiance; they had come to the New World under the combined patronage of all the ruling classes of England, and brought with them a matured prejudice for English institutions. They looked to the mother country as the model after which the institutions of the new State should be fashioned; a monarchical form of government, an established church, and a privileged aristocracy were sought as advantages.

During the reign of Charles I, "possessed of security and quiet, abundance of land, a free market for their staples, and having England for their guardian against foreign oppression, rather than their ruler, the colonists enjoyed all the prosperity which a virgin soil, equal laws and general uniformity of condition and industry could bestow." (Bancroft). During this halcyon period the population rapidly increased, until, in 1650, it was estimated at 20,000 souls. This resulted largely from immigration, but the colonial statute book notes also that "among other blessings God Almighty hath vouchsafed increase of children to this colony."

The following decade proved equally propitious to the happy development of the colony, the population increasing fifty per cent. The widespread story of its prosperity challenged the attention of all classes; it was accounted "the best poor man's country in the world;" loyalists of rank, education and wealth found it a congenial asylum; and travelers from England, charmed with the milder climate, the profusion of game, and the beauty of new birds and flowers, united to confirm the opinion that "if a happy peace be settled in poor England, then they in Virginia shall be as happy a people as any under Heaven." Once settled in the country, the immigrant thought no more of returning. Land was cheap and abundant; waterfowl thronged the sedgy streams; fish swarmed in the rivers; thousands of quail and turkeys supplied a new delicacy; and oysters "heaped together in inexhaustible beds" cost only the gathering. Such abundance gave rise to a lavish hospitality which became proverbial, and leisure, following the possession of wealth, found no difficulty in transferring the sports of the old country to the new. The prolific forests furnished unstinted shooting, while the chase and race track followed the increase of horses, the improvement of which was early fostered by legislation.

The restoration found the early planted germ of aristocracy well developed. Estates of 1,000 acres were not infrequent; the colonial governor maintained a brick house at the capital, and a manor-house on his large estate, provided with plate, servants, carriages, and orchards, in which he counted 1,500 apple trees, besides apricots, peaches, pears, etc. Silk and lace, fashionable attire, official trappings, English furniture, wine and books were the rule among the dominant class. The success of the commonwealth had contributed large numbers of cavaliers to colonial society, as many as 330 coming in one ship. These persons were "among the nobility, clergy, and gentry," and brought with them the prejudices and habits of this class in the mother country. The loyalty of the colony and the readiness with which the conditions of the New World lent themselves to the disposition of the cavaliers made them a permanent acquisition to the colony, and social forms as well as material prosperity soon showed the result of their molding influence. The "general uniformity of social condition" underwent a striking change. The simplicity of frontier life gave way to the courtly bearing of the aristocracy and the subservient politeness of peasantry; the democratic log home of the wealthy was replaced by the manor-house or frame dwelling of the well-to-do planter; and imported elegancies vied with the native luxuries in their grand entertainments.

With the accession of the large cavalier immigration Virginia possessed two classes of people, which had been distinct in England, and which must, in the natural order of things, be distinct in the colony. The great mass of the colonists were drawn from the middle and lower walks of English life, a considerable number was originally indented servants, and had become freemen, while some had been transported on criminal charges, though principally of political offenses. The more successful of these original colonists formed the middle class in Virginia, and insisted no less upon their privileges than the cavalier class. This system of gradation was further emphasized by "the almost general want of schools." "Every man instructs his children according to his ability," wrote the governor; a system calculated to perpetuate ignorance in a community where few had any education save that gained by daily experience. The wealthy fared better; their children were sent to England or provided with tutors, supplied from the clergy, who gave instruction at their homes.

In such a community only the nicest adjustment of the balance of power could prevent the intelligent and privileged classes from assuming the supreme and undivided control of affairs. The lower classes, however, had gained something by the change of continents which could not be sequestered by the advent of an aristocracy, and the sterling character, practical good sense and independent spirit of the common people were not readily overawed by the large domain, superior intelligence, and gentle breeding of the favored class. And so, during the rule of the commonwealth, the equipoise was maintained; the commoners sat in the assembly and resisted the encroachments of the governors in right democratic fashion, while the aristocracy molded the social institutions, instructed themselves in the prestige of Old World traditions, and awaited the expected return of a royal administration.

The restoration of Charles II was the signal for their advancement to full power; the commoners naturally retired with the commonwealth, and the royalists came in with the return of royalty. The first assembly elected under the restored king's reign was composed almost solely of the cavalier element; but this portentous change did not then occasion serious consideration—it was of the eternal fitness of things, and the colony had not yet learned the folly of trusting in princes. The legislation which followed was not the suggestion of revenge, nor a greedy grasp at unwarrantable power. The cavalier believed in the jus divinum of kings not more absolutely than in the jus divinum of king's men; and in freeing the governor from incidental restraint, in securing to the burgess independence of his obligations to constituents, in the restriction of the elective franchise, and in augmenting the arbitrary power of the church, the royalist only carried out the precepts of a form of government which all the people saw restored with satisfaction. It was the only proper thing in the view of the restored refugees, and the cavalier governor for the same reason found in the absence of means for popular education a cause for congratulation. "I thank God," said Berkeley, "there are no free schools or printing; and I hope we shall not have these hundred years; for learning has brought disobedience and heresy and sects into the world and printing has divulged them, and libel against the best government. God keep us from both."

The people, however, did not accept these logical deductions of the restoration; the free air of the New World had educated them to a point which made them refuse to accept the position accorded to them by the institutions of the Old World. They complained, and when fortune gave them a capable leader, they rebelled. It is true that the disaffection caused by the wanton policy of the king reinforced the people by a goodly contingent of the cavalier element, but had the charter they sought been granted. had they, "for the future" been secured "from our fears of being enslaved," it is safe to say fewer cavaliers would have given Bacon moral support, as in fact very few were under arms. At the death of "the generall" the rebellion failed, not for lack of victory nor of capable leaders among the cavaliers who had given the cause moral support, but for the lack of such a leader to assert the rights of the commons. On their return to power the cavaliers systematically undid the whole work of the Bacon assembly, and sat quietly by until the outraged representative of royalty disgraced his manhood as well as his office in his quasi legal butcheries; until, as the king said: "That old fool has hanged more men in that naked country then I have done for the murder of my father." If indeed the cavalier element did sympathise with the people in their rebellion, they were the most miserable paltroons recorded in history. The preponderating evidence is to the contrary; in a fit of pique they maintained neutrality; the rebellion failing, they returned to their natural vocation of ruling the people in their own way.

In 1670 the governor reported the condition of the colony to the lords commissioners of foreign plantations. There are 40,000 people in Virginia, of whom 6,000 are white, and 2,000 are black servants; the freemen muster monthly in every county, and number more than "8,000 horse;" five forts—two on the James River and one each on the York, Rappahannock and Potomac Rivers, are armed with thirty cannon; of shipping there are some eighty vessels from England and Ireland yearly, and a few "ketches" from New England; of home shipping there is none, as neither "small nor great vessels are built here, for we are most obedient to all laws, whilst the New England men break through and trade to any place that their interest leads them to."

This is the outline. Bancroft writes in the details under date of 1674, as follows: "the paths were bridle-ways rather than roads; and highway surveyors aimed at nothing more than to keep them clear of logs and fallen trees. There was not an engineer in the country. I doubt if there existed what we should call a bridge in the whole dominion. Visits were made in boats or on horseback; and the Virginian, traveling with his pouch of tobacco for currency, swam the rivers when there was neither ford nor ferry. Almost every planter was his own mechanic. The houses, for the most part of one story and made of wood, often of logs, the windows closed by shutters for want of glass, were sprinkled at great distance on both sides of the Chesapeake. There was hardly such a sight as a cluster of three dwellings. Jamestown was but a place of a State House, one church and eighteen houses, occupied by about a dozen families. Till very recently the legislature had assembled in the hall of an ale house. Virginia had neither towns nor lawyers. A few of the wealthier planters lived in braver state at their large plantations surrounded by indented servants and slaves."

In the period succeeding the English revolution the "people" gradually came back to power; "pernicious notions" increased so rapidly that, in 1710, certain counties discarded "gentlemen" in their choice of burgesses and sent "persons of mean character and figure" to represent them. Immigration, which almost ceased during the troubled times of Bacon's rebellion, set in again with increased numbers. The disfranchisement of dissenters in England stimulated emigration by which the colony gained considerable accessions of a kind which strengthened the opposition to arbitrary or privileged power. The divine right of king's-men was no longer supported by the instructions of the crown, and the grinding oppression of the "navigation acts" was gradually effacing the political lines of colonial classes. Settlements were pushing into the interior; a colony of Huguenots had settled, in 1699, on the upper James River; a colony of "Germans of Palatines," sent over by Queen Anne to aid in the manufacture of wine and iron, were settled on the Rapidan; and yet, with about 100,000 population, the colony, "as to outward appearance, looks all like a wild desert." In 1680 the assembly sought to correct the evil to commerce by this dispersion of settlements and selected a site in each of the twenty counties for a village, and brought all the power of legislation to encourage their growth, but not more than three or four of these sites contained villages at the time of the Revolution.

Under the house of Hanover the progress of colonization received a powerful influence from the disturbed state of Europe; Germans came in large numbers; in 1728 Ireland was in a ferment; "people every day engaging one another to go the next year to the West Indies," i. e. the British colonies; and colonial authorities were "very much surprised at the vast crowd of people pouring in upon us from the north of Ireland." An important part of this immigration came by way of Pennsylvania, and attracted by the fertility of the Shenandoah valley, began to make settlements in the lower part of it, extending above the present site of Winchester. This tide came in about 1732, and consisted chiefly of Scotch-Irish Presbyterians. Following closely in their wake came the Germans, settling, still further up the valley, the village of Strasburg recalling in its name the nationality of its founders. These new settlers were generally divided among three religious sects: Lutheran, Mennonists and Calvinists; and so completely did they occupy the country, that the native language and customs long maintained their purity against the innovating influences of the new country. Winchester was the dividing line between the two nationalities, and St. Patrick's day and the festival of "St. Michael, the patron of the Dutch," regularly occasioned collisions of opposing partisans. In 1736, the valley was entered by Virginians, who followed up the James River to the fertile land beyond the Blue Ridge. These were almost entirely of Scotch-Irish Presbyterians driven from Ulster by English oppression. Thus the wooded slopes of the mountain ridge and the fertile valley beyond were settled by a class of sturdy dissenters, dissenting not only to an established church, but also to a political system founded only on the divine right of kings and kings'-men.

Thus the American Revolution found Virginia a thrifty agricultural State in spite of the burdens it had borne; its population a vigorous people but less homogeneous than in New England, and its social institutions a type of England in new environments. The counties, in 1652 thirteen in number, and in 1680, twenty, had gradually increased to seventy-four: thirty-five on the tide-waters or in that parallel; twenty-three between the tide-water counties and the Blue Ridge Mountains; eight between the Blue Ridge and the Alleghany Mountains; and eight west of the latter range. There were no townships, and village growth was still greatly retarded by the character of the country. The lowlands, intersected by numerous navigable streams, allowed trade to find its way to the very doors of the people, and limited the necessity for merchants and distributing points. Williamsburg, the seat of government for over eighty years, never contained over 1,800 inhabitants; and Norfolk, the most populous town the colony ever had, numbered but 6,000 people. Besides these leading towns there were some twenty-four more or less vigorous villages; on the James River and its tributaries were Portsmouth, Hampton, Suffolk, Smithfield, Petersburg, Richmond, Manchester, Charlottesville and New London; on the York River and tributaries, were York, New Castle, Hanover; on the Rappahannock, Urbana, Port Royal, Fredericksburg, Falmouth; on the Potomac and tributaries, Dumfries, Colchester, Alexandria, Winchester, Staunton; and on the Ohio, Louisville (1780). There were other places "where the laws have said there shall be towns; but nature has said there shall not." Tobacco was still the great staple production of the country; but the later immigration had not taken kindly to its culture, and wheat and stock-raising occupied the attention of the larger part of the valley farmers.

Of internal development, the keenly critical Jefferson writes (Notes on Virginia, 1781): "Private buildings are very rarely constructed of stone or brick, much the greatest portion of scantling and boards, plastered with lime. It is impossible to devise things more ugly, uncomfortable and, happily, more perishable. There are two or three plans, on one of which, according to its size, most of the houses in the State are built. The poorest people build huts of logs laid horizontally in pens, stopping the interstices with mud. The wealthy are attentive to the raising of vegetables, but very little so to fruits. The poorer people attend to neither, living principally on milk and animal diet. The only public buildings worthy of mention are the capital, the palace, and the hospital for lunatics. * * * There are no other public buildings but churches and court houses, in which no attempts are made at elegance. Indeed, it would not be easy to execute such an attempt, as workmen could scarcely be found here capable of drawing an order. The genius of architecture seems to have shed its maledictions over this land. Buildings are often erected by individuals, of considerable expense. To give these symmetry and taste would not increase their cost, * * * would often cost less than the burthen of barbarous ornament with which these buildings are sometimes charged."

The old social regime was in its prime; the large immigration in the second quarter of the eighteenth century had given rise to two societies, in popular terms: the "Cohees" of the mountains and valley, and the "Tuckahoes" of the lowlands. The former were the hardy frontiersmen who lived the adventurous life of the pioneer, pressing westward over the Alleghanies into the "great woods" in daily combat with wild men and beasts; the latter made up of 'longshoremen of Accomack and the seaboard, the small landholder—the yeomen of Virginia—the merchant or factor of the towns and the planters on the James and York. Social forms had been settled at the beginning of the century, but since then its grooves had been fixed, and customs were planted upon a foundation that promised perpetuity. A spirit of mutual toleration had grown and flourished under the varying experiences of the century, and in political sentiment there was general unanimity; social classifications had originated in the natural "love of ease and rule in Virginia character." "Nabobs," a term of ridicule applied to the wealthy planters by their opponents, were numerous in the lowlands, and lived in a luxurious and ostentatious style. Many possessed immense estates held under the rigorous laws of entail, while others acquired them through their own talents and enterprise. A sumptuous six-oared barge or a coach and four were the familiar means of travel; two-horse carriages were rare. At the capitol a ceremonious hospitality was dispensed with lavish hand; liveried servants did the bidding of the host; plate and china decked the table; the rarest wines of England cheered the guest; and an imported chef directed the cuisine, which the luxuriance of the country amply supplied with every delicacy. On his own estate the planter "was a feudal patriarch mildly ruling everybody; drank wholesome wine, sherry or canary of his own importation; entertained every one; held great festivities at Christmas, with huge log-fires in the great fire-places, around which the family clan gathered; and everybody, high and low, seemed to be happy." All luxuries were imported from England in exchange for tobacco, which was loaded from warehouses on the river bank into the ship's hold. Nothing was manufactured in the colony. The passion for country life was universal. Gov. Spotswood is pictured by the historian of the period (Hon. William Byrd of Westover) as residing at "Temple Farm;" the rooms of his manor house are "elegantly set off with pier glasses," and adorned with bric-a-brac; two tame deer enjoy the freedom of the house, and "one of the handsomest and easiest chariots made in London" provides a means of conveyance for himself, family and friends.

During the session of the assembly it was very much the habit of planters to come to the capital with their families to enjoy the gaiety of the season. The original capital was fixed at Jamestown; the "city" was twice destroyed by fire, and in 1698, when the capitol and prison were again burned, Lieut.-Gov. Nicholson removed the seat of government to the middle plantation, where he laid out the town of Williamsburg. The original plan of the town was a monogram composed of the initial letters of the reigning sovereigns—William and Mary. The plan was not fully carried out, but the village became the centre of political and social influences. It "consisted of Gloucester Street, the main thoroughfare, with the old capitol at one end and William and Mary College at the other, Palace Street debouching upon it, and a few others, as in undeveloped towns." (Cooke). The capitol was a two storied building, "a light airy structure" according to Jefferson, "with a portico in front, of two orders;" it was architecturally inaccurate in its construction, yet on the whole it was the pleasantest piece of architecture in the colony. In this building the use of fire, candles and tobacco were forbidden, least it should share the fate of its predecessors.

The college, established in 1693, and later provided with a home at the capital, and the lunatic asylum built here, were "rude, misshapen piles, which, but that they have roofs would be taken for brick kilns." Near Gloucester Street was the palace, which the burgesses, in 1710, grateful for the concession of the writ of habeas corpus, granted Spotswood £2,000 to build. The structure was not handsome without, but spacious and commodious within; was "prettily situated" with grounds embracing some 300 acres, set with lindens and other trees. Among other notable buildings of the old capital, were the "old magazine" built by the same governor in 1716, a stone octagon in which were stored muskets and powder, and the "Raleigh Tavern on Gloucester Street, a building of wood erected in 1700, with entrances on both fronts, and a leaden bust of Sir Walter Raleigh over the main doorway." A large apartment, called the "Apollo Room," is a historic feature of this structure; this was the favorite place for dancing; here were given inaugural balls, and assembly receptions; and here the burgesses, dissolved by the irate governor, deliberated on revolutionary topics.

In the fashionable season, "Gloucester Street was an animated spectacle of coaches and four, containing the 'Nabobs' and their dames, of maidens in silk and lace with high heeled shoes and clocked stockings; of youths passing on spirited horses—and all these people are engaged in attending the assemblies at the palace, in dancing in the Apollo, in snatching the pleasure of the moment, and enjoying life under a regime which seemed made for enjoyment. The love of official intercourse had been a marked trait of the Virginians in all generations, and at the middle of the century the instinct had culminated. The violins seemed to be ever playing for the divertisement of the youths and maidens; the good horses were running for the purse or cup; cocks were fighting; the college students were mingling with the throng in their 'academic dress;' and his serene Excellency, in his fine coach, drawn by six milk white horses, goes to open the house of burgesses, after which he will sternly dissolve them."*

Of this royalist "Nabob" class, but few were actual Tories during the Revolutionary struggle. Some quite naturally were disposed to favor conciliatory measures to the last moment; while others, among whom were Washington, Mason, the Lees, Pendleton, Peyton, Edmund Randolph, Cary, Madison and Monroe, were foremost in their opposition to the royal prerogative. But the asserted equality of mankind, as applied to the issue between assembly and parliament, was, to many of this class, only an assertion of the equality of the jus divinum of kings and king's-men. Democracy became an inevitable though unwelcome consequence of the revolutionary spirit which they had helped to evoke, and which Jefferson guided with inexorable logic. The application of the principles of the Revolution to social institutions, therefore, aroused the most spirited opposition. On the fourth day of the first legislature under revolutionary auspices, Jefferson introduced a bill for establishing a free judiciary, and three days later a bill to convert estates in tail into fee simple. This measure was opposed by a strong minority, and forced to run the gauntlet of various amendments calculated to preserve the principle; it finally passed by a bare majority. The nature of the contest is explained in Mr. Jefferson's reason for the bill; that "instead of an aristocracy of wealth, (of more harm and danger than benefit to society), to make an opening for the aristocracy of virtue and talent * * was deemed essential to a well ordered republic." This law of entail had been more strongly guarded in Virginia than in England, and had been a powerful instrument in building up the aristocratic class. The passage of the bill abolishing this law, and another measure introduced by Jefferson abolishing primogeniture and the Salic principle in the laws of inheritence, did more to loosen the hold of the aristocracy upon Virginia society than all the liberal constitutional changes effected.

The original constitution made only slight changes in the form of government; it did not extend the elective franchise, and mentioned the church only to exclude "all ministers of the gospel" from membership in the assembly. The established church, however, was a matter which was not to be allowed to pass in silence. In the last article of the bill of rights, Mason gave expression to the undoubted sentiments of the "people;" the people believed "all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion," and the first legislature received numerous petitions for relief from the assessments in support of the established church. In this session Jefferson introduced a bill for the relief of dissenters, and brought on a contest which lasted from the 11th of October, 1776, to the 5th of December following. No other innovation of the Revolutionary period provoked a contest so obstinate, or aroused so bitter feelings—for the time. It was in fact, the initial act in a new movement, which, after a contest of 134 years, sustained by the established church with unvarying success, was about to give victory to the large and growing class of dissenters.

*"Virginia: a History of the People," by John Esten Cooke, a work to which the preceding pages are largely indebted for the description of Virginia society.

The Church of England came with the first colonists as a part of their equipment provided by the company, and was accepted as a feature which no well furnished community should be without. The first minister in the colony was Robert Hunt, "an honest, religious and courageous divine" in the opinion of the rough old soldier writers of the time. He was succeeded by Mr. Bucke, Mr. Wickham, Mr. Whitaker and others. They were men of irreproachable character, and actuated by the true missionary spirit. The latter was especially unselfish in his devotion to the colony, and is known as "the apostle of Virginia." Under the ministry of these men, the churches at Jamestown, Henrico, Smithfield, Bruton, and the Blanford Churches at Williamsburg and Petersburg were founded. For years the subject of dissent did not agitate the colonial government. Delaware set an ostentatious example of church going, attending services accompanied by his staff and "fifty halberdbearers in red clocks." In 1611, Dale came armed with "stripes for negligence and death for infidelity," but dissent had not yet sprung up.

The church became a subject of legislation as early as 1624, when it was decreed that the whole colony should conform; "both in canons and constitution, to the Church of England;" parishes were laid off, to each of which was assigned a minister with a fixed salary of tobacco. Up to 1630, the presence of dissenters had not attracted hostile attention; on the contrary, the puritans were invited to leave their sterile country and settle in the more favored land of Virginia. The first of this sect came to the colony as early as 1619, and a considerable company of these people was prevented from coming at the same time only through the interposition of the Archbishop of Canterbury. At the coming of Berkeley in 1642, their numbers were sensibly felt by the jealous churchman, and were considered almost as objectionable as papists. Against the latter the commander of the fort at Point Comfort was directed, in 1632, to administer the oath of allegiance and supremacy to all passengers of ships arriving there from abroad, and to commit any refusing the oath to prison.

Berkeley was "very malignant toward the way of the churches" and exercised his ample powers freely to keep the established church pure and undefiled by dissent. In 1643, the assembly pronounced the sentence of banishment against the "Independents," as they called themselves; they were forbidden to teach or preach publicly or privately unless comformable to the "orders and constitution of the Church of England," and directed to "be compelled to depart out of the colony with all convenience," when notified. The governor lost no time in giving the notification by proclamation, and large numbers were "compelled" to leave Virginia finding an asylum in catholic Maryland and elsewhere. Notwithstanding these rigorous measures against the "Independents," dissent still continued to be a subject of complaint by zealous churchmen, but there were grave difficulties in the way of persistent persecution. As time passed on other matters engaged the attention of the governor; the zealous complainants found themselves in a hopeless minority; and, for ministers, the governor reported, in 1670, "the worst are sent us," who would do well to "pray oftener and preach less."

The criticism in regard to the character of the ministers was one of long standing. In 1632, the assembly thought it neccessary to warn them not to "give themselves to excess in drinking or riot, playing at dice, cards, or any unlawful game," and the governor found few to boast of "since Cromwell's tyranny drove divers men hither." It seems, therefore, that the successors of the early eminent divines were illy calculated to build up the church; but there was also another difficulty in the great extent of the parish. Some of these extended over more than one of the large early counties, a distance in a single direction of more than fifty miles. Such a field was not inviting to those who were qualified to fill the better places in England, and so Virginia was principally dependent upon such as could do no better. Under such circumstances dissent flourished, and was ignored, and "neither surplice nor subscription spoken of."

The government, at times, aroused itself from this course of tolerant inaction and leveled its stern decrees against the obnoxious sects, but only eventually to stimulate their growth, as the established church possessed scarcely vigor enough to keep dissent out of its own pulpits. In 1650, the loyal colony, alarmed at the progress of dissent in England, and fearing the effect of the development of the puritan element in Virginia, again banished the nonconformists. The church was too weak, however, to lend any valuable assistance to these efforts; meeting-houses were to be found only in the heart of the colony, although there were some forty-eight parishes; and ministers, though "well paid," were so few that a bounty was offered by the assembly to secure the immigration of more. After the restoration, the most rigorous legislation was resorted to in aid of the church; the whole liturgy was required "to be thoroughly read," and the ministry provided for by granting the vestry extraordinary power. In the last measure the zealous churchmen overreached themselves; the burdens imposed by these exacting vestries was an important cause which contributed to the armed dissent of Bacon. And so the church fared for half a century; the colony in 1684 driven to the verge of treason in their alarm at the papist tendencies of James II, and in 1710 in "gentlemanly conformity to the Church of England."

The great tide of immigration which flowed into Virginia in 1732, brought in a powerful element of dissent, the old "Tuscorora Meeting House" and the "Opequon Church" remaining for years the enduring evidence that their religious faith was not left behind nor inactive in the wilderness. This population was composed chiefly of Scotch and Irish Presbyterians and German Lutherans, Mennonists and Calvinists. All this class of dissenters, while conscientious, law-abiding people, were in sentiments and tastes as much opposed as possible to the easy-going gaiety-loving Episcopalians of the lowlands. While "dancing and other amusements," according to the historian of the valley (Kercheval), "were common, and were sometimes kept up for weeks together," they were deeply in earnest, and the solicitous churchmen declared that "paganism, atheism, and sectaries" threatened the solidity of the church, and created "faction in the civil government." Various remedies were suggested; prominent among these was the appointment of a resident prelate, and at one time "all the hopes of Jonathan Swift terminated in the bishopric of Virginia." Sectarians, however, continued to increase; the Episcopal clergy, secure for life in their glebes and salaries, devoted the Sabbath only to the care of their parishes, and gave the balance of the week to the cultivation of their estates or other remunerative employment; their character, also, was still the subject of grave and not unfounded suspicion. In direct contrast with the churchmen, the zeal of sectarian missionaries made their untiring efforts to be felt in all parts of the upland country, where it was largely an open and undisputed field.

The general deadness of the Church of England gave rise to the Methodists, who sought rather to infuse life into it than to overturn it. In 1740, the "new light stir" reached Virginia, and under the powerful preaching of Whitfield, disrupted dissenting sects as well as the established church, and drew thousands to its ranks. The Presbyterians were active in the colony as early as the beginning of the eighteenth century, but a presbytery was not established until 1755; the Baptists were quite as early in Virginia, but the first church was not established until 1760. The latter were especially aggressive in the propagation of their faith; this, with the peculiar freedom of their church constitution, rendered them especially obnoxious to the government, and the laws against them were rigorously enforced, the wealthy members being obliged to pay the fines of the poor. Persecution incited the Baptists to renewed zeal, and united other dissenting sects in opposition to a power that tolerated none. In 1768, imprisonment followed fines; three Baptist ministers were arrested, and marched through the streets of Fredericksburg, singing, to prison. The feeling between the dissenting sects, save the Methodists, and the established church was intensified into factional hostility, destined to be waged with bitterness on both sides, and only to cease with the complete overthrow of one of the two religious systems. The Revolutionary period gave the dissenters the additional support of political sympathy, and without this aid the established church hopelessly failed in the contest.

The inevitable result hastened to its conclusion; the bill for relief of dissenters brought victory in sight, and incited the sects in opposition to exact the utmost privileges of religious freedom. The act of 1776 left the question of "a general assessment for the support of religion," to be acted upon by general vote. In 1779, this was rejected; in 1785, the "act for religious freedom" consolidated all the previous legislation in this matter, and effectually divorced the church and State. In 1802, the sale of Episcopal glebes was provided for; this ended the struggle against the established church; donations, church edifices, inclosures and furniture were preserved by this law to the church, but fate even despoiled her of these, and the once dominant church sank almost out of existence, to rise only after years of effort to a secondary place of power and influence.

One relic of the old aristocratic regime, however, survived the Revolutionary spirit of the period in the "peculiar institution." Conditional servitude under indentures existed in Virginia from the first settlement. These servants were bound to their masters to discharge by their labor the cost of transportation; under the reign of James I, 100 convicts were sent to the colony at the express command of the king, and sold to the planters; subsequently the city of London sent a similar number of homeless children, who were disposed of in the same way. White servants gradually became a common article of commerce; were sold in England to be shipped to the colony, where they were purchased on board ships of the masters of the vessels. In August, 1619, Dutch ships landed and sold twenty negroes as slaves, and from this period until the revolution of 1688, white and black servants were found in the colony. The two classes differed in their treatment only in the term of their service. The facility with which the white servant made his escape enforced humane treatment, which alone, however, was not found sufficient to retain them in servitude. The law provided severe punishment for runaways; in 1642, such offenders were liable, for a second offense, to be branded upon the cheek, a penalty which was subsequently so far mitigated as to place the brand upon the shoulder. Twenty years later the offense of running away was punished by increasing the term of servitude at the discretion of a magistrate, while the master was permitted to inflict "moderate corporal punishment." Subsequent importations of white servants were generally of those convicted of political offenses. "Scots taken in the battle of Dunbar; Royalists, prisoners taken at the battle of Worcester; and leaders of the insurrection of Penruddoc."

The Oliverian plot in 1663, when certain recently imported "roundhead" servants instigated a nearly successful insurrection, awoke the colonists to the danger of such additions to the population, and the assembly prohibited the further importation of "jail-birds." Such legislation did not receive the sanction of the crown, and in 1685 the suppression of the Monmouth rebellion afforded a new supply of this objectionable class of servants. In the meanwhile, kidnaping had become common, in Bristol, at least; not only felons, but innocent persons were hurried across the Atlantic to enrich those engaged in the nefarious business. Even the mayor and aldermen were found guilty of terrifying culprits charged with venial crimes until they begged to be transported and were sold into servitude. The revolution of 1688 brought about a general amnesty for political offenses, and thereafter the trade in servants was chiefly confined to blacks, who were sold into perpetual bondage.

For more than fifty years after the introduction of slavery into Virginia, the system languished; the people enslaved as well as slavery was repugnant to the people. In 1671, among a population of 40,000, the number of white servants reached only 6,000, and that of slaves only 2,000; of the latter, Gov. Berkeley reported that only two or three cargoes had arrived in seven years, while some 1,500 of white servants—"most were English, few Scotch and fewer Irish"—were imported annually. By a system of sophistry drawn from the bigotry of the early church, the scruples of conscience and of a manly faith in the freedom of mankind were evaded. In 1670, it was enacted that "all servants not being Christians, imported into this country by shipping, shall be slaves;" in the natural order of evil progression, it was declared by statute in 1682—what had been practically affirmed as early as 1667—that "conversion to the Christian faith doth not make free."

Self-interest came to the support of this sophistry; the system of indentured service prepared the way for bond labor, and made it almost a social necessity; and even before indentured service ceased, the condition of perpetual bondage found a willing convert in the Virginia planter's love of unrestrained power. In the purchase price the two classes of servants showed little difference; in 1672, the white servant, with five years of labor due, was worth about £10; the negro, with the expectation of thirty years of full labor, brought from £20 to £25. In cost of maintenance the balance was largely in favor of the negro, and there was a natural disinclination to hold in bondage persons who differed from their superiors only in their misfortune, and whom a few years might convert into equals with ability to avenge any grudges born of bondage. White servants, too, unstamped by nature with the ineffaceable marks of race, found escape not difficult; and laws which gave them the right to complain to a magistrate of undue punishment, or neglect of care in the matter of food, clothing or shelter, constituted an irksome restraint upon the master. The blacks, on the contrary, placed no such conditions upon the master; they were easily traced in attempting to escape; they had no champion in the law, and enforced ignorance made them powerless to resist legal power.

Slavery thus became engrafted upon the social system, and the general sentiment gradually emphasized the contrast between the two classes of servants; the early enfranchisement of the whites was favored, while every trace of black blood carried with it the stigma of bondage; and by degrees, all trace of the humanity of the slave was lost in the laws. In 1692, a statute made it lawful for "persons pursuing fugitive colored slaves to wound or even kill them;" and in 1699, the "death of a slave from extremity of correction was not accounted a felony, since it cannot be presumed that prepense malice, which alone makes murder felony, should induce a man to destroy his estate." Thus the slave became the absolute property of his master, with no other protection from his passions than that accorded to the brute.

The large profit accruing from bond labor employed in the production of tobacco, which then brought a price ten times that realized to-day, was sufficient to give a marked impetus to the growth of slavery, but it is doubtful if the actual number of slaves subsequently imported would have reached the final proportions without the artificial encouragement of the English government. Measures "for the better supply of the plantation" were considered by parliament in the reign of William and Mary; an English statute of 1695 declared "the trade is highly beneficial and advantageous to the kingdom and colonies;" in 1708, a house of commons committee reported the slave-trade, "important and ought to be free;" and three years later a similar committee thought "the plantations ought to be supplied with negroes at reasonable rates." During these years the traffic in slaves was encouraged by the English government in behalf of the interests of its merchants; but slave-trading soon became a royal monopoly, and legislative suggestions became laws, which were enforced by all the power and influence in the kingdom.

At the close of the war of the Spanish succession, England demanded and secured the monopoly of this horrible traffic. In the treaty of Utrecht (1713) "Her Brittanic Majesty did offer and undertake, by persons whom she shall appoint, to bring into the West Indies of America belonging to his Catholic Majesty, in the space of thirty years, 144,000 negroes, at the rate of 4,800 in each of the said thirty years." In this royal monopoly, Philip V took a fourth share, and a similar proportion of the common stock was reserved to the queen herself; the balance being distributed among her subjects. The queen's individual share was subsequently assigned to the South Sea Company, at the earnest solicitations of her minister. From this time forward the traffic in humanity received the earnest support of the English government, and attained large and increasing proportions, great numbers of slaves finding their way to the colonies by way of the West-Indies, and direct from the shores of Africa; the single exception to the iron rule of colonial commerce being made in 1750, in favor of free trade in slaves. Colonial governors were instructed to give particular encouragement to the Royal African Company of England, and to maintain "a constant and sufficient supply of merchantable negroes." These instructions illustrate the royal policy in Virginia, and in 1754 slave marts were maintained at every court house "as far at least as the southwest mountain."

Freedom was not without its champions even in this mercenary age. In England, Baxter, Addison, Steele, Savage, Hutcheon and others, united the authority of religion, the power of logic, the pathos of poetry and romance, and the sanction of philosophy in behalf of the brotherhood of man; in America a variety of considerations led a strong sentiment in the same direction. As early as 1701, the Boston colony sought "to encourage the bringing of white servants and to put a period to negroes being slaves;" under the influence of Keith in Pennsylvania, the Quakers in considerable numbers were led to emancipate their blacks on religious grounds, Penn taking early and prominent part in the movement. In the southern colonies opposition to the trade was based upon the "excessive production and the consequent low price of their staple;" the heavy debt incurred by the purchase of slaves on credit; "and the dangerous increase of the colored population."

The subject of their increase seems to have claimed a good deal of consideration; it had been gradual, but in later colonial times had proportionately greatly exceeded the white population. In 1619, the first 20 came; in 1649 there were, in Virginia, 300; in 1670, 2,000; in 1714, 23,000; in 1756, 120,000; in 1790, 293,427. The increase of slaves in Virginia from 1670 to 1790, was in the proportion of 1 to 146; while the whites in the same period, increased only as 1 to 12. In 1725 the Virginia assembly, alarmed at this rapid increase, attempted to repress slave importation by tax; this was resorted to in 1732; in 1740 it was increased to ten per cent, and in 1761 a prohibitory duty was established. In each case the royal government nullified colonial restrictions, whether in form of tax or duty; and the incontestable charge of a Virginia statesman stands unimpeached, that "the British government constantly checked the attempts of Virginia to put a stop to this infernal traffic."

Both English and colonial authorities shared the opinion that the large body of slaves in Virginia constituted a menace to the independent action of the colony. The military forces needed on the frontier were in early days robbed of considerable numbers by the apparent necessity of maintaining a sufficient force of planters in the lowlands to overawe the large body of blacks, and a potent argument with the English ministry in behalf of unrestricted trade in slaves was that they would not "leave their employers the entire security that might prepare revolt." Such reasoning proceeded upon very narrow grounds. Negroes were gathered from widely separated districts in Africa, and taken from widely differing conditions in life; they were grossly ignorant and stupid, with neither dialect nor traditions in common, and were as completely dependent upon their owners as brutes. There were occasional flashes of manhood among them, where the harshness of the master or the exceptional spirit of some captive warrior led one to acts of desperation, but there never was any good cause for apprehension of serious insurrection save in the imagination of the slaveholders.

Public sentiment was very generally divided on the institution of slavery until after the Revolution. By many it was held: "Except the immediate interest he has in the property of his slaves, it would be for every man's interest that there were no slaves, because the free labor of a free man * * * is in the end cheaper than the eye service of the slave." (Boucher, 1763.) Others based their opposition on moral grounds, and questioned whether "the liberties of a nation be secure when we have removed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people that these liberties are of the gift of God." (Jefferson, 1781.) On the other hand an honest few believed slavery one of the means employed by a benevolent Providence to reach the heathen outcasts of Africa; but the main prop of the institution was "the immediate interest in the property of slaves." But, divided as the people were in regard to the institution in Virginia, there was practical unanimity in opposition to the further importation of blacks, and in 1761, Virginia found in this her chief cause of complaint to the English government. In this opposition Richard Henry Lee was one of the foremost actors, declaring the further importation dangerous to the political as well as the moral interests of the colony; this was the general sentiment of the people, and when the first general legislative assembly of the united colonies prohibited the traffic, the act received the general assent of every loyal citizen.

In this achievement the vigorous opposition to slavery in the State ended; the hope expressed by Jefferson, that the way was preparing "under the auspices of Heaven, for a total emancipation," was disappointed; slavery became a permanent institution, the influence of which gave an imperishable character to every phase of society. The abhorrence of the foreign slave traffic was transferred to the internal trade and the slave-trader became an object of contempt, though tolerated as a necessary evil. Agriculture was confirmed as the prevailing industry, and tobacco as the only profitable staple; the miserable bondage of credit was continued, the factors of Baltimore and Charleston gradually taking place of the English and Scotch merchant; and the same improvident expenditure, the same open-handed hospitality, with more of republican simplicity, remained.

Such was the first colony in Virginia; and such were the molding influences of the State that was rapidly extending its territorial limits westward, destined to make the Mississippi its western boundary, and leave the birth-mark of its institutions upon four great States.

CHAPTER III.

BEYOND THE ALLEGHANIES—VIRGINIA'S CONQUESTS IN THE WEST.

VIRGINIA, in the time of Elizabeth, included all that indefinite region of the New World not occupied by Spain or France. As described by an old writer, "the bounds thereof on the east are the ocean, on the south lieth Florida, on the north Nova Francia; as for the west thereof, the limitations are unknown." In 1606, James I divided this territory between the "first" and "second colony to Virginia," and the subsequent failure of the "second colony," gradually led to the restriction of the original name of the territory assigned to the colony settled at Jamestown. This tendency was emphasized by the explorations of John Smith (1614); the name of New England applied by him to the north Atlantic coast supplanted the older one of Virginia, and the two parts became generally known under these respective names.

Notwithstanding their charter granted them the territory "up into the land from sea to sea," the Virginians seem to have laid but little stress upon this inland extension. They were very jealous of their rights along the sea-coast, and continued to protest in season and out of season against the infringement of their ancient bounds and limits involved in the royal grants to colonies north and south of them. But when these protests proved unavailing, they found little incentive and no necessity for pushing their explorations westward. Practically, therefore, Virginia for 125 years was restricted to the narrow scope of country between the Potomac and Nottoway, from Chesapeake Bay to the Blue Ridge.

The first authenticated attempt to explore the tramontane country was made by order of Gov. Berkeley. In 1670, Capt. Henry Batte commanded a force which penetrated into the New River country; the Blue Ridge was found high, rocky and well covered with timber; and just beyond, the party found their progress obstructed by a rapid, rock-strewn river, which they estimated to be 450 yards wide. The banks were high and precipitous, in places estimated at a height of 1,000 yards; beyond they saw other hills, bare of timber and broken by white cliffs, but with these meager results the party returned. In the fall of the following year the valley of the Kanawha was further explored, but with no recorded results. Interest in this unknown region found no other public expression for nearly half a century. In 1716, Gov. Spotswood undertook a trip to the mountains, more as a novel entertainment than as a serious attempt to increase the general knowledge. A gay company of cavaliers was gathered at Williamsburg, in August of this year; "rangers, pioneers and Indians" were provided to bear the toil of the expedition, while pack-horses and servants supplied the comforts and luxuries demanded by the sumptuous character of the explorers. The journey was made with leisure; halts were made where the abundant game attracted the sportsman, and the nightly bivouac under the summer sky lent zest to the revels which closed the day's sport. The Blue Ridge at length was reached; on its summit the king's health was drank, and two neighboring peaks were named "Mt. George" and "Mt. Alexander," after the king and governor. Descending into the valley, the river, Shenandoah, was named "Euphrates;" an empty bottle was made the depository of a document proclaiming the valley the territory of the king, and buried, when the merry party returned to the colonial capital to found the order of the "Knights of the Golden Horseshoe" in commemoration of the festive occasion.

No active emigration followed; the beauty and fertility of the valley were extolled, but the lowland planters were not of pioneer stock; the rocky barrier of the Blue Ridge forbade the life of luxury and ease to which they had grown accustomed, and another half century would probably have elapsed in inaction, had not the agitation of Europe supplied a hardier race. In 1732 a vast throng "of those whom bigots chase from foreign lands" found their way to America.

The glowing tales of the middle valley fell upon attentive ears, and following up the course of the James one current of this tide of immigration flowed into the upper valley, barely preceded by another which found its way through Pennsylvania and across the Potomac into the lower valley. These pioneers were early followed by large numbers seeking a refuge remote from European intolerance, and the settlements were rapidly extended to the western confines of the valley. Beyond the Alleghanies lay "the great woods," in the hidden recesses of which was to be determined not only the limit of Virginia, but the destiny of the continent also.

East of the Blue Ridge the extension of English settlements was not seriously hindered. The Indian race, apparently isolated by the natural features of the country, and divided into unfriendly tribes, fell an easy prey to the diplomacy and force of the whites. The colonists made little pretense of purchase in the acquisition of territory. The Indian massacre, of 1622, according to the ethical system of the time, placed the savages beyond the pale of diplomacy, and the whites proceeded to demand the forfeit of their lands as rapidly as the increasing population required more room. It was not to be expected that the untutored mind of the savage would grasp this theological subtlety; and in 1644 the aged successor of Powhatan, who had always cherished a determined hostility to the whites, signalized his closing career by a repetition of the earlier attack. Some 300 of the colonists perished, but the prompt and vigorous rally of the whites inflicted a crushing blow upon the savages; their aged chief was captured and subsequently assassinated by his guard; and the tribe was forced to sue for peace, which was granted only on terms that made their presence south of the York River, without the badge of a messenger, the signal for their destruction by the vigilant whites.

In 1656 the presence of a mountain tribe near the falls of the James River was construed into a menace to the settlements, and a colonial force, aided by friendly Indians, was sent against them. In this engagement the whites were repelled, but the foreign tribe did not wait for further demonstrations, and retired to the Blue Ridge. Again, in 1676, the Indians, provoked by the steady encroachment of the whites, and the unwarrantable slaughter of certain chiefs, united to attack the settlements. This last blow of the savages was delivered with less effect than earlier ones, while the punishment returned by the whites was by far the most effective. Under the command of Bacon, the "well-armed housekeepers" of Virginia inflicted frightful slaughter upon a party of savages that made a stand near the site of Richmond, and in succeeding expeditions forever broke their power in the lowlands. This campaign transferred the irrepressible conflict to the region beyond the mountains. Here the two contestants were less unevenly matched; settlements less compactly made afforded less facility for organization, while the Indians, united in a common hostility, proved more formidable in numbers, and having their villages more remote, retreated from their forays with greater security.

A new and formidable element added to this tramontane struggle was the influence of the French. Preceding the English in these western waters, and even contesting with Spain the honors of original discovery, France claimed the whole continent from the Gulf to the polar sea, and from Newfoundland westward to the unknown limits of the New World. The discovery and exploration of America found the Gallic nation eager to improve the advantages offered by a virgin territory; the heresy of Calvin had made great inroads upon the strongholds of the Roman Church; and the Huguenot party, a political as well as religious organization, was for the time not unequally matched against the Catholic court. But the tenure of its power depended upon the most delicate adjustment of social equipoise, to the uncertainty of which none was more keenly alive than the "calm, stern man who represented and led the Protestantism of France." The New World, therefore, was hailed by one party, at least, as an asylum for the persecuted sect, and half a century before the origin of the "First Colony of Virginia," Coligny cautiously projected a city of refuge in America. The unsuccessful colony on the Brazilian coast, in 1555, and the unfortunate settlement on the St. John River in Florida, in 1564, marked the rise and fall of this project.

In the meanwhile French adventurers were pushing their explorations in the far North, scanning the Atlantic seaboard from the Carolinas to Newfoundland. In 1518 the first of a number of abortive attempts at colonization was made on the coast of Nova Scotia, but it was not until 1604 that the foundation of the colony of Acadia was laid. This colony, constantly harassed by the jealous opposition of Jesuits and illicit fur traders during its early career, was brought to the verge of ruin by the English in 1613–14, but was subsequently revived, and, in the hands of the French, remained a constant menace to the outlying settlements of New England until the peace of Utrecht (1713) gave it to England.

The seat of French power in America, however, was on the St. Lawrence. Here Champlain founded Quebec, in 1608, and inaugurated the policy which remained to the last the ruling principle of the French power in the New World. This adventure was projected and supported by a private enterprise of slender means, and with little recognition from the king. In 1615, recognizing the precarious foundation on which he was building, Champlain used his efforts to secure such recognition for his colony as would protect it against the jealousy which future success would be sure to awaken. A viceroy was appointed, who turned his sinecure to account by granting a monopoly of the fur-trade to such as would pay the most for the privilege. Under this regime no attempt was made to encourage immigration; Quebec was half mission and half trading station; none tilled the soil, and, save the priests, the less than one hundred whites in Canada were all in the employ of the merchants who controlled the fur-trade. In 1627, Richelieu, who had recently (1624) come into power as minister of finance, suppressed this monopoly and organized the company of one-hundred associates. The resources of France were exhausted, and the great minister sought to build up New France from the resources of her own forests and rivers. To the new company was granted a monopoly of the fur-trade for fifteen years, and for this concession it was required to send two or three hundred mechanics of all trades to Canada at once, and to transfer thither, within the period of its monopoly, 4,000 colonists. This experiment, however wisely conceived, was fated to miserably fail; the "associates" made vast outlays and received but meager returns, and in face of the multiplied hindrances to carry out their obligations would have ruined the company.

The policy of the home government alone proved an insurmountable obstacle to success; the only emigrating class in France was the Huguenots, thousands of whom hailed the New World as an asylum where the reform religion could find a secure retreat from persecution; but Jesuit bigotry cut off this resource, and permitted none but Catholics to people New France. Of the latter class there were no voluntary emigrants save monks and nuns, who added discord but no increase of population to the feeble settlements. The resources of the company were still further crippled in another direction; the implacable hostility of the Iroquois destroyed its remaining hope of success by practically suppressing the fur-trade. Possessed by a satanic malice which braved death in a thousand forms, the implacable savages carried their war of extermination to the farthest bounds of human habitation, and eventually made the populous region north of the St. Lawrence a tenantless wilderness.

In 1640, therefore, there were not more than 300 whites in Canada, of whom scarcely ten were self-supporting. Five years later the company surrendered its monopoly of the fur-trade, with its debts and obligations, to the people of the settlement, retaining all its seigniorial rights, and, in 1663, it surrendered these rights, with its charter, to the king. In accepting this surrender, Louis XIV expressed the hope that "through the re-establishment of commerce," he should secure "abundance of people" in New France; but led by Colbert, his prime minister, in the following year the king granted a monopoly of the fur-trade to the "great company of the West."

The new grant aroused a spirited remonstrance, which demonstrated the fact that this grant, if maintained, would be the death of the settlement; the company was therefore forced to surrender a part of its monopoly, and eventually failed, as its predecessors had done. At the same time the king seemed to awake to the importance of the St. Lawrence settlement, and henceforth the French possessions in the New World became, notwithstanding the monopoly granted, the especial care of the crown. This new dispensation was signalized, in 1665, by the appointment of a governor and intendant for Canada, and a lieutenant-general for New France, which included both Acadia and Canada. With these officials came a regiment of regular troops, which was employed in the next two or three years against the Mohawks with such effect as to secure a peace unbroken for twenty years.

With this departure a new era opened in Canada: Sieur Talon, the intendant, was instructed to "cause justice to reign, establish a good police, protect the inhabitants, discipline them against their enemies, and procure for them peace, repose and plenty; * * encourage them to trade and industry, * * and put them in the way of making some profit." The intendant entered with vigor upon the discharge of his duties; aided by the resources of the royal treasury, he developed the manufacture of the common necessities of the colonists; sent engineers to explore the copper mines of Lake Superior, attempted to establish trade with the West Indies, and laid the foundations for those explorations which established the French in possession of the great West from the mouth of the Mississippi to Hudson's Bay.

The new king, scarcely out of his minority, heartily seconded his able representative; as early as 1659 the king had exerted his power to supply Canada with colonists, and each succeeding year shiploads of immigrants were landed at Quebec at the royal charge. Most of these additions to the colonial population were single men and women. At first, men alone constituted the bulk of the exportations from France, but in 1667 the institution of families received attention, and "eighty-four girls from Dieppe, and twenty-five from Rochelle" were sent, among whom were "fifteen or twenty of pretty good birth." This plan was continued for years; troops were sent to the colony, and at the expiration of their term of service were disbanded, and every inducement made both officers and men to remain as colonists. Women suitable as wives to officers were sent over, and bounties were offered for marriage, the common people when married being presented with "an ox, a cow, a pair of fowls, two barrels of salted meat, and 11 crowns in money." The royal dowry was varied to reach all classes, and in some cases reached the extent of a gift of a house, with provisions for eight months.

Nor did the royal solicitude stop here. Bounties were offered on children: parents having ten living children born in wedlock were granted a pension of 300 livres a year; while to those having twelve children, the pension was increased by 100 livres. At the same time the royal power found exercise in stimulating this artificially grown colony to take root in the new soil; a modified form of feudalism was devised, and along both sides of the St. Lawrence and Richelieu Rivers were planted seigniories, for which the beneficiaries gave only "faith and homage."

Under such fostering care the colony gradually attained considerable expansion, if not solidity, but everywhere was felt the limiting hand of French absolutism. "The new settler was found by the king, sent over by the king, and supplied by the king with a wife, a farm, and sometimes with a house;" it was the forcing and pruning process of the garden, not the vigorous luxuriance of nature. In 1672 the king was diverted by more pressing cares in Europe, and the artificial symmetry of the Canadian colony took on some of the rugged vigor of nature.

The colonial policy of France, inaugurated by Champlain, made the Indian the chief corner-stone of New France; while other civilizations crushed or ignored the savages, the French embraced and cherished them. Of this policy the zeal of propagandism and the fur-trade were the vital forces, and "policy and commerce built their hopes on the priest." In 1625, the order of Jesuits was planted in Quebec. Undaunted by the rigors of the climate or the malignity of their savage foes, they bore the cross, the symbol of French religion and of French sovereignity, to the remotest recesses of fur-bearing America. Robbed of their occupation by the destruction of the Hurons, the Jesuits turned to the interior, and vied with hardy couriers de bois in pioneering the way of France in the great West. Here their explorations opened up a vast territory which the plan of their colonial development enabled the French to readily seize and hold.

This plan had its origin in the geographical situation of the parent colony and the character of the home government. Vitally dependent upon the fur-trade, the trapper and trader constituted an important element of colonial life, and all recognized the necessity for a wide and free range for the pursuit of their vocation; and the people, held under arbitrary rule, gave a military character to the order of colonial development. Strategic points were seized upon, where stations, half mission and half trading-post, were established; diplomacy with the Indians was conducted under the guise of the black hat and robe of the priest; and the fealty of native allies was confirmed and maintained by conversion to the religion of the dominant race. Thus Quebec, Montreal, Fort Frontenac, Michillimackinac and Fort St. Louis were points d'appui from which French influences dominated the whole interior. Later development multiplied these points, and Presque Isle, Detroit, Vincennes, Kaskaskia and New Orleans completed the chain which connected the St. Lawrence with the Gulf, and constituted a claim to the valley of the Mississippi, which would have been well nigh irresistible, had it been properly and early supported by the French nation.

In the Indian confederation of New York, the colonial policy of Canada sustained the earliest and most serious check. Champlain found the northern tribes everywhere terrorized by the incessant attacks of the Iroquois; he therefore counseled a confederation of these tribes under the protectorate of France, and gave it an initial impulse by joining them in reprisals upon the universal enemy. Previous to 1616 he won three signal victories over these all-conquering savages, through the fatal power of the arquebuse, and for thirty years the progress of Iroquois conquest was stayed.

In the meanwhile, the thrifty Dutch traders of New Netherland supplied the Mohawks with the enginery of civilized warfare and, thus equipped, their superstitious fear of the whiteman's weapon gone, they renewed their unrelenting hostility. Nation after nation of the savage allies of the French were swept out of existence, and the whites, whose vaunted prowess had so imposed upon the simplicity of their allies, were reduced to the pitiable necessity of beholding these vital blows struck without raising a hand to prevent it. Emboldened by such victories the Iroquois conceived a contempt for the French, and carried their successful forays against the Canadian settlements until they were brought to the verge of extinction.

At this juncture, France awoke to the importance of her trans-Atlantic possessions: the signal punishment of the Mokawks followed; but even this obtained peace for the whites only; the savage butchery of the faithful allies went forward, unchallenged by the feeble colony, until the whole region was depopulated of natives.

Short-lived cessation of hostilities between the French and Iroquois occurred, but these intractable savages were never really at peace with the power that gradually circumscribed their warlike enterprise. Located between the eastern and western colonies, they held the balance of power, and acknowledged fealty to neither; but notwithstanding a subtlety that almost attained the dignity of diplomacy, they became the cat's-paw of the Dutch and English. The eastern colonies, with nothing to demand, pandered to the savage instincts and easily won them; guns, powder and lead were freely given them in liberal exchange for furs, and secret aid was granted them in their warfare upon the French and their allies. On the other hand the French had little to grant and everything to demand; the war policy of the Iroquois was dictated by the demands of revenge and trade alike; their territory afforded few furs with which to carry on the profitable barter with the colonists at Albany, and they carried their forays to the west and north to levy an indemnity in furs, the staple of aboriginal trade. This the policy of the French hindered; and this alone under the influence of the seaboard colonists afforded a sufficient casus belli. At the same time, the French gave sufficient evidence of their power to convince the Iroquois of their inability to cope single-handed with this formidable people, and the savages were accordingly driven into closer relations with their English allies.

New Netherland was the key to the situation, and even after it passed into the hands of the English (1664), Sieur Talon persistently urged upon the prime minister, Colbert, the importance of buying or seizing this territory and thus bringing the Iroquois to submission. His successor continued to urge this action, but, through the short-sighted policy of Louis XIV, the golden opportunity was allowed to pass unimproved. Accordingly the issue between the two colonial powers was joined. The Iroquois, pursuing their policy of independence, had carried their forays into the borders of Maryland and Virginia as well as into the Illinois country. Barre, the Canadian governor, determined to chastise them, and desirous of disabusing the English of the erroneous opinion that these attacks had been instigated by the Jesuits, announced his intention to the governor of New York, and suggested that he co-operate, at least so far as to suppress the traffic in arms for the time. With less frankness but more diplomacy, the governor of New York declined to accede to Barre's request, claimed the Iroquois as British subjects, and at the same time informed the Indians of the French governor's intentions. An angry correspondence ensued, and while the French gained some minor advantages, the practical result of this diplomatic collision was largely in favor of the English. Alarmed by the prospect of punishment by the French, the Iroquois entered into a treaty for protection (1684) with Lord Howard, the governor of Virginia, and though denying any fealty to the English, the Iroquois thenceforward were not often in doubtful relations to the two powers.

The antagonism of the two nations did not rest alone upon colonial rivalry; it found a deeper origin in their repugnant civilizations. England stood, on the one hand, for the supremacy of the people through law; France, on the other, stood for the absolutism of the jus divinum, and between these principles there could be no lasting peace. The rising of the English people, in 1687, precipitated the struggle which was destined to end only with the humiliation of absolutism. At the end of ten years, France gained territory and England gained the recognition of the people's king. In 1702, the struggle was renewed; the issue was unchanged but the results were less evenly balanced; at the close of the war of the Spanish succession, France was forced, in the peace of Utrecht (1713), to concede both principle and territory. In America, England gained by this war

Hudson's Bay and its borders, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and the recognition of the Iroquois as British subjects.

Incomparably the greatest of these gains was the recognition of the English dominion over the New York confederation. With this concession was granted the English claim to the territory occupied by the Six Nations, a grant which not only seriously curtailed French pretensions, but also cut off all hope of a direct line of communication with the Mississippi Valley, and left their line by way of the lakes and Niagara River open to attack. This concession also made the English heirs to Iroquois claims of conquest in the West, an advantage of the highest importance, and which they ultimately improved. As yet, however, the English seemed utterly indifferent to the possession of the interior. The charters of the seaboard colonies granted the territory from "sea to sea;" but, separate in organization, and jealous of each other as well as of the king, their policy was narrowed and their power divided. Living by agriculture and trade, their expansion, while deep-rooted and permanent, was necessarily slow. A powerful incentive for the rapid acquisition of territory was thus wanting during the early period of English colonial history, and for more than a century their western horizon was bounded by the mountains.

In 1739, the warring civilizations were again arrayed in arms. The treaty of Utrecht had effected only a truce, in which the combatants gained the opportunity for needed recuperation; it defined many things but settled nothing, and the "war with Spain" was an inevitable result of this Machiavellian compact. In 1744, France became involved in the struggle which convulsed all Europe, but with the exception of the fruitless conquest in Acadia, the peace of the American colonies was undisturbed, and the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) referred to the new world only to leave the possessions of the respective powers "the same as before the war." This was but the evasion of an issue which sooner or later must demand adjudication, and left a peaceable adjustment of conflicting colonial claims, raised by the former treaty, out of the question.

It is difficult to define the geographical scope of the early claim of the French in America. Generally stated it included the entire valleys of the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi Rivers; but of this broad claim the details were as illy defined in the minds of the claimants as in the minds of the English. Southeast of the Ohio, the Alleghany range afforded a natural boundary, which was seized upon by the French as the western limit of their rival; but the projection of this line northward necessitated the conquest or purchase of New York. The ratification of this line was, therefore, persistently urged by the Canadian officials, but neglected by the king, until the war of the Spanish succession set the matter at rest by the extinguishment of all French claims to the northeast and to central and eastern New York. The terms of the treaty, however, left the dividing line between the colonies of the two nations as obscure as before. This was not an oversight but the direct dictate of diplomacy; might was the only real basis of territorial right in the new world, and each nation was eager to anticipate the other in establishing its power within the coveted limits before trying conclusions; accordingly the inevitable collision was transferred to the valley of the Ohio.

At the date of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) the English settlement had not yet crossed the mountains, but this coming event had long since cast its shadow athwart the pathway of the French. As early as 1715, Father Mermet, at Kaskaskia, wrote the governor of Canada that "the encroaching English were building forts near the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers," and there are certain traditions of English explorations in the valleys of these rivers as early as the decade ending with 1664. In 1678, it is said* "a considerable number of persons went from New England upon discovery, and proceeded so far as New Mexico, 150 leagues beyond the river Meschasebe;" twenty years later an expedition up the Mississippi River from the Gulf is related, and again, in 1742, the voyage of one John Howard down the same river by way of the Ohio, ending in his capture by the French. Whatever the truth may be in regard to these traditions, the French found plenty of evidence to confirm their apprehension that the English were about to dispute their possession of the interior, and in 1749 Gallisoniere, the governor of Canada, sent a party to plant lead plates, bearing the declaration of French claims to the territory, along the Ohio River.

*Annals of the West, p. 44.

But the adventurous English traders had preceded this party; on the Big Miami they built a trading house this very year, and on the Maumee they came in contact with the French, who arrested them for their intrusion. The French did not rest with these precautions; in 1750 a fort was built at Vincennes; and Fort Chartres, originally built of wood in 1718, was rebuilt of cut stone and garrisoned by a regiment of grenadiers. Nearer the scene of action the greatest activity prevailed; the loyalty of friendly Indians was confirmed by a judicious combination of threats and subsidies; Presque Isle (Erie) was fortified; a wagon road was built from thence to the Alleghany River; a second fort was built at Venango, fifteen miles southward of Erie, and a force sent to keep the Ohio clear. In the early part of 1752 these troops came upon the trading house on the Miami, and resistance being offered, attacked the place, capturing the traders, and inflicted considerable loss upon the tribe of Twigtwees who supported the Englishmen. Thus was struck the first blow of the "old French war."

In the meanwhile the English had not been inactive. The adventurous spirit of the colonists on the Atlantic coast early led to the exploration of the surrounding wilds; but, as has been noted, the character of the English settlements was such as to prevent a rapid or widespread occupation of the land, and notwithstanding the explorations set on foot by Virginia, and the somewhat mythical voyages referred to, it was the middle of the eighteenth century before the English began seriously to think of possessing the country beyond the "great mountains." Though possessed of a very inadequate knowledge of the interior, Gov. Keith, of Pennsylvania, as early as 1719 urged upon the home government the necessity of securing the great West, but the importance of this acquisition did not impress the ministry until some thirty years later, when Lord Halifax wrote to his colleagues in the ministry that "the country west of the great mountains is the centre of the British dominions."

In the meanwhile, the settlement of the Shenandoah Valley had developed the trader, whose adventurous instincts led him to cross the Alleghanies and penetrate the pathless forests to the Miami and Maumee in search of trade. Here was carried on a profitable system of barter, the reports of which stimulated the commercial enterprise of the Virginians; and in 1748, Conrad Weiser was sent to the Indians of the Ohio Valley with a double mission: to subsidize the natives in behalf of the Pennsylvania government, and to sound them on the subject of allowing a series of trading posts to be erected in their country. The result of this mission was favorable to the projected trading enterprise, and in the same year, Thomas Lee, president of the Virginia council, Lawrence and Augustus Washington and ten other Virginians, with a Mr. Hanbury of London, joined in a petition for a grant beyond the mountains. In the following year the governor of Virginia was instructed to grant to John Hanbury and his associates, 500,000 acres between the Monongahela and the Kanawha Rivers, or on the northern margin of the Ohio. This organization, known as the "Ohio Company," was to pay no quit rent for ten years, to select two-fifths of their territory at once, and at their own cost to construct and garrison a fort. Other companies of a similar character came rapidly into existence; in 1749, in addition to the concession of the Ohio Company, a grant of 800,000 acres, north and west of the line of Canada, was made to the "Loyal Company," and in 1757, one of 100,000 acres to the "Greenbrier Company," which was projected, however, about the time of the others.

Of these trading corporations the Ohio Company alone showed early activity. Profiting by information gained from Indian hunters and traders, this company imported goods from England and had them transported to Will's Creek (Cumberland, Md.), from whence they were distributed to traders who carried them to the interior. At the same time (1750) the company summoned the "adventurous Gist from his frontier home on the Yadkin" to explore the country west of the "great mountains." He was instructed to push his explorations as far as the falls of the Ohio, to search for a large tract of good level land, to note the general features of the country, and mark the strength and number of the tribes.

"On the last day of October, 1750, the bold envoy of civilization parted from the Potomac. He passed through snows over 'the stony and broken land' of the Alleghanies; he halted among the twenty Delaware families that composed Shanoppin's town on the southeast of the Ohio; swimming across the river, he descended through the rich but narrow valley of Logstown." From thence he proceeded to Great Beaver Creek, and on to the Muskingum, where he met George Crogan, the trader-envoy of Pennsylvania. Parting from this point in January, 1751, he proceeded to the mouth of the Scioto, and thence across the Little Miami to the larger stream of the same name. From thence he retraced his steps, and descending to the Ohio by way of the Little Miami, proceeded within fifteen miles of the falls of the Ohio, when he checked his course and ascended the valley of the Kentucky; found a pass to the Bluestone and returned to his principals by way of the Roanoke.

In April, 1751, Crogan again visited the Indians at Piqua, and through him Pennsylvania was invited to build a fort at the forks of the Monongahela. This, from motives of economy, the Pennsylvania Assembly declined to do. In fact, each one of the provinces sought to evade the burden of securing the valley of the Ohio. The proprietaries and Assembly of Pennsylvania tossed the subject from one to the other in fruitless dispute as to their responsibility in the matter; New York would only remonstrate with the governor of Canada, and Virginia, limited in resources, was equally reluctant to assume the expense involved in such an undertaking. The key to the Ohio Valley was the forks of the Monongahela; the nearness of this point to Virginia, and her charter claims to this territory, at length devolved the initiative upon her.

The claims of the English were based upon the discoveries referred to in the preceding pages, and upon a title secured by purchase. The discoveries were of too mythical a character to be strongly advanced against the superior claim of the French, and were made little account of; but the purchase of this territory from the Iroquois was more plausible, if not more valid.

In 1744, with Conrad Weiser as interpreter, the commissioners of Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia met these Indians at "the filthy town" of Lancaster. Twelve days were consumed in ceremonies that partook more of the character of an orgie than a diplomatic conference. Punch, wine and "bumbo" were freely distributed, and the Indians kept stupidly drunk most of the twelve days. The history of the whole proceeding as given in the quaint, unvarnished language of the secretary of the Maryland commissioners, stamps the whole proceeding as a barefaced fraud, in which either party over-reached the other; the whites gaining concessions from the incapacitated natives, and the Indians selling that to which they had no more right than to Quebec. At each conference the whites "put about the glass pretty briskly," the Indians "fed lustily, drank heartily," and after such preparations enormous concessions were hurriedly made for trifling considerations.

It was the negotiations of the Virginians, however, upon which the English claims to the Ohio Valley were founded. To them the Indians gave "a deed releasing their claim to a large quantity of land lying in that colony," and recognized "the king's right to all lands that are, or by his majesty's appointment shall be, within the colony of Virginia." For this elastic concession the natives received £200 in gold, and a like sum in goods, with a promise that, as settlements increased, more should be paid. It was under this treaty that Virginia subsequently claimed all the lands westward to the Mississippi.

The settlements did increase, and the Indians, those who had as well as those who had not been represented at Lancaster, began to murmur. In 1752, Virginia sent commissioners to Logstown, a little village on the north side of the Ohio, seventeen and a half miles below Pittsburg, to meet the chiefs of these tribes. They declined to recognize the Lancaster treaty, but consented to have the English build a fort at the forks of the Monongahela. The Virginians were not satisfied with this concession, and through the white interpreter finally secured a questionable confirmation of the former treaty, and consent for a settlement southeast of the Ohio. The activity of the French in fomenting the dissatisfaction of the Indians kept the English busy in allaying their aroused suspicions and confirming them in their treaty relations with the colonies. In 1753, therefore, Fairfax met the chiefs at Winchester, but such were the feelings toward the Lancaster treaty that he dared not refer to it. At Carlisle, a month later, the commissioners of Pennsylvania, in a conference with the representatives of all the tribes, had more success. Here a treaty was concluded with them against the French, but which, in the end, proved quite as empty of good results as the others.

In the meantime, the two powers in Europe professed a state of "profound peace," and commissioners were in Paris seeking to outwit each other in regard to the disputed lands in the Ohio Valley. At the same time, England did not hesitate to instruct her colonial governors that France was invading her dominions, and to direct them at their own cost to build forts, and with their own militia to repress the savages and repel the French. Under these instructions, Gov. Dinwiddie, of Virginia, sent "a person of distinction" to the commander of the French forces to ascertain the purpose of the warlike preparations on French Creek. The envoy, a young surveyor named George Washington, found the Indians terrorized by the threats of the French; observed the enemy strongly fortified at Presque Isle and Venango; learned of a projected descent upon the forks of the Monongahela in the spring, and ascertained that the courteous St. Pierre proposed to carry out the orders of his superiors, regardless of consequences.

Washington reached Will's Creek on his return, early in January, 1754. In his absence, the Ohio Company had taken steps to fortify the location it had chosen, and the returning envoy met "seventeen horses loaded with materials and stores for a fort at the forks of the Ohio."

The report of Washington was followed by immediate activity. Expresses were sent to the governors of Pennsylvania and New York, conveying the startling intelligence, and calling for assistance. Two companies of volunteers were authorized by Virginia, the one to be raised west of the mountains by the frontiersman Trent, and the other to be raised in the older part of the colony by Washington. The former consisted of seventy men, and was at once employed in completing the fort begun by the Ohio Company, while Washington's command, consisting of 150 men, was to proceed to the fort, garrison it, and "to make prisoner, kill or destroy all who interrupted the English settlements." Men and munitions were gathering along the Potomac, as far west as Will's Creek, but before they could reach the new fort spring had come and with it the French.

On the 17th of April, 1754, the ensign in command of the thirty-three men at the incomplete fort, suddenly found himself beset by sixty batteaux and 300 canoes, laden with men, cannon and stores. Successful resistance to such a force was impossible, and the English capitulated and withdrew. This success on the part of the French was followed by the most active measures in securing its fruits; the fort was completed, armed and named DuQuesne, for the governor of Canada. Troops from the Illinois country were hurried up the Ohio to reinforce its garrison; spies were sent throughout the Monongahela Valley to win the savages and watch the force at Will's Creek; and armed reconnoitering parties hovered about the English front to give warning of the first military advance.

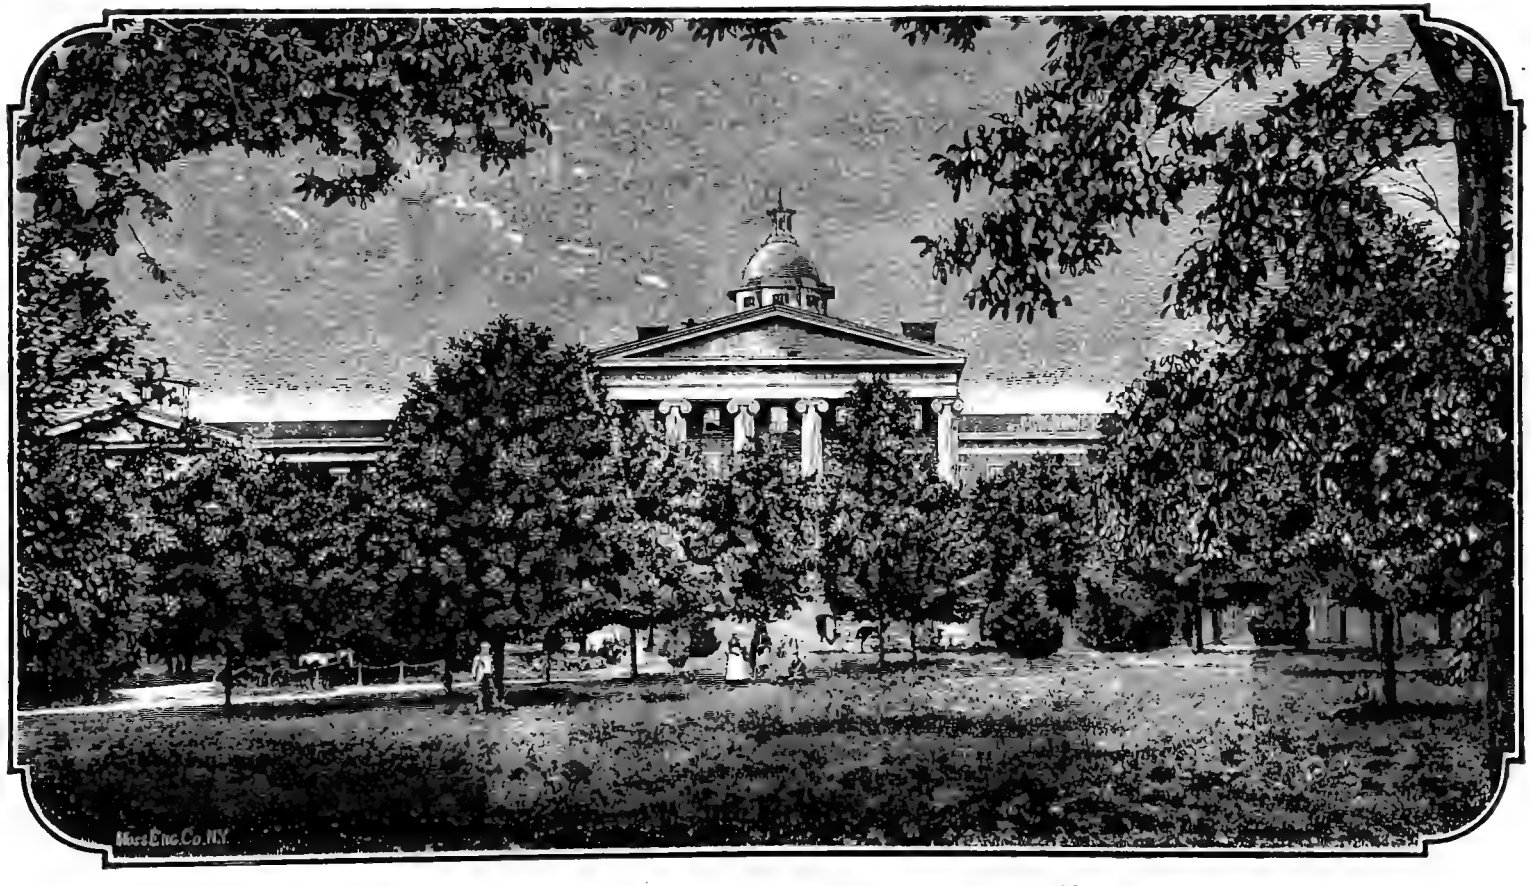
Washington was at Will's Creek pushing forward the preparations to reinforce the frontier fort, when the news of its capture was brought in; scouts continued to bring information of the enemy's activities, but the tedious preparations for an advance were not allowed to cease. The line of march lay over a broken mountainous country to the mouth of the Red Stone Creek (Brownsville, Penn.), where the Ohio Company had already built a trading post, and thence down the valley to the fort; roads had to be prepared for the artillery and trains, and progress was made at the slow rate of from two to four miles a day. On the 27th of May, the English had reached a point known as Great Meadows; here a body of French troops was reported to be in the vicinity, and Washington, fearing a surprise, started out on the following morning to develop the strength of this enemy. A collision occurred in which the French lost their commander, M. de Jumonville, and nine men, the Americans losing but one. This was the first act of open hostilities between the regular forces of the opposing nations in the Ohio Valley, and was held by the French as the commencement of war.

The march of the American forces was continued without further incident until the latter part of June, when the report coming in that the enemy was approaching in force, a council of war determined on a retreat to a more defensible point. Great Meadows was again reached on the 1st of July, and at this point the exhausted state of the provincials determined Washington to make a stand. Here, as Washington reported, "with nature's assistance, he made a good intrenchment and prepared a charming field for an encounter," to which the circumstances of the troops gave the name of "Fort Necessity," and here on the 3d of July, the Americans were assailed by some 900 French. For nine hours an ineffectual resistance was made against overwhelming odds, when a capitulation was agreed upon, the Americans being allowed to retire with everything save the artillery. This action was one of the causes subsequently assigned by George II for a declaration of war.

Thus matters stood at the beginning of 1755; both nations professed the most peaceful intentions, while vigorously pushing preparations to continue the war on a larger scale. Negotiations in Europe continued; France proposed to restore American lines as they were before the war of the Spanish succession, and refer all matters in dispute to the commissioners in Paris; England refused to go back of the treaty of Utrecht.

France rejected this basis of discussion, and offered another compromise—that both nations should retire from the country lying between the Alleghanies and the Ohio; to this England agreed, stipulating, however, that the French should destroy all their forts on the Ohio and its branches, but this the French court refused to accept.

This decision was not reached until the latter part of March, but in February, Braddock had landed in Virginia, and French stores and troops were embarked on a fleet which was crowding all sail across the Atlantic. War was not yet declared, and Braddock planning a three-fold campaign against the French posts in Nova Scotia, at Crown Point and by way of Fort Du Quesne against Niagara, did not meditate the conquest of Canada; he was instructed only to resist encroachment on English territory. The first onset was disastrous to the English; Braddock's terrible defeat near Fort Du Quesne was scarcely mitigated by the trifling successes at Lake George and at Louisburg.



Early in 1756 France formed an alliance with Austria, Russia and Sweden, and England with Frederick the Great. In May England declared war, and forthwith began a struggle, the influence of which was felt throughout the civilized world. At the end of seven years, England gained Canada, and all the territory claimed by the French east of the Mississippi River, save Louisiana. By a secret convention in 1762, the latter had been ceded to Spain, and in the treaty of Paris (1763), France surrendered the last of her possessions in the New World. With these vast accessions came grave doubts as to the value of the conquest; statesmen of both nations declared that with the menace of a foreign power removed from their western border, the colonies would grow more independent, and cause of rupture with the home government would not be wanting; and so the event proved. "The seven years war, which doubled the debt of England, increasing it to $700,000,000, was begun by her for the acquisition of the Ohio Valley. She achieved that conquest, but not for herself." (Bancroft.)

While the fate of nationality was thus being decided amid the din of arms, and the dire conflict of armies on the skirmish lines of opposing civilizations, the solid English phalanxes were pushing their way westward beyond the mountains, subject to many and terrible vicissitudes. Immigration once directed to the Shenandoah Valley, the people "spread more and more widely over the mild, productive, and enchanting interior," and at the opening of the French and Indian war were ready to surmount the rocky barrier of the Alleghanies. At the same time the attention of statesmen was drawn to this scarcely known region, and the necessity of planting a colony here, to more effectually resist the claims of the French, began to be considered in diplomatic circles. One of the professed aims of the Ohio Company was to plant a colony beyond the mountains in order to secure Ohio for the English, and while the more immediate object was the building up of a profitable trade with the Indians, a rapid settlement would certainly have followed its success. The first steps in the prosecution of the company's plan have been noted. Returning from his extended tour of exploration, Gist made the necessary surveys which preceded the erection of the posts on the sites of Brownsville and Pittsburgh, and, in 1752, the Indians in the treaty of Logstown, having agreed not to molest settlements on the lands granted the company, he began laying out a town, two miles below the fort at the forks; founded a colony of eleven families beside himself near Laurel Hill; and projected roads to connect the whole together, and with Will's Creek, the base of supplies. Two years later, 1754, in response to action by the burgesses of Virginia, the king instructed the governor of that province to grant lands west of the Alleghanies to any person desiring to settle thereon, not to exceed 1,000 acres to one person, and upward of 3,000,000 of acres are said to have been thus granted.

At this point the war intervened, and less pacific measures became necessary to resist foreign encroachments. The French, with their Indian allies, descended upon the forks of the Ohio, and the scattering settlements west of the mountains were rapidly destroyed. Then followed Braddock's disastrous defeat, and the Indians, emboldened by the first show of success, carried the tomahawk and fire brand east of the mountains with such terrible effect that in April, 1756, Washington wrote from Winchester: "The Blue Ridge is now our frontier, no men being left in this county (Frederick) except a few who keep close with a number of women and children in forts." In the fall of this year a powerful blow was struck at these savage marauders by the destruction of their principal rendezvous at Kittanning, about forty miles above Fort Du Quesne. This gave partial relief to the border, and, in the summer of 1758, the English sent a trusty messenger to the Indians, who were beginning to waver in their friendship for the French. An informal treaty was thus effected, and a few months later the fall of Fort Du Quesne transferred the seat of war to the north.

A treaty with all the tribes at Easton, Penn., followed this event, and the frontiers of Pennsylvania and Virginia, thus relieved from the menace of these savage foes, were rapidly repeopled; traders began once more to bear their burdens of trinkets to the interior in quest of Indian barter; settlers began to slowly push into the "great woods," and the Ohio Company prepared to push their enterprise. Again the Indians began to murmur, and, in 1762, the English commandant at Fort Du Quesne, now called Fort Pitt, issued his proclamation declaring that the treaty at Easton (1758) secured all the lands west of the mountains to the Indians as hunting grounds, and forbidding all settlements or intrusion of traders within this region. This was followed (October, 1763) by general instructions from the king forbidding any grants of "lands beyond the bounds of their respective governments, as described in their commissions," by any colonial governors.

WESTERN LUNATIC ASYLUM, HOPKINSVILLE.—SEE PAGE 535.

These precautions came too late, however. In the northwest was heard the voice of Pontiac crying: "Why, says the Great Spirit, do you suffer these dogs in red clothing to enter your country and take the lands I have given you? Drive them from it! Drive them! When you are in distress I will help you;" and the wide-spread disaffection among the tribes made them willing listeners to this preacher of the new crusade. At length the blow fell without warning upon the unsuspecting whites; traders were everywhere despoiled of their goods, and many of them murdered; the frontier forts from Mackinac to Fort Pitt were everywhere simultaneously assailed, and nine fell in one day. Along the Pennsylvania and Virginia frontiers the streams ran red with blood, and more than 20,000 settlers were driven from their homes in western Virginia. But the forts at Detroit, Niagara and Pittsburgh did not yield, and the expeditions of Bradstreet and Bouquet (1764) once more brought the Indians to sue for peace.

The treaty made at Niagara in the fall, settled only the status of the frontier forts, and provided for a complete surrender of prisoners. Accordingly in the following year, a conference was held with the various Indian nations at German Flats. At this meeting the whites submitted two propositions; the one, to fix a satisfactory line as a westward boundary to the white settlements; the other, that the Indians should grant the surviving traders, who had suffered by the conspiracy, a tract of land as a compensation for their losses.* To the latter proposition the Indians readily agreed, and offered, in response to the first, the line of the "Ohio or the Alleghany and Susquehannah." The agent of the English not being empowered to act upon this boundary question, the whole matter was left unsettled until definite instructions could be received from England. Through the criminal carelessness of the ministry, this important business did not receive attention until late in 1767; and in the meanwhile settlements were rapidly extending into the disputed territory in open defiance of treaty stipulations, proclamations and the express orders of Gen. Gage, the commander of the English forces.

The Indians began to grow restive under this state of things, but in apparent indifference to the critical character of the situation, the attention of the English ministry was absorbed in adjusting the conflicting claims to lands not yet secured from the threatening savages. The Ohio Company was pressing for an adjustment of its affairs, which the war had greatly deranged; two new companies were asking consideration of projects involving large grants of lands in this region; and in conflict with all these, the Virginia troops, who had served in the French war, and who had been promised a bounty in western lands, were represented by an agent who was urging their claims. Before any adjustment of these matters was reached, however, the attitude of the savages gave rise to a wide-spread apprehension of another border war, and urgent appeals were sent to the ministry to have the boundary line fixed at once. Instructions were accordingly received, and in October, 1768, a meeting of the Iroquois and certain of the Delawares and Shawanese, was held at Fort Stanwix. At this conference the boundary was settled to begin on the Ohio at the mouth of the Tennessee; thence up the Ohio and Alleghany to Kittanning; thence northward to the Susquehanna, etc., thus granting to the English a title to Pennsylvania, western Virginia and Kentucky, so far as the Indian representatives could do so.

*Appendix A, Note 8.

The settlement of this question, though giving only a defective title to the region granted, gave rise to the greatest activity in land speculation. A new organization was formed in Virginia, called the "Mississippi Company," which presented a petition for a grant of 2,500,000 acres. This project was referred to the Board of Trade with the other matters mentioned, and no more heard of it. In the case of the others, a final issue was not reached until 1772; in the meanwhile, the Ohio Company being merged in one of the new ones, and the soldiers' claims being recognized by the united companies and the government, all the claims were adjusted by the royal sanction of the "Walpole Company."

The royal instructions of 1763 were generally considered as a temporary expedient to quiet the natives, and during the tedious negotiations of the land companies, private speculators were busy in exploring the country south of the Ohio. It is said, though denied by the governor, that Lord Dunmore sent surveyors into this region, and was pushing an extensive speculation in the public lands on his own account. Whatever the truth may be in this matter, it is well known that Washington, to whom the Virginia bounty gave 10,000 acres, and others were investigating and selecting lands through their agents, when the war of the Revolution put a stop to both corporate and individual speculation. At the same time adventurous settlers were rapidly over-running the hunting grounds of the savage, building their cabins and planting their fields where the situation appeared the most inviting; and surveyors, the most convincing evidence to the Indians of the intended permanent occupation by the whites, were found on the Ohio as far down as the falls, and on the Kentucky as far up its course as the site of Frankfort.

The futility of the purchase made at Fort Stanwix daily grew more apparent; the Iroquois, who sacrificed no substantial interest in this transaction, and who alone of the savages signed the treaty, were the only satisfied ones to the bargain. The Delawares and Shawanees, who were only feebly represented at the conference, and who at best only partially sanctioned the treaty, when removed from the presence of their conquerors, or after sober second thought, began to view the "settlements with an uneasy and jealous eye," and declared "that they must be compensated for their right, if the people settled thereon, notwithstanding the cession of the Six Nations." Occasional fatal collisions between the two races intensified the hopeless hatred of the Indian toward the whites, and it only needed some new grievance, of importance sufficient to overcome the prudence of influential chiefs, to precipitate another bloody struggle upon the border.

This came at last, and the result is recorded in history as "Dunmore's war." This inconclusive contest had its origin in the assassination of the family of Logan, the Cayuga chieftain, and was determined by a single stubborn passage-at-arms near Point Pleasant. The promptness of the whites in anticipating the action of the Indians prevented the usual forays on the border, but the fear of the ordinary bloody consequences drove most of the settlers from Kentucky. The close of the war settled nothing but the armed contest, and gave rise to the suspicion that the governor meditated treachery to one of his subordinate officers, and that he was even then preparing for the Revolutionary struggle which was already foreshadowed in the minds of many.

In the war of the Revolution, which so closely followed these events that the battle of Point Pleasant is frequently called the first engagement of that memorable struggle, the Indians bore a prominent part. During the protracted contest between the French and English, they had been such important factors that many believed that a general war could not be carried on free of Indian alliances, and in this view Washington coincided, though congress for a time labored to keep the natives neutral. The action of the British rendered such efforts fruitless, and civilization once more joined hands with the savage to deface the product of its own labor.

In the diplomacy of the forest, the British possessed great advantages over the Americans. They were represented by the same persons who had for thirty years exerted a great personal as well as official influence over the savages, and the natives, whose friendships were not fickle and whose hatred was implacable, had great difficulty in understanding the reasons or policy which set one part of the English against the other. There was scarcely a tribe in the Mississippi Valley, however, that was not embittered by the memory of a great wrong perpetrated by the colonists, and since the removal of the French, they had sullenly maintained a fitful peace, induced thereto only by a prudent regard for the power that had inflicted severe punishment on various fields; but they still cherished the vain hope of keeping their remaining lands free from the aggressive advance of the settlements, and were not slow to believe that this division in the ranks of the common enemy would bring them aid against those who were the source of their annoyance. The British agents, therefore, found their policy outlined for them, and promptly confirmed the Indians in their logical deductions.

It is a fact highly creditable to the Indian character that there were individuals and tribes among the natives who were favorable to the American side in the beginning of the war; and it was upon these that the Americans mainly depended to reach those less amicably disposed. Through this agency, the "pack-proverb" illustrating the issue between the colonists and the home government was industriously circulated in the west, and the natives counseled to observe neutrality in the impending struggle.

The main dependence of the English, at the onset, was Sir William Johnson, who had resided in the Mohawk Valley since 1738, and who, since 1746, had held in charge the important Iroquois confederation. In 1774, Johnson suddenly died, leaving his son, Col. Guy Johnson, to succeed him as Indian superintendent, and another son, John, to succeed to his estate and honors. Both sons shared their father's influence with the natives, and with them joined, at this juncture of American affairs, the noted half-breed and Mohawk chieftain, Joseph Brant—all of whom were in sympathy with the royal cause. The colonists, from the first, entertained well grounded fears that the influence of this trio would be exerted against the Americans, and caused them to be watched with so close a scrutiny that, notwithstanding the moral and material support of the wealthy tories of the Mohawk Valley, they deemed it advisable to remove the center of their operations further westward. They first went to Fort Stanwix, and thence to Oswego, from whence they directed their murderous assaults, which subsequently fell with such cruel force upon the frontiers of the central colonies. Opposed to the machinations of the Johnsons, the colonists had a faithful and judicious friend in the Rev. Samuel Kirkland, a missionary to the Oneidas, and through him, his charge and the Tuscaroras were persuaded to stand neutral.

Both parties to the war were early in approaching the Indians. The Massachusetts congress appealed to the Iroquois to aid them or stand neutral, as early as April, 1775; in the following June, the Virginia house of burgesses sent an agent to the western tribes; in August a congress was held at Albany to confer with the New York tribes; and in October another meeting was held at Pittsburgh to treat with the Delawares, Senecas, and certain of the Shawanese; but in each case the Americans found the English had preceded them, and gained the hearts of the tribes. Accordingly, less pacific measures having failed, congress authorized (June 17, 1776) Washington to employ the natives where and when he could, and to offer them rewards for prisoners.

The British were not less practical than prompt in securing Indian alliances. Through the Johnsons, the savages were employed in pursuance of carefully prepared military plans in conjunction with the movements of the regular troops, and each of the western forts were made stations from which the Indians were furnished for, and directed, in their nefarious work. To Detroit, which early attained a bad eminence in this respect, and the forts in the Illinois country, was assigned the conduct of the war in Kentucky and on the Virginia frontier, and the Indians, stimulated by a reward for scalps, so filled the Kentucky forests with their straggling parties that none of the settlers felt safe when outside of the protecting palisades of their frontier forts. It should be observed, however, that in all this "troublous time," when the imminent danger of an Indian war, with all its terrible barbarities was well understood, the flow of immigration into Kentucky was scarcely checked. And later, when hostilities had actually begun; when each day brought its tale of murder and destruction; when the incoming pioneer found the less stout-hearted crowding the homeward trails to the safer retreat of the older colonies—even then the decimated ranks of the Kentucky settlers were gradually reinforced by those whom all the terrors of an Indian invasion could not daunt. The situation cannot be more graphically portrayed than is done in a letter of John Floyd to Col. William Preston:

BOONESBORO, July 21, 1776.

My Dear Sir:—The situation of our country is much altered since I wrote you last. The Indians seem determined to break up our settlement; and I really doubt, unless it is possible to give us some assistance, that the greater part of the people may fall a prey to them. They have, I am satisfied, killed several whom, at this time, I know not how to mention. Many are missing, who some time ago went out about their business, of whom we can hear nothing. Fresh sign of Indians is seen almost every day. I think I mentioned to you before, some damage they had done in Lees' town. On the seventh of this month they killed one Cooper, on Licking Creek, and on the fourteenth, a man whose name I know not, at your salt spring on the same creek

On the same day they took out of a canoe within sight of this place, Miss Betsey Callaway, her sister Frances and a daughter of Daniel Boone, the two last about thirteen or fourteen years old, and the other grown. The affair happened late in the afternoon. They left the canoe on the opposite side of the river from us, which prevented our getting over for some time to pursue them. We could not that night follow more than five miles. Next morning by daylight we were on their track; but they had entirely prevented our following them by walking some distance apart through the thickest cane they could find. We observed their course, and on which side they had left their sign, and traveled upwards of thirty miles. We then supposed they would be less cautious in travelling, and making a turn in order to cross their traces, we had gone but a few miles when we found their tracks in a buffalo path—pursued and overtook them in going about ten miles, just as they were kindling a fire to cook. Our study had been how to get the prisoners without giving the Indians time to murder them after they discovered us. We saw each other nearly at the same time. Four of us fired and all rushed on them, by which they were prevented from carrying anything away except one shot-gun without any ammunition. Mr. Boone and myself had each a pretty fair shot as they began to move off. I am well convinced that I shot one through the body. The one he shot dropped his gun; mine had none. The place was covered with thick cane, and being so much elated on recovering the three poor little heart-broken girls, we were prevented from making any further search. We sent the Indians off almost naked, some without their moccasins, and none of them without so much as a knife or tomahawk. After the girls came to themselves sufficiently to speak they told us there were only five Indians—four Shawanese and one Cherokee. They could speak good English and said they should go to the Shawanese towns. The war-club we got was like some I have seen of that nation. Several words of their language which the girls retained, were known to be Shawanese. They also told them that the Cherokees had killed or driven all the people from Watauga and thereabout, and that fourteen Cherokees were then in Kentucky waiting to do mischief. If the war becomes general, of which there is the greatest appearance, our situation is truly alarming. We are about finishing a large fort, and intend to keep possession of this place as long as possible. They are, I understand, doing the same thing at Harrodsburg, and also on Elkhorn, at the Royal Spring. The settlement at Licking Creek, known by the name of Hinkston's, has been broken up; nineteen of the settlers are now here on their way in—Hinkston among the rest. They all seem deaf to anything we can say to dissuade them. Ten, at least, of our own people are going to join them, which will leave us with less than thirty men at this fort. I think more than three hundred men have left the country since I came out, and not one has arrived, except a few cabiners down the Ohio.

I want to return as much as any person can do; but if I leave the country now, there is scarcely one single man who will not follow the example. When I think of the deplorable condition a few helpless families are likely to be in, I conclude to sell my life as dearly as I can in their defense, rather than make an ignominious escape. I am afraid it is in vain to sue for any relief from Virginia; yet the convention encouraged the settlement of this country, and why should not the extreme parts of Fincastle be as justly entitled to protection as any other part of the country. If an expedition were carried on against those nations who are at open war with the people in general, we might be in great measure relieved, by drawing them off to defend their towns. If anything under Heaven can be done for us, I know of no person who would more willingly engage in forwarding us assistance than yourself. I do, at the request and in behalf of all the distressed women and children and other inhabitants of this place, implore the aid of every leading man who may have it in his power to give us relief. I cannot write. You can better guess at my ideas from what I have said than I can express them.

I am, dear sir,
Yours most affectionately,
To my last moments,
J. FLOYD.

To COL. PRESTON.

Happily, strength is not only in numbers, and assistance was nearer at hand than the author of the above letter dreamed. The year 1776 brought several valuable accessions to the sorely beset settlement in Kentucky, and most important of all was the arrival of George Rogers Clark, as a permanent settler. He was a native of Albemarle County, Va., where he was born in November, 1752;* his early life was spent as a surveyor, a service which, at that day, demanded the highest qualifications of heart and brain. He took part in Dunmore's war, in which he served as commander of a company, and in the following year made a visit to Kentucky. Pleased with the prospect, he determined to adopt the newly opened country as his home, and accordingly, in 1776, he made his appearance on the frontier. "He fixed on no particular residence—was much in the wood; incidentally visiting the forts and ostensible camps, cultivated the acquaintance of the people, and acquired an extensive knowledge of the various objects presented to his curiosity or to his inspection." (Marshall.) His mind took a bolder flight than those of his contemporaries on the border, and looking beyond the present defense of isolated forts his plans contemplated the organization and protection of the whole region purchased at Fort Stanwix.

The immediate demand, which outweighed all other considerations at this period, was the political organization of this border land. Fincastle County, of Virginia, was supposed to include the frontier posts of Kentucky, though of this the pioneers had no tangible evidence, as the scattered condition of the settlements and their remoteness from the seat of government gave them neither a voice in the constitution of the administration, nor the benefit of its provisions. At the same time, a great uncertainty prevailed, whether the country south of the Ohio River actually fell within the charter lines of North Carolina or Virginia; the Henderson Purchase still further complicated the situation, and the pioneers, affected both in their property and lives by these disintegrating influences, determined to settle their political relations by an appeal to Virginia.

In this movement Clark was a prominent factor, and in June, 1776, the convention at Harrodstown elected him and Gabriel John Jones as members of the Virginia legislature. The election obviously had no legal force, and was not what Clark contemplated; but he had been absent from the convention, and it was evidently too late to remedy its action when he was notified of his election. He accordingly accepted the result as constituting him an agent for the border community, and repaired at once to Virginia. Here he found the legislature adjourned, and the governor, Patrick Henry, lying sick at his residence in Hanover. Visiting the governor at once, Clark laid before him the necessities of the frontier and his plan for its relief. In this the governor heartily joined and gave him a letter to the council. Thus equipped, the envoy of the frontier settlements appeared before that body, presented his case and asked for 500 pounds of powder for the use of the various stations on the border. The legal status of the petitioners was not clear, however, and the council, rendered uncertain as to the political relations of these frontier settlements, felt constrained to act with great caution. With every desire to aid the distressed settlers, the council still felt impelled to refuse the gunpowder as a gift to fellow-citizens, but offered to lend it to them as friends. But Clark wanted something more than gunpowder; he wanted recognition, and with a boldness that characterizes his whole career, he returned the order for a loan of gunpowder, with a letter setting forth his reasons for not accepting it on such terms, intimating that the Kentuckians would look elsewhere for assistance, and added "that a country which was not worth defending, was not worth claiming." This spirited course had its intended effect; the council re-assembled, and without reservation placed the required powder at Pittsburgh, subject to Clark's orders for the use of "Kentucki."

*Collins' Historical Sketches of Kentucky; the date given by Marshall is September, 1748.

This important matter happily adjusted, Clark wrote to his constituents of the first results of his mission and prepared to present their interests before the legislature when it should meet in the fall. It is sufficient to say in this place that in this part of his mission he was equally successful, and the County of Kentucky was formed. He now prepared to return to the frontier, but fortunately at the moment of departure he learned that the powder had not yet been removed from Pittsburgh, and he determined to take this route in his return, to insure the safe and prompt delivery of the needed ammunition. This undertaking was attended with difficulties of no little importance, but with his usual happy fortune, Clark succeeded in getting the needed supply to its destination.

The following year (1777) was characterized by a more determined effort on the part of the Indians and English; the number of straggling parties of hostile savages was greatly augmented; determined attacks were made upon the strongest posts; and all but, the three principal stations were broken up and abandoned. But notwithstanding these forbidding experiences, the Kentucky settlement received frequent accessions, and the course of life ran on not unmixed with merriment in the midst of vicissitudes which made violent death a daily visitor. The good result of Clark's mission was soon seen by the arrival of meager but acceptable reinforcements; but that hero had not settled down into inactivity. His mind was busy with larger plans, and observing the advantage the British derived from the possession of the Illinois forts he conceived the plan of striking a powerful blow in defense of Kentucky by the capture of these posts. The necessity for some such action had already been brought to the attention of congress, and commissioners had been appointed to confer with Gen. Hand, commanding at Fort Pitt, in regard to the subject, but the achievement of this object was reserved for Clark. In the summer of this year (1777), he had sent spies to reconnoiter the forts. On their return they brought intelligence of increased activity in this quarter, and such account of the whole situation as to convince Clark of the practicability of the meditated enterprise. Accordingly in August, he set out for Williamsburg to submit his project, but with no definite intention of asking the command of the expedition.

Under date of November 19, 1779, Clark wrote a letter from "Louisville, Falls of Ohio," to Hon. George Mason, in which he gives a short sketch of his enterprise and proceeding in the Illinois, and from this are taken the following extracts descriptive of the organization of the expedition:

I had just Reasons known to few but myself that occationed me to resolve not to have any farther Command whatever, without I should find a very great call for Troops and my Country in danger, in such case I was determined to lose my Life rather (than) we should submit. * * * * But finding that we were in (an) alarming situation, the Indians desperate on one side, the Britains on the others, I immediately resolved to encourage an Expedition to the Illinois. But to make it publick was a certain loss of it. I proposed the plan of it to a few Gentlemen, they communicated it to the Governor, it was immediately determined on, to put in Excution as soon as a Bill could be passed to enable the Governour to order it; it accordingly pass'd though but a few in the House knew the real intent of it. After giving the Council all the intelligence I possibly could, I resolv'd to pursue my other Plans. But being desired by the Governor to stay sometime in town, I wated with impatience he, I suppose, believing that I wanted the Command, and was determined to give it to me; But it was far from my inclination at that time. I was summoned to attend the Council Board, the instructions and necessary papers were ready for puting in the name of the Person to Command; I believed they expected me to selicit for it, but I resolved not to do so, for reasons I hinted you before. However I excepted it after being told the Command of this little Army was designed for me. I then got every request granted, and (was) fully empowered to raise as many Men as I could, not exceeding a certain number; after being engaged I was then as Determined to prosecute it with Vigour, as I was before indifferent about the Command; I had since the beginning of the War taken pains to make myself acquainted with the situation of the British posts on the Fronteers, and since find that I was not mistaken in my judgement. I was ordered to attact the Illinois, in case of Success to carry my Arms to any quarter I pleased. I was certain that with 500 Men I could take the Illinois, and by my treating the Inhabitants as fellow Citizens, and show them that I meant to protect them rather than treat them as a Conquered People. Engaging the Indians to our Interests, etc., It might probably have so great an effect on their Countrymen at Detroyet (they already disliked their Master) that it would be an easy prey for me. I should have mentioned my design to his Excellency, but was convinced or afraid that it might lessen his esteem for me, as it was a general opinion that it would take several thousand to approach that Place. I was happy with the thoughts of a fair prospect of undeceiving the Publick respecting their formidable Enemies on our Fronteers. I left Williamsburg January the 18th, made as quick dispatch as possible to the fronteers, and by the end of the month had Recruiting Parties disposed from Pitsburgh to Carolina, had my little Army Recruited in half the time I expected.

Elivated with the Thoughts of the great service we should do our Country in some measure puting an end to the Indian War on our fronteers, it may appear to you to be mear presumption in me, but I was always too jealous of myself to be far wrong in the plans that I had so long studied, and since find that I could have executed it with the greatest ease if it had not been (the) following Conduct of many leading Men in the fronteers, that had like to have put an end to the enterprise, not knowing my Destination, and through a spirit of obstinacy they combined and did everything that lay in their power to stop the Men that had Enlisted, and set the whole Fronteers in an uproar, even condescended to harbor and protect those that Deserted; I found my case desperate, and the longer I remained the worse it was—I plainly saw that my Principal Design was baffled—I was resolved to push to Kentucky with what Men I could gather in West Augusta; being Joined by Capts. Bowman and Helms who had each raised a Company for the Expedition, but two-thirds of them was stopped by the undersigned Enemies to the Country that I before mentioned. In the whole I had about one hundred and fifty men collected and set sail for the Falls. I had previous to this received Letters from Capt. Smith on Holdston Enforming me that he intended to meet me at that place with near two hundred Men, which encouraged me much as I was enabled by that reinforcement at least to attack the Illinois with a probability of Success, &c.

I set out from Redstone the 12th day of May, leaving the Country in great confusion, much distressed by the Indians. General Hand, pleased with my intentions, furnished me with every necessary I wanted and the — of May I arrived at Canoweay (Kanawha) to the Joy of the Garrison as they were very weak, & had the day before been attacted by a large Body of Indians.

Being Joined by Captain Oharrard's compy. on his way to the Osark; after spending a day or two, We set out and had a very pleasant Voyage to the falls of the Ohio, having sent Expresses to the Stations on Kentucky from the mouth of the River, for Capt. Smith to join me immediately as I made no doubt but that he was wateing for me; But you may easily guess at my mortification on being informed that he had not arrived, that all his Men had been stopped by the incessant labours of the populace, except part of a compy., that had arrived under the Command of one captain Dellands, some on their march being threatened to be put in Prison if they did not return; this information made me Desperate as I was before Determined.

Reflecting on the information that I had of some of my greatest opponents censuring the Governour for his conduct, as they thought ordering me for the protection of Kentucky only; that and other secret impulses Occationed me in spite of all Counsel to risque the Expedition, to convince them of their error until that moment, secret to the Principal officers I had. I was sensible of the impression it would have on many, to be taken near a thousand (miles) from the Body of their Country, to attack a People five times their number, and merciless Tribes of Indians their Allies, and determined Enemies to us.

I knew that my case was desperate, but the more I reflected on my weakness the more I was pleased with the Enterprise. Joined by a few Kentuckians under Colonel Montgomery to stop desertion I knew would ensue on the Troops knowing their Destination, I had encamped on a small Island in the middle of the Falls, kept strict Guard on the Boats, but Lieutenant Hutchings of Dillard's Compy. contrived to make his escape with his party after being refused leave to return, luckely a few of his Men was taken the next day by a party sent after them; on this Island I first began to discipline my little Army knowing that to be the most essential point toward success, most of them determined to follow me, the rest seeing no probability of making escape I soon got that subordination as I could wish for; about twenty families that had followed me much against my Inclination I found now to be of service to me guarding a Block-house that I had erected on the Island to secure my Provisions.

On the second of January, 1778, two sets of instructions were issued to "Lieut.-Col." Clark; the one for the public, authorized him "to enlist seven companies of men, officered in the usual manner, to act as militia; * * * * to proceed to Kentucky, and there to obey such orders and directions as you shall give them for three months after their arrival at that place," etc.; the other, for the guidance of the expedition, was secret, and designated the number of men for each company as fifty; directed him "with this force attack the British post at Kaskasky;" and stated that it was "in contemplation to establish a post near the mouth of the Ohio," for which the cannon captured at Kaskaskia might be available, etc.

The point against which the expedition was thus projected was the center of a considerable French settlement, and the oldest permanent European settlement in the valley of the Mississippi. In 1700, the French and Indians at old Kaskaskia had removed to a point on Kaskaskia River, near the Mississippi, 100 miles or more above the mouth of the Ohio. In 1702, Juchereau had gone across to the Wabash and founded Vincennes, and each of these points had been centers of active trade with the Indians. In 1718, Fort Chartres was erected on the Mississippi, sixteen miles above the village; about it sprang up the village of New Chartres; five miles away the village of Prairie du Rocher was founded; and some sixty miles above Kaskaskia was the village of Cahokia. During the ascendency of the French power, the fort was an important point d'appui; it was from this point that a strong contingent went up the Ohio to the capture of George Washington and his forces at Fort Necessity; from here the detachment went out which destroyed Fort Granville, within sixty miles of Philadelphia; another body of its troops aided in the defeat of Maj. Grant at Fort Du Quesne; and another assisted in the vain attempt to raise the British siege of Niagara.

Though transferred by treaty to the English in 1763, the fort was the last place in North America to lower the white ensign of the Bourbon king, and it was not until the latter part of 1765 that the British formally accepted the surrender of this most remote citadel. Pontiac, the unwavering friend of the French, took upon himself, unaided by his former allies, to hold back the victorious English. Maj. Loftus, Capts. Pitman and Morris, Lieut. Frazer, and George Crogan, some with force, some in disguise, and others with diplomacy, sought to reach the fort to accept its capitulation, but each one was foiled and turned back with his mission unaccomplished, glad to escape the fate of that Englishman, for whom Pontiac assured them he kept a "kettle boiling over a large fire."

The subsequent defeat of the Indians finally gave this forest fortress into the hands of the English, thus projecting another nationality into this "neck of the woods." The secret treaty of 1762 had brought the Spanish to the west bank of the river, and it is suggestive of the different races and varying sovereignties of this locality "that a French soldier from the Spanish city of St. Louis should be married to an Englishwoman by a French priest in the British colony of Illinois." The English garrison occupied the old French fort until one day in 1772, when the river, having overflowed its banks, swept away a bastion and the river wall; at this, the occupants fled with precipitate haste to the high ground near Kaskaskia, where they erected a palisade fort.

Clark's original plan contemplated the capture of these outlying posts only as a step towards the capture of Detroit, but the difficulties under which he labored, as well as the fact that his "principal plan was baffled," have been noted in his letter. On reaching the falls of the Ohio, his plans were forced to undergo another change, which he thus describes in his journal: "As Post Vincennes at this time was a town of considerable force, consisting of nearly 400 militia, with an Indian town adjoining, and great numbers continually in the neighborhood, and in the scale of Indian affairs of more importance than any other, I had thought of attacking it first; but now found that I could by no means venture near it. I resolved to begin my career in the Illinois, where there were more inhabitants, but scattered in different villages and less danger of being immediately overpowered by the Indians; in case of necessity we could probably make our retreat to the Spanish side of the Mississippi; but if successful we might pave our way to the possession of Post Vincennes."

Accordingly on the 26th* of June, the expedition set out from Corn Island with 153 men, and proceeded day and night until the mouth of the Tennessee was reached. Here the troops were disembarked to prepare "for a march by land;" a few hours later a company of hunters, "but eight days from Kaskaskias," were taken, who on being questioned were found to be colonists favorable to the American cause. The intelligence they gave was not favorable to the expedition, but they asked permission to join its fortunes and showed their loyalty by giving out to the men only such reports as they had been instructed by Clark to do. The company was re-embarked, and on the evening of the same day ran their boats into a small creek about a mile "above the old Fort Massac." After resting one night, the invaders struck out for the northwest "and had a very fatiguing journey for about fifty miles," until the plains were struck.

Nothing extraordinary happened through the march except the guide's losing his way, which for a time put the "troops in the greatest confusion," and the commander in a great "flow of rage." The guide recovered his bearings, however, and on the evening of July 4, the little army reached a point within three miles of Kaskaskia. Marching after night to a farm-house on the same side of the river, about a mile above the town, boats were found to take them to the side on which the fort stood; and, at the same time, it was learned from the captured family that some suspicion had been entertained of an attack a few days before, when some preparations for defense were made, but the people, "making no discoveries, had got off their guard." The force was subsequently divided into two divisions; the one to cross the river again, and surround the town, the other to follow the commander in the attack on the fort. Acting upon the information that the French had been taught to hold the Americans in deadly fear, Clark provided that if the attack on the fort should succeed, persons who could speak French were to be sent through the streets of the village to proclaim "that every man of the enemy who should appear in them would be shot down." The attack on the fort was successful, the Americans entering it by "a postern gate left open on the river side of the fortification," which was revealed by a hunting soldier, taken prisoner the evening before.* The programme in reference to the town was successfully carried out, and in about two hours the inhabitants were disarmed; the whole having been accomplished without one drop of bloodshed. On the 6th, Cahokia fell in like manner without a blow.

"Post St. Vincent, a town about the size of Williamsburg," writes Clark, "was the next object in my view," but at this juncture of affairs new difficulties arose to vex the sorely beset commander. The term for which the troops had enlisted had expired, and the greater part of them were determined to return to their homes. The situation was most disheartening; by a happy stroke of diplomacy the horror and detestation of the French citizens had been turned to the most enthusiastic loyalty, but the peasantry were an unwarlike people, and still held the power of the British in great respect. Nothing, therefore, but a show of power could confirm them in their new attitude, and secure their hearty co-operation in the plans contemplated for the capture of Vincennes and the detachment of the Indians from the British interests. The retirement of the troops meant the tame surrender of all the valuable results of the ably planned and executed campaign—an issue which the bold leader did not concede possible for a moment. Acting upon implied powers bestowed by his instructions, Clark secured the re-enlistment of about 100 men for eight months, though not without the use of "great preasents and promises."

*Clark's letter to Preston. Butler places it on June 24, p. 50, note.

* Butler's History of Kentucky, p. 53.

"To color my staying with so few troops," writes Clark, "I made a feint of returning to the falls, as though I had sufficient confidence in the people, hoping that the inhabitants would remonstrate against my leaving them, which they did in the warmest terms, proving the necessity of the troops at that place, in that they were afraid, if I returned, the English would again possess the country. Then, seemingly by their request, I agreed to stay with two companies of troops, and that I hardly thought, as they alleged, that so many was necessary; but if more was wanted I could get them at any time from the falls, where they were made to believe was a considerable garrison." In the meanwhile the French had shown their faith by their works; some had accompanied the troops to Cahokia to assure its citizens of the hearty co-operation of Kaskaskia; some days later, the priest, with others, proposed to carry a proclamation to Vincennes, and by their representations to secure the voluntary allegiance of that post; and now that troops were needed, sufficient of the citizens volunteered to complete the two companies which remained with Clark. These services were promptly accepted, and on August 1st, the deputation to Vincennes returned with the cheering intelligence that the people of that place had publicly taken the oath of allegiance, and raised the flag of the colonists.

"Domestic affairs being partly well settled, the Indian department came next the object" of Col. Clark's attention, and of the first importance, as his appearance in the country had put them in the greatest consternation. "They were generally at war against us," writes Clark, "but the French and Spaniards, appearing so fond of us, confused them; they counseled with the French traders, to know what was the best to be done, and of course was advised to come and solicit for peace." Capt. Helm was sent to Vincennes as commandant of that post and superintendent of the Indians thereabouts, and by him were "sent letters and speeches to the Kickapoos and Piankeshaws." In September negotiations were opened with the Illinois tribes at Cahokia, where Capt. Bowman commanded. Here the remarkable diplomatic talent of Col. Clark shone with new luster; spending five weeks at this point, he negotiated treaties with ten or twelve nations; sent agents to all quarters and made his influence felt among the savages "even to the borders of the lakes." At Vincennes the wisdom of Clark's selection was abundantly confirmed by the tact and prudence displayed by Capt. Helm; the savages were speedily won, and joined with a small detachment of troops from Kaskaskia in attempting the capture of a British agent located near the site of Lafayette, Ind.

Such success on the part of the Americans was not likely to pass unnoticed on the part of the enemy at Detroit, and no precaution was omitted to guard against surprise. The result of the abortive campaign by McIntosh against the lake posts was learned by the capture of an English spy at Cahokia, and at the same time uncertain information was gained of Hamilton's intended descent upon the Illinois country. Supposing that Kaskaskia as the most important post would be first attacked, the scouts were increased and every approach guarded with increased vigilance. Some of these spies were captured by the enemy, but the force at Kaskaskia learned nothing certain of the movements of the British, until news was brought in the latter part of January, 1779, that Vincennes had been taken. The garrison at this place, consisting of Capt. Helm and one man, was surprised on the 17th of December, by the appearance of Hamilton at the head of 800 French, Indians and regulars, and forced to surrender, but not until the usual honors of war had been accorded by the over-anxious commander of the besieging forces.

The British plan contemplated the reduction of Kaskaskia also, to be followed by a vigorous attack upon the whole of Kentucky border, but the gallant behavior of Capt. Helm on this occasion gave the English general an impressive example of the character of the enemy he must expect to meet, and the rest of the fall's campaign was deferred, the season being so far advanced as to prevent any protracted movement. There was some alarm at Kaskaskia, caused by the approach of a party of Indians to waylay and capture Col. Clark; this attempt was soon discovered and foiled, but the general situation was none the less critical. Hamilton, deciding on no further operations that season, dispersed his Indian allies to attack various points on the borders, but with orders to rejoin him in the spring, and sent messengers to the southern tribes, 500 of whom he expected to join him in time for the spring campaign.

Clark at once perceived the importance of checking these designs, and that the only probability of holding the country was to take advantage of the enemy's present weakness. He accordingly proceeded to concentrate his forces, which, all counted, numbered "only a little upwards of 200 men," and having prepared a large boat "mounting two four-pounders" and "four large swivels," he set out for Vincennes with an "inward assurance of success." "But I had some secret check," writes Clark;* "we had now a route before us of 240 miles in length, through, I suppose, one of the most beautiful countries in the world, but at this time in many parts flowing with water and exceeding bad marching; * * * the first obstruction of any consequence that I met with was on the 13th (February), arriving at the two little Wabachees: although three miles asunder, they now make but one, the flowed water between them being at least three feet deep, and in many places four. * * *

"This would have been enough to have stopped any set of men that was not in the same temper as we were. But in three days we continued to cross, by building a large canoe, ferried across the two channels—the rest of the way we waded—building scaffolds at each to lodge our baggage until the horses crossed to take it; it rained nearly a third of our march, but we never halted for it; on the evening of the 17th we got to the lowlands of the river Umbara (Embarrass), which we found deep in water, it being nine miles to St. Vincent's, which stood on the east side of the Wabache, and every foot of the way covered with deep water; we marched down the little river in order to gain the banks of the main, which we did in about three leagues, made a small canoe and sent an express to meet the boat and hurry it up; from the spot we now lay on (it) was about ten miles to town, and every foot of the way put together, that was not three feet and upward under water, would not have made the length of two miles and a half, and not a mouthful of provision. * * * But to our inexpressible joy, on the evening of the 23d we got safe on terra firma within half a league of the fort, covered by a small grove of trees where we had a full view of the wished-for spot. * * * We had already taken some prisoners that was coming from the town. Laying in this grove some time to dry our clothes by the sun, we took another prisoner known to be a friend, by which we got all the intelligence we wished for."

At this point Clark determined to act with his accustomed boldness. Writing a letter to the inhabitants that he was before the town, and of his designs, he expressed the wish that those who intended to support the English would repair to the fort, while others should keep close to their houses, "other ways there should be no mercy shown them." He also sent the "compliments of several officers that was known to be expected to reinforce me"; and with this he dispatched the prisoner to the beleagured village. As it was an open plain from his point of cover to the fort, Clark timed his approach so as to bring his lines in sight of the place just before dark, and taking advantage of the undulations of the land, disposed the lines in such a manner that nothing but the pavilions* could be seen, having as many of them as would be sufficient for a thousand men." The houses so obstructed the view from the fort that the garrison was not apprised of the presence of the foe until the Americans had full possession of the town, and a soldier was wounded while looking out of a port-hole to learn the cause of the disturbance, supposing it to be occasioned by drunken Indians.

With this the battle began; the artillery of the fort "played briskly but did no execution;" the Americans, "shielded by houses, palings and ditches," got up within eighty or a hundred yards of the fort, and maintained a continuous fire all night; but "never was a heavier fire kept up for eighteen hours with so little damage done." The boldness of Col. Clark had not been without its effect, however, and notwithstanding the "little damage done," the English commandant seemed to delay his surrender only for a fitting opportunity. About 9 o'clock on the following morning (February 24), Clark sent a flag to the garrison, demanding its immediate surrender, warning the officer in command against the destruction of any papers in his possession, and adding: "For if I am obliged to storm, you may depend on such treatment as is justly due to a murderer."

*Letter to Col. Preston.

*Flags.

To this Hamilton returned a dignified refusal, whereupon the besiegers began a hot fire upon the fort, killing or wounding several of the garrison through the port-holes. The English commander's apprehensions rapidly getting the better of his dignity he soon proposed a truce for three days; this Clark peremptorily declined, and reiterated his demand for an immediate and unconditional surrender. After a conference in which the fears of the English lieutenant-governor were raised to the highest point, articles of surrender were agreed upon. About 10 o'clock on the 25th, the American flag rose over the fort, and the American troops took possession. With this surrender ended all English pretensions to this region.

On the official announcement of Clark's first success in the Illinois country, the Virginia legislature took prompt action to secure the dominion thus acquired, and in October, 1778, passed "an act for the establishing of the County of Illinois, and for the more effectual protection and defense thereof." This act, after reciting the facts of the expedition, projected and carried to success by Virginia militia, provided that all citizens of Virginia settled west of Ohio should be included in the new and distinct county, and authorized the governor to appoint the usual officers for the administration of civil affairs. For the important post of county-lieutenant, Gov. Henry selected John Todd, and on the 12th of December indited upon the opening pages of a record-book, his letter of instructions to the newly appointed officer. This also constituted his commission and reached him at Vincennes, shortly after its surrender, in February, 1779, whither Col. Todd had accompanied the expedition which had effected its capture. The adjustment of private affairs engaged his attention for the time, and it was not until the following May that he arrived at Kaskaskia, and assumed the duties of his new office, in the discharge of which he continued until his death at the battle of Blue Lick, in 1782. No successor to him seems to have been appointed, the cession of the Northwest having been made by the Virginia assembly in December of the following year.

CHAPTER IV.

THE DARK AND BLOODY GROUND—ITS PREHISTORIC ANNALS.

KAN-TUCK-KEE, pronounced, according to Marshall, with "a strong emphasis," is a word of Indian origin, applied by the savages to a "long deep-channeled, and clifty river," emptying into the Ohio from the South about midway between Louisville and Cincinnati, and was very early used by this people to designate a considerable scope of country lying adjacent to its banks. It is said to signify "river of blood," and to refer to that prehistoric age of which there are few scientific data save those found in certain mounds found here and there in the country—"casual relics of antiquity, thus left upon this distant shore of time, telling no tale but that such things had been and had perished." Of these mementoes of a forgotten past, Kentucky divides with Ohio and Illinois the distinction of possessing the larger share of those found in North America.

It was not to be expected that these ancient monuments should long escape the exploring eye of science, and their discovery, with the presence of the Indian, early gave rise to numerous hypotheses to account for the peopling of the "New World." In the early history of scientific investigation, however, these relics formed but a minor part of the evidence relied upon to support the various theories entertained in regard to the origin of the Americans. Philological and ethnological peculiarities of the various peoples on the earth, with more or less mythical traditions current in every nation, supplied a more tangible and accommodating material with which to eke out preconceived theories, and from such materials arose hypotheses that, while they did not answer all the conditions of the problem, yet possessed so many half truths as to make them for years not untenable in the dawn of scientific progress. Even now in the brighter light of recent investigations, however, much later developments may disallow the authority of their data, or the justness of their conclusion, these early fancies still possess a fascination for the speculative student that will not let them utterly die.

Geologists have long believed that there was a time when the "lands now called Italy and Spain were joined to Africa, and in place of the Mediterranean Sea were only a few land-locked basins; when the British Islands as far north as the Shetlands were a part of the continent; when the present bottom of the North Sea was a low, wide plain covered probably by magnificent forests, through which the Rhine, with the Elbe and the Thames as its tributaries, wound its way to discharge its waters at length into the ocean north of Scandinavia; and when the western boundary of Europe was far out in the Atlantic beyond the present coasts of Ireland and France, extending in an unbroken line from the Arctic Ocean to Africa."* Bolder theorists, accepting the suggestions of Humboldt that the summits of the Madeira and Canary Islands may once have been a part of the chain of the Atlas Mountains, have extended this hypothetical range to the West Indies, and constructed a continent which once joined Africa with Central America.

It would be impossible to note within ordinary limits the philological and ethnological comparisons which afford the data from which are drawn the plausible arguments arrayed in support of these early theories, or the legends which form so important a feature in the chain of evidence relied upon. Prominent among the latter, however, is the story of the lost Atlantis, which Plato records as related to Solon by an Egyptian priest; some 9,000 years before his time, the priest said, a great insular continent, including the Azores, Madeira, Canary and Cape Verde Islands, and reaching far out into the ocean, was destroyed by an earthquake and submerged, with all its powerful and warlike race of inhabitants.

*Prehistoric man; Bryant's History U. S.; vide Rafinesque, et al.

Of these early archæological speculations, one which possesses the additional interest afforded by a local coloring is found in the introductory pages of Marshall's "History of Kentucky," published in 1824. In this article the learned Prof. Rafinesque* has briefly noted the regular succession of the principal events which preceded the advent of the modern nations upon this continent. He adopts a theory which harmonizes the various suggestions as to a derivative origin of the Americans, and makes the "Atalan" and "Cutan" nations, which found their way thither from the east, the pioneers of human existence in America; subsequently the "Iztacan" and "Oghuzians" coming from the west invaded the first settlements, and eventually became masters of the situation. The periods which cover the evolution of this prehistoric society are, (1st) from the dispersion of mankind to the first discovery of America, including several centuries; (2nd) from the discovery of America to the founding of the western empires, including some centuries; (3d) from the foundation of these empires to the Pelegian revolution of nature, including several centuries; (4th)from the Pelegian revolution to the invasion of the Iztacan nations, including about twelve centuries; (5th) from the Iztacan invasion to the decline and fall of the Atalan and Cutan nations in North America, including about thirty centuries to the present time.

It will be observed that these periods are entirely arbitrary, good for this theory and theorist only, and begin with the cessation of the Biblical flood. To the first period is assigned the primary activities of the second era of human existence; the repeopling of the earth; the dispersion of mankind; the expansion of patriarchal families into the first colonies of primitive nations; and the growth of these nations into independent historical factors. Then followed those social convulsions that find expression in revolution, conquest and predatory wars, eventually resulting in the consolidation of many of the national fragments into one powerful empire by the prowess of the warlike "Atlantes" of Africa. The sway of this empire which "lasted many ages" extended from North Africa to the British Islands; and to the splendor of its power was added the glory of discovery.

Of the islands which now lie off the northwestern coast of Africa, Prof. Rafinesque constructs "one or more" prehistoric islands called "Atlantic Islands, which have given the name to the Atlantic Ocean." From these certain bold navigators are supposed to have found their way to the West Indies, driven by trade winds; and from thence to have discovered the mainland. This discovery found the people of the whole empire ready to seek new fortunes and adventure in the new land, and a great throng of immigrants soon spread over the American continent, the "marshy plains" bordering the large rivers, and the active volcanoes of South America, no less than the fertile spots of North America, determining the site of the new settlements. The "Atlantes" of America became known as "Atalans," from "Atala," a name given to the newly discovered land, while the emigrants of many subject nations contributing to the population of the New World were generically designated as "Cutans." The Atlantic shore, it is said, was then an arid waste but recently emerged from the sea, and the "Great White Land (Mahaswe-ta-Bhumi of Hind)" beyond the Alleghanies "became the seat of a great empire." This wonderful expansion does not seem to have endangered

*Prof. C. S. Rafinesque was a gentleman of great and very versatile talent. He was one of the pioneers in scientific research, and much of his work has been superseded by more recent investigations. His "Annals of Kentucky," of which extended notice is made in these pages is entitled to consideration only as a curious speculation which the vague ideas entertained at his time alone could warrant. He was born at Galata, Turkey, in 1784; came to America in 1802; in 1819 was made Professor of Natural Sciences in the Transylvania University, at Lexington, Ky., a position he held for seven years. He died in Philadelphia, in 1840. He published several works on scientific subjects, none of which survive save his writings on "Recent and Fossil Conchology," edited by W. G. Binney and G. W. Tryon, Jr.

the existence of the great aggregation of empires, the limits of which now touch the Ganges on the south and the Mississippi and Lake Ontario on the north. While the empire of the western continent had its own rulers, and a long succession of them, the African emperors were "acknowledged generally as lords paramount."

Such was the situation of affairs when occurred that wonderful cataclysm in which the traditional island of Atlantis was lost, and the whole face of the world materially changed. This fearful convulsion of nature severed all connection between the hemispheres, each survivor among the nations believing the other destroyed. Thus isolated, and the cohesive power of the government destroyed by the abolition of the object of common allegiance, the empire became divided into numerous nations, of which the "Talegans," occupying Kentucky and contiguous States, and the "Apalans, south of them, were two of the most powerful empires of that period." Then followed (5th period) the attack of the "Iztacans," named from their ancestor "Iztac." These people correspond to those of the "Mongolian immigration," to which many theorists assign the first peopling of America. According to Prof. Rafinesque, they may have crossed the Behring Strait before the "Pelegian" cataclysm, but it was some centuries before they came in contact with the older occupants of the Mississippi Valley. Of this race, the "Olmecas or Hulmecs" first came in contact with the "Talegans," but, unable to subdue them, passed into Tennessee, and finally went to Anahuac. Other Iztacan nations followed; came in collision with the "Talegans" with no better success, and followed in the footsteps of their predecessors, with whom they formed alliances, and constituted the great "Natchez" confederation or empire. This empire was found, more or less firmly established, northward from Anahuac to Alabama, Tennessee and Missouri, and waged frequent wars with the "Talegans."

About five centuries later occurred the "Oghuzian" invasion. The Natchez empire had gained some success in its wars with the "Atalans," and at this time held the country from "the Ohio to Florida, and from the Alleghanies to the Mississippi. * * * The nations forming this empire or league, were civilized and cultivators; they became polished by their intercourse with the Atalans, and borrowed many customs from them. They worshiped the sun and fire, but did not build circular temples, erecting instead pyramids and high altars, generally of a square or angular form. * * * * * At the Oghuzian invasion, the Taencas, a Natchez tribe, occupied West Kentucky, the Huasiotos were in East Kentucky, and some Talegans still held the banks of the Ohio, etc.

"The Cherokees or Zulocans, an Atalan nation dwelling west of the Mississippi, being driven by the Oghuzians, came to Kentucky and Tennessee, and settled at last after many wars in the mountains of Carolina, where they became a nation of hunting mountaineers, and gradually destroyed the Huasioto nation of the Cumberland Mountains. The Shawanees, an Oghuzian tribe, came then in contact with the Natchez and expelled them from Kentucky, which the victors occupied for a long time. The Talegans north of the Ohio were partly destroyed or driven south through Kentucky to join the Apalachians, or down the Mississippi toward Louisiana and Mexico." And with these peoples, the Natchez (Iztacans) and Oghuzians, divided by various influences into numerous petty tribes, were waging their internecine wars when the Europeans came upon the scene.

Such confusions of fact and fable are certainly not history; but while the result of the latest and most exhaustive examination* of these theories, that "no man at the present day can tell the origin of the American," may be accepted as the truth of the matter, yet it is considered not impossible by a well informed essayist (Bryant's Hist. U. S.), that "in them may yet be found some aid in putting together the unwritten story of the early human race on this continent." But the true relation between these speculations and the teachings of true science does not yet appear. The developments of science during the past half-century have not been few nor unimportant, but they have supplied little of detail, and have rather widened than restricted the field for speculation. Thus far, scientific deductions have been largely negative in their conclusions, destroying confidence in old systems of chronology, and in the value of the various historical traditions formerly relied upon, without supplying anything definitive in their place. Here and there disconnected discoveries establish the fact that man existed in a period so remote, that, in its contemplation, a thousand years are "as a watch in the night," and in the archæological calendar, his career is marked by the chipped flint (Palæolithic) and the polished stone periods (Neolithic) of the stone age, the bronze and iron ages; but of the centuries involved in each or any age the scientist knows scarcely more of the number than the school-boy.

*Native Races of the Pacific States. H. H. Bancroft.

If, however, the later developments of science have only vaguely outlined the great problem of man's antiquity, they have been none the less radical in their influence upon the earlier deductions. Little more than twenty-five years ago, the Biblical chronology constructed by Bishop Usher had the supposed sanction of divine revelation as well as of science, and followers of this system had placed "the various migrations of men, the confusion of tongues, the peopling of continents, the development of types, the whole evolution of human society, within the narrow compass of little more than 4,000 years." (B. C.) Upon this settled state of security the revelation of the caves in England, Germany and France, and the lakes of Switzerland, came like an ominous lightning flash from a clear sky. Incredulous and pious people saw, in the new assumption of science, the covert attack of infidelity upon the validity of the Bible, while the scientist welcomed the new light, and sought in geology the only safe basis of antiquarian research. The receding echoes alone are left of this short-lived contest between dogma and discovery; attempts at constructing prehistoric chronologies are at least suspended; and without surrendering anything of biblical confidence, mankind is slowly acquiring a faint conception of the stupendous work of creation.

Whether the "elder man" was a resident of this continent is still an open question with scientists, but which the general belief expects to be decided in the affirmative. To this solution America's greatest geologist has paved the way in assigning to the Western Hemisphere an antiquity which was formerly believed not possible. "First-born among the continents, though so much later in culture and civilization than some of more recent birth, America, so far as her physical history is concerned, has been falsely denominated the New World. Hers was the first dry land lifted out of the waters; hers the first shore washed by the ocean that enveloped all the earth beside; and while Europe was represented only by islands here and there above the sea, America already stretched an unbroken line of land from Nova Scotia to the far West." (Agassiz.) If this high antiquity of the Western Hemisphere be true, it is obvious that communication between the two hemispheres may have been effected some ages earlier than the period heretofore assigned; and if the suggestion of early geologists that the continents once approached nearer to each other than now, or that the two worlds were once connected by a continental causeway, be accepted, speculation and science may unite to provide the primitive American a derivative origin in the Palæolithic age.

It is to geological research that science now turns for a solution of this question, and the principal obstacle in achieving unquestioned results is not so much the lack of evidence as the difficulty of its verification. In the absence of the cave and lake testimony, which has so authoritatively established the former existence of the primitive man on the Eastern Hemisphere, dependence is here placed upon the testimony of superficial deposits and natural or artificial exhumation of fossil remains. Of the superficial deposits, the more common are the stone relics found strewn broad-cast over the land. These are seriously invalidated as evidence, however, by the fact that the Indians were discovered here in the stone age of development, and so similar are the implements of this age in all countries and times, that in a confused collection of these remains no scientist professes ability to distinguish with certainty the modern product from the ancient, save as their original situation and surroundings mark the probable period of their origin. Other evidence of this character is supplied by the shell-heaps which are found along the Atlantic coast from Nova Scotia to Florida. These have been classed by Sir Charles Lyell as identical with the garbage heaps (Kjökken-Möddings) of Denmark, which have given such satisfactory evidence of the presence of the primitive man. The American shell-heaps are much less positive in their testimony: they are evidently the refuse of shell-fish eaten by some race of men, and their number and frequent large size clearly indicate the presence of a large population. These relics have scarcely received merited attention from scientific explorers, though such examinations as have been made seem to justify the eminent English geologist's classification. The late Prof. Jeffries Wyman examined the structure and contents of some of these heaps and found no evidence of their having originated with the Indians, while trees growing upon them "showed, by their annular growth, an age antedating from one to three centuries the landing of Columbus."*

In addition to this evidence, several remarkable discoveries of human remains are recorded which, if only well authenticated, would seem to settle any doubt that may exist as to the presence of the "elder man" on this continent. Of these the earliest was made by Dr. Koch, of St. Louis (1839), who dug up from the bottom-land of the Bourbeuse River, in Missouri, the bones of a mastodon, about which were found weapons of the stone age "in such juxtaposition as to show that man and beast had met there in deadly hostility." There is no serious incongruity in the claims of this discovery, which would scarcely be questioned if the presence of the "first inhabitant" had been settled before this exploration. But science is very jealous for the truth and will accept nothing upon which a shadow of doubt can rest. It is considered remarkable "that subsequent deposits of earth should have so completely covered these frail remains, without disturbing them, that they could be exhumed in their original condition so long afterward." The discoverer proved to be an unscientific enthusiast, and notwithstanding his integrity is vouched for by respectable witnesses, the "find" is robbed of much of its scientific value by the doubt in which Dr. Koch's scientific ability is held. Other discoveries by the same explorer, equally remarkable and valuable if authenticated, share the fate of the former.

Some five years after Dr. Koch's first discovery, the fragment of a human bone was found at Natchez, Miss., in association with the bones of the extinct megalonyx and other extinct animals. These relics were found in a fissure in the earth caused by the memorable earthquake of 1811–12, and were examined by Lyell in 1846. There is no question as to the genuineness of these remains, but with an excess of caution the celebrated geologist suggests that these bones may have been brought into their discovered relation by the human bone falling from the surface. This opinion is now generally adopted, though Lyell subsequently held that "had the pelvic bone belonged to any recent mamifer other than man, such a theory would never have been resorted to." In 1852, a human skeleton was exhumed from a depth of sixteen feet, in New Orleans, while workmen were making an excavation for the foundation of gas works. Above the remains were found evidences of "four successive buried forests of cypress," and competent judges suggest that these bones may have rested there 50,000 years. On the Petit Anse Island evidences of man's activities have been discovered in close association with bones of the mastodon and elephant, but the erratic character of the river makes this association of relics less conclusive, as it is suggested that the wash of the hills may have mingled the remains of various periods.*

*These shell-heaps, it should be added, are not confined to the Atlantic border. They are also found at various points along the more important rivers of the country. P. 14, Bryant's History of the United States. See Note 1, Appendix A.

Similar testimony is to be derived from discoveries made in Illinois, South Carolina, and especially in the gold drift of California. Of the contributions of the latter, the most notable is the "Pliocene skull," the popular conception of which is derived more widely, perhaps, from a characteristic poem by Bret Harte, than from scientific publications. A reputed discovery of a fragment of a human cranium "180 feet below the surface of Table Mountain, in association with fossil bones of extinct animals," was made in 1857. Some ten years later, "the Pliocene skull" was discovered, which the state geologist, Prof. Whitney, as well as other scientists, believes to be an authentic discovery. "The shaft in which the bone was buried is 150 feet deep, and was sunk through five beds of lava and volcanic tufa, and four beds of gold-bearing quartz. In this superincumbent mass no crack or crevice was apparent through which the bone could have fallen to so great a depth, and the inference, therefore, is that it was deposited in the place where it lay when that was on the surface of the earth's crust, and that over it in subsequent ages were piled up the successive beds of gravel and volcanic cinders. If this be true of these skulls, then the man they represented lived before the human race appeared in Europe, so far as yet ascertained." (Hist. U. S., Bryant.) Such evidences raise a strong presumption that the primitive man was once a resident of this continent, but the fact can be demonstrated only by such a recurrence of "finds" as will remove professional doubt from the scientific mind.

Coming down to a later time—one probably falling within the historic period, according to Prof. Foster—are found the more tangible traces of an early race of men. Of this people, named from the character of their remains, the Mound-Builders, the evidences are found vastly multiplied, and of such a character as to afford means of a reasonable conjecture as to their mode of life, their advancement in civilization, and final destiny. These evidences, though first accepted with great distrust, have been so amplified and confirmed by more recent researches, as to leave no room for intelligent dissent to the former existence of this race. The remains upon which this conclusion is based "consists," says Mr. Foster,* "of tumuli symmetrically raised and often inclosed in mathematical figures, such as the square, the octagon and circle, with long lines of circumvallation; of pits in the solid rock, and rubbish heaps formed in the prosecution of their mining operations, and of a variety of utensils, wrought in stone, copper or molded in clay."

In the theory of Prof. Rafinesque, the origin of these works are assigned to two different periods and peoples; those of "circular, elliptical and conical shapes" are referred to the "Atalans" and kindred nations, while those of pyramidal form and "high altars, generally of square or angular form," are referred to the succeeding "Iztacans," who may have been allied by origin to the Pyramid-Builders of other parts of the world. Though the professor claims that the earlier structures "may be easily distinguished from the subsequent Iztacan monuments by a greater antiquity," and the difference in form, later investigators have not accepted such a theory as supported by the evidence. All these remains are asigned to a single race, the different forms of the structure being held to indicate only the different uses for which they were designed.

The traces of the Mound-Builders' occupation are found throughout the broad expanse

*The recent discovery of pipes fashioned in the unmistakable form of the elephant seems to afford reasonable ground to believe that the people to whom they originally belonged had been co-existent with the elephant on this continent, and affords strong confirmation of the judgment of scientists, who assign this animal as the object which is symbolized in the Wisconsin mound. The first of these pipes was accidentally discovered about 1873, by a German farmer, in Louisa County, Iowa He knew nothing of the importance of his discovery, and used it in his smoking, subsequently presenting it to a relative, who also used it. It was not until about 1880 that it came to the attention of scientists. The owner was then loth to part with what he esteemed a curious trinket, but it subsequently being broken he sold it for $2 or $3, to be placed in the State museum. This pipe stimulated the prosecution of explorations in mounds in the county in hope of discovering others and Mr. Blumer was so fortunate as to find another equally good specimen of this rare relic. A full description of the pipes, with an account of their discovery, may be found in the American Naturalist for April, 1882, Vol. XVI, No. 4.

*"Prehistoric Races of the United States," Chicago, 1873.

of the Mississippi Valley, reaching as far north as the lakes, indicating the former existence of a great empire, the center of which, as marked by the more important works, being located on the Ohio River and on the Mississippi near the same latitude. There is a wide diversity of form and character in these remains, but a careful examination of all the evidences justifies the belief that a fixed principle underlies their construction, and that a different form indicates a different object to be attained in its erection. Typical mounds, therefore, have been classed by Squier and Davis* with reference to their supposed use as follows: Inclosures—1, for defense; 2, sacred; 3, miscellaneous. Mounds—1, of sacrifice; 2, for temple sites; 3, sepulture; 4, observation. Both enclosures and mounds belong to the same system, but instances are not wanting where each is found without the other.

Inclosures which are generally referred to the military operations of the Mound-Builders consist of simple earth-works thrown up to the height of from five to twenty-five feet, and upward of twenty five feet thick at the base, inclosing an area of from five to about 150 acres. At the foot of these lines of circumvallation is a moat or ditch of a width varying from twenty-five to fifty and eighty feet, the relative location of which is an important feature with many in determining the character of the structure. By some writers the ditch on the outside is considered essential to characterize the inclosure as a fortification; but to this demand Prof. Foster has pointed out the fact that the attack of savages and the natural defense are both quite different from the military operations of civilized people; and that in the fortifications of the Mandans, the ditch is constructed on the inside, an arrangement that would facilitate the mode of defense which certain circumstances suggest, i. e., of rolling stones from the summit of the embankment upon the attacking party. Writers in general, however, disregard this distinction, and works with ditches on either side are classed as defensive, the location being the decisive feature in the investigation. In this connection an author remarks: "But when in addition to this (exterior ditch), we find a line of simple or bastioned works occupying a peninsular terrace or a precipitious height 'covering' an important region of country, commanding every position, guarding every approach, served by protected lines of communication, and convenient to points of supply, there would seem to be no further room to doubt."*

Other inclosures do not readily fall into any strict classification. Those classed as sacred differ from the defensive structures principally in being located on level plateaux, and including within their walls mounds of sacrifice, temple sites and sepulture, as all of these uses were undoubtedly sacred to the Mound-Builders. In the miscellaneous class are placed a large number of inclosures, the purpose of which there are no data to explain; the areas thus defined are irregular in form and vary greatly in size; and suggestions as to their use have assigned them a varying importance, from the demesne of a primitive lord to the site of a walled town. "There can be little doubt," suggests Prof. Foster, "that the Mound-Builders had their national games which were celebrated within these inclosures. They had, too, their religious observances, their funeral services, and their grand councils; but no clear line, I think, can be drawn in reference to the different purposes of these structures."

Mounds of sacrifice, or altars, as they are variously termed, are generally characterized by the fact "that they occur only within the vicinity of the inclosures or sacred places; that they are stratified, and that they contain symmetrical altars of burned clay or stone, on which were deposited various remains,

*"Smithsonian Contribution to Knowledge," Washington D. C., 1848, Vol. I, p. 7.

*Thomas E. Pickett, M. D., in Collins' Historical Sketches of Kentucky. A remarkable stone fort situated on an elevated narrow ridge at the mouth of Fourteen-mile Creek, in Clarke County, Ind., is referred to this class of structures. The highest part of the ridge is 280 feet above the level of the Ohio, and its summit is guarded partly by an abrupt natural escarpment of rock and partly by an artifical stone wall. The latter is constructed of loose stones regularly laid up but without mortar, and in one place is about 150 feet long. "It is built along the slope of the hill and had an elevation of about seventy-five feet above its base, the upper ten feet being vertical. The inside of the wall is protected by a ditch." Another much longer interval unprotected by the natural escarpment was defended by a similar artificial stone wall, "but not more than ten feet high." See Report of Geological Survey of Indiana for 1873, p. 126.

which in all cases have been more or less subjected to the action of fire." (Squier and Davis.) These characteristics are not all uniformly present, however. In the "American Bottom," where the mound system reached its highest development, the mounds of this class are not inclosed; and others are found with unmistakable evidences of being used for sacred purposes, but with no symmetrical structure answering to the typical altar. The remains found in these mounds consist of the manufactures of the people, beads of shell, pipes, tubes of copper, etc., etc. What the ceremonies were that were performed before these altars, archæologists are at a loss to conjecture. From certain evidences it is believed that human sacrifice found a place in their worship, but the data relied upon may only prove that the Mound-Builders practiced cremation. Fire was undoubtedly used in their worship, as "the altars or basins found are almost invariably of burned clay, although a few of stone have been discovered." These altars are elevated basins seldom exceeding a height of twenty inches, and are generally found resting on the surface level beneath a mound regularly heaped over it in layers of different materials, though in a few exceptions they are found on a thin layer of sand. They are symmetrical in their construction, but not uniform in size nor shape, varying in these respects from a circle of a two-foot diameter to a parallelogram of 50x15 feet.

Temple-Mounds are described by Squier and Davis as "distinguished by their great regularity of form and general large dimensions. They consist chiefly of pyramidal structures truncated, and generally having graded avenues to their tops. In some instances they are terraced, or have successive stages. But whatever their form, whether round, oval, octangular, square or oblong, they have invariably flat or level tops," upon which the temples are supposed to have been erected, but being constructed of perishable material they have decayed and left no sign of their former existence. Mounds of this class are found much less numerous toward the north, traces of them at Aztalan, Wis., being the northernmost limits of those discovered; they are not found in the lake region, nor on that line which seems to mark the farthest advance of these people.

The principal of these structures are found at Cahokia, Ill.; near Florence and Claiborne, Tenn.; at Selzartown, Miss.; at Marietta, Newark and Chillicothe, the only places where the temple-mound is found in southern Ohio, and at St. Louis, Mo. Some very remarkable mounds of this class occur in Kentucky, on the "Long Bottom" of Cumberland River, in Adair County, also near Cadiz, Trigg County, near Mount Sterling, and in Hickman and McCracken Counties. In Whitley County is one 360 feet long, 150 feet wide, and 12 feet high, with graded ascents, and at Hopkinsville, Christian County, is one of great size, upon which the court house is built. (See Squier and Davis, p. 175.)

The mound at Cahokia, "the monarch of all similar structures in the United States," may well serve as a type. When unimpaired by decay, this mound formed a huge parallelogram, with sides at the base respectively 500 and 700 feet in length, and reaching to the height of 90 feet. On the southwest there was a terrace, 160x300 feet, which was reached by a graded way; the summit was truncated, affording a level area of 200x400 feet in extent. This great mound covered an area of six acres, and, it is conjectured, bore up a great temple, perhaps the principal one of the Mound-Builders' empire. In close proximity to this mound were four other elevated platforms, varying from 250 to 300 feet in diameter. The great mounds at St. Louis and Marietta reach a height of thirty-five feet, and the one at Claiborne, Tenn., reaches nearly fifty feet in height.

The pyramidal form of this class of structure has given rise to a speculation which attempts to connect the Mound-Builders with the ancient Egyptians, but such an attempt seems to proceed upon hasty generalizations to conclusions which are generally rejected by archæologists. The relation of this form of the temple mound to the Teocallis of Central America appears to be well defined, and constitutes, according to Prof. Foster, "one of the strongest links in the chain which connects the ancient inhabitants of the Mississippi Valley with those of Mexico and Central America."

"Sephulchral mounds," says Mr. Foster, "consist often of a simple knoll, or group of knolls, of no considerable height, without any definite arrangement. Examples of this character may be seen at Dubuque, Merom, Chicago and Laporte, which, on exploration, have yielded skulls differing widely from the Indian type. * * * The corpse was almost invariably placed near the original surface of the soil, enveloped in bark or coarse matting, and, in a few instances, fragments of cloth have been observed in this connection. Sometimes a vault of timber was built over it, and in others it was inclosed in long, and broad flags of stone. Sometimes it was placed in a sitting position, again it was extended, and still again compressed within contracted limits. Trinkets were often strung about the neck, and water jugs, drinking cups, and vases, which probably contained food, were placed near the head. Over the corpse, thus arrayed, a circular mound was often raised, but sometimes nothing more than a hillock."

There seems to have been a wide diversity in the burial customs of this people; a large number of mounds are found to be the depository of a single body; others seem to indicate that some distinguished person had been accompanied in death by his personal attendants, who were placed about him in the tomb; and still others indicate a miscellaneous burial of large numbers without particular arrangement. The use of fire in the disposition of the dead is apparent, though not in every case; nor is it clear that when used it was for the purpose of cremation. A thin coating of moist clay was applied to the body, nude or wrapped in a coarse fabric, and upon this a fire was maintained for a time, more or less prolonged, but in most cases the heat was not sufficient to destroy the cloth, which has sometimes been found in a good state of preservation. This, evidently, was not the result of inattention, as "all the circumstances seem to indicate that burial was a solemn and deliberate rite, regulated by fixed customs;" cremation and urn burial were also practiced.

"Mounds of observation," is rather a fanciful classification intended to mark isolated mounds found on elevated sites, the character of which generally discourages the idea that they could have been considered desirable places of residence. This theory of special purpose, however, has not been accepted as supported by any particular evidence; the Mound-Builders undoubtedly had need of such signals as the Indians still use, a flame by night and a smoke by day, and certain mounds have been found in positions where such a signal could be seen for a score of miles about.

There are also a large number of mounds found that do not fall into any of these classes. Of these, the widest divergence from the typical mound is found in Wisconsin. Here, instead of the circular or pyramidal structure, are found forms, for the most part consisting of rude, gigantic imitations of various animals of the region, such as the buffalo, bear, fox, wolf, etc.; of the eagle, and night-hawk, the lizard and turtle, and in some instances the unmistakable form of man. These, though not raised high above the surface, and even in some cases represented in intaglio, attain the largest dimensions; one representing a serpent extending 700 feet, and another representing a turtle, had a body fifty-six, and a tail 250 feet long. The significance of these peculiar forms has not been determined, but unmistakable evidences have been discovered, which mark them as the work of the same race whose structures are found elsewhere, so numerous throughout the Mississippi Valley.

The "Garden Beds of the Northwest" are found in lower Wisconsin, northern Indiana, and Michigan—all in the region bordering on Lake Michigan. Their resemblance to the beds of a garden suggests the name applied to them, though their lines are not uniformly regular. Some of the plats form a parallelogram, others are variously curved, while others are in the form of parallel ridges "as if corn had been planted in drills." The beds in Wisconsin suggest an age more recent than the mounds, "as they sometimes extend across them in the same manner as over the adjoining grounds."

There is, in addition to these mounds, a large number which—following Mr. F. W. Putnam—whom Mr. Foster quotes at length, may be called "habitation mounds." A large number of these are described as located at Merom, Ind., and a group of fifty-nine mounds at Hutsonville, Ill., a few miles above the former place and across the Wabash River. These mounds were carefully examined, to ascertain if they were places of burial, without discovering a single bone or implement of any kind, but, on the contrary, the excavation showed that the mounds had been made of the various materials at hand, and in one case ashes were found, which had probably been scraped up with other material and thrown upon a heap. In the ancient fort at Merom, in depressions observed within the earth works, were found striking evidences of food having been cooked and eaten there, and the conclusion drawn by Mr. Putnam is that these pits were the houses of the inhabitants or defenders of the fort, who were probably further protected from the elements and the missiles of assailants by a roof of logs and bark, or boughs. Another writer,* in a paper read before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, at their Boston meeting, August, 1880, says: "There is in this region a peculiar class of mounds, that was for a long time a puzzle to me. They are usually found in groups of from two or three to twenty or thirty, and even more, and are generally on some knoll or rising ground in the vicinity of a spring or water course, especially in the vicinity of our prairies or level areas of land. These mounds are from one to three, and, in a few instances, even four feet in height, and from twenty to fifty feet in diameter. One mound of the group is always larger than the rest, and always occupies a commanding position. Sometimes the group is arranged in a circle; other groups have no apparent design in arrangement. Numbers of these mounds can be seen in the cultivated fields. Although I have made excavations in them, and dug trenches entirely through them, I have found nothing but ashes, charcoal, decayed portions of bones of fishes and animals partially burned, shells from the adjacent streams, flint chippings, and in one or two instances a flint implement of a rude character.

"After examining many of these structures I am induced to believe that they are possibly the remains of ancient dwellings, made by placing in an upright position the trunks of young trees in a circle, or in parallel rows, the tops of the poles inclining inward and fastened together, the whole being covered with earth and sod to form a roof, or in the same manner as many Indian tribes make their mud lodges; as, for instance, the Mandans and the Omahas. Such a structure, after being repaired from time to time by the addition of more earth on top, would, finally, by the decay of the poles, fall inward, and the ruins would form a slight mound. Conant and Putnam describe such mounds in Missouri and Tennessee, some of the largest of these ancient towns being provided with highways and streets. They are also found in southern Illinois, Indiana and Ohio. Putnam has described an enclosed town in Tennessee, in which were many low mounds, or rather, as he calls them, earth circles, that he has pretty conclusively shown to be sites of the lodges or houses of the people."

The traces of the Mound-Builders are very numerous in Kentucky, and Prof. Rafinesque estimated that, of more than 1,000 of their towns on the waters of the Ohio, about 200 were found in this State, with "half a million of inhabitants at least." Temple sites of terraced mounds, are said to be more numerous here than in the States north of the Ohio, and notable examples of this class have been discovered and described* as located in the counties of Adair, Trigg, Montgomery, Hickman, McCracken, Whitley, Christian, Woodford, Greenup and Mason. Of these,

*Hon. William McAdams, Jr., Otterville, Ill.

*Collins' Historical Sketches, 1882. Also Dr. Pickett's article in same work; "Memoir of the Kentucky Geological Survey," Frankfort, 1883; Vol. II, by L. Carr, etc.

the structures found near Lovedale, in Woodford County, and in Montgomery and Greenup Counties, have excited unusual interest.

The latter Dr. Pickett describes as a "part of a connected series of works communicating by means of parallel embankments and embracing the chief structural elements peculiar to this class of works. On a commanding river terrace stands one of the groups of this series—an exact rectangle, 800 feet square, with gateway, bastion, ditch and hollow-way, with out-works consisting of parallel walls leading to the northeast, and to the southwest, from opposite sides of the rectangular inclosure. The work has many of the salient features of an extensive fortification, and appears to have been designed for purpose of military defense; and yet there is nothing to forbid the supposition, that its sloping areas were also devoted to the imposing rites of a ceremonial worship. There is a corresponding group on the opposite bank of the Ohio River, which is obviously sacred or superstitious in its origin and design.

"The third group of this series consists of four concentric circles, intersected at right angles by four broad avenues, conforming very nearly to the cardinal points of the compass. In the center is a large mound, truncated and terraced, with a graded way leading to the summit. This group rests upon a lofty terrace at the base of the hills, which border the beautiful river valley. About a mile to the west of this is a small circular work with a central mound, which is approached from the exterior by a narrow gateway, through the parapet, and a causeway over the ditch. There seems to have existed a connection originally by parallels, between the several groups of this unique and enigmatical series of works. The total length of the embankments now (1871) traceable is about eight miles."

Structures which are clearly assignable to the military operations of this people are also found in great numbers in the State. These are invariably situated along the large water-courses, and are especially marked in Allen, Bourbon, Boone, Fayette and Pendleton Counties, and suggest a confirmation of Indian traditions, that on the borders of the Ohio was waged the decisive battle for national existence.

These monuments of the Mound Builders bear undoubted evidence of a great but indeterminate antiquity, and in attempting to form any conception of the period in which they had their origin, the student is met with obstacles that leave anything save vague results impossible. Inferences drawn from the physical character of the mounds and their surroundings, are especially unsatisfactory as to particulars. It is evident that these structures were built long after the country resumed its present topographical features, but the absence from the last formed terrace of those works which were undoubtedly designed to occupy the margin of the streams, suggests that the present river limits have been assumed since the construction of such works, if not since their abandonment.

Trees found growing upon these mounds are another source of indefinite suggestion. An examination of the concentric layers displayed in the trunk of these trees, indicates an age of four or five centuries, but this proves only that the works were not occupied at the time these trees took root. There must have been a long period after the abandonment of these works before the forest growth sprang up in the deserted haunts of man, and it is by no means certain that the trees now discovered standing were the first to occupy these ancient sites.

It is estimated on good authority* that it takes from 54 to 130 years for trees to increase their diameter by one foot, and that few individuals of the present standing timber were in existence at the time of Columbus' discovery of America. There seems to be a natural limit to the life of a tree, even when it is spared the ravages of destructive tempests and fire; the forests everywhere exhibit evidence of natural waste and repair. But once prostrated, the trunk rapidly disintegrates and leaves no trace of its former existence save in the humus, which forms so prominent a part of the forest soil. So far as this evidence goes, therefore, the trees found growing upon these abandoned works may be the second, third, or an indefinite ordinal in the succession of arborescent occupants, and the period thus indicated is one of complete indefiniteness, though undoubtedly very remote.

* Dr. I. A. Lapham; calculation is made for Wisconsin, and would vary somewhat in more southern latitudes. Quoted by Foster.

Inquiries into the ethnical peculiarities of the Mound-Builders confirm this high antiquity. Only a few authentic crania have been discovered in such a state of preservation as to offer data for scientific deductions, but so far as these establish a typical character, they link these people with the Autochthones of the Western Hemisphere, and assign them a kinship with the Toltecs, of Mexico, who, according to the uncertain estimate of Clavigero, arrived at Anahuac in 648 A. D. Whatever date may be assigned to this immigration, the civilization indicated by the ruins in Central America was undoubtedly the result of the slow increment of many centuries, "and yet these ruins," says Prof. Foster, "I am disposed to believe are more recent than the mounds of the Mississippi Valley."

If it be accepted as science, and traditions seem to agree in pointing out that the Mound-Builders and the Toltecs were of the same race, an almost incredible vista of antiquity is opened up to conjecture, when the civilization of the primitive portion of the race is considered. "Their monuments indicate that they had entered upon a career of civilization; they lived in stationary communities, cultivating the soil and relying on its generous yield as a means of support; they clothed themselves, in part at least, in garments regularly spun and woven; they modeled clay and carved stone, even of the most obdurate character, into images representing animate objects, including even the human face and form, with a close adherence to nature; they mined and cast copper into a variety of useful forms; they quarried mica, steatite, chert and the novaculite slates, which they wrought into articles adapted to personal ornament, to domestic use, or to the chase; unlike the Indians, who were ignorant of the curative properties of salt, they collected the brine of the salines into earthen vessels molded into baskets, which they evaporated into a form which admitted of transportation; they erected an elaborate line of defense, stretching for many hundred miles, to guard against the sudden irruption of enemies; they had a national religion, in which the elements were the objects of supreme adoration; temples were erected upon the platform mounds, and watch-fires lighted upon the highest summits; and in the celebration of the mysteries of their faith, human sacrifices were probably offered up. The magnitude of their structures, involving an infinitude of labor, such only as could be expended except in a community where cheap food prevailed, and the great extent of their commercial relations reaching to widely separated portions of the continent, imply the existence of a stable and efficient government, based on the subordination of the masses." (Foster.) To reach such a pitch of power from an autochthonic barbarism implies a lapse of time for which science and experience afford no chronometric guide.

The question still remains in regard to the origin and fate of this people, and to it neither science nor tradition gives a satisfactory answer. As to their origin, speculation is divided between an autochthonic and derivative beginning, though the latter obtains the more general endorsement. Upon this theory are based two general hypotheses: the one supposes that the Mound-Builders reached the South American continent or Central America from the "Atlantic Islands," that, moved by natural causes, they immigrated northward to the Mississippi Valley, from whence they were subsequently driven by an irresistible foe, or a powerful political eruption among themselves, and that they found refuge in the "more congenial climate of Central America, where they developed those germs of civilization, originally planted in their northern homes, into a perfection which has elicited the admiration of every modern explorer."

The other supposition suggests that the Indian is a degenerate descendant of these ancient people, and that the far-famed Montezuma, whose "halls" have furnished so rich a store of romantic illusion, was nothing but a dirty Indian, in a mud hut. This theory rests largely upon a comparison of the physical character of the remains found in the Mississippi Valley, Colorado and New Mexico; but notwithstanding the force of the argument thus derived, it is safe to say that by the great mass of evidence the Indian still stands an independent race. As suggested elsewhere, the conformation of such skulls as appear to be the well authenticated remains of the Mound-Builders closely allies this people with the Toltecs, while the distinctive character of their structures, as well as the mass of traditions presented, strongly confirms this relation. At the same time these evidences, as well as the character of their civil institutions, create a "well marked line of division from the Indian."

The two races are, nevertheless, historically closely connected, the traditions of both peoples raising a strong presumption that the Indian was the foe that dispossessed the Mound-Builders of their ancient sites in the Mississippi Valley. Writers generally agree that the physical character of their remains indicates that the empire of the extinct race expanded from the South, and that the line of defenses, "extending from the sources of the Alleghany and Susquehanna in New York diagonally across the country, through central and northern Ohio to the Wabash," marks the farthest limit of their domain. This line seems also to accurately indicate the region from whence the attacks were looked for and probably made. The traditions of the Mexican tribes are less definite than those of the northern Indians and relate only that their ancestors were overwhelmed in their northern home by the Chichimecs (barbarians) after a struggle protracted through some years; and that to escape annihilation the whole nation took flight southward, led by their chiefs. While these traditions are vague and little trusted by scientists, there are so many independent partial confirmations of their truth, that this theory in the absence of a better one, seems to be gaining ground.

Of the Indian traditions, the one most widely quoted is that current in the Delaware nation. According to this, many hundred years ago, when this nation boasted in the title of Lenni-Lenape—original or unmixed men—they occupied a country in the far West. From thence the whole nation set forth toward the rising sun, sweeping through the land in a great flood of migration, until their progess was stayed on the bank of a river by a race of giants, whom they called Allegewy, for whom the river was subsequently named Alleghany. Whether the river referred to be the one now bearing the name, or the Mississippi, writers do not agree. According to Davidson,* the starting point in the wanderings of the Algonkin tribes on the continent as determined by tradition and the cultivation of maize, their favorite cereal, was in the Southwest. Passing up the western side of the Mississippi Valley, they turned eastward across that river, the southern margin of their broad tract reaching about to the 35th parallel, while the center probably covered the present territory of Illinois.

Wherever the point may be that marked the meeting of these races, the contact gave rise to immediate hostilities, Delaware traditions assigning the perfidious conduct of the Mound-Builders as the casus belli. The Lenni-Lenape sought and gained permission to continue their journey eastward, but being assailed by the treacherous Allegewy, when in the act of crossing the river, the former were severely handled, though not destroyed. The Iroquois nation was engaged in a similar migration eastward at the same time, but along a higher line of latitude, and to them the defeated Delawares appealed for assistance against the Allegewy. Thenceforth the two migrating nations made persistent war upon the race of giants, until, after a struggle continued through many years, the giants were utterly defeated and driven from their homes.

The Delawares are not alone in the possession of traditions pertaining to this event in the prehistoric annals of their race. The most positive and explicit confirmation of this story is found in the tales of other tribes, some of which Dr. Pickett has compiled in an article of which mention has been made in the preceding pages. It is said that an old Indian told Col. James Moore, of Kentucky, that the original inhabitants of this State were destroyed by the Indians; that the decisive battle was fought near the falls of the Ohio, where the Indians succeeded in driving their foes on to a small island in the river and in slaughtering them to the last man. This the Indian declared was a tradition of undoubted authenticity in his tribe, and that the occurrence to which he referred was accepted as an unquestioned fact. But farther than this, the Indian sage declared that the island afforded ocular proof of the truth of the tradition, which a low stage of water would reveal. Subsequently Mr. Moore took occasion to examine Sandy Island and discovered a multitude of human bones.

* History of Illinois; Davidson and Stueve, 1877.

The celebrated Indian chief, Tobacco, gave a similar confirmation of this tradition in a conversation with Gen. Clark, and it is said that Cornstalk told substantially the same story to Col. McKee. The latter chief said that the country on both sides of the Ohio was originally possessed by a white race, who were familiar with the arts of which the Indians were entirely ignorant; that this people had been entirely destroyed by the Indians, and that the earth-works found in the State were the remains of this "very long ago" people.

This Indian lore receives incidental corroboration from the character of the Mound-Builders' remains found along the Ohio border. The vast system of defensive works found on this line, admirably disposed to cover points most exposed to a general attack, as well as the evidences found in the counties of Bracken, Pendleton and Bourbon indicating siege operations, and a determined struggle, suggest that the Ohio River may have marked the site of the last obstinate stand of the doomed race. These closing contests were evidently attended with immense loss of life on the part of the vanquished people, and doubtless, as has been suggested, the familiar appellation of the "dark and bloody ground" originated in the gloom and horror with which the Indian imagination naturally invested the traditional scenes and events of that strange and troubled period.

Another suggestion in reference to the ominous name the State bears, is that the Kentucky River formed the natural route taken by the northern and southern tribes to reach their enemies on either side of this neutral land. But whatever authority may be assigned to the one or the other of these suggestions, the fact remains, that a wide scope of country "where every prospect pleases" was originally shunned as a place of residence by the Indian nations. The larger portion of the State was certainly a land of ill-repute to the savages; to their superstitious imagination, the land was filled with the ghosts of its slaughtered inhabitants, and they repeatedly expressed their surprise that the whites could make it their home.

This ineligibility does not seemed to have extended to the western confines of the State, as the lower valley of the Cumberland River is marked by the earliest French authorities as the home of the Shawanese or Shawanee nation. How long they had occupied this region is unknown, but they were finally overtaken by the all-conquering rage of the Iroquois about 1672, and being defeated by these redoubtable warriors, the Shawanese fled up the valley, the principal bands finding new homes in South Carolina, on the head-waters of the Santee River. In the precipitation of their flight, the nation was broken into fragments, and a portion numbering some 450 souls wandered for years in the wilderness west of the Cherokees, who occupied the Tennessee Valley as far west as Muscle Shoals. This band subsequently found its way to the head of the Alabama River. In 1698, having obtained consent of the Pennsylvania authorities, part of the nation settled on the banks of the Susquehanna, where they attracted other bands until, in 1732, their braves numbered fully one half of the fighting Indians of that section of the country. In 1751 this restless nation turned again westward, and located just below the mouth of the Scioto River. It was some years before the nation again united within the limits of the State of Ohio, the great unoccupied scope of country through which this people wandered from the Cumberland to the Alabama, and from the Santee to the Susquehanna, affording the various detachments a temporary home. A discontented portion of the nation, it is said, breaking off from the fragment sojourning in Virginia, came again in 1730 to Kentucky, and made a town in Clark County, near Winchester, which they called Lulbegrud. This party left about twenty years later, and joined their kinsmen in Ohio.

After the expulsion of the Shawanese the greater part of Kentucky remained the hunting ground of the Cherokees, though the Indian claims to this region were various and conflicting. The reputed conquest of the Shawanese, Delawares, Twigtwees and Illinois nations by the Iroquois, was made the basis of comprehensive claims by the victorious confederation. There is little question that this powerful nation carried their successful forays as far as the Tennessee River, about 1672, but that this gave them any substantial claim to this region thus run over is opposed to the subsequent actual status as well as to all theories of conquest entertained by civilized nations. The Iroquois did not occupy this country and did not defend it, but it was occupied without the payment of tribute or homage, and tenaciously defended by other tribes, during upward of a century after the foray which is made the basis of Iroquois claims. That such a claim ever received serious recognition, is sufficiently explained by the obvious advantage which such a construction would yield the English in their diplomatic dealings with the French.

In 1684 the Iroquois voluntarily placed themselves under the protection of the English; in 1701 this relation was reaffirmed or renewed; in the treaty of Utrecht (1713) this action was emphasized and recognized by the French, and in 1726 a formal deed of all the Iroquois lands conveyed them in trust to the English, "to be protected and defended by his majesty, to and for the use of the grantors and their heirs." In the contest for the Ohio Valley it was obviously to the interest of the English to cover as much as possible of the coveted territory by this deed of trust, and hence they placed the most liberal construction upon the Iroquois claims. That such a construction would have stood the test of judicial examination may well be doubted, but the question between the rival powers was finally arbitrated not by law, but by might.

In 1768, when the English sought to acquire lands in western Virginia and Kentucky, they were met by the exaggerated pretensions which they had themselves fostered and urged against the French. In quieting these claims by purchase, the authorities undoubtedly acted with wisdom, but it was something worse than folly to press a title thus acquired against the occupying claimants of this region. It was well understood that the "Shawanese, Delawares, Mingoes of Ohio, and other dependent tribes," rejected these pretensions of the eastern confederacy; and notwithstanding the presence of a single representative of the Shawanese, and two of the Delawares, at the Fort Stanwix conference—a fact upon which much stress is laid—it will be observed that the negotiations were had solely with the Iroquois; the treaty was signed alone of the Indians by their chieftains, and the whole price of the purchase placed in their hands. That the "dependent tribes" ever received any part of the consideration paid for the ceded territory was subsequently denied by these tribes, and this was accepted by the whites as the truth of the matter. Under such circumstances, to insist that the purchase of Fort Stanwix covered all just claims to this territory was simply to invite the murder of such settlers as should occupy the land, relying upon the validity of this treaty. As a matter of fact something of such a result did follow, culminating in the "Dunmore war." This outbreak was summarily checked, and a short-lived peace consummated in a treaty negotiated by Lord Dunmore in 1774; in this it is said, though not supported by the circumstances attending the event, that the Stanwix Purchase was confirmed by the Ohio tribes.

Beside the claims thus recognized and presumably extinguished, the southern Indians made pretensions to this region. The justice of their claim was of course strenuously denied by the Iroquois, but in 1770, by a treaty with the Cherokees, at Lochaber, S. C., the whites recognized it, and the territory east of a line drawn from a point six miles above Big Island, in the Holston River, to the Kanawha, was purchased. In running this line, however, it is said that on reaching the head of the Kentucky, Little Carpenter, a Cherokee chief, observed that his people preferred to have their lands marked by natural boundaries, and proposed instead of the treaty line that the course of this river should be followed, including a much larger scope of country to be ceded. This was agreed upon, and the royal sanction obtained; the Virginia assembly voted the sum of £2,500, and paid it to the Cherokees for the additional territory thus granted. In 1775 the portion of Kentucky lying between the Cumberland and Kentucky Rivers was purchased of the Cherokees by Richard Henderson and others, for the sum of £10,000. This transaction was subsequently invalidated by the Virginia assembly as respected the grantees, but not as respected the grantors.

The Indian title to Kentucky was therefore extinguished by the treaty of 1768, which included all of its territory east of the Tennessee River; the treaty of 1770, which included the claims of the Cherokees to the region east of the Kentucky River; the treaty of 1774, by Lord Dunmore with the Ohio tribes, which, it is said, sanctioned the treaty of 1768; the treaty of 1775, between Henderson and the Cherokees, which included their claims to territory between the Cumberland and Kentucky Rivers; and the treaty of 1818 with the Chickasaws for that portion of the State west of the Tennessee River, and known since as the "Jackson Purchase."

CHAPTER V.

EXPLORATION AND FIRST SETTLEMENTS OF KENTUCKY.

THE year 1763 saw the close of the French and English war, the issue of which, in America, had settled the right of possession to the country lying east of the Mississippi in the English. The Virginia frontier, however, was restricted by treaty with the Indians to the line of the Alleghanies. During the terrible vicissitudes of the preceding years, this line had practically fluctuated between the Blue Ridge and the more western ranges, but as the brunt of hostilities was removed to the Canadian border, settlers, emboldened by the comparative peace which prevailed, pushed westward to the line of Fort Pitt, and a few hardier adventurers extended their explorations into the unknown country beyond the Big Sandy. Though contrary to the express stipulations of unquestioned treaties, and against the earnest protest of the natives, the Virginia authorities did not hesitate to encourage this intrusion, granting some 3,000,000 of acres west of the mountains as early as 1754, the Virginia assembly, in 1758, going so far as to enact a law to stimulate the growth of these settlements.

The natural consequences followed this unwise action. The Indians, finding their grievances unredressed, refused to lay aside their weapons on the defeat of their French allies, and rekindled the flame of war which swept over the western country with resist-less fury, destroying all but the three principal ones of the newly-gained outposts, and visiting the border with frightful carnage. The campaigns of Bouquet and Bradstreet succeeded, and were followed by the treaty at Niagara and the subsequent conference at German Flats. While neither of these conferences effected any change in the frontier of Virginia, the latter was designed to prepare the way for such a change, and the too eager settlers, taking for granted what had only been proposed, rapidly regained the ground lost by the onslaught incident to Pontiac's conspiracy, and were once more endangering the general peace by their unwarrantable intrusion upon the Indian territory.

Accordingly, on the 1st of May, 1768, the president of the Virginia council, acting as governor, was found addressing the sessions in a speech, from which the following statement of the situation is taken: "By letters from his excellency, Gen. Gage, commander-in-chief of his majesty's forces, and from Sir William Johnson, superintendent of Indian affairs (which I shall cause to be laid before you), it will appear that a set of men, regardless of the laws of natural justice, unmindful of the duties they owe to society, and in contempt of royal proclamation, have dared to settle themselves upon the land near Redstone Creek and Cheat River, which are the property of the Indians; and notwithstanding the repeated warnings of the danger of such lawless proceedings and strict and spirited injunctions to them to desist, and quit their unjust possessions, they still remain unmoved, and seem to defy the orders and even powers of government." The gravity of the situation was fortunately not unknown in England, and instructions were therefore received which led to the purchase that made the Tennessee River the western boundary line.

The territory thus secured was practically, at this time, an undiscovered country. The Indian traders, who were the first explorers, and who long before had become familiar with every trail in the region between the Ohio and the Lakes, knew nothing of it. But this obscurity, strange as it appears, is simply accounted for by the fact that long before the approach of the whites, the last wigwam-blaze within its limits had been extinguished; and these adventurous merchants, attracted by the prospect of barter, had naturally been led northward to the valleys of Scioto and Miami in quest of the villages of the savages. The country west of the Big Sandy was not entirely unknown, however. As early as 1730, a white captive among the Indians had visited the southwestern portion of this newly acquired territory. This was John Salling, "a bold weaver," of Williamsburg, whom John Marlin induced to join him in an exploring expedition to the then undeveloped middle valley of Virginia. Marlin was a pack-peddler, who drove a thriving trade in small articles with the settlers on the eastern slopes of the Blue Ridge and over the mountains in the vicinity of Winchester, but, attracted by the half-disclosed beauties of the unsettled country beyond, he planned this expedition.

The two prosecuted their enterprise with safety until they reached the waters of the Roanoke, where they were met by a roving party of Cherokees. Marlin was so fortunate as to escape, but Salling was made captive and carried to the Indian towns upon the upper Tennessee. He remained with his captors, it is said, some three years, when he proceeded with a party for the salt licks of Kentucky in quest of buffalo. Here his party, falling in with a band of savages from Illinois, was attacked and beaten, Salling being made prisoner by the victors. Returning with his new captors to Kaskaskia, he was adopted by an old squaw as her son, a relation he sustained for some two years. In the meantime he became quite identified with his adopted tribe, and accompanied its parties on various expeditions, at one time reaching the Gulf coast in his wanderings. Salling was subsequently purchased from the squaw by an exploring party of Spaniards, who soon tired of their bargain and returned him to his Indian masters. Shortly afterward, accompanying a party of his tribe to Canada, Salling was generously redeemed by the French governor and sent to New York, from whence he found his way back to Williamsburg. Here the story of his adventures was listened to with the keenest interest, and his description of the valley gave a new and vigorous impulse to the settlement of that portion of Virginia. But Kentucky profited little by this early visit; the region was too remote to excite permanent interest, even if Salling's opportunities for observation and description had been much better, and it was destined to rest in the obscurity of the "great woods" until another quarter century should bring it nearer, and develop grander interests in this unexplored wilderness.

The first exploration, and perhaps the next visit of the whites to this country, was that conducted by Dr. Thomas Walker, of Virginia, a gentleman prominently identified with early Indian affairs. This excursion was made in the year 1750, by a small party of Virginians from Orange and Culpeper Counties, of which, next to the leader, Ambrose Powell was the most prominent member. Their course led southward between the Alleghanies and Laurel Ridge to the valley which lies on the eastern side of the latter range, where, on a beech tree, Powell carved his name, which is still borne by the river and valley. Turning to the west, they crossed the rocky ridge which forms the dividing line between Kentucky and Virginia, by a gap, to which Walker* gave the name of Cumberland for the English duke, who was a favorite character with the Doctor—a name which still adheres to the range and a river as well. Crossing into the confines of Kentucky, the party found its way to the "hazel patch in Laurel County," where it divided. From this point, Walker, with such of the company as followed him, struck northward for the Ohio River. "Under the impression that the Ohio was to be found east of north" says Marshall, "he took an erroneous course which kept him in a rough and mountainous country until, having passed the Kentucky River—which he named Louisa—he came upon Big Sandy." Thence the party took its homeward course by way of the New River Valley, not pleasantly impressed with the country examined.

The result of this exploration did little to bring this region into public favor. The course traversed passed principally through a broken country, forbidding in every practical view, and exacting a prodigious expenditure of resolution and endurance to accomplish the journey. Such an experience was not calculated to give rise to a report that would excite public interest sufficient to lead any to brave the privations and dangers of the wilderness, and more than a decade passed before another attempt was made to penetrate the obscurity of this western country.

If the tour of Gist, which has been noted elsewhere, be excepted, no further visits to Kentucky were probably made by the whites until the expedition in 1761, recorded by Judge Haywood, in his "History of Tennessee." In this year a party of nineteen men from the northern part of Virginia, and the adjacent portions of Pennsylvania, set out for the southwest on a hunting excursion. Establishing a station on a branch of Powell's River, in Lee County, Va., the company remained in this vicinity hunting for eighteen months. Subsequently they passed through Cumberland Gap into the country beyond, but no record of their exploration has been preserved. It is to this party that Judge Haywood assigns the distinction of being the nomenclators of this region, though probably this claim should properly be restricted to the name of Clinch River and sundry "ridges" named for members of the company. In 1763, the same persons, save two or three who remained at home, again visited Powell Valley, crossed the mountains at Cumberland Gap, and spent the hunting season on Cumberland River. In the following year they carried their hunting operations to the vicinity of the present site of Crab Orchard, Ky., where they found such profitable sport as induced them to repeat their visit in several successive years.

In 1765, occured the conference at German Flats; and the following year, stimulated by the rumor that Sir William Johnson had purchased the lands west of the Alleghanies, lying between the Ohio and the Tennessee, for the king, a party of four whites, accompanied by a young mulatto slave and led by James Smith—variously titled as colonel or captain—set out from North Carolina to examine the new purchase. Passing through Cumberland Gap they first explored the country south of the Kentucky line as far as the present site of Nashville; thence following the course of the Cumberland River, they explored the country adjacent to the Cumberland and Tennessee Rivers to the Ohio. Here the company divided—Smith determining to return home, while his companions proposed to extend their tour to the Illinois country. On separating, Smith sent his horse with his companions, "as it was difficult to take a horse through the mountain," and they, providing him with a generous supply of ammunition, left him to pursue his homeward journey on foot, accompanied by the slave boy whom his owner had loaned for the purpose.

*Judge Haywood, in his history of Tennessee, credits the origin of these names to a party of hunters, who followed in 1761; the text follows the authority of Marshall and Butler.

Smith has left a record of this adventure, in which he relates its various incidents with laborious minuteness. He regained his native State after an absence of eleven months, in a most destitute condition; "my clothes," he writes, "were almost worn out, and the boy had nothing on him that ever was spun. He had buckskin leggins, moccasins, and breech-clout, a bear skin, dressed with the hair on, which he belted about him, and a raccoon-skin cap. I had not traveled far after I came in before I was strictly examined by the inhabitants. I told them the truth, and where I came from, etc.; but my story appeared so strange to them that they did not believe me. They said that they had never heard of any one coming through the mountains from the mouth of the Tennessee, and if any one would undertake such a journey, surely no one would lend him his slave. They said that they thought all I had told them were lies, and on suspicion they took me into custody, and set a guard over me."*

In 1767, a party from South Carolina—Isaac Lindsey and four others—explored the valley of the Cumberland, following its course nearly to the site of Nashville, where they met James Harrod and Michael Stoner (men prominent in the early history of Kentucky), on a hunting expedition from Illinois, having made their way thither from Fort Pitt down the Ohio.

A more important arrival in Kentucky, the same year, was that of the ubiquitious Indian trader in the person of John Finley, who came hither with several companions for the double purpose of hunting and trading with such wandering bands as he might meet. Finley came from the settlements on the Yadkin, and made his way across the Holston and Clinch to the head-waters of the Cumberland; thence following the warrior's path, "leading from the Cumberland ford along the broken country lying on the eastern branch of the Kentucky River, and so across the Licking to the mouth of the Scioto," he reached the Red River, an affluent of the Kentucky, in Montgomery County. Here he met a band of roving Indians with whom he traded; but, save that he was subsequently the pilot of Boone, nothing more is known of this first pioneer of Kentucky. "Were it permitted to indulge the imagination in drawing a portrait for this man," remarks the historian, Marshall, "strength of body and vigor of intellect, the necessary basis of bold conceptions and successful enterprise, would form the prominent features of its foreground. But to the historian destitute of facts, silence supersedes commentary."

Notwithstanding the extended explorations and visits noted, "the great body of the people in the colony knew nothing about the real situation of the country now called Kentucky. And they heard it spoken of as though its existence were doubtful, or as a tale told in romance to amuse the fancy, rather than to inform the judgment, or stimulate the mind to enterprise." (Marshall.) But while the net result of these explorations had done so little to increase popular information, they had not been lost upon the leading minds in the colonies, and the project of forming an independent colony south of the Ohio, long urged as a defense against the encroachments of the French, and since the war supported by cupidity and ambition, seemed now likely to succeed.

*Drake's Captivities; 1839.

The history of the original colonies had not passed unnoted, and the various companies formed about this time undoubtedly originated in an ambition to repeat the early experience of the London Company, Lord Baltimore and others, under more favorable circumstances. Nor was this ambition confined to the existing corporations; certain of the royal officials, apparently moved by personal considerations, were not less interested in this movement, though less open in their efforts, and among these, circumstances have pointed to Lord Dunmore, governor of Virginia and Sir William Johnson, Indian agent for the Northern District, as most prominent. With the latter this inland colony was a dearly cherished object, and to his ambition may be assigned the responsibility for much of the bloodshed which characterized the early settlement of Kentucky. How early he conceived such a design is uncertain, but as early as 1766 he secured the endorsement of Gov. Franklin, of New Jersey—son of Benjamin Franklin—for his scheme. The plan contemplated was the purchase of the desired territory from the Iroquois, for which a grant was then to be procured from the king, and a colony, of which Johnson was to be governor, planted thereon. Through Gov. Franklin the project was brought to the favorable attention of his father, then colonial agent at the court, and through Johnson to the notice of the ministry. Nothing could have been more ill-advised at this time, as the Indians were already in a vacillating temper, prepared to attack the border at the first fresh grievance.

The attitude of the savages hastened matters somewhat out of the proposed order; the treaty of Fort Stanwix followed, and in fixing upon the boundary line, Sir William was influenced more by the necessities of his project than by the equities of the case. "Had it stopped at the mouth of the Kanawha, the Indian frontier would have been marked all the way from northern New York to Florida. But instead of following his instructions, Sir William Johnson, assuming groundlessly a right of the Six Nations to the largest part of Kentucky, continued the line down the Ohio to the Tennessee River, which was thus constituted the boundary of Virginia." (Bancroft.) "The fact that such a country was ceded voluntarily, not after a war, not by hard persuasion, but at once and willingly,"* affords striking evidence that the cession was previously arranged for by Johnson in view of another contingency, and that the Iroquois were alone consulted and won by such blandishments as the experienced Indian agent knew well how to employ. However, the territory was thus secured; but the royal government gravely suspected the wisdom of adding to the number of the colonies, the growing insubordination of which was already giving it no little cause for uneasiness, and there were enough prior demands for grants before the cabinet to delay any examination of this new one, until the opening difficulties of the revolutionary rupture forced every other consideration out of mind, and rendered all such planning vain. But the wind had been sown in Johnson's unauthorized action, and the frontiersmen of Kentucky were to reap the whirlwind.

In the meantime, while royal officials schemed, and the royal ministry wearily sifted the numerous and conflicting propositions to colonize this newly purchased region, silent forces were preparing to solve the question of its settlement without the sanction of charter or the tinsel of government. The return of Finley to the North Carolina settlements was fraught with the most important influences for good or ill to the new country he left behind him, and it is difficult to conjecture when its settlement would have been effected had not this visit happily ended in enlisting the interest of the hardy settlers on the Yadkin. The story of his adventures and the tidings of the land fell with various effects upon his different auditors; curiosity struggled with doubt and a prudent regard for the difficulties of the enterprise, and for two years none appeared disposed to undertake the arduous journey. In the meanwhile, the description of Kentucky, with its *"Annals of the West," by J. H. Perkins, 1846.

DANIEL BOONE.

noble stretch of untouched forest, its beautiful rivers swarming with their finny tribes, its picturesque landscapes, its fertile valleys, and more than all the exhaustless throng of "beasts of every American kind" came to the appreciative notice of Daniel Boone, a resident of one of the valleys of South Yadkin.

But little is known of the previous history of this remarkable man. He was now about thirty-eight years of age; "his manners were simple and unobtrusive—exempt from the rudeness characteristic of the backwoodsman. In his person there was nothing remarkably striking. He was five feet, ten inches in height, and of robust and powerful proportions. His countenance was mild and contemplative, indicating a frame of mind altogether different from the restlessness and activity that distinguished him."*

Possessed of an inordinate passion for hunting and adventure, the story of this distant country acted on him like carnage upon the charger, that "smelleth the battle afar off;" and on Finley's proposing to revisit it, he promptly determined to accompany him.

Accordingly, on the 1st of May, 1769, a party consisting of Boone, John Stewart, Joseph Holden, James Mooney and William Cook, under the guidance of Finley, set out from the "peaceful settlements" on the Yadkin for Kentucky. The season proved exceedingly wet, a circumstance that caused the travelers extreme discomfort, and added to the tedious character of the laborious journey. Their route lay across the broad Appalachian Range, which defines the tributary valley of the Atlantic on the west, across the valleys of the Holston, Clinch and Powell Rivers to the head-waters of the Cumberland, and thence toward the north by the warrior's path. On the 7th of June they reached the Red River, where Finley had met the natives in his former visit, and here, at the end of a fatiguing journey of thirty-eight days, pursued through a perfect wilderness—"a land of precipices, of rugged hill-sides, of deep, narrow valleys, of tangled wood and impenetrable thickets"—they ceased their march and prepared a permanent camp to shelter them from the storms.

Hunting and the examination of the country next occupied their time, which was thus passed, without recorded incident, until the latter part of December. In making this visit Finley doubtless intended to renew his trading relations with the savages, and the others joined him for the sport and profit of hunting. None were yet adepts in Indian warfare, and it is certain that they had no reason to expect hostilities. The natives had treated Finley with kindness on the occasion of his first visit; the present company had made their entrance to this region and their more than six months' stay, without thought of disguise or concealment, unmolested; and whatever danger was to be apprehended from the discontent of the Indians previous to the Fort Stanwix treaty, that compact, they were certainly authorized to suppose, had removed all such fear. Whether any of the party had any conference with the Indians or early knowledge of their presence is unknown, but it is manifestly improbable that six hunters could unreservedly ply their vocation for so long a period in the favorite Indian hunting-ground of the continent, and escape the lynx-eyed observation of the savages. This the event proved; but how long the party had been a subject of surveillance, or what the cause of the attack to be recorded was, can only be conjectured.

The author of "Annals of the West" suggests the probable explanation: "the Indians were always extremely jealous of any white man that showed the faintest intention of residence on or near their hunting-grounds; if, therefore, the observation of several months satisfied them that the new-comers meant to lay equal claims with themselves to the game of their choicest forests, instead of being mere transient traders, we need not be surprised that they seized the first opportunity of making any of them prisoners." Whatever the reason, on the 22d of December, as Boone and Stewart were returning from a hunting expedition near the Kentucky River, they were seized by a party of Indians, who had concealed themselves in a cane-break.

*Gov. James T. Morehead's address, 1840. See Appendix A, Note 2.

In this emergency the captives displayed the ready tact that seems instinctive in the frontiersman. The savages offered them no violence, and affecting to accept the situation as final, they soon had the satisfaction of observing that they had disarmed the watchfulness of their captors. Encamping by a fire one night, at the end of a week's captivity, Boone discovered that the Indians had all fallen asleep, and carefully arousing his companion they made their escape unobserved. Repairing at once to their camp on Red River, they found it deserted and dismantled, their companions having returned to the settlements in alarm. But Boone and Stewart were not so easily disheartened; changing their camp, it is said, to a cave, now in Mercer County, they determined to brave the increased dangers and continue their hunting. A few days later they were unexpectedly joined by Squire Boone, a younger brother of Daniel, who, with a single companion, had followed the same route from Carolina, and fortunately chanced upon the site of their camp. But this auspicious reinforcement was closely followed by disaster; a little later, in another excursion, the elder Boone and Stewart were again attacked by Indians, the latter being shot and scalped. This occurrence so alarmed the companion of Squire Boone that he started forthwith and alone for the Carolina settlements.

The two brothers were now alone in a wilderness where danger lurked in every shadow. Surrounded by a vigilant and savage foe, of whose prowess they had had fresh and terrible evidence, separated by hundreds of miles of difficult travel from the nearest settlement, they found themselves destitute of every resource but their rifles and woodcraft. Undaunted by the terrors of the situation, these men determined to stay, but soon the small supply of ammunition warned them that the country must be abandoned or measures taken to increase the supply. The first alternative was not to be seriously thought of, and it was decided that the younger brother should return to the settlement and bring back the necessary supplies, while Daniel remained and extended his explorations.

To be thus absolutely alone in such a wilderness, might well shake the resolution of the stoutest heart, and Boone records that the departure of his brother left him for a time dejected and lonesome, but the situation afforded him too many distractions for this state of mind long to continue. He soon regained his usual buoyant confidence and roved far and near, hunting without concern and with great success. During the interval of his brother's absence, Boone seems to have abandoned his former camp, and to have rested no two successive nights in the same locality. Wandering wherever his fancy led him he explored the whole central portion of the territory which now forms the State of Kentucky, reaching the hills which overlook the "beautiful river" Ohio. His experience in Kentucky appears to have been his first intimate relation with hostile Indians, but, "uniting in an eminent degree the qualities of shrewdness, caution and courage, with great muscular strength," he succeeded in escaping the vigilance of his savage foes, though he must have been in constant proximity with one or another of the numerous Indian parties that frequented this region. That he should have been preserved untouched for three months, beset by such dangers, is little short of a miraculous interposition of Providence, and goes far to confirm the old pioneer's belief in his divine appointment "as an instrument ordained to settle the wilderness."

It is pointed out by the author of "Annals of the West," however, that "the woods of Kentucky were at that period filled with a species of nettle, of such a character that being once bent down it did not recover itself, but remained prostrate, thus retaining the impression of a foot, almost like snow; even a turkey might be tracked in it with perfect ease. This weed Boone would carefully avoid, but the natives, numerous and fearless, would commonly pay no regard to it, so that the white hunter was sure to have palpable signs of the presence of his enemies, and the direction they had taken." But to avail himself of such an advantage required a consummate woodcraft, which was the outgrowth of natural gifts, rather than instruction, and one is at a loss whether most to admire the courage and capacity of Boone amid the perils of the wilderness, or that of his brother in his scarcely less hazardous exploit of obtaining supplies.

But the time approached when the return of Squire Boone was to be expected; he had been gone since the 1st of May, and as July came on, Daniel directed his way toward the old rendezvous, where he was joined on the 27th of the same month by his brother, who brought horses and a full line of necessary articles. The brothers thenceforward remained together, hunting and exploring without remarkable incident until the following March (1771), when they returned to the settlements on the Yadkin, the elder with the intention of removing his family to the country, with the natural attractions of which he had become enamored.

It was September, 1773, before the completion of his arrangements permitted him to set out, but on the 25th of this month "he and his household left his Eastern home forever," and, accompanied by five other families, took the route to Kentucky. On reaching Powell Valley the party was happily reinforced by forty well-armed men who were seeking the same destination. Pressing forward without anticipation of trouble they had just reached the threshold of the State when they were surprised by a sudden attack on their rear by the savages. The whites soon recovered from their surprise, and responded with a spirited resistance, quickly beating off the enemy, but not without the loss of six men killed and wounded, the eldest son of Boone being numbered with the dead. This ominous introduction to the "dark and bloody ground" checked the buoyant spirits of the company; the women, not yet inured to the bloody scenes of border warfare, were panic-stricken; and the men, seriously impressed with the unexpected strength and determination of the Indian opposition, did not feel prepared to face such perils with their families. It was without much dissent, therefore, that the party retraced its steps, the emigrants taking up their residence in the valley of the Clinch, where they remained until 1775, separated from their future home by a double mountain range.

But the Boones were not alone in their knowledge of and desire to enjoy this region. As early as June, 1769,* a party of hunters, variously estimated from twenty to forty in number, and organized in Rockbridge County and New River Valley, Va., and Holston Valley, in North Carolina, set out by way of Powell Valley and Cumberland Gap, for the hunting grounds along the line of the Cumberland River. The company was thoroughly equipped for a long stay, each man taking, besides "rifles, traps, dogs, blankets," etc., one or more horses. Reaching the meadows near the site of Monticello, Wayne County, they made a camp and depot in which to store the peltry and game. From this point they ranged "to the west and southwest through a country covered with high grass," until the following summer, when the sport was abandoned. Here the company divided; ten of the hunters, constructing means of conveying their booty and themselves by water, went down the Cumberland and Mississippi Rivers to the French fort at Natchez, and thence home; the remaining members of the party returned by the outward route.

In the preceding fall (1769) several hunters, under the lead of Col. James Knox, separated from the main party, then hunting on the Laurel River, and following up the course of one of its western branches, Skegg's Creek, the little party met a band of Cherokees, under the lead of a chief known as "Captain Dick." A mutual recognition followed between some of the hunters and the chief, and the latter, learning the whites were in search of meat, directed them to follow the direction of the creek across the dividing ridge, when "they could come on his river,† where they would find meat plenty; to kill and go home." It is not recorded whether they obeyed the latter part of the chief's injunction; it is probable that they did not, and that in 1771 they were joined by some of the earlier party and a few recruits, raising the number to a total of twenty-two persons. The hunting in this season (1771) was excellent, and, extending their excursions to the barrens of Green River, they found themselves embarrassed by their success. Securing more skins than they could carry away, they constructed a "skin house" on Caney Creek, in Green County, where they stored their surplus booty. The Indians subsequently capturing two of the party, the remaining members temporarily abandoned the locality; on their return after a two months' absence, they found their dogs, which had "stayed by the stuff," gone wild, and their depot despoiled, a loss that one of the party expressed in a laconic inscription on a tree near by, "2,300 deer skins lost; ruination, by God." A station, subsequently made by this party on a creek, which takes its name from the occurrence (Station-Camp Creek), was also rifled by a band of Cherokees, the hunters losing all their pots and kettles, surplus clothing, and 500 deer skins.

*Marshall and Butler say 1770; Haywood and Collins, 1769.
†Hence, since called Dick's River.

At length the thought of returning began to suggest itself. The Indians were becoming serious obstacles in the way of securing the results of their hunting, and some of the party had been absent from home for upward of three years. Accordingly, late in 1772, they set their faces toward the settlements, where they arrived in safety, to the joy of their families who were prepared to give them up as lost, and where the story of their adventure gained for them the sobriquet of "The Long Hunters," and gave the new land a more widespread celebrity than it had hitherto enjoyed.

Another force now added its powerful influence to develop the "distant land beyond the mountains." The purchase of 1768, followed by that of 1770, had prepared the way for the sale of lands, and notwithstanding the inhibitory proclamation of 1763 had not been revoked, the keenest activity in land speculation ensued, surveyors pushing their lines to the mouth of the Kanawha as early as 1770.* The soldiers of Virginia in the French war, to whom a land bounty had been promised by Gov. Dunmore, and whose title had been recognized by the crown and land companies, were also clamorous for the satisfaction of their claims. It was provided that the bounty lands should be located on the waters of the Ohio, and in 1772 the settlements having reached the New River Valley, considerable surveys of these lands were made on this affluent of the Ohio. But the fame of Kentucky becoming rapidly noised abroad and the selection of bounty lands being confided to the beneficiaries, the demand for locations in Kentucky became general.

In 1773, therefore, a number of surveyors were appointed to make selections in Kentucky for such claimants. Of these appointees, Thomas Bullitt, whose gallantry saved the remnant of Maj. Grant's troops from that officer's unauthorized and disastrous attack on Fort Du Quesne in 1758, was the more prominent. Accompanied by James Harrod and others,† he set out from Fort Pitt for the falls of the Ohio. On reaching the mouth of the Kanawha, he was joined by the McAfee company intent upon a similar mission for themselves. The McAfees had left Sinking Creek, in Botetourt County, on May 10, and striking across the country had reached the Kanawha about four miles above the mouth of Elk River. Here they had sent their horses back, and constructing two canoes had descended the river, by previous arrangement meeting Hancock Taylor, a surveyor, and his company, on their way down. Reaching the Ohio, they met Bullitt's party, and the three parties thus united elected Bullitt captain.

Deeming it prudent, in consideration of the

*The first authorized survey made in Kentucky is placed at a somewhat earlier date than the above would indicate. Collins (Vol. II, p. 460) speaking of "one of the oldest patents probably now in Kentucky," says: "It was issued by the crown of Great Britain in 1772 to John Fry, for 2,084 acres of land, embracing the town of Louisa in Lawrence County. Nearly one-third of the land lies on the Virginia side of Big Sandy River. The survey upon which the patent issued was made by Gen. Washington between 1767 and 1770, inclusive, and upon the beginning corner he cut the initials of his name. Another survey was made by him for John Fry, on Little Sandy River, eleven miles from its mouth, and in the present county of Greenup." The fact that none of his papers so far as published mention these surveys, has given rise to a doubt whether Washington did the work in person.

† Appendix A, Note 3.

hostility manifested by the Indians, to negotiate with the most troublesome of the Ohio tribes, Bullitt left the company here and set out alone to visit the Shawanese town of "Old Chillicothe." He reached his destination undiscovered by the Indians, whose first intimation of his presence was the sight of his white flag waving in token of peace. They were at once eager to learn the cause of his presence; was he from the Long Knife?* and if on a peaceful errand, why had he not sent a runner? Bullitt, undaunted by the situation, replied that he had no bad news, that he was from the Long Knife, that he had no one swifter than himself, and being in haste could not wait the return of a runner. "Would you" said he, "if you were very hungry and had killed a deer, send your squaw to town to tell the news and wait her return before you ate?" Such adroitness soon put the savages in good humor, and with the deliberate custom of the Indians, deferred further conference until the following day. The surveyor then told the Shawanese that he wished to settle on the other side of the Ohio; made the strongest assurances of friendship on the part of the whites, and acknowledged that neither they nor the Delawares got "any of the money or blankets given for the land which I and my people are going to settle. But it is agreed by the great men, who own the land, that they will make a present to both the Delawares and Shawanese the next year, and the year following, that shall be as good." A delay of another day was made before they would reply, when they made answer to the effect that "he seemed kind and friendly, and that it pleased them well;" that as to "settling the country on the other side of the Ohio with your people, we are particularly pleased that they are not to disturb us in our hunting. For we must hunt to kill meat for our women and children and to get something to buy our powder and lead with, and to get us blankets and clothing."

Parting thus, Bullitt rejoined his companions, who had in the meantime reached the mouth of Limestone Creek, where Maysville now stands. Putting out from here in one boat and four canoes, the company proceeded to the mouth of the Kentucky River, where the McAfee party turned aside to ascend this stream: the rest went forward to the falls, where they arrived on the 8th of July. On their way down the river the united party stopped occasionally and made surveys here and there; several small plats were made in Lewis County, and on July 5, "a tract of very good land on Big Bone Creek"* was marked out. Arriving at their destination and pitching camp above the old mouth of Beargrass Creek, the party under Bullitt began their appointed work and continued for about six weeks exploring and surveying lands in what is now Jefferson and Bullitt Counties. In August, Bullitt made the first plat of Louisville,† probably on lands surveyed for John Connolly, but no record was made of this allotment, and it was subsequently supplanted by legislative action.

On parting from Bullitt, the McAfee company ascended the Kentucky River as far as Drennon's Creek; here they found one of their party—his name is perpetuated in that of the creek—who, crossing the country from Bone Lick, had preceded them one day. At this point the party abandoned their canoes, and following a buffalo trail along the west bank to a point opposite the site of Leestown, they forded the river and on the 16th of July made their first survey in the bottom-lands where Frankfort has since been built. "They then went up the ridge along the present Lexington Road, until 10 or 11 o'clock of the 17th, when they again crossed the Kentucky River seven miles above Frankfort, passed a little east of the present Lawrenceburg, and camped near the remarkable spring which is situated under a rock, on the road between Frankfort and Harrodsburg—then called the Cave spring, and now known as Lillard's. After surveying some land, the party hunted westwardly, until they discovered Salt River, but which they called Crooked Creek; they then went down this

*Appendix A, Note 4.

*Appendix A, Note 5.
†Ibid; Note 6.

creek to the mouth of Hammond's Creek, surveying from this point to the mouth of the branch, on which Harrodsburg now stands." (Butler.)

This party now broke up, Taylor and his two assistants going to the falls to join Bullitt, and the McAfees proceeding across the country for their homes. They started on the 31st of July; rains were frequent and game unusually scarce; and reaching the broken country at the forks of the Kentucky about the 5th of August, they found their stock of provisions exhausted, and not a living animal in sight save themselves. Bruised by the stony paths, torn by the briers and underbrush that thickly beset their way, and famished for the want of water which could nowhere be found, they pushed on until the 12th, when, as some of them laid themselves down to die, a more resolute member of the party fortunately succeeded in killing an elk. This timely supply of food, happily supplemented by the discovery of water, revived their drooping spirits, and the party, once more refreshed, pushed on until they reached the warrior's path, and following this regained their home by way of Powell Valley. Taylor reached Bullitt about the 3d of August, and soon after, James Douglas, deputy surveyor for Fincastle County, joined them from Virginia.

There were several surveying parties in the northeastern part of Kentucky this year. Of these, a party of ten under Capt. John Hedges, with Capt. Thomas Young and Lawrence Darnall as chain-carriers, was earliest. They came from Virginia by way of Fort Pitt and the Ohio River, landing on the site of Maysville; they gave the name of Limestone to the stream which empties into the Ohio at this point, and linked the name of Darnall with the first large creek below, calling it Lawrence. This party made several surveys in what is now Bracken County; built an improver's cabin and cleared a small piece of land on the Ohio River, about five miles below Augusta. Gen. William Thompson, of Pennsylvania, at the head of another party, landed at the mouth of Cabin Creek in July, and made extensive surveys on Licking River and its tributaries, remaining as late as the 20th of November.

The year 1773 was further signalized by the advent of Simon Kenton in Kentucky. He was a native of Fauquier County, Va.; born April 3, 1755, of mixed Irish and Scotch parentage. He grew to the age of sixteen entirely without the education of books or teachers, living a careless, uneventful life until an unfortunate love affair turned him into the wilderness, a heart-broken outlaw. He loved a maiden who did not reciprocate his passion, but bestowed her affection upon his friend and companion. Attending their wedding uninvited, in his utter despair and recklessness, Kenton thrust himself between the happy pair whom he found sitting together, whereupon their friends set upon him and gave him a good drubbing. Soon after, meeting his successful rival alone in a retired spot, he attacked him and was so far carried away in his rage as to beat him unmercifully. Kenton was finally brought to his senses by observing the apparent fatal result of his attack, and leaving his antagonist for dead, he fled beyond the frontier, his only refuge from personal and legal vengeance. Traveling by night and lying concealed by day, he reached the Cheat River settlement some time in April, 1771, and assumed the name of Simon Butler. Remaining here long enough to earn a good rifle by his labor, he joined a party destined for Fort Pitt. Here he was engaged to hunt for the garrison, and while thus employed formed a friendship with Simon Girty, who as a renegade subsequently ran such an infamous career.

While at Fort Pitt he also met George Yeager, who, when a boy and prisoner among the Indians, had visited Kentucky. Kenton's enthusiasm being kindled and fed by Yeager's description of the scenery, fertility and game of this "cane-land," he determined to explore it for himself, and in the autumn, 1771, accompanied by Yeager and John Strader, he went down the Ohio, exploring the southern bank as far as the mouth of the Kentucky for cane. Disappointed in not finding this growth as described by Yeager, the party retraced their journey to the Kanawha, where they continued their search without success. They remained in this region, however, engaging in hunting and trapping during this winter and the one following, until the spring of 1773.

Hitherto they seem to have escaped the observation of the Indians, at least of such as were inclined to hostilities, but one night in March, while sleeping in their rude camp unguarded and unsuspecting of danger, they were rudely awakened by a party of savages who had crept near enough to fire upon them with considerable accuracy. Yeager was killed, but Kenton and Strader escaped to the woods unhurt, but without clothing, save the shirts they had on. The survivors made good their escape from the Indians, but in their pitiable plight, without food or the means of procuring it, their unprotected bodies lacerated by the briers and underbrush that filled the forests, death only seemed deferred. Their camp was on one of the upper western branches of the Kanawha, and for six days they toiled on their painful journey with a scarcely defined destination, and living one can hardly conjecture how. On the last day, the two unfortunate trappers could only travel six miles, and this progress was made between the vacillations of hope and despair, the exhausted men repeatedly lying down to die. Their determined exertions, however, were happily rewarded; at the close of the sixth day they reached a hunter's camp on the Ohio, where they were considerately fed and clothed. With this party they ascended the river to the mouth of the Kanawha, where Kenton engaged with one of the settlers until he had earned enough to procure another rifle and outfit.

In the summer, he joined a party going down the Ohio in search of Bullitt's party, and on their way, some time in July, Kenton "with Michael Tyger and others" made some surveys and "tomahawk improvements" along and near the river in what are now Boyd and Greenup Counties. Not finding Bullitt, and alarmed by the attitude of the Indians, the party abandoned their canoes and under the guidance of Kenton returned to Virginia through the country. On reaching the mouth of the Big Sandy, Kenton's services as guide being no longer necessary, he decided to make this his hunting-ground for the season, and, in company with William Grills, Jacob Greathouse, Samuel Cartwright and Joseph Lock, remained here during the winter of 1773–74 trapping and hunting. In the spring, selling their peltries to a Frenchman and general Indian hostilities appearing inevitable, Kenton and his comrades returned to Fort Pitt, and eventually took part in the campaign of Lord Dunmore against the Shawanese.

In 1774, Col. William Preston, the surveyor of Fincastle County—in which was included all this new addition to Virginia—sent out three deputies, with their assistants, to continue the locating of military lands. Col. John Floyd was the first to arrive in the field, and on May 2, made his first survey in what is now Lewis County, opposite the mouth of the Scioto, for Patrick Henry—200 acres, binding one and one-eighth miles on the Ohio. On the same day he made another survey four miles below the first, and continued until July, so far as ascertained,* as follows: May 7, in Mason County, below where Dover now is; May 11, in Kenton County, about nine miles below Covington; May 12, in Boone County, including Big Bone Lick and vicinity; May 16, in Carroll County, three miles above the mouth of the Kentucky River; May 24, in Trimble County, about eleven miles below the mouth of the Kentucky; May 27, in Jefferson County, nineteen miles above the falls of the Ohio; June 2, in same county, five miles below the falls; June 6, in same county, at the mouth of Beargrass Creek; and going thence to the Elkhorn River, he made surveys in the counties of Scott, Fayette and Woodford.

Floyd's colleagues, James Douglass and Hancock Taylor, were not much later in reaching Kentucky. Douglass probably began his work on the waters of the Licking; on June 14, he is recorded as making a survey of 1,000 acres for James McDowell on a "south fork of Licking Creek," probably in

*See Collins, Vol. II, p. 238.

Montgomery County; subsequently he proceeded westward to what is now Jessamine County, where he executed numerous surveys on Jessamine and Hickman Creeks; and then turning northward met Taylor on the head waters of the south fork of Elkhorn, where the latter had made extensive surveys. Obtaining notes of the distances and courses he had run, Douglass surveyed here 3,000 acres for Edward Ward; a similar tract, July 8, "for Henry Collins, Esq., as a lieutenant in his majesty's navy in the late war;" and, July 11, 2,000 acres for Alexander McKee. Following the course of this stream into Scott County, he located several thousand acres in the vicinity of where Floyd was operating.

Taylor seems to have wandered over less country than his colleagues; he began his surveys, probably, in Fayette County, where he located thousands of acres and remained until July. He then proceeded to the lower part of the Kentucky River, to survey a tract of land for Col. William Christian not far from the mouth of the river, and while thus employed was attacked and seriously wounded by the Indians. Two of his assistants attempted to extract the bullet with a pen-knife, but were unsuccessful; the wound proved fatal on the way to the settlement, and Taylor was buried in Madison County on a fork of Silver Creek, which bears his name.

In the meantime, a notable event was occurring near the vicinity of these surveys. In May, James Harrod, who had been in one of the surveying parties of the preceding year, led a company of thirty-one* men into what is now Mercer County, and laid the foundation of the first settlement and village in Kentucky. The party came from the Monongahela Valley, by way of the Ohio, to the mouth of the Kentucky, and ascended the stream "to the mouth of a creek called (from that fact) Landing Run (now Oregon), in the lower end of the present county of Mercer, and east of the village of Salvisa; thence across the Salt River, and up to Fountain Blue, and to the place where Harrodsburg now stands. In two or three weeks this was followed by Isaac Hite's company of adventurers of eleven men. Capt. Harrod and his company encamped at the Big Spring, on the east of the place where it was agreed to lay off a town. Thence the men scattered in small companies to select locations, improve lands and build cabins, which they divided among themselves by lot—and as 'the lottery cabins' they were known as long as they lasted. John Crow's lottery cabin was near the town spring of Danville. James Brown's, on Clark's Run three-fourths of a mile southeast of said spring, and James Blair's, a mile and a quarter southwest; William Field's a mile and a third west of Danville; John Crawford's, four miles south of Danville; and James Wiley's, three miles east of Harrodsburg. There is good reason to believe that cabins were not built for all of the company, and therefore those built were apportioned by lot. The men of Hite's company 'improved,' but generally without building cabins. James Harrod found what he called the Boiling Spring, which subsequently became the site of 'Boiling Spring settlement,' six miles south of Harrodstown; here he cut down brush and made his improvement." (Collins.)

On the 16th of June, the company united to lay off a town, in which was assigned to each man a half-acre lot, and a ten-acre outlot. While this work was in progress, Boone having been sent to Kentucky on a special mission, reached this place and assisted in laying out the lots, one of which was assigned him. This lot adjoined one laid off for one Hinton, upon which a double log-house was built, which was known indiscriminately so long as it existed as Boone's or Hinton's cabin. Several other cabins were built here, which afforded quarters for the party until July 10th, when a band of Indians attacked five of the settlers, who were attending a piece of corn, planted about three miles from Harrodsburg. One of the number, Jared Cowan, was engaged in drying some papers in the sun, and was instantly killed. This sudden and fatal attack dispersed the squad; Jacob Sandusky, with two others, supposing the main party destroyed, struck out for the Cumberland River, which they reached in safety, and thence by canoe to New Orleans. The other survivor hastened to Harrodsburg, from whence a strong party was sent out, and the murdered man's papers recovered. This confirmation of the report of general Indian hostilities, which Boone had brought, quickly determined their action; the scattered men were recalled at once, and the whole company speedily conducted by way of Cumberland Gap to Virginia.

*Appendix A, Note 7.

Until the middle of 1774, the dissatisfaction of the Ohio Indians with the Fort Stanwix treaty found expression in open hostilities only within the precincts of the disputed territory. The existence of this dissatisfaction, and the reasons therefor, were well known, and as early as 1770, the fact found record in Washington's journal. In 1773, Bullitt probably expressed the calm judgment of the leading minds, when he recognized the justice of these Indian complaints, and promised that their claims should be satisfied; but it did not require a revelation to teach these untutored savages that "fine words butter no parsnips." The blankets and presents were not forthcoming, but it did not escape their attention, meanwhile, that thousands of deer and buffalo were falling a prey to the white hunter's rifle, and that over thousands of the choicest acres in their hunting-grounds could be seen the surveyor's fatal trail. Accordingly, irresponsible bands of the Ohio tribes gave deadly expression to the general feeling, and there were few who ventured into this forbidden ground but experienced the weight of Indian resentment. This feeling was undoubtedly encouraged by the French traders, who were still welcome among the natives, and who had not yet recovered from the smart occasioned by the discomfiture of their nation; for some little time longer, however, a prudent regard for the power of the English delayed a general war, but with the opening of the year 1774 events occurred which precipitated the Shawanese, "the very head and front of the offending," into open war.

The earlier settlements west of the Alleghanies were planted along the Cheat River in 1754, and along the Monongahela two years later. Here their extension was checked for a time by the hostile activity of the Indians, but directly this was ended the progress of the settlements led toward the Ohio. The Zanes settled on the site of Wheeling, in 1770, considerably in advance of others, but in 1772 settlements began to be marked in the country between the Monongahela and the Laurel Ridge, and in the succeeding year the main line had reached the Ohio. The rallying point for all this region was at Fort Pitt, at the forks of the Ohio, where a vigorous settlement had sprung up under the name of Pittsburgh.

During the French war there was considerable doubt as to the jurisdiction within which the forks of the Ohio came, neither Pennsylvania or Virginia caring to incur the responsibility and expense of defending it against the French. Circumstances, however, devolved the task principally upon Virginia, though both provinces contributed to its final capture and defense. When the geography of this country became better known, it was found that Pennsylvania had profited most by the exertions of their joint efforts—a result by no means pleasing to the Virginians. As early as 1763, therefore, a growing feeling existed in Virginia that the possession of this point rightfully belonged to that province, and in the course of the succeeding ten years, this feeling matured into a demand.

Accordingly, early in 1774, Lord Dunmore, governor of Virginia, sent his nephew, Dr. John Connolly, to Pittsburgh to assert the claims of the province. Connolly's first act, under this authority, was to issue a proclamation to the settlers in this region to assemble on the 25th of January, to be enrolled and mustered as Virginia militia. The proprietors of Pennsylvania were represented in the West by Arthur St. Clair, and he promptly caused the Virginian representative to be arrested before the date of the meeting. Notwithstanding this marked challenge of Virginia's authority, the people assembled according to the call, only to be peaceably dispersed by the dominant authority. Soon after this, upon his own authority and the promise of Connolly to return to his bond, the sheriff released his prisoner, who straightway collected a band of followers, and in March returned to Pittsburgh to re-assert the claim of Virginia. Too strong to be re-arrested, the usurper repaired the fort which had been dismantled, named it Fort Dunmore, and garrisoned it, remaining for the time master of the situation.

His proceedings thus far had been carried forward upon the sanction of the governor, but it became a serious question with Connolly whether the assembly would grant the means of paying the large expense involved, and it is gravely charged that he sought secretly to provoke a rupture with the Indians to give the color of necessity to his profuse expenditure. However this may be, in the latter part of April, Connolly dispatched a letter to the settlers along the Ohio warning them that the Shawanese were not to be trusted, and that the whites should be prepared to revenge any outrages perpetrated by the savages.

On June 17, 1798, Gen. Clark wrote a letter to the Louisville Literary News Letter, discussing the responsibility for what followed the events mentioned above, and from it is taken the following account of the situation: "This country* was explored in 1773. A resolution was formed to make a settlement the spring following, and the mouth of the Little Kanawha appointed as the place of general rendezvous, in order to descend the river from thence in a body. Early in the spring the Indians had done some mischief. Reports from their towns were alarming, which deterred many. About eighty or ninety men arrived at the appointed rendezvous, where we lay some days.

"A small party of hunters, that lay about ten miles below, were fired upon by the Indians, whom the hunters beat back, and returned to camp. This and many other circumstances led us to believe that the Indians were determined on war. The whole party was enrolled and determined to execute their project for forming a settlement in Kentucky, as we had every necessary store that could be thought of. An Indian town called the Horsehead Bottom, on the Scioto and near its mouth, lay nearly in our way. The determination was to cross the country and surprise it. Who was to command? was the question. There were but few among us that had experience in Indian warfare, and they were such that we did not choose to be commanded by. We knew of Capt. Cresap being on the river about fifteen miles above us, with some hands, settling a plantation; and that he had concluded to follow us to Kentucky as soon as he had fixed there his people. We also knew that he had been experienced in a former war. He was proposed; and it was unanimously agreed to send for him to command the party. Messengers were dispatched and in half an hour returned with Cresap. He had heard of our resolution from some of his hunters, that had fallen in with ours, and had set out to come to us.

"We now thought our army, as we called it, complete, and the destruction of the Indians sure. A council was called, and to our astonishment our intended commander-in-chief was the person that dissuaded us from the enterprise. He said that appearances were very suspicious, but there was no certainty of a war; that if we made the attempt proposed, he had no doubt of our success; but a war would, at any rate, be the result, and that we should be blamed for it, and perhaps justly; but if we were determined to proceed, he would lay aside all considerations, send to his camp for his people, and share our fortunes.

"He was then asked what he would advise. His answer was, that we should return to Wheeling, as a convenient port, to hear what was going forward. That a few weeks would determine. As it was early in the spring, if we found the Indians were not disposed for war, we should have full time to return and make our establishment in Kentucky. This was adopted, and two hours later the whole were under way. As we ascended the river we met Kill-buck, an Indian chief, with a small party. We had a long conference with him but received little satisfaction as to the disposition of the Indians. * * * * * On our arrival at Wheeling (the country being pretty well settled thereabouts), the whole of the inhabitants appeared to be alarmed. They flocked to our camp from every direction; and all that we could say could not keep them from under our wings. We offered to cover their neighborhood with scouts, until further information, if they would return to their plantations; but nothing would prevail. By this time we had got to be a formidable party. All the hunters, men without families, etc., in that quarter, had joined our party.

*Kentucky.

"Our arrival at Wheeling was soon known at Pittsburgh. The whole of that country at that time being under the jurisdiction of Virginia, Dr. Connolly had been appointed by Dunmore captain-commandant of the district, which was called West Augusta.* He learning of us, sent a message addressed to the party, letting us know that a war was to be apprehended, and requesting that we should keep our position for a few days, as messages had been sent to the Indians, and a few days would determine the doubt. The answer he got was that he had no inclination to quit our quarters for some time; that during our stay we should be careful that the enemy did not harass the neighborhood that we lay in. But before this answer could reach Pittsburgh, he sent a second express, addressed to Capt. Cresap, as the most influential man amongst us, informing him that the messengers had returned from the Indians; that war was inevitable, and begging him to use his influence with the party to get them to cover the country by scouts until the inhabitants could fortify themselves. The reception of this letter was the epoch of open hostilities with the Indians. A new post† was planted, a council was called, and the letter read by Cresap, all the Indian traders being summoned on so important an occasion. Action was had, and war declared in the most solemn manner; and the same evening two scalps were brought into camp.*

"The next day some canoes of Indians were discovered on the river, keeping the advantage of an island to cover themselves from our view. They were chased fifteen miles down the river, and driven ashore.† A battle ensued; a few were wounded on both sides; one Indian only taken prisoner. On examining their canoes, we found a considerable quantity of ammunition and other warlike stores. On our return to camp, a resolution was adopted to march the next day and attack Logan's camp on the Ohio, about thirty miles above us. We did march about five miles, and then halted to take some refreshment. Here the impropriety of executing the projected enterprise was argued. The conversation was brought forward by Cresap himself. It was generally agreed that those Indians had no hostile intentions, as they were hunting, and their party was composed of men, women and children, with all their stuff with them. This we knew, as I myself and others present had been in their camp about four weeks past, on our descending the river from Pittsburgh. In short, every person seemed to detest the resolution we had set out with. We returned in the evening, decamped, and took the road to Redstone."‡

Connolly's ill-advised letter was destined to bear still further bitter fruit. The settlers everywhere in this region seemed to have been put on the alert by this warning, and with a "zeal not according to knowledge," were betrayed into acts which warranted the bloodiest reprisal. Two days later than the events narrated by Gen. Clark, a company of thirty-two men under the command of Daniel Greathouse, hastily assuming that the action of Cresap would inevitably precipitate a war,

*West Augusta, i.e., western part of Augusta County.
†Fort Henry.

*The Indians, whose murder is thus noted, proved to be friendly natives in the employ of a Pittsburgh trader, and sent on a special mission. Notwithstanding the favorable character Clark assigns to Cresap, the great mass of evidence shows him to have been an "Indian hater," and the special evidence relating to this murder, makes it clear that he attacked the unsuspecting Indians against the earnest protest of the Zanes, who clearly showed him that his premeditated attack was unjustifiable, and ominous of wide-spread evils.

†At Captina Creek.

‡Brownsville, Penn. Clark was the apologist of Connolly and Cresap; the latter was, through a natural misapprehension, charged with the additional dastardly murder at Yellow Creek, but fortunately his reputation is saved this additional reproach by abundant sworn testimony.

proceeded up the Ohio to a point forty miles above Wheeling. The avowed object of this movement was the protection of a family (Baker's) whose cabin stood opposite the mouth of Big Yellow Creek, where Logan's hunting party was then encamped.

Arriving at their destination, "the party was concealed in ambuscade, while their commander went over the river, under the mask of friendship, to the Indian camp, to ascertain their number; while there an Indian woman advised him to return home speedily, saying that the Indians were drinking and angry on account of the murder of their people down the river, and might do him some mischief. On his return to his party, he reported that the Indians were too strong for an open attack. He returned to Baker's and requested him to give any Indians who might come over, in the course of the day, as much rum as they might call for, and get as many of them drunk as he possibly could. The plan succeeded. Several Indian men, with two women, came over the river to Baker's, who had previously been in the habit of selling rum to Indians. The men drank freely and became intoxicated. In this State they were all killed by Greathouse and a few of his party, for it is but justice to state, that not more than five or six of the whole number had any participation in the slaughter at the house. The rest protested against it, as an atrocious murder. From their numbers being by far the majority, they might have prevented the deed; but alas! they did not. A little Indian girl alone was saved from the slaughter, by the humanity of some one of the party, whose name is not now known.

"The Indians in the camp, hearing the firing at the house, sent a canoe with two men in it to enquire what had happened. These two Indians were both shot down as soon as they landed on the beach. A second and larger canoe was then manned by a number of Indians in arms; but, in attempting to reach the shore some distance below the house, were received by a well-directed fire from the party, which killed the greater number of them, and compelled the survivors to return. A great number of shots were exchanged across the river, but without damage to the white party, not one of whom was even wounded. The Indian men who were murdered were all scalped. The woman who gave the friendly advice to the commander of the party, when in the Indian camp, was amongst the slain at Baker's house."*

Comment upon these atrocious crimes is unnecessary; and they have been thus specifically pointed out because the massacres at Captina and Yellow Creeks were the undoubted cause of the outbreak which ensued. None on the frontier doubted that war would follow. The settlers were hastily notified and gathered at places best suited for defense, and an express was sent to Williamsburg with tidings of affairs on the border. Lord Dunmore quickly took measures to meet the emergency; the organization of an armed force to rendezvous at Wheeling was expeditiously undertaken, and Boone was summoned from his retirement to proceed to Kentucky and warn the several surveying parties engaged there. In company with Michael Stoner he set out in June, and it was on this trip that he visited Harrodsburg and assisted in laying out the lots. He found the surveyors already alarmed, and conducted them in with complete success and safety, making the tour of 800 miles in sixty-eight days.

The Indians, however, had not generally determined upon war. The friends of the murdered savages took vengeance on the whites within their reach, and several traders were sacrificed to their fury in a terrible manner, but the tribes were still reluctant to take up the bloody gauntlet thrown down by the whites. In this unsettled state of affairs the force rendezvoused at Wheeling, determined to march against the Indian town, Wappatomica, on the Muskingum. The Indians frustrated in their attempt to surprise this invading army, sued for peace, and gave five of their chiefs as hostages. Two of these were subsequently released to collect the head tribesmen to ratify a peace, but the whites, after waiting until it seemed evident that the only object of the savages was to gain time for organization, laid waste the town and crops, and retired with their prisoners. The Delawares, still anxious for peace, and the Shawanese, influenced by their sagacious leader, Cornstalk, went so far in their efforts to avert the threatened conflict as to secure some wandering traders from the wrath of the Mingoes whose friends had been murdered. And Logan, who had taken ready vengeance upon the scattered settlers, while the rest of his race hesitated, now that he had secured a scalp for each of his thirteen relatives murdered, expressed himself satisfied, and ready to treat with the Long Knives. But Connolly, who had been the prime instrument in embroiling the races, was possessed of a spirit scarcely less than fiendish, and seemed determined that war should follow. He accordingly attempted to seize the Shawanese whose errand of friendship had brought them within his reach, and when foiled in this attempt, sent his base emissaries to waylay them.

*Notes on early settlement of western Virginia. Rev. Joseph Doddridge, 1824.

Under such circumstances it would have scarcely been in accord with civilized human nature, and certainly not with Indian nature, if no border attacks had succeeded; and so from June to September the frontier was harried by numerous independent incursions, which were especially directed against the Virginians. These devastations called out the renewed efforts of Gov. Dunmore, and a large force was raised, consisting of two wings, one under Dunmore from the northern and eastern counties of Virginia, and the other from the southern and western counties under Gen. Lewis. These were to unite at Point Pleasant, and together proceed to the Indian country in Ohio. Lewis reached the appointed place on the 6th of October, and while waiting for the other wing was attacked by about an equal number of Indian warriors, drawn from the Shawanese, Delaware, Mingo, Wyandotte and Cayuga tribes. The battle began about sunrise on the 10th, and continued until near sunset with unabated fury and determination.

The savages were under the leadership of the famous Cornstalk, who inclosed the troops in the angle formed by the Kanawha and the Ohio, resolved to annihilate them if fortune favored his efforts. "Never," says Withers, "did men exhibit more conclusive evidence of bravery in making a charge, and fortitude in withstanding an onset, than did these undisciplined soldiers of the forest in the field at Point Pleasant." The Virginians were not less valiant; here Greek met Greek, but the "anointed children of education were too powerful for the tribes of the ignorant." Taking advantage of the sheltering banks of Crooked Creek, which flows in a course parallel with the Ohio into the Kanawha, a detachment of the troops gained the rear of the savages, who disconcerted by this unexpected attack gave way and retreated to their homes. The whites remained victors, but at a fearful cost. About one-fifth* of their number lay dead or bleeding upon the ground, among whom were ten of the leading officers.

As early as practical the command proceeded across the Ohio to secure the fruit of this hard-won victory, but before much progress had been made, a message from Dunmore brought the intelligence that the governor had proceeded direct from Pittsburgh, that he was then engaged in negotiating a treaty, and that the advancing troops were ordered to return to Point Pleasant. Gen. Lewis, entertaining grave suspicions of Dunmore's fidelity, declined to obey the orders thus received, and only stayed his march when ordered by the governor in person, in presence of an Indian town. The treaty agreed upon by Lord Dunmore has never been published, and it rests only upon that officer's word that the Shawanese agreed to forego their hunting in Kentucky; it is certain that the treaty effected no lasting settlement of the vexed question of the time, and gave assurance to existing suspicions that that officer desired to placate the savages in the interests of the part that the British were to play in the conflict which he dimly saw impending.

"The Dunmore war," though conducted outside of Kentucky limits, was none the less a marked event in its history, and was earnestly engaged in by most of those who have been noted as its earlier pioneers. Harrod, with thirty of his company, served under Gen. Lewis; Kenton acted as spy in both wings of the army; and Boone, after his return from the mission to Kentucky, commanded three frontier posts under appointment from the governor.

* Seventy-five killed and 140 wounded.

The retreat of the explorers and surveyors from Kentucky, in 1774, and the warlike activities which followed, served to spread the report of the new country's attractions in ever widening circles, and at the close of the brief struggle, public attention immediately reverted with increased interest to the disputed territory. The succeeding year, therefore, witnessed not only the return of former explorers to their improvements, but also the advent of many new adventurers.

Of the previous year's explorers, Kenton was probably the first to return. Discharged from the army in the fall, he repaired with a single comrade, Thomas Williams, to his old hunting-ground on the Big Sandy; here they spent the winter, and in the spring, having disposed of their peltries, Kenton led the way in quest of the "cane-land" which had been the object of his former fruitless search. They accordingly set out down the river, but night overtaking them they were obliged to put in to the shore. They landed at the mouth of Cabin Creek, about six miles above Maysville, and next morning, while hunting some miles back in the country, Kenton discovered the object of his persistent pursuit. From a little eminence his gaze took in a wide stretch of country, containing a large cane-brake and presenting a landscape that enraptured the young hunter Rejoining his companion, he related the glad tidings, and, sinking their canoe, the two started inland on a tour of discovery.

In the month of May, 1775, within a mile of the present town of Washington, in Mason County, having built their camp and finished a small clearing, they planted about an acre of land with the remains of the corn bought for food. The spot chosen by them for their agricultural attempt, was one of the most beautiful and fertile in the State of Kentucky. Here, in due season, they ate the first roasting ears that ever grew, by the care of a white man, on the north side of the Kentucky River. Before this they had discovered the upper and lower Blue Lick and the immense herds of buffalo, elk, etc., that frequented these places, covering the hills and valleys of the Licking. The land was a hunter's paradise, and our adventurers were completely happy in their new, undisputed home. They soon had cause, however, to apprehend that others would contend with them for the mastership of the soil.

Happening one day at the lower Blue Lick, they discovered two white men. Approaching them with due caution, they found them friendly, and learned that they had wandered without guns or food far into the country, their canoe having upset in a squall on the Ohio. Fitzpatrick and Hendricks (so these strangers were named) were invited by Kenton to join his station near Washington. Hendricks acceded to the proposal, but Fitzpatrick insisted on returning to Virginia. Accordingly, Kenton and Williams (having left Hendricks at the Lick) accompanied Fitzpatrick to the Ohio, gave him a gun and took leave of him on the other side from where Maysville now stands. Returning quickly as possible, they were surprised and not a little alarmed to find the camp where they had left Hendricks abandoned and in disorder. Looking around they observed a smoke in a low ravine, and at once comprehended the whole affair. They were satisfied that a party of Indians had captured their friend, and they at once fled to the woods.

Next morning, cautiously approaching the still smoking fire, they discovered that the savages had departed, and with feelings that may be easily imagined, they found what they did not doubt were the skull and bones of the unfortunate Hendricks. He had been burned to death while they were so cowardly flying. Filled with shame and remorse that they had so basely abandoned him to his fate without an effort to rescue him, they went back to their camp near Washington. They had the good fortune themselves to escape the notice of the Indians who prowled through the country. In the fall Kenton, leaving Williams at the camp, took a ramble through his rich domain. Everywhere he saw abundance of game, and the richest and most beautiful land. At the lower Blue Lick he met with Michael Stoner, who had come to Kentucky with Boone the year before. He now learned that himself and Williams were not the only whites inhabiting the cane-land. Taking Stoner to his camp and gathering up his property, he and Williams accompanied him to the settlements already formed in the interior. Kenton passed the winter of 1775–76 at Hinkson's Station, in the present county of Bourborn, about forty miles from his corn patch.*

There was less activity in the location and survey of military lands in this year, but Floyd and Douglass were both early in returning to Kentucky. The latter came back to the scene of his former labors, with a "party of about ten or twelve," and spent the summer in this work. Under date of July 12, 1775, Henderson writes from Boonesboro, to his colleagues in the Transylvania Colony scheme, that this party, "employed in searching through that country, and laying off officers' lands, have been for more than three weeks within ten miles of us, and will be for several weeks longer, ranging up and down the country."

*Sketch of Simon Kenton, in Collins, Vol. II, p. 442.

Floyd came to Kentucky in April, with thirty-one men from Virginia, and pitched his camp on Dick's River, engaging in surveying, during most of the year, all through central Kentucky. In May, he visited Boonesboro on behalf of his company to learn on what terms they might settle colonial lands; upon which Henderson remarks in his journal: "Was much at a loss on account of this gentleman's arrival and message, as he was surveyor of Fincastle County under Col. Preston." Later in the month, Floyd was a delegate to the Boonesboro Legislature from St. Asaph, and subsequently so far identified himself with the colonial enterprises as to become Henderson's principal surveyor.

In this year, Benjamin Ashley also made some surveys in Nicholas County for the Ohio Company—a part its first 200,000 acres; and in May, ten young men came from Virginia to what is Mason County, who, after exploring, surveyed upward of 20,000 acres. They also made improvements for each one, but their visit is chiefly remarkable for a bout of fisticuffs in which two of them engaged with such bitterness as for some time to give the name of "Battle Creek" to a stream now known as Well's Creek.

There was in this year, however, a marked activity among settlers, new explorers vying with older ones in their preparations to reach Kentucky early in the spring. March or April was as soon as it was practicable for the members of the older settlements to reach this destination, but in May, 1775, a close estimate places the number of prospective citizens then in Kentucky at 300, who already had 230 acres under cultivation.

Save Kenton, the McAfees were probably the first settlers to reach Kentucky in the spring, preceding Harrod by four, and Boone by twenty days. The Indian hostilities, which followed their return to Virginia in the previous year, prevented them from carrying out their intention of returning to make a settlement that year, but early in the succeeding spring they were once more in the cane-brake. They reached their claim on Salt River on March 11th, cleared two acres of ground, planted peach stones and apple seeds for an orchard, and in April started back to Virginia, leaving two of their number with Harrod to protect their improvement from the intrusion of other settlers. On their homeward journey they met Henderson and his company, when, persuaded by the leader of the party contrary to the advice of their elder brother James, Robert, Samuel and William McAfee turned back and united their fortunes with the colony. The family party accordingly divided, the three brothers returning to Boonesboro, where they entered land with Henderson, and put it in cultivation. That fall, when the colonial scheme proved abortive, the family party was reunited, and under the protection of the newly erected Harrod Station, cleared and cultivated some fifteen acres near the mouth of Armstrong Branch, in Mercer County.

On March 15th, James Harrod returned to the village which had been laid out on Salt Creek under his auspices in the previous year, and which was now called Harrodstown. He brought with him about fifty men, most of them young and without families, whom he had enlisted in the enterprise in the Monongahela Valley. The company at once occupied the cabins previously erected, and set about "improving" various sites for future settlements, sixteen fields of corn being planted in the neighborhood. In April, however, the alarm created by the Indian depredations in the preceding month robbed this settlement of more than half of its numbers, who set off for the protection of the older settlements. Harrod remained and pushed his improvements at Boiling Spring, while a sufficient number remained in the village to give it a busy air; in fact it was never subsequently entirely deserted, and in September gained an accession of several families to its population. In the succeeding winter a fort was begun here, though not completed until the next year, and was one of the noted outposts during the unsettled period, from the beginning of the Revolutionary war to the general pacification at Greenville.

The next and by far the most important accession to the frontier forces, in this year, was Boone and his company. The close of the "Dunmore war" had no sooner placed him at his own disposal, than he was solicited to lend his experience and efforts in behalf of an enterprise which sought to plant a colony in Kentucky. Little is known of the early growth of this project, but Richard Henderson seems to have been the leading spirit. He was a man of marked ability, and had occupied the position of associate supreme judge of North Carolina. Led by ambition and a spirit of speculation to emulate the early colonial enterprises, he privately sought the Cherokees under the pretense of viewing some back lands, and having ascertained their readiness to negotiate for the sale of a large portion of Kentucky, returned to his home to organize a company to effect the purchase.*

Accordingly, Thomas Hart, Nathaniel Hart, David Hart, John Luttrell, William Johnston and James Hogg, of Orange County, and John Williams, Leonard Hendly Bullock and Judge Richard Henderson, of Granville County, N. C., associated themselves for that purpose, and in a conference on the Watauga branch of the Holston River, between certain of the newly formed company, assisted by Boone, and the principal chiefs of the Cherokees, the natives, on March 17, 1775, sold to the company the fairest portion of Kentucky, as well as a large tract in North Carolina, for £10,000 sterling.

The boundaries of the tract in Kentucky were as follows: "Beginning on the Ohio River at the mouth of the Cantuckey Chenoee, or what, by the English, is called Louisa River; from thence running up the said river, and the most northwardly fork of the same, to the head spring thereof; thence a southeast course to the top of the ridge of Powell's Mountain; thence westwardly, along the ridge of the said mountain, unto a point from which a northwest course will hit or strike the head spring of the most southwardly branch of Cumberland River; thence down the said river, including all its waters, to the Ohio River, and up the said river as it meanders to the beginning."

Boone had been engaged to cut a road to the territory thus purchased, and prepare for the colony to be transferred thither; and before the consummation of the treaty, which was delayed by tedious Indian ceremonials for twenty days, he was on his way marking the route which has since been known as Boone's Trace. Boone had a party of twenty-one men, which included Squire Boone, Richard Callaway, John Kennedy, and others, and at Long Island, in the Holston, he was joined by Capt. Twetty with seven men. They began at this point to mark the trace, blazing their way with hatchets until they reached Rockcastle River. Thence their course lay for twenty miles through a country covered with dead brush; the next thirty miles lay "through thick cane and reed; and as the the cane ceased, they began to discover the pleasing and rapturous appearance of the plains of Kentucky. A new sky and strange earth seemed to be presented to their view; so rich a soil they had never seen before—covered with a clover in full bloom; the woods abounding with wild game—turkeys so numerous that it might be said they appeared but one flock, universally scattered in the woods. It appeared that nature, in the profusion of her bounty, had spread a feast for all that lived, both for the animal and rational world."*

This bold approach to the favorite hunting grounds of the savages was not to be made with impunity. No evidence of the presence of Indians had been observed, however, during their progress; the company had reached a point in Madison County within fifteen miles of the Kentucky River, and they went into camp on March 24th, therefore, without any of those precautions which would otherwise have been considered necessary. The pioneers had not been unobserved, as they thought; about daybreak the next morning the sleeping whites were aroused by a sudden volley of rifles, but fortunately the attacking band of savages was too weak to follow up the advantage afforded by the surprise, and retreated. This assault, brief as it was, entailed serious consequences upon the pioneers. Capt. Twetty received wounds in both knees, from which he died three days later; his black servant was killed outright, and Felix Walker was dangerously wounded. Some of the party refusing to brave further danger in advancing, followed the newly made trace homeward, while the rest of the company, erecting a slight fort* on a little eminence, about 100 yards from the road, remained here until April 1st. In the meantime the same Indians discovered a party of six whites encamped near the Kentucky River, and only a few miles from Boone's company, though unknown to them. These the savages attacked, killing and scalping two of their number; the rest escaped, a son of Samuel Tate being discovered by some of Boone's hunters. Having buried Twetty's remains in the fort, and leaving a small party with Walker, who was too seriously wounded to be moved at once, the main party proceeded to the mouth of Otter Creek, where Boone had sent a messenger to invite the members of the lower settlements to meet him. Arriving at their destination, selection was made of "a plain on the south side, wherein was a lick with two sulphur springs strongly impregnated," and here the company built a couple of cabins, "having some of the advantages of a stockade fort," which was subsequently named Fort Boone.

* Gov. Morehead is authority for the assertion that Col. Nathaniel Hart took these preliminary steps.

* Narrative of Hon. Felix Walker in Collins, Vol. II, p. 497.

Before leaving "Little Fort," Boone had dispatched a letter to Col. Henderson, informing him of their progress and experience, and added: "My advice to you, sir, is to come or send as soon as possible. Your company is desired greatly, for the people are very uneasy, but are willing to stay and venture their lives with you, and now is the time to frustrate the intentions of the Indians, and keep the country, whilst we are in it. If we give way to them now, it will ever be the case." This letter found Henderson already on the road for Louisa, as the Kentucky River and Valley were sometimes called. He had taken prompt and practical measures to plant the proposed colony, the details of which will appear in the following extract taken from his "Journal of an Expedition to Cantuckey in 1775."

Monday, March 20th,—Having finished my treaty with the Indians at Watauga, set out for Louisa. Thursday, 30th,—Arrived at Capt. Martin's in Powell Valley. Friday, 31st,—Employed in making a house to secure our wagons, as we could not possibly clear the way any farther.

Saturday, April 1st,—Employed in making ready for packing [i. e., loading horses with the baggage]. Sunday, 2d,—Mr. Hart came up [this was Capt. Nathaniel Hart, one of the proprietors of Transylvania, who had made the treaty at Watauga In 1779, he brought his family to Boonesborough. In August, 1782, while carelessly riding out in the vicinity of the fort, he was killed and scalped by a small party of Indians]. Wednesday, April 5th,—Started with our pack horses. Friday, 7th,—About break of day, it began to snow. About 11 o'clock received a letter from Mr. John Luttrell's camp, that there were five persons killed by the Indians on the road to Cantuckey. Same day received a letter from Daniel Boone, that his company was fired upon by Indians, who killed two of his men, though he kept the ground and saved the baggage, etc. Saturday, 8th,—Started about 10 o'clock, crossed Cumberland Gap. About four miles from it, met about forty persons returning from the Cantuckey on account of the late murders by the Indians. Could prevail on only one to return. Several Virginians who were with us turned back from here. Monday, 10th,—Dispatched Capt. William Cocke to the Cantuckey, to inform Capt. Boone that we were on the road. Sunday, 16th,—About 12 o'clock, met James McAfee with eighteen other persons returning from Cantuckey. Thursday, April 20th, 1775,—Arrived at Fort Boone, on the mouth of Otter Creek, Cantuckey River, where we were saluted by a running fire of about twenty-five guns, all that were at the fort. The men appeared in high spirits and much rejoiced at our arrival. Friday, April 21st,—On viewing the fort, finding the plan not sufficient to admit of buildings for the reception of our company, and a scarcity of ground suitable for clearing at that advanced season, was at a loss to proceed. Capt. Boone's company having laid out most of the adjacent good land into lots of two acres each, and taking as it fell to each individual by lot, was in actual possession and occupying them. After some perplexity, resolved to erect a fort on the opposite side of a large lick, near the river bank, which would place us at the distance of 300 yards from the other fort—the only place where we could be of any service to Capt. Boone's men, or vice versa. Saturday, 22*d*,—Finished running off all the lots we could conveniently get, fifty-four in number. Gave notice of our intention of having them drawn for in the evening, but Mr. Robert McAfee, his brother Samuel, and some more, were not well satisfied whether they would draw or not. They wanted to go down the River Cantuckey, about fifty miles, near Capt. Harrod's settlement, where they had begun improvements and left them on the late alarm. I informed them myself, in the hearing of all attending, that such settlements should not entitle them to land from us. They appearing much concerned, and at a loss what to do, the lottery was put off till next morning, at sunrise, thereby giving them time to come to a resolution. Sunday, April 23*d*, 1775,—Drew lots and spent the day without public worship. The interval was employed in building a magazine, sowing seeds, etc.

*This structure, formed of logs six or seven feet high, and probably not roofed, was known in the early annals of Kentucky as Little or Twetty's Fort, and was the first ever constructed in the State.

Sunday, May 7*th*,—Went into the woods after a stray horse, stayed all night, and on our return found Capt. Harrod and Col. Thomas Slaughter, from Harrodstown, on Dick's River. It is in fact on the head of Salt River and not on Dick's River. Col. Slaughter and Capt. Harrod seemed very jocose and in great good humor. Monday, May 8*th*,—Was very much embarrassed by a dispute between the above. * * * After much dispute about the respective claims of Slaughter and Harrod, for land to be apportioned to their respective companies, in order to divert the debate on this irritating subject, a plan of government by popular representation was proposed. The reception this plan met with from these gentlemen, as well as Capt. John Floyd, a leading man on Dick's River, gave us great pleasure, and therefore we immediately set out about the business. Appointed Tuesday, May 23d inst., at Boonesborough, for the meeting of delegates, and accordingly made out writings for the different towns to sign. For want of a little obligatory law, or some restraining authority, our game—nay, as soon as we got here, if not before—was driven off very much. As short a distance, as good hunters thought, was fifteen or twenty miles; nay, sometimes they were obliged to go thirty miles; though by chance, once or twice a week, buffalo were killed within five or six miles of the camp. The wanton destruction of game gives great uneasiness. Saturday, May 13*th*,—No scouring of floors, sweeping of yards, or scalding bedsteads here. About fifty yards from the river, behind my camp, and a fine spring a little to the west, stands one of the finest elms that perhaps nature has ever produced. The tree is produced on a beautiful plain, surrounded by a turf of fine white clover, forming a green to the very stock. The trunk is about four feet through to the first branches, which are about nine feet from the ground. From thence it regularly extends its large branches on every side, at such equal distances as to form the most beautiful tree the imagination can suggest. The diameter of the branches from the extreme end is 100 feet, and every fair day it describes a semicircle on the heavenly green around it of upward of 400 feet in circuit. At any time between the hours of ten and two 100 persons may commodiously seat themselves under the branches. This divine tree, or rather one of the many proofs of the existence from all eternity of its divine author, is to be our church, council-chamber, etc. Having many things on our hands, we have not had time to erect a pulpit, seats, etc., but hope by Sunday seven-night to perform divine service in a public manner, and that to a set of scoundrels, who scarcely believe in God or fear a devil, if we may judge from most of their looks, words or actions. Tuesday, May 23*d*, 1775,—Delegates met from every town, pleased with their stations, and in great good humor. Wednesday, May 24*th*,—Convention met (under divine elm) for the colony of Transylvania; sent a message acquainting me that they had chosen Col. Thomas Slaughter as chairman, and Matthew Jouett, clerk, of which I approved, and went and opened business by a short speech, etc. Thursday, May 25*th*,—Three of the members waited on the proprietors with a very sensible address, which they asked leave to read; read it, and delivered an answer in return. Business went on. This day four bills were fabricated: (1) for establishing tribunals of justice and for recovery of debts; (2) for establishing a militia; (3) for preventing the destruction of game, etc.; (4) a law concerning fees. The delegates are very good men, and much disposed to serve their country. Saturday, May 27*th*,—Finished the convention in good order; everybody pleased. Sunday, May 28*th*,—Divine service, for the first time in Kentucky, was performed by Rev. John Lythe, of the Church of England. Most of the delegates returned home.

Monday, June 5*th*,—Made out commissions for Harrodsburg, Boiling Springs settlement, and St. Asaph's, both military and civil. Friday, June 16*th*, — Continued eating meat without bread. Sunday, June 18*th*,—Michael Stoner, our hunter, not returned; was expected yesterday; no meat.

Wednesday, July 12,—Horses being almost worn out, went up the river (Kentucky) in a canoe to get meat, if possible. Our salt quite out, except about a quart which I brought from Harrodsburg. Times a little melancholy, provisions very scarce; no salt to enable us to save meat at any distance from us. No accounts or arrivals from within; weather very dry; the spring being scarce, water was rarely to be gotten. We were not able to raise above fourteen or fifteen fighting men at one time, unless they were all summoned, which could not easily be done without long notice, they being much dispersed hunting,* etc.

In the meanwhile the cane-brakes, elsewhere in Kentucky, were rife with the busy activity of settlers. Benjamin Logan had heard of the rich lands to be secured in Kentucky, and starting out from his farm on the Holston, unaccompanied, save by three of his bondsmen, he made his way as far as the Powell Valley, intent upon exploring the newly opened country for himself. Here he fell in with Henderson's company, with which he proceeded to his destination. In journeying thither, he learned of Henderson's plans, which ill suited his independent spirit, and gaining the interior, he parted company with his fellow-travelers, and struck out for himself. He selected a site about a mile west of the present town of Stanford, in Lincoln County, and there, with one Michael Galaspy, raised a crop of corn and built a small defensive cluster of cabins. He did not remain long alone; his many excellent qualities of head and heart attracted others, and the settlement thus formed single-handed was of such importance, in May, as to be represented in the colonial assembly on an equal footing with the more pretentious one at Harrodstown.

At the same time, some seventy-five miles northeast of Logan, the Hinkston company of fifteen explorers were making improvements on the Licking. Coming down the Ohio in March and April, they ascended the Licking to the mouth of Willow Creek, four miles above Falmouth, and landed; here they remained two nights and a day on account of high water and continued rains, and then proceeded to a spot near the lower Blue Lick. At this place they fell in with the Miller company of fourteen persons, which had followed the same course, but had passed them unobserved in the journey. Each party sent explorers to spy out the land, who brought in their reports to the united company. The two parties traveled together until the buffalo trace leading toward the site of Lexington was reached, when they separated. Hinkston and his company took this trace to the region lying between Cynthiana and Paris, where they made several small clearings and built a cabin for each member of the company. From members of this company, Hinkston and Townsend's Creeks, and Cooper's Run take their names, and on the last two, corn was raised in this year. The Miller party encamped on a creek bearing the same name, and selected sites for improvement for each one of the company, one of the members planting a patch of potatoes. In June, however, the whole company returned home.

Contemporaneous with these were the parties of McConnell and Lindsay, which arrived on the Elkhorn from the Monongahela Valley in April. The first named party, under the lead of William McConnell, who had been in Kentucky the year before, remained here until June, making various "improvements" in what is now Fayette County. Some of these persons returned by water, the others going by land to the mouth of Lawrence Creek on the Ohio, six miles below Maysville, where the company was reunited. Reaching their destination before the arrival of the canoes, the land party busied themselves in making "improvements" and building cabins on that stream. In the succeeding November, John McClellan, with his family and six young men, returned, bringing their movable goods in canoes and driving their stock, nine horses and fourteen head cattle, overland. The site of Leestown was the appointed place of rendezvous, where the land party arrived first; on the arrival of the canoes, the party proceeded to the Royal Spring, where Georgetown has since been founded, and erected a cabin, where the company resided until April of the next year. This done, the young men went within two miles of the site of Lexington, and built a cabin.

"In April, 1775, Joseph Lindsay, William Lindsay, Patrick Jordan, Garrett Jordan, John Vance and others, met at Drennon's Lick and came up together to Elkhorn,

*These extracts have been taken from the portion quoted by Mr. Collins in his excellent sketches. Reference is made to another "stitched book," but this, that indefatigable compiler, after a long and pains-taking search, was unable to find.

where John Lee and Hugh Shannon joined them, thence up Elkhorn to the forks; from the forks to the place now called Georgetown, and thence to, or near, the place where Lexington now stands—their business, to explore the country and make improvements. The morning after they encamped here, the company remained in camp on account of the rainy weather. Patrick Jordan went alone down the fork on which they were encamped, and discovered a large spring of water on the north side of land a short distance from the fork. When he returned to camp and told of the spring, Joseph Lindsay, the only one of the company who had not made choice of an improvement said he would have it, and promptly offered Jordan two guineas to go with him and show it. They went together, taking axes, and made an 'improvement,' cut poles and built a cabin, three or four logs high and about ten feet square, girdled some trees, and made a brush heap or two, and cut the initials J. L. on a tree at the head of the spring. After that, several of the company went over to Harrodsburg, and the others down to the forks of the Elkhorn after their provisions, working tools, etc., which had been left there with the canoes. In a few days, the brothers Jordan returned with Joseph Lindsay to his spring, assisted him to plant between a quarter and a half acre of land in corn, and then left him, Lindsay declaring he meant to live there. In September, 1775, Patrick Jordan went by and found Lindsay living there, in a camp he had built; besides the plow-irons, wedges, hoes, axes, etc, which he had gotten from Elkhorn, Lindsay had roasting ears of corn and snap beans, the first Jordan had seen in the country. In July, 1776, he called there again, and saw two acres of corn, and some fruit trees growing, and about a quarter of an acre of land inclosed with a fence. Lindsay was not there; 'it was growing troublesome times on account of the Indians, the people were scary, and had generally left their improvements and gone into the stations for security.' Lindsay had gone to Harrodsburg." (Collins.)

In his historical address, Governor Morehead states that "in the year 1775, intelligence was received by a party of hunters, while accidentally encamped on one of the branches of the Elkhorn, that the first battle of the Revolution had been fought in the vicinity of Boston, between the British and provincial forces; and in commemoration of the event they called the spot of their encampment Lexington." There are some considerations which lead one to believe this suggestion as to the origin of the town's name a romance, but the evidences are strongly in favor of its probability; and it appears quite as evident that one of these parties—McConnell's or Lindsay's—was its author, though the town was not founded until four years later.

Such were the notable explorations made and settlements effected prior to 1776; others of a less important character, and many, of which there is no record, contributed to the pioneer activities of this period, but of all the eager throng that hastened to pre-empt the choicest glades and meadows in this fertile land, few cared to brave the dangers of the "dark and bloody ground" in their defense. On June 12, when, as his journal informs us, the supplies were nearly exhausted, Henderson writes from Boonesborough, as the settlement was called, to his colleagues:

* * * No doubt but you have felt great anxiety since the receipt of my letter from Powell's Valley.* At that time things wore a gloomy aspect; indeed it was a serious matter, and became a little more so, after the date of the letter than before. That afternoon I wrote the letter in Powell's Valley, in our march this way we met about forty people returning, and in about four days the number was little short of a hundred. Arguments and persuasions were needless; they seemed resolved on returning, and traveled with a precipitation that truly bespoke their fears. Eight or ten were all that we could prevail on to proceed with us, or follow after; and thus, what we before had, counting every boy and lad, amounted to about forty, with which number we pursued our journey with the utmost diligence, for my own part, never under more real anxiety. * * * Every group of travelers we saw, or strange bells which were heard in front, was a fresh alarm; afraid to look or inquire, lest Capt. Boone or his companions were amongst them, or some disastrous account of their defeat. The slow progress we made with our packs, made it absolutely necessary for some person to go and give assurance of our coming, especially as they had no certainty of our being on the road at all; or had even heard whether the Indians had sold to us or not. It was owing to Boone's confidence in us, and the people's in him, that a stand was ever attempted in order to wait for our coming. * * * * * * *

* April 8. See Journal, ante.

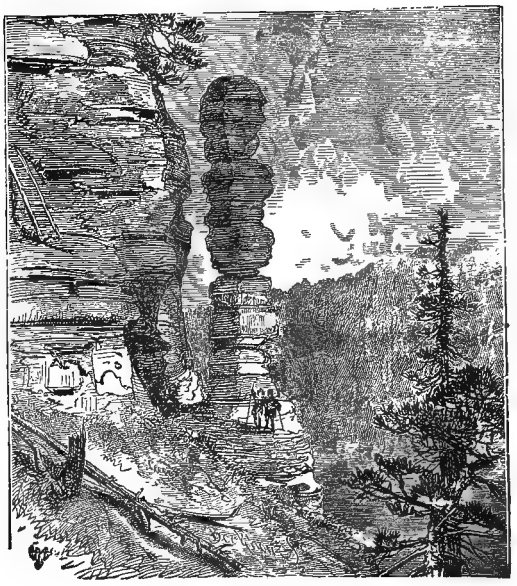
The general panic that had siezed the men we were continually meeting, was contagious; it ran like wild-fire; and, nothwithstanding every effort against its progress, it was presently discovered in our own camp; some hesitated and stole back, privately; others saw the necessity of returning to convince their friends that they were still alive, in too strong a light to be resisted; whilst many, in truth, who have nothing to thank but the fear of shame, for the credit of intrepidity, came on, though their hearts for some hours made part of the deserting company. In this situation of affairs, some few, of genuine courage and undaunted resolution, served to inspire the rest; by help of whose example, assisted by a little pride and some ostentation, we made a shift to march on with the appearance of gallantry, and, cavalier-like, treated every insinuation of danger with the utmost contempt. It soon became habitual; and those who started in the morning with pale faces and apparent trepidation, could lie down and sleep at night in great quiet, not even possessed of fear enough to get the better of indolence. * * * To give you a small specimen of the disposition of the people it may be sufficient to assure you that when we arrived at this place, we found Capt. Boone's men as inattentive on the score of fear (to all appearances), as if they had been in Hillsborough. A small fort, which only wanted two or three days' work to make it tolerably safe, was totally neglected on Mr. Cocke's arrival;* and unto this day remains unfinished, nothwithstanding the repeated applications of Capt. Boone, and every representation of danger from ourselves. * * * Our plantations extend nearly two miles in length, on the river, and up the creek. Here people work in their different lots; some without their guns, and others without care or caution. It is in vain for us to say anything more about the matter; it cannot be done by words. * * * Our company has dwindled from about eighty in number to about fifty odd, and I believe in a few days will be considerably less. Among these I have not heard one person dissatisfied with the country or terms; but go, as they say, merely because their business will not admit of longer delay. The fact is that many of them are single, worthless fellows, and want to get on the other side of the mountains, for the sake of saying they have been out and returned safe, together with the probability of getting a mouthful of bread in exchange for their news. * * * We are seated at the mouth of Otter Creek, on the Kentucky, about 150 miles from the Ohio. To the west, about fifty miles from us, are two settlements, within six or seven miles one of the other. There were, some time ago, about 100 at the two places; though now, perhaps not more than sixty or seventy, as many of them are gone up the Ohio for their families, and some returned, by the way we came, to Virginia and elsewhere. * * * Col. Harrod, who governs the first two mentioned settlements (and is a very good man for the purpose), Col. Floyd (the surveyor) and myself, are under solemn engagements to communicate with the utmost dispatch every piece of intelligence respecting danger or sign of Indians, to each other. In case of invasion of Indians, both the other parties are instantly to march and relieve the distressed if possible. * * * * * * * *



* See journal entry, Monday, April 10. The messenger dispatched.

The plea of going back to the older settlements for their families was in most cases without foundation in fact. None returned; and prior to September there were no white women in Kentucky. Some time before this date, Boone had returned to the Holston River settlements to bring on his family; he found the families which had made the unsuccessful attempt to reach this region, in 1773, ready to try again, and accordingly, having secured a number of recruits for the frontier post, he set out with them and his family in the latter part of the summer. On reaching Powell Valley, he was joined by Hugh McGary, Richard Hogan and Thomas Denton, with their families, who had been waiting three months for his return. United, the company mustered "twenty-seven guns," which, with their stock and luggage, made a somewhat imposing cavalcade. They reached the head of Dick's River without special incident, and here the other families, having some months before sent Jacob Harman forward to prepare for their coming, separated from Boone, and made their way, as best they could by Boone's directions, to Harrodsburg. Opposite Gilbert's Creek these families, becoming bewildered, left their stock with the young men of the party, James Ray, John Denton and John Hays, and went forward unencumbered to seek their destination. McGary succeeded in reaching the village by a happy accident, and sent back a guide to bring the rest of the company, where they arrived on September 8. The boys on being left behind were promised relief in three days, but these days were extended to weeks before they were found and conducted in. Boone, with his family and twenty-one men, proceeded to Boonesborough, where they arrived on September 8, also, Mrs. Boone and her daughter, being "the first white women who ever stood upon the banks of the Kentucky River." Thus in the latter part of the year 1775, the domestic circle was completed for the first time in the State, at Harrodsburg, Boonesborough, and on the site of Georgetown.*

Another arrival, which proved of the first importance in the early history of Kentucky, was that of George Rogers Clark. The company formed in 1774, to plant a settlement in the new country, of which Clark was a member, seems to have been permanently diverted from its purpose by the events which culminated in the war against the Ohio Indians, and Clark, not to be prevented from at least visiting this country, came alone in the spring of this year, finding his way to Harrodsburg. His presence became known throughout the frontier; he had served in the late war as captain, and in recognition of his military ability he was placed in command of the irregular forces of the settlements, though probably not commissioned. Fortunately circumstances gave him no opportunity to display the high qualities of military leadership which he possessed, and which the future was to amply develop. After the hostilities of the spring, the Indians seemed to have abandoned the field; and the settlements, after the early part of April, rested in a general feeling of security. This, however, was only the ominous lull before the tempest.

*John McClellan and his family in November; ante.

CHIMNEY ROCK, ON KENTUCKY RIVER.

CHAPTER VI.

COLONIZATION OF KENTUCKY—THE BORDER STRUGGLE.

ALMOST important feature of the settlement of Kentucky, in 1775, was the planting of the Transylvania colony, the initial steps of which have been noted in the preceding chapter. The project certainly was without precedent, and yet novel only in its order of procedure. Hitherto such enterprises had first sought the sanction of the king in a charter, but the innovation involved in the action of Henderson and his associates was such as would not probably have aroused serious opposition at any other juncture of affairs. But at this time, the disputes of the colonies with the crown had made the royal governors particularly suspicious and watchful, and this unusual course was construed as another evidence of the people's growing disloyalty to the king. Accordingly, the treaty with the Cherokees had scarcely been consummated before the governors of Virginia and North Carolina, incited by a jealous regard for the royal prerogative and the charter limits of their respective colonies, fulminated their proclamations against the new colony, characterizing it as a design to form "an asylum for debtors and other persons of desperate circumstances."

Such factious hostility gave this enterprise a wide-spread notoriety, and raised up for it an unexpected support. The subject of planting this colony incidentally came up in the Virginia revolutionary convention, where it was vigorously defended by the champions of the people, Henry and Jefferson. Learning of this, the proprietors united in a letter of thanks to these gentlemen, in which they took occasion to say:

* * * The copartners in the purchase of lands, in Louisa, from the Indians, neither intending by their distant and hazardous enterprise to revolt from their allegiance to their sovereign, nor yet to desert the grand and common cause of their American brethren and fellow subjects in their manly and glorious struggle for the full enjoyment of the natural rights of mankind, and the inestimable liberties and privileges of our happy constitution, were anxious to know the result of the wise and mature deliberations of the convention, and particularly in the inquiries concerning the several matters which became the subject of consideration in that august assembly. It was not long before we learned the particulars from some of the members, and that the minute circumstances of our contract with the Cherokee Indians had occasionally been moved and debated. The true point of view in which you, with several other gentlemen, conceived the nature of our contract, and the eloquence and good sense with which you defended, and the liberal principles on which you supported our claims to the benefit of our engagement with the Indians, in addition to the universal applause of the whole continent for your noble and patriotick exertions, give you an especial claim to our particular acknowledgements, of which we take this earliest opportunity of begging your acceptance. * * * * * * *

Convinced that our purchase is neither against the laws of our country, nor the principles of natural justice and equity, and conscious to ourselves of the uprightness of our intentions, we totally disregard the reproaches thrown out against us by illy-informed or envious and interested persons; and now, encouraged by the approbation of the respectable Provincial Congress of Virginia, we shall hereafter pursue with eagerness what we at first adopted with caution.*

Such were the auspices under which the Transylvania colony began its career. It is not probable that the details of this colonial scheme were previously elaborated beyond such as were necessary for the purchase and occupation of the land, and Henderson's journal suggests (see entry May 8, ante) that the plan for a representative government originated in the unforeseen difficulties which arose after the planting of the settlement at Boonesborough. Harrodsburg, Boiling

*The entire letter may be found in the "Romance of Western History," by James Hall; 1857.

Spring and St. Asaph's had been independently established, and involved interests which, while not entirely harmonious among themselves, the proprietors could not afford to antagonize. It would be unjust to the liberal and far-sighted policy entertained by Judge Henderson, however, to describe the form of government as extorted by inexorable circumstances. His whole career shows him to have been a man of great intelligence and advanced political principles, and while the situation undoubtedly suggested the easiest way to secure general harmony, representative government was thereby placed only a little earlier in the order of colonial development as forecasted in the mind of the leading proprietor. But whatever its origin, the suggestion met with the approval of the leading men then in Kentucky, and prompt steps were taken to realize upon it at as early a date as possible.

Accordingly, on May 23, 1775, the delegates apportioned to the various settlements met at Boonesborough. The brief journal of this first legislature in Kentucky, published in full by Mr. Collins, notes the presence of Squire Boone, Daniel Boone, Samuel Henderson, William Moore, Richard Callaway, Thomas Slaughter, John Lythe, Valentine Harmon, James Douglass, James Harrod, Nathan Hammond, Isaac Hite, Azariah Davis, John Todd, Alexander Spottswood Dandridge, John Floyd and Samuel Wood as members. The session was opened, on the part of the proprietors, by Judge Henderson, who, in a dignified address, emphasized the importance of the work to be done, and pointed out the legislation necessary to protect the reputation of the colony from reproach, and to secure the welfare of the colonists. He said, in part:

You are called and assembled at this time for a noble and honorable purpose—a purpose, however ridiculous or idle it may appear at first view to superficial minds, yet it is of the most solid consequence. * * * * * * * *

You are perhaps fixing the palladium, or placing the first corner-stone of an edifice, the height and magnificence of whose superstructure is now in the womb of futurity, and can only become great and glorious in proportion to the excellence of its foundation. These considerations, gentlemen, will no doubt animate and inspire you with sentiments worthy of the grandeur of the subject.

Our peculiar circumstances in this remote country, surrounded on all sides with difficulties, and equally subject to one common danger, which threatens our common overthrow, must, I think, in their effect secure to us a union of interests, and consequently, that harmony in opinion so essential to the forming of good, wise and wholesome laws. If any doubt remain among you with respect to the force or efficacy of whatever laws you now, or hereafter make, be pleased to consider that all power is originally in the people; therefore, make it their interest by impartial and beneficial laws, and you may be sure of their inclination to see them enforced.

To this address, the spirit of which is fairly illustrated by the brief extracts quoted, the convention made a suitable reply in a single notable paragraph, of which they affirm "that we have an absolute right, as a political body, without giving umbrage to Great Britain, or any of the colonies, to frame rules for the government of our little society, cannot be doubted by any sensible, unbiased mind," etc. The first two days were occupied with the ordinary organization and the exchange of these official courtesies, but on the twenty-fifth the convention settled down to its appointed work, framed four ordinances, and on the twenty-seventh concluded its sitting. The closing entries in its journal summarizes the work of the session as follows:

The following bills passed and signed this day by the proprietors, on behalf of themselves and partners, and the chairman of the convention, on behalf of himself and the other delegates:

1st.—An act for establishing courts of judication, and regulating the practice therein.

2d.—An act for regulating a militia.

3d.—An act for the punishment of criminals.

4th.—An act to prevent profane swearing and Sabbath breaking.

5th.—An act for writs of attachment.

6th.—An act for ascertaining clerks' and sheriffs' fees.

7th.—An act to preserve the range.

8th.—An act for improving the breed of horses.

9th.—An act for preserving game.

All the above mentioned acts were signed by the chairman and proprietors, except the act of ascertaining the clerks' and sheriffs' fees, which was omitted by the clerk not giving it in with the rest. Ordered, that at the next meeting of delegates, if any member be absent, and doth not attend, that the people choose one to serve in room of such absent member. Ordered, that the convention be adjourned until the first Thursday in September next, then to meet at Boonesborough.

MATTHEW JOUETT, Clerk.

The result of the convention was generally acceptable to the settlers then on the frontier. In addition to the salutary laws ordained, a compact had been entered into by the delegates of the people and the proprietors, the provisions of which guarded every interest, and granted every privilege for which the older colonies were then contending. No sooner, therefore, was the colonial land office opened than purchasers hastened to avail themselves of the company's terms, and by the 1st of December, 1775, 560,000 acres were entered. Thus far the colonial venture seemed to be on the high road to success, but its political status was still unsettled, and to this feature of the problem the proprietors were giving earnest consideration. Silas Deane, of Connecticut, had been applied to for such suggestions in regard to internal affairs as the experience of that colony might afford, and accompanying a copy of its laws, Mr. Deane wrote to James Hogg, in November, commenting upon them and the general topic. In regard to the practice of Connecticut, he said: "They were never fond of making many laws; nor is it good policy in any State, but worst of all in a new one." In this the Transylvania convention had been singularly happy, and in most respects had anticipated the admirable suggestions of the writer.*

In pursuance of a call for a general meeting of the company, the proprietors convened at Oxford, N. C., on September 25, 1775, Henderson, Luttrell and Thomas Hart returning from Kentucky for the purpose. Nathaniel and David Hart were not present; having become disaffected toward their colleagues, they chose to remain on the frontier. At this meeting the proprietors "took into their consideration the present state of said colony," and recorded their action in a series of resolutions, the more important of which are here given in full. The first six appoint Col. John Williams resident agent for the company "until the 12th of April next;" fix his salary for this time at "£150 proclamation money of North Carolina;" provide for his success or "in case of death or removal of Mr. Williams;" for the reservation of lands known to adjoin salt springs or mineral deposits, and one-half of all mineral products in any other lands; and for the recording of deeds granted. Then follows:

Resolved, That all surveys shall be made by the four cardinal points, except where rivers or mountains so intervene as to render it too inconvenient; and that in all cases where one survey comes within the distance of eighty poles from another, their lines shall join without exception; and that every survey on navigable rivers shall extend two poles out for one pole along the river; and that each survey not on navigable rivers shall not be above one-third longer than its width.

Resolved, A present of 2,000 acres of land be made to Col. Daniel Boone, with the thanks of the proprietors for the signal service he has rendered to the company.

Resolved, That the thanks of this company be presented to Col. Richard Callaway, for his spirited and manly behaviour in behalf of said colony; and that a present of 640 acres be made to his youngest son.

Resolved, That James Hogg, Esq., be appointed delegate to represent the said colony in the Continental Congress now sitting at Philadelphia; and that the following memorial be presented by him to that august body:

To the Honorable the Continental Congress now sitting at Philadelphia—The memorial of Richard Henderson, Thomas Hart, John Williams, Nathaniel Hart, John Luttrell, William Johnston, James Hogg, David Hart and Leonard Henly Bullock, proprietors of Transylvania, Sheweth,

That on the seventh day of March last, for a large and valuable consideration, your memorialists obtained from the Cherokee Indians, assembled at Watauga, a grant of a considerable territory, now called Transylvania, lying on the south side of the river Ohio.

They will not trouble the honorable Congress with a detail of the risks and dangers to which they have been exposed, arising from the nature of the enterprise itself, as well as from the wicked attempts of certain governors and their emissaries; they beg leave only to acquaint them, that through difficulties and dangers, at a great expense, and with the blood of several of their followers, they have laid the foundation of a colony, which, however mean in its origin, will, if one may guess from the present appearances, be one day considerable in America.

The memorialists having made this purchase from the aborigines and immemorial possessors, the sole and uncontested owners of the country, in fair and open treaty, and without the violation of any

*Hall quotes the letter in full; p. 373.

British or American law whatever, are determined to give it up only with their lives. And though their country be far removed from the reach of ministerial usurpation, yet they cannot look with indifference on the late arbitrary proceedings of the British Parliament. If the united colonies are reduced, or will tamely submit to be slaves, Transylvania will have reason to fear.

The memorialists by no means forget their allegiance to their sovereign, whose constitutional rights and pre-eminences they will support at the risk of their lives. They flatter themselves that the addition of a new colony, in so fair and equitable a way, and without any expense to the crown, will be acceptable to his most gracious majesty, and that Transylvania will soon be worthy of his royal regard and protection.

At the same time, having their hearts warmed with the same noble spirit that animates the united colonies, and moved with indignation at the late ministerial and parliamentary usurpations, it is the earnest wish of the proprietors of Transylvania to be considered by the colonies as brethren, engaged in the same great cause of liberty and of mankind. And as by reason of several circumstances, needless to be here mentioned, it was impossible for the proprietors to call a convention of the settlers in such time as to have their concurrence laid before this congress, they here pledge themselves for them, that they will concur in the measures now adopted by the proprietors.

From the generous plan of liberty adopted by the congress and that noble love of mankind which appears in all their proceedings, the memorialists please themselves that the united colonies will take the infant colony of Transylvania into their protection; and they, in return, will do everything in their power, and give such assistance in the general cause of America as the congress shall judge to be suitable to their abilities.

Therefore, the memorialists hope and earnestly request, that Transylvania may be added to the number of the united colonies, and that James Hogg, Esq., be received as their delegate, and admitted to a seat in the honorable the Continental Congress.

By order of the proprietors,

[Signed]. RICHARD HENDERSON, President.

The remaining action of the proprietors was unimportant, save that in relation to the disposition of public lands, as follows:

Resolved, That from this time to the first day of June, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, the lands in the said colony shall be sold on the following terms: No survey of land shall contain more than six hundred and forty acres (except in particular cases) and the purchaser shall pay for entry and warrant of survey two dollars; for surveying the same and a plot thereof, four dollars; and for the deed and plot annexed, two dollars. And also shall pay to the said proprietors, their agent, or receiver for the time being, at the time of receiving a deed, two pounds, ten shillings sterling for each hundred acres contained in such deed; also, an annual quit-rent of two shillings, like money, for every hundred acres, commencing in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty. And that any person that settles on the said lands before the first day of June, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, shall have the privileges, on the aforesaid conditions, of taking up for himself any quantity not above six hundred and forty acres; and for each taxable person he may take with him, and settle there, three hundred and twenty acres and no more.

Resolved, That Col. Richard Henderson survey and lay off within the said colony, in such places and in such quantities as he shall think proper, not less than two thousand acres, hereafter to be equally divided amongst the copartners, and that each copartner be permitted, by himself or his deputy, to make choice of, and survey in one or more places, any quantity of vacant land in the aforesaid colony, for his or their particular use; but not above two thousand acres, and that agreeable to the aforesaid rateable proportions, unless on the same terms, and under the same regulations and restrictions, as laid down for other purchasers.

Resolved, That not more than five thousand acres shall be sold to any one person who does not immediately settle on the said lands; and that at three pounds, ten shillings sterling per hundred, and not more than one hundred thousand acres in the whole on these terms.

The action of the proprietors thus recorded was fraught with the most serious consequences to the venture in which they were embarked; and while their decisions were in a large measure actuated by wisdom and worthy motives, the change in the terms of the sale of land proved the bar on which the commercial bark grounded and rendered its total wreck more easy. Col. Williams did not reach the frontier until the early part of December, but he at once set about carrying out the company's instructions, and on January 3, 1776, wrote his principals from Boonesborough, "some account of what I have been after since my arrival at this place." This letter is so much to the point, and presents the situation so much more clearly than any abstract could, that its essential features are here given in the language of the writer.

As the primitive intention of sending me to Transylvania was to establish a land office, appoint the necessary officers to the said office, surveyor, etc., upon the best footing in my power, and to make sale of the lands within the said colony, upon such terms as might be most advantageous to the proprietors and satisfactory to the inhabitants thereof; my first step was to fall upon some method of appointing a person to the office of surveyor, who should give general satisfaction to the people. I thought none more likely to do so than calling a convention and taking their recommendation for the person whom I would appoint. From the dispersed situation of the people, and the extreme badness of the weather, we failed in convening a majority; however, I took the sense of those who appeared, and who unanimously recommended Col. John Floyd, a gentleman generally esteemed, and I am persuaded truly worthy, and him I have commissioned surveyor of the colony at present, though perhaps it may be advisable, at a future day, to divide the colony into two districts and to appoint another surveyor to one of the districts.

The entering office I have disposed to Mr. Nathaniel Henderson, and the secretary's to Mr. Richard Harrison; though, upon consideration, I have thought that the numerous incidental expenses were so great that some way ought to be fallen upon to defray them without breaking in upon the monies arising from the sale of the lands, and that the $2 for entering, etc., and the other two for filling up the deeds, counterparts, annexing seals and plots, etc., was more money than the services of these officers absolutely required; I, therefore, have reserved out of each office, $1, to answer the purpose of defraying those extraordinary expenses, and the office is left well worth the acceptance of persons capable of filling them with credit.

The number of entries on our book is now upward of 900, a great part of which was made before I came to this place, when people could make entries without money, and without price; the country abounded with landmongers; since there is $2.00 exacted on the entry made, people are not so keen, though I make no doubt but all who can comply with the terms will endeavor to save their lands, and as many people who have got entry on the book are now out of the country, and cannot possibly pay up the entry money immediately, I have thought proper to advertise, that every person who had made entry on the book, and paid no money, that they come in and pay up the entrance money by the first of April, and take out their warrants of survey, or their several entries will, after that time, be considered as vacated, and liable to be entered by any person whatever.

The surveyors have now begun to survey, and some few people have been desirous of getting out their deeds immediately; but they generally complain of a great scarcity of money; and doubt their being able to take their deeds before next June, or even before next fall; though, in a general way, people seem to be well reconciled to the terms, and desirous to take upon them, except some few, whom I have been obliged to tamper with, and a small party about Harrodsburg, who it seems have been entering into a confederacy not to hold lands on any other terms than those of the first year. As this party is composed of people in general of small consequence, and I have taken some steps to remove some of their principal objections, I make no doubt but to do all that way; and for that purpose have formed a design for removing myself, with the office, to Harrodsburg, some time in February next, unless I should find from a trip I propose immediately taking there, that I cannot do it with safety. The principal man, I am told, at the head of this confederacy is one Hite, and him I make no doubt but to convince he is in an error.

Among other things one of the great complaints was, that the proprietors and a few gentlemen had engrossed all the land at or near the Falls of the Ohio, which circumstance I found roused the attention of a number of people of note; I therefore found myself under the necessity of putting a stop to all clamors of that kind, by declaring that I would grant no large bodies of land to any person whatever, which lay contiguous to the Falls; which I have done in a solemn manner. This, I am far from thinking will be injurious to the proprietors, but quite the reverse; and circumstances which will render more general satisfaction, and be of as much utility to the Colony, as any step heretofore taken.

You will observe that I am going on to justify the measure, before I inform you what it is. But to be brief, it is this; the Falls, it is certain, is a place, which from its situation, must be the most considerable mart in this part of the world; the lands around are generally rich and fertile, and most agreeably situated; which had occasioned many people to fix their affections on that place. Many applications have been made for large grants, at and about that place, and refused. Since which 20,000 acres, and upwards, have been entered there for the company; 40,000 or 50,000 more in large tracts by a few other gentlemen; a partiality was complained of; a general murmuring ensued.

Upon considering the matter I thought it unjust; I thought it a disadvantage to the partners in general; and that some step ought to be taken to pacify the minds of the people. I therefore entered into a resolution that I would grant to no one man living, within a certain distance of the Falls, more than 1,000 acres of land, and that it be settled and improved in a certain space of time, under the penalty of forfeiture; that every person who had entered more than 1,000 acres might retain his 1,000 out of which spot he pleased; that the several officers, who have claims there may each, on application and complying with our terms, be entitled to 1,000 within his survey. That a town be immediately laid out and a lot reserved to each proprietor and then the first settlers to take the lots they may choose, enter and improve; which improvement must be done in a certain limited time, or the lot forfeited, and again to be sold, etc. These proposals seem to have given general satisfaction, and every one who had entered large quantities, within these limits, gives it up with the greatest alacrity; and I am in hopes it will meet the general approbation of the company; if so, I shall be happy; if not, I shall be very sorry, though the necessity must justify the measure.

The Falls of the Ohio is a place of all others within the colony which will admit of a town, which, from its particular situation, will immediately become populous and flourishing; the land contiguous thereto rich and fertile, and where a great number of gentlemen will most certainly settle, and be the support and protection of a town at that place; a place which should meet with every encouragement, to settle and strengthen, inasmuch as it will most certainly be the terror of our savage enemies, the Kickepoos Indians, who border more nearly on that place than any other part of the colony; and as I think it absolutely necessary that the aforesaid proposed town, at the falls, to be laid off the ensuing spring, if I find it practicable to raise a party about the 1st of March and go down and lay out a town and stake it off; though this will, in a great measure, depend upon the future tranquillity of our situation, between this and then, for I assure you the little attack made upon us by the Indians the 23d of last month, has made many people who are ashamed to confess themselves afraid, find out that their affairs on your side of the mountains will not dispense with their staying here any longer at present; and I am well convinced once they get there, that every alarm, instead of precipitating, will procrastinate their return.

The sanguine expectations of Col. Williams in regard to the dissatisfaction of the settlers were not entirely realized. The "small party at Harrodsburg" was not to be so easily placated; the "Confederacy" seems to have been based upon something more than a determination "not to hold lands on any other than those of the first year," though this was the burden of the complaint. There was evidently an element of envy in the movement which manifested itself in an ill-tempered insinuation in regard not only to the character of the proprietors, but also to the character of the eminent men who composed the Boonesborough convention. A petition to the Virginia convention originated among these malcontents, though inasmuch as the date is not found in the document, the period* of its origin can only be determined by internal and collateral evidence.

In this paper the petitioners represent that they were attracted to Kentucky "by the advantageous reports of their friends who first explored it;" that they have been greatly alarmed by the conduct of the proprietors, "in advancing the price of the purchase money from 20s. to 50s. sterling, per 100 acres, and at the same time have increased the fees of entry and surveying to a most exorbitant rate, and, by the short period prefixed for taking up the lands even on those extravagant terms, they plainly evince their intention of rising in their demands as the settlers increase, or their insatiable avarice shall dictate;" that they "have been more justly alarmed at such unaccountable and arbitrary proceedings, as they have lately learned" of the general purchase at Fort Stanwix, and have "the greatest reason to presume that his majesty * * * will vindicate his title;" that they would have cheerfully paid the consideration at first stipulated by the company, whenever this grant had been properly authenticated; and therefore "humbly expect and implore to be taken under the protection of the honorable convention of the colony of Virginia, of which we cannot help thinking ourselves still a part, and request your kind interposition in our behalf, that we may not suffer under the rigorous demands and impositions of the gentlemen stiling themselves proprietors, who, the better to effect their oppressive designs, have given them the color of a law, enacted by a score of men, artfully picked from the few adventurers who went to see the country last summer, overawed by the presence of Mr. Henderson."

It may seriously be doubted whether this petition originated in Kentucky, but be that as it may, it is certain that of the eighty-four names appended as signers, but one representative name—that of James Harrod, a member of the Boonesborough convention—appears, and that is greatly invalidated by the self-stultification involved in the last sentence quoted. Not one of the signers, with the exception noted, ever became otherwise conspicuous in Virginia or Kentucky, while of those against whom the envious shaft was aimed, scarcely one has failed to secure an honored place on some of the brightest pages of the history of that time.

*Butler and Hall state that it originated in the Harrodsburg convention, June 6, 1776.

The attempt to found the colony of Transylvania gave rise to a sharp conflict of interests; the increased cost of land, which, though it only raised the price to about 14 cents per acre, including all charges, was, in the scale of values at that time, an oppressive price, and the change was without doubt unwisely made, but the history of the whole enterprise reveals no avaricious tendency on the part of the company. The proprietors had made a large outlay in the original purchase; the expense of locating and maintaining the first settlement was considerable, and the first sales of lands did little more than cover the expense of doing the business. And yet, the company exhibited no parsimony in dealing with settlers. They hired between 200 and 300 men in founding the settlement, and it is said, upon the authority of the deposition of Benjamin Logan, that Henderson offered a gratuity of 640 acres to such as would raise a crop of corn the first year.

"In justice to this great company," says Butler, "it must be observed that it furnished, although for sale, all the supplies of gunpowder and lead with which the inhabitants defended themselves and their families. Indeed the books of Henderson & Company exhibit accounts for these articles with all the inhabitants of the country, in the years 1775–76; while they are credited with various items, as cutting the road to Cantuckey, hunting and ranging. * * * These accounts remained unclosed upon the books in every instance, shewing a condition of no little indebtedness for the colonists of Transylvania to the great proprietors." Yet when the ruling wage per day was about 33 cents, Col. Williams states in a letter to the company that materials for the manufacture of powder stored in Powell Valley could not be brought forward, because colonists demanded $1 a day for their services. Had the colony received the political recognition the proprietors sought, the mutual interests of proprietors and colonists would have led to an equitable arrangement of land difficulties, as the influences for a liberal government were numerous and influential: but this was not to be. The projected colony had fallen upon Revolutionary times; old things were passing away and newer modes were being ushered in.

The mission of James Hogg was productive of no positive results. Soon after the meeting at Oxford, he set out for Philadelphia and reached his destination on the 22d of October. On the 2d of December he returned, and some time in January, 1776, wrote a letter, probably to Henderson,* giving "an account of my embassy, which you will please to communicate to the other gentlemen, our copartners, when you have opportunity." This account is so attractive in its original form that it is here given entire—with the exception of certain non-essential paragraphs—as the fullest and most accurate information to be secured upon the subject. The journey was partly made in company with "Messrs. Hooper and Hewes," who were valued and influential friends of the Transylvania Colony, and who rendered important services in aid of its representative as indicated in the letter.

It was October 22 when we arrived at Philadelphia. In a few days they introduced me to several of the congress gentlemen, among the first of whom were, accidentally, the famous Samuel and John Adams; and as I found their opinion friendly to our new colony, I shewed them our map, explained to them the advantage of our situation, etc. They entered seriously into the matter, and seemed to think favorably of the whole, but the difficulty that occurred to us soon appeared to them. "We have petitioned and addressed the king," said they, "and have entreated him to point out some mode of accommodation. There seems to be an impropriety in embarrassing our reconciliation with anything new, and the taking under our protection a body of people who have acted in defiance of the king's proclamation will be looked on as a confirmation of that independent spirit with which we are daily reproached." I then showed them our memorial, to convince them that we did not intend to throw off our allegiance to the king, but intended to acknowledge his sovereignty whenever he should think us worthy of his regard. They were pleased with our memorial, and thought it very proper, but another difficulty occurred; by looking on the map they observed that we were within the Virginia charter. I then told them of the fixing their boundaries, what had passed at Richmond in March last, and that I had reason to believe the Virginians would not oppose us; however, they advised me to sound the Virginians, as they would not choose to do anything in it without their consent.

*The address of this letter, its exact date, and the name of the place where it was written are not recorded, and are probably lost. The body of the communication is preserved entire, which, with the other papers quoted in this review of the Transylvania Colony, are to be found complete in the appendix to Mr. Hall's work, edition of 1857.

All the delegates were, at that time, so much engaged in the congress, from morning to night, that it was some days before I got introduced to the Virginians, and before then I was informed that some of them had said, whatever was their own opinion of the matter, they would not consent that Transylvania should be admitted as a colony, and represented in congress, until it originated in their conventions, and should be approved by their constituents. Some days after this I was told that Messrs. Jefferson, Wythe and Richard Henry Lee were desirous of meeting with me, which was accordingly brought about, but unfortunately Mr. Lee was, by some business, prevented from being with us, though I had some conversation with him afterward. I told them that the Transylvania Company, suspecting that they might be misrepresented, had sent me to make known to the gentlemen of the congress our friendly intentions toward the cause of liberty, etc., but said nothing of our memorial, or of my pretensions to a seat in congress. They said nothing in return to me, but seriously examined our map, and asked many questions. They observed that our purchase was within their charter, and gently hinted that, by virtue of it, they might claim the whole. This led me to take notice that a few years ago,* as I had been informed, their assembly had petitioned the crown for leave to purchase from the Cherokees, and to fix their boundaries with them, which was accordingly done by a line running from six miles east of the long island in Holston to the mouth of the Great Khanaway, for which they had actually paid £2,500 to the Cherokees, by which purchase both the crown and the assembly had acknowledged the property of those lands to be in the Cherokees. Besides, said I, our settlement of Transylvania will be a great service to the Virginians.

They seemed to waive the argument concerning the right of property; but Mr. Jefferson acknowledged that, in his opinion, our colony could be no loss to the Virginians, if properly united to them, and said, that if his advice was followed, all the use they should make of their charter would be to prevent any arbitrary or oppressive government to be established within the boundaries of it, and that it was his wish to see a free government established at the back of theirs, properly united with them, and that it should extend westward to the Mississippi, and on each side of the Ohio to their charter line. But he would not consent that we should be acknowledged by the congress until it had the approbation of their constituents in convention, which he thought might be obtained, and that for that purpose we should send one of our company to the next convention. Against this proposal several objections occurred to me, but I made none.

This was the substance of our conference, with which I acquainted our good friends, Messrs. Hooper & Hewes, who joined me in the opinion that I should not push the matter further. * * * I was frequently with parties of the delegates, who in general think favorably of our enterprise. All the wise ones of them, with whom I conversed on the subject, are clear in opinion that the property of the lands are vested in us by the Indian grant; but some of them think that by the common law of England and by common usage in America, the sovereignty is in the king, agreeably to a famous law opinion, of which I was so fortunate as to procure a copy. The suffering traders and others, at the end of last year, obtained a large tract of land from the Six Nations and other Indians.* They formed themselves into a company and petitioned the king for a patent, and deserved to be erected into a government. His majesty laid their petition before Lord Chancellor Camden, and Mr. Charles York, then attorney-general, and afterward chancellor. Their opinion follows: "In respect to such places as have been or shall be required by treaty or grant from any of the Indian princes or governments, your majesty's letters-patent are not necessary. The property of the soil resting in the grantee by the Indian grants, subject only to your majesty's right of sovereignty over the settlements, as English settlements, and over the inhabitants as English subjects, who carry with them your majesty's laws wherever they form colonies, and receive your majesty's protection by virtue of your royal charters." After an opinion so favorable for them it is amazing that this company never attempted to form a settlement, unless they could have procured a charter, with the hopes of which, it seems, they were flattered, from time to time. However, our example has aroused them, I am told, and they are now setting up for our rivals. * * * * * *

I was several times with Mr. Deane, of Connecticut, the gentleman of whom Mr. Hooper told you when here. He says he will send some people to see our country; and if their report be favorable, he thinks many Connecticut people will join us. This gentleman is a scholar, and a man of sense and enterprise, and rich; and I am apt to believe has some thoughts of leading a party of Connecticut adventurers, providing things can be made agreeable to him. He is reckoned a good man and much esteemed in congress; but he is an enthusiast in liberty, and will have nothing to do with us unless he is pleased with our form of government. * * * You would be amazed to see how much in earnest these speculative gentlemen are about the plan to be adopted by the Transylvanians. Ther entreat, they pray that we make it a free government, and beg that no mercenary or ambitious views in the proprietors may prevent it. Quit-rents, they say, are a mark of vassalage, and hope they shall not be established in Transylvania. They even threaten us with their opposition if we do not act on liberal principles, when we have it so much in our power to render ourselves immortal. Many of them advise a law against negroes. Inclosed, I send you a copy of a sketch by J. Adams, which I had from Richard Henry Lee.

*1770; treaty at Lochaber, S. C.

Ante*, page 79, and Appendix A, Note 8

The situation was undoubtedly promising for the final political and material success of the colony, but public affairs were so complicated by the disturbed relations of the older colonies with the mother country, that it was manifestly impolitic, if not impossible, to urge matters further, and recognition was therefore necessarily held in abeyance. Such a necessity, however, proved fatal to the ambitions of the proprietors; the frontier settlements could not suspend existence until the political heavens cleared; the uncertainties and ravages of a desperate war were not calculated to encourage the enterprise of "speculative gentlemen;" and the "small party about Harrodsburg" were not slow to perceive the advantage which these circumstances placed in their lands.

The return of George Rogers Clark to Kentucky in 1776, after a short visit to Virginia, has been noted;* he had no special interest to serve, save to "lend a helping hand," and was not long in discovering the necessities of the situation. The disaffection at Harrodsburg had increased in the meanwhile; Virginia convention in the early part of 1776, while not prejudicing the question of recognizing the new colony, had encouraged the settlement of Kentucky; and the portentous shadows of the coming tempest of war were already darkening the frontier. The measures to be adopted in such a case were apparent to him; and it was largely due to his influence and direction that a convention was held at Harrodsburg June 6, to seek the protection and aid of Virginia. Though not present at its deliberations, he and Gabriel John Jones were chosen members of the Virginia assembly, and forthwith proceeded on their mission. The energetic action of Clark resulted in the recognition of the settlers as citizens of Virginia, and in the fall the county of Kentucky was erected.

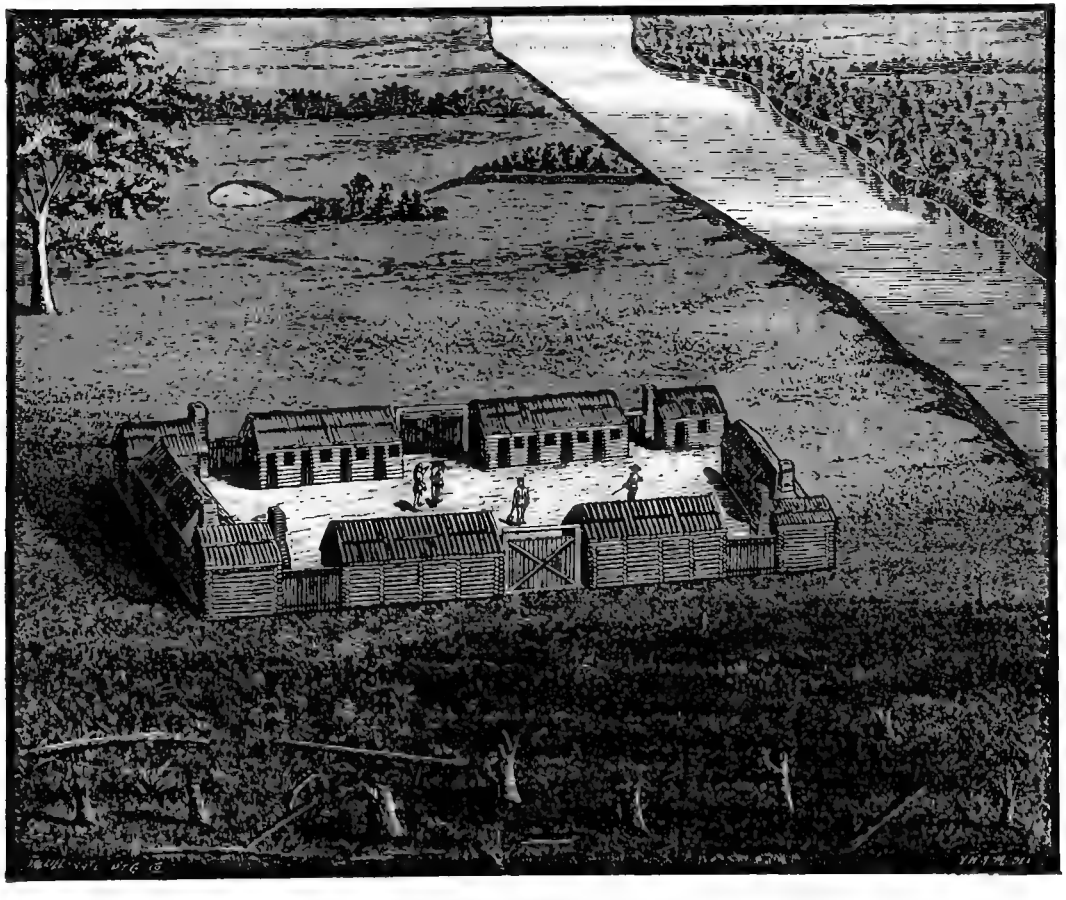
This action on the part of Virginia, while not conclusive, was an important indication of the growing opinion which prevailed in that colony. Whatever the rights of the proprietors of Transylvania were under the royal regime, they underwent a serious change when Virginia set up her pretensions to independence. The erection of Kentucky County was opposed by Henderson and his friends with every available argument, but when effected the proprietors gave up the unequal contest. They still urged their claim to the property purchased, but this also was denied, and final action was taken by the house of delegates on November 4, 1778, as follows:

Resolved, That all purchases of land, made or to be made, of the Indians within the chartered bounds of this commonwealth as described by the constitution or form of government, by any private persons not authorized by public authority, are void.

Resolved, That the purchase heretofore made by Richard Henderson & Co., of the tract of land called Transylvania, within this commonwealth, of the Cherokee Indians, is void. But as the said Richard Henderson & Co. have been at very great expense in making the said purchase, and in settling the said lands, by which this commonwealth is likely to receive great advantage, by increasing its inhabitants and establishing a barrier against the Indians, it is just and reasonable to allow said Richard Henderson & Co. a compensation for their trouble and expense.

In this action the senate concurred on the 17th. Some fruitless effort was expended by the proprietors to secure a reversal of this act so far as it declared their purchase void, but reluctantly becoming con-

Ante*, page 83. In reference to Clark's second visit to Kentucky, Butler notes the following incident, narrated by Gen. Ray: "I had come down," said the General, "to where I now live" (about four miles north of Harrodsburg), "to turn some horses out to range; I had killed a small blue-wing duck, that was feeding in my spring, and had roasted it nicely, on the brow of the hill, about twenty steps east of my house. After taking it off to cool, I was much surprised on being suddenly accosted by a fine, soldierly looking man, who exclaimed, 'How do you do, my little fellow? What is your name? A'nt you afraid of being in the woods by yourself?' On satisfying his inquiries, I invited the traveler to partake of my duck, which he did without leaving me a bone to pick his appetite was so keen; though he should have been welcome to all the game I could have killed when I afterwards became acquainted with his noble and gallant soul." In return Ray inquired of the stranger his name and business in that remote region; to which he replied, "My name is Clark, and I have come out to see what you brave fellows are doing in Kentucky, and to lend a helping hand if necessary." Ray, then a boy of sixteen, conducted Clark to Harrodsburg, where he soon identified himself with the interests of the frontier settlements.



vinced of the futility of their efforts, they acquiesced in the decision of the assembly, and applied for the compensation to which the act adjudged them reasonably entitled. The assembly accordingly granted some 200,000 acres, lying on the Ohio, and extending twelve miles and a half up both sides of the Green River, "in full compensation to the said Richard Henderson & Co. and their heirs," etc. Thus ended the Transylvania colony.

But this contest, which decided the fate of a State, scarcely made a ripple on the surface of frontier life, and save the dissatisfaction which culminated in the convention at Harrodsburg, no note of it is found in the annals of the border. Its result, however, may be traced in the history of the Kentucky settlements. An unrecognized rivalry existed between the two leading towns from the first, and probably had much to do with the antagonism to the proprietors' project developed at Harrodsburg. It was evident that if the Transylvania colony was recognized, Boonesborough would become the chief place on the frontier; immigration would naturally be directed to it, and the value of the property in its vicinity be enhanced. Such, for a time, was the result. But the success of the Harrodsburg petitioners wrought a marked change; the latter town became the center of frontier influence, and some of the families earliest to settle in Boonesborough removed, in the fall of 1776, to Harrodsburg, which became the seat of justice for the county of Kentucky. Yet, notwithstanding this loss of prestige and numbers, Boonesborough continued, throughout the unsettled period of Indian hostilities, of the first importance in the history of the border.

The opening days of 1776 found the advance line of civilization in the Ohio Valley, held by the settlements of Hinkston, near Lars Station in Harrison County, of McClellan at Georgetown, of Logan in Lincoln, at Boiling Springs and Harrodsburg in Mercer, and Boonesborough in Madison County. During the preceding summer and fall the settlements had not been seriously disturbed by Indian depredations. Indeed, such was the security felt by the people, that Henderson wrote to the company under the date of June 12th, 1775: "It will no doubt be a surprise to you, but it is nevertheless true, that we are in no posture of defense or security at this time; and for my own part, do not much expect it will ever be effected, unless the Indians should do us the favor of annoying us, and regularly scalping a man every week until it is performed." It does not appear that the Indians were so accommodating as to make any attack at all until the 23d of December, when, it would seem by the following letter of Col. Williams, its salutary influence was entirely explained away. "The blockhouse"—"Fort Boone"—was destined to remain, for some months longer, their only dependence.

On Saturday, about noon, being the 23d, Col. Campbell, with a couple of lads (Sanders and M'Quinney) went across the river. On the opposite bank they parted. Campbell went up the river about 200 yards, and took up a bottom. The two lads, without a gun, went straightway up the hill. About ten minutes after they parted, a gun and cry of distress was heard, and the alarm given that the Indians had shot Col. Campbell. We made to his assistance. He came running to the landing with one shoe off, and said he was fired on by a couple of Indians. A party of men was immediately dispatched, under the command of Col. Boone, who went out, but could make no other discovery than two moccasin tracks, whether Indians or not could not be determined. We had at that time, over the river hunting, etc., ten or a dozen men, in different parties, part or all of whom we expected to be killed, if what Col. Campbell said was true, but that by many was doubted. Night came on, several of the hunters had returned, but had neither seen nor heard of Indians, nor yet of the two lads. We continued in this state of suspense till Wednesday, when a party of men sent out to search for them found M'Quinney, killed and scalped, in a cornfield, at about three miles distant from the town, on the north side of the river. Sanders could not be found, nor has he yet been heard of. On Thursday a ranging party of fifteen men, under the command of Jesse Benton, was dispatched to scour the woods twenty or thirty miles round, and see if any further discovery could be made. To these men we gave 2 shillings per day, and £5 for every scalp they should produce. After they went out our hunters returned, one at a time, till they all came in safe, Sanders excepted, who no doubt has shared M'Quinney's fate.

On Sunday, the 31st day of the month, our rangers returned, without doing any more than convincing themselves that the Indians had immediately, on doing the murder, ran off northward, as they discovered their tracks thirty or forty miles toward the Ohio, making that way.

BOONESBOROUGH FORT.

On the above massacre being committed we began to doubt that there was a body of Indians about, who intended committing outrage on our inhabitants. However, we are perfectly satisfied since that their number was only six or seven men, who set off from the Shawnee town before the treaty at Fort Pitt,* with an intent, as they termed it, to take a look at the white people on Kentucky, and King Cornstalk, at the treaty, informed the commissioners of this, and said, for the conduct of these men, before they returned, he could not be responsible, for that he did not know but that they might do some mischief, and that if any of them should get killed by the whites he should take no notice at all of it. For this we have undoubted authority, and don't at present think ourselves in any greater danger here than if the above massacre had not been committed.

Another circumstance is that our ammunition grows scant. I don't think there is enough to supply this place till the last of March, supposing we should have no occasion of any to repulse an enemy; if we should, God only knows how long it will last. If any powder can possibly be procured, it would certainly be advisable to do it, if not, some person who can manufacture the materials we have on the way for the purpose of making powder. Most part of those are at the block-house, or at least within two or three miles of that, the rest in Powell's Valley.

One would reasonably suppose that the pioneers would find in the occurrence above related, a sufficient incentive to begin this work, but it was not until the latter part of July, 1776, that a commodious inclosure for defense was built on the plan drawn by Mr. Henderson in the preceding April.† Harrodsburg was similarly provided about the same time, but Logan's, McClellan's, and Hinkston's settlements were not so defended; the first two were subsequently fortified, and the other for a time was abandoned to be repossessed later, and fortified as Ruddle's Station.

*October, 1775; with congressional commissioners.

†See diary; entry of April 21. The larger fort at Boonesborough was a typical frontier defense; and as the plan of it has been preserved with a very good description of its surroundings, the engraving in the text may be considered fairly accurate. The plan, found in Henderson's writing, is copied from the engraving in Hall's work (p. 164) and may be seen in Appendix; note 9. The date commonly assigned for the completion of this fort, June 14, 1775, is erroneous. This date, derived from Filson's History, refers to the completion of the "small fort," mentioned by Henderson as "only wanting two or three days' work to make it tolerable safe," but which, on June 12, "remains unfinished." In his letter of July 21, 1776, Col. Floyd writes: "We are about finishing a large fort, and intend to keep possession of this place as long as possible."

The continued quiet which prevailed on the frontier reassured those who had fled from Kentucky on account of the Indian depredations committed in the spring of 1775, and early in the next spring these timid adventurers returned, bringing with them large numbers of others, who were eager to share in the bounty offered by the Virginia assembly. They naturally sought the scenes of their former explorations, and the valley of the Kentucky was once more alive with the busy activity of improvers. Many did not go further than the region first entered, and the territory now within the limits of Mason County was fairly thronged with these adventurers, the names of some sixty different persons being preserved. In the country now comprised in the counties of Scott, Harrison, Bourbon, Mercer, Madison and about Logan's fort in Lincoln, the number was scarcely less in proportion. In all, the number of new arrivals reached upward of 200, but the permanent increase of the settlements was very small. About April, Capt. John Haggin brought his family—the first to find a home north of Georgetown—and settled on Paddy's Run in Harrison County. In this season, also, Logan moved the members of his family to St. Asaph's, but realizing the insecurity of his station, he subsequently placed them in Harrodsburg. A few families settled at the mouth of the Kentucky, and others on Drennon's Creek, and these, with possible additions at Boonesborough and Harrodsburg, were the chief part of the permanent accessions to society on the frontier.

With the exception of the murder near Boonesborough in December, the Indians committed no depredations upon the Kentucky settlements from April 4, 1775, until April of the succeeding year. The savages had not abandoned their favorite hunting-grounds, however; their attention had only been temporarily diverted. At the close of the abortive congress with the commissioners at Pittsburgh, the warlike party of the Shawanese had withdrawn from the peaceably disposed portion of the tribe, and retiring toward what is now the northwestern part of the State of Ohio, sent their chief men to concert measures with the British agents at Oswego. The war for independence had not yet begun, but it was felt in the older portions of the country to be inevitable, though such apprehensions had not yet become generally accepted in Kentucky, a delusion that was strengthened by the peace which ruled on the border. The English agents were not so short-sighted; they expected war to ensue, and while no campaign was decided upon with the Indians, they were instructed to hold themselves in readiness to join the British in their contemplated attacks upon the American settlements in the spring of 1776, and in April, the long truce was broken by the murder of Willis Lee at his station, called Lee's Town, the name of which has been perpetuated. From that period to the end of the year the settlements were kept in a constant state of alarm by the numerous bands of Indians, who "came to take a look at the people on the Kentucky." A letter of Colonel Floyd, which is elsewhere* quoted in full, gives a graphic picture of the experiences in Kentucky at that time: "The Indians seem determined to break up our settlement. * * * * They have, I am satisfied, killed several whom, at this time, I know not how to mention. Many are missing, who some time ago went out about their business, of whom we hear nothing. Fresh sign of Indians is seen every day. * * * * On the seventh of this month (July) they killed one Cooper on Licking Creek, and on the fourteenth, a man whose name I know not, at your salt spring on the same creek. * * * We are about finishing a large fort, and intend to keep possession of this place as long as possible. They are, I understand, doing the same thing at Harrodsburg, and also on Elkhorn, at the Royal Spring."

This renewal of savage hostilities had the usual effect of clearing the country of the timid, and most of those who had no permanent interest planted here. The bolder people at once busied themselves in building defenses. Hinkston's settlement, exposed by its location so far northward and its want of a stockade, was abandoned in July, and its leader, with eighteen followers, retired to Boonesborough, where, deaf to all persuasion, they excited a number of others with their fears, and the whole company departed for the older settlements, leaving less than thirty persons to defend the "large fort" just completed. A few less timid members of the Hinkston settlement, with several families from the mouth of the Kentucky and Drennon's Creek, united with the settlers at the Royal Spring (site of Georgetown) in building a stout stockade, which became known as McClellan's Fort—the first* of its kind north of the Kentucky River.

The general state of insecurity was further emphasized on July 14 by an act which showed the ubiquity and cruel adroitness of the savage foe. This was the capture of Elizabeth and Fanny Callaway and Jemima Boone from a canoe in sight of the fort at Boonesborough. The girls, the first aged sixteen years and the others fourteen, made such defense as they could, screamed and struggled, the eldest striking one of the assailants upon the head, gashing it to the bone, with a paddle—but in vain. They were carried off, but not without giving the alarm. Cols. Boone and Callaway were absent at the time, but soon returned and organized a rescuing party, which forthwith set out. Callaway, at the head of several on horseback, proceeded rapidly forward to cut off the retreat of the savages across the Ohio, whilst Boone, accompanied by Samuel Henderson, Capt. John Holder, Flanders Callaway and four others, followed the trail on foot. The girls took every possible precaution to leave evidences of their course for the guidance of the party which they were assured would follow for their rescue. The girls were captured late on Sunday afternoon, and early on Tuesday morning they were rescued, the pursuers making a sudden attack upon the Indian camp while the savages were preparing their breakfast. There were five of the savages, only one of whom got back to tell the story, the others dying from wounds or famine.*

Ante, p. 82.

*This pre-eminence may be disputed in favor of McGee's Station, built three miles north of Boonesboro, about the same time. It is not possible to determine between these rival claims; there is less than a month's interval between the dates of their construction.

Other depredations followed to keep alive the general alarm, and in all this danger the settlers found themselves principally dependent, for ammunition and many other things, upon the older settlements, from which they were separated by hundreds of miles of almost impassable forests, in the shadows of which lurked a numerous and desperate foe. In June, Clark and Jones had gone to Virginia on the double mission of procuring powder and securing recognition of the settlements as part of that colony; but early in October, before Clark's supply came to hand, the ammunition getting low at McClellan's Fort, Robert Patterson—subsequently one of the founders of Lexington, Ky., and Cincinnati and Dayton, Ohio—with six other men from the fort, started to Pittsburgh to procure the required powder and other necessaries. On their way the party spent several days at the Blue Lick, curing buffalo meat and making other preparations for their journey. Proceeding thence to the present vicinity of Maysville, they secured a canoe and went up the Ohio River. Until they reached the mouth of the Kanawha, they observed no particular caution in their movements, but from this point forward, realizing they were in a dangerous region, they traveled from day-break till dark, and at night, cautiously landing, slept without a fire.

Late in the evening of the 12th of October they landed a few miles below the mouth of Hockhocking, in the present State of Ohio, and contrary to their usual practice made a fire, having become less cautious in consequence of their near approach to the settlements. They laid upon their arms around the fire, and in the night were attacked by a party of eleven Indians, who gave them a volley, and then fell upon them with their tomáhawks. Col. Patterson received two balls in his right arm, by which it was broken, and a tomahawk was struck into his side, between two of his ribs, penetrating into the cavity of the body. He sprang out into the darkness, and got clear, supposing all of his companions were killed. He made for the river in hopes of getting into the canoe and floating down to Point Pleasant, but as he approached it he discovered that there was an Indian in it. In a short time the whole party of Indians went on board, and floated down the river. Col. Patterson then made an attempt to get to the fire, in which he succeeded. He found a companion, named Templeton, wounded in a manner very similar to his own case; another, named Wernock, wounded dangerously, and another, named Perry, slightly. Of the other three one was killed, one was missing, and the other, named Mitchell, was unhurt. They had saved one gun and some ammunition. They remained on the ground until morning, when they attempted to proceed up the river on foot, but Wernock was unable to move, and they were forced to leave him. They found themselves unable to proceed farther than a quarter of a mile from the camp, and it was then agreed that Perry should endeavor to reach Grave Creek, and bring them aid, while Mitchell was to remain and take care of the others. Wernock, who was left behind, died in the evening, and Mitchell, who had gone back to assist him, lost his way in returning to Patterson and Templeton, and did not find them until the next morning. They then moved a couple of hundred yards from the river, and the next day got under a cliff, which sheltered them from the rain, where they remained until Perry returned from Grave Creek with assistance. They were removed to that place after lying eight days in their suffering condition. Patterson laid twelve months under the surgeon's care.*

This incident is but one of the many that serve to illustrate the watchful scrutiny of the savages, and the terrible exactions which the settlement of Kentucky made upon the

*This account is supplementary to that given in Floyd's letter referred to above. A touch of romance is given to the painful affair by the fact that those named of Boone's party were the recognized lovers of the girls, in the order named. Two of the number—Samuel Henderson, youngest brother of Col. Henderson, and Elizabeth Callaway—were the principals in the first marriage celebrated in Kentucky. The ceremony was performed by Squire Boone, at Boonesboro, August 7, 1776. Their first child, Fanny, born May 29, 1777, was the first white child of parents married in Kentucky, and the fifth white child born in the State The others were subsequently married. See Collins, Vol. II, p. 521.

*American Pioneer, Vol. II, pp. 344-5.

hardy pioneers who braved the dangers of the border in this heroic period. The character of Indian operations was well calculated to inflict the greatest distress upon the scattered stations. These forest fortresses were cut off from the support of the older communities by long and greatly exposed routes of travel; their defenders were harassed in their attempts to raise the crops necessary for their existence, and all attempts to secure powder, or other supplies, were closely watched, and, so far as possible, cruelly defeated. Such a plan, if successfully carried out, must have inevitably forced the little garrisons to retreat from their bold positions, or fall an easy prey to the overwhelming force which might be brought against them when thus brought to the last extremity. Kentucky was thus practically in a state of siege, though at long range, and without the regularity of details which a well-conducted investment would have afforded.

It was under such circumstances that Clark and Jones reached Pittsburgh in December, 1776, to secure the transportation of the 500 pounds of powder, granted by Virginia, "for the use of the inhabitants of Kentucke," to its destination. The watchfulness of the Indians, and their hostile intentions were well known, and their spies were to be seen lurking about the very settlement. But the case was urgent, and Clark was not one to calculate dangers if success seemed possible. Accordingly the precious consignment was embarked, and the delegates, with seven boatmen, launched out upon the river, pursuing their course in safety to the Three Islands (within the present county of Lewis). Here they secreted the powder, and after setting their boat adrift that it might not attract the attention of the Indians, the whole party began their march for Harrodsburg, by way of McClellan's Fort. On reaching the latter place they learned that Col. John Todd was in the vicinity, and would soon come in. Clark determined, therefore, to leave his colleague with five of the boatmen to await Todd's arrival, while he pushed on to Harrodsburg to report the result of his mission. A few days later Todd came, and on December 25, at the head of nine mounted men, piloted by Jones, set out in quest of the powder. On reaching a point near the Lower Blue Lick, the party was fiercely assailed by a band of forty or fifty savages, who were following the recent trail of the powder escort. Jones and another of the whites were instantly killed, two others were captured, and the rest put in rapid flight for the fort. Four days later the Indians, who were under the command of a noted Mingo chief called Pluggy, boldly assailed McClellan's Station, in which there were only twenty defenders. The attack was fiercely maintained for several hours, when the death of the chief put a sudden end to the fight, and caused his followers to retreat to their towns. Of the settlers two were mortally wounded, and two others less seriously hurt. The alarm inspired by this event effected the purpose of the savages much better than the direct assault; the fort was at once abandoned, its occupants retiring to Harrodsburg.

Thus, at the beginning of 1777, but two fortified posts remained, and in these were gathered all the settlers in Kentucky. Logan still continued to cultivate his improvement at St. Asaph's only assisted by his slaves, his family finding shelter in Harrodsburg. Early in this year, having been joined by several others, he determined to fortify his station, and soon afterward was joined by his own and other families. Thenceforward Logan's was one of the prominent strongholds on this frontier. Early in January, a force from Harrodsburg had safely brought the powder from Three Islands; a militia organization had been effected,* in which Clark probably held commission as major; and thus equipped the pioneers prepared to rely upon their own resources and fight it out. These crude defenses seem but a slight barrier to withstand the shock of war which dashed its angry waves against their frail strength, but they were held by determined men and women, who bravely kept the murderous hordes of savages at bay.

*A battalion had been formed of the inhabitants north of the Kentucky River in 1775. On the 5th of March, 1776, a reorganization was effected, which included all the settlers.

Although the fell bargain between tyranny and barbarism had not yet been consummated, the Indians this year appeared in Kentucky in greater numbers, and displayed greater activity than ever before. An extract from the diary of George Rogers Clark briefly tells the story:

March 6th,—Thomas Shores and William Ray killed at the Shawanese Spring. March 7th,—The Indians attempted to cut off from the fort (Harrodsburg) a small party of our men; a skirmish ensued. We had four men wounded and some cattle killed. We killed and scalped one Indian and wounded several. March 8th,—Brought in corn from the different cribs until the 18th day. March 9th,—Express sent to the settlement. Ebenezer Corn and company arrived from Capt. Linn on the Mississippi. March 18th,—A small party of Indians killed and scalped Hugh Wilson about a half mile from the fort, near night and escaped. March 19th,—Archibald McNeal died of his wounds received on the 7th inst. March 28th,—A large party of Indians attacked the stragglers about the fort; killed and scalped Garret Pandergrest; killed or took prisoner Peter Flin.

April 7th,—Indians killed one man at Boonesborough and wounded one. April 8th,—Stoner arrived with news from the settlement. April 24th,—Forty or fifty Indians attacked Boonesborough, killed and scalped Daniel Goodman, wounded Capt. Boone, Capt. Todd, Mr. Hite and Mr. Stoner. Indians, 'tis thought, sustained much damage. April 29th,—Indians attacked the fort and killed Ensign McConnell.

May 6th,—Indians discovered placing themselves near the fort. A few shots exchanged; no harm done. May 12th,—John Cowan and Squire Boone arrived from the settlement. May 18th, McGary and Haggin sent express to Fort Pitt. May 23d,—John Todd and company set off for the settlement. May 23d,—A large party of Indians attacked Boonesborough Fort; kept a warm fire until 11 o'clock at night; began it next morning, and kept a warm fire until midnight, attempting several times to burn the fort; three of our men wounded, not mortally; the enemy suffered considerably. May 26th,—A party went out to hunt Indians; one wounded Squire Boone, and escaped. May 30th,—Indians attacked Logan's Fort, killed and scalped William Hudson, wounded Burr Harrison and John Kennedy.

June 5th, Harrod and Elliot went to meet Col. Bowman and company; Glen and Laird arrived from Cumberland; Daniel Lyons, who parted with them on Green River, we supposed was killed going into Logan's Fort. John Peters and Elisha Bathey we expect were killed coming home from Cumberland. June 13th,—Burr Harrison died of his wounds received May 30. June 22d,—Barney Stagner, Sr., killed and beheaded half a mile from the fort. A few guns fired at Boone's.

July 9th,—Lieut. Linn married; great merriment. July 11th,—Harrod returned. Express returned from Pittsburgh.

August 1st,—Col. Bowman arrived at Boonesborough. August 5th,—Surrounded ten or twelve Indians near the fort; killed three and wounded others; the plunder was sold for upward of £70. August 11th,—John Higgins died of a lingering disorder. August 25th,—Ambrose Grayson killed near Logan's Fort, and two others wounded; Indians escaped.

September 8th,—Twenty-seven men set out for the settlement. September 9th,—Indians discovered; a shot exchanged; nothing done. September 11th,—Thirty-seven went to Joseph Bowman's for corn; while shelling they were fired on; a skirmish ensued; Indians drew off, leaving two dead on the spot, and much blood; Eli Gerrard was killed on the spot, and six others wounded. September 12th,—Daniel Bryan died of his wounds received yesterday.*

Such was the record made at Harrodsburg of passing events. Each of the other stations could have added a similar story, had there been "a chiel amang them takin' notes," but the terrible struggle has not been passed unrecorded by other hands. Hostilities began very early in the spring; hardly time enough to organize another force had elapsed after the retreat of Pluggy's band in December, before a party of seventy warriors under Blackfish took the war-path leading to Kentucky, where they arrived sometime in February, and Clark's first entry, in the extract quoted, marks the first act of the new year's campaign.

James and William Ray, Thomas Shores and William Coomes were engaged in making a clearing at the Shawanese Spring, about four miles from the Harrodsburg Fort, for Hugh McGary, the step-father of the two Rays. On March 6th, Shores, with the two brothers, went to a sugar-camp in the vicinity to regale themselves with syrup or sap. Here they fell in with a party of Indians, who instantly followed a murderous volley by a rush upon the startled whites. William Ray was killed by the first fire; Shores was captured, but James Ray, with surprising agility and unequaled speed, escaped unhurt to give the alarm.

Coomes was unconscious of his danger, but, alarmed by the protracted delay of his companions, had ceased his work and was about to go to the camp when he caught sight of fifteen Indians approaching. Fortunately the heavy undergrowth and canebrake shielded him from their observation, and sinking down behind the trunk of a tree he had just felled, the Indians passed him unnoticed to the temporary hut errected by the choppers for their camp.

*Morehead's address, p. 162.

So soon as they were out of sight, Coomes escaped toward the sugar-camp, to find out what had become of his companions. Discovering no trace of them, he concealed himself amidst the boughs of a fallen hickory tree, the yellow leaves of which were of nearly the same color as his garments. From his hiding place he had a full view of the sugar-camp; and after a short time he observed a party of forty Indians halt there, where they were soon rejoined by the fifteen whom he had previously seen. They tarried there for a long time, drinking the syrup, singing their war-songs, and dancing their war-dance. Coomes was a breathless spectator of this scene of revelry, from the distance only of fifty or sixty yards. Other straggling parties of savages also came in, and the whole number amounted to about seventy, instead of forty-seven, as stated by Butler and Marshall.

Meantime, James Ray had communicated the alarm to the people of Harrodsburg. Great was the terror and confusion which ensued there. The hot-headed McGary openly charged James Harrod with having been wanting in the precautions and necessary courage for the defense of the fort. These two men, who had a personal enmity toward each other, quarreled and leveled their fatal rifles at each other's bosoms. In this conjuncture the wife of McGary rushed in and turned aside the rifle of her husband, when Harrod immediately withdrew his, and the difficulty was temporarily adjusted.

McGary insisted that a party of thirty should be immediately dispatched, with him, in search of Coomes, Shores and his step-son, William Ray. Harrod, the commandant of the station, and George Rogers Clark thought this measure rash and imprudent, as all these men were necessary for the defense of the place, which might be attacked by the Indians at any moment. At length, however, the request of McGary was granted, and thirty mounted men were placed under his command for the expedition.

The detachment moved with great rapidity, and soon reached the neighborhood of the sugar-camp, which the Indians had already abandoned. Near it they discovered the mangled remains of William Ray, at the sight of which McGary turned pale, and was near falling from his horse, in a fainting fit. As soon as the body was discovered, one of the men shouted out. "See there! they have killed poor Coomes." Coomes, who had hitherto lurked in his hiding place, now sallied forth, and ran toward the men, exclaiming: "No, they haven't killed me, by Job! I'm safe." The party having buried Ray and rescued Coomes, returned in safety to Harrodstown, which they reached about sunset.*

This war-party of the Indians was bent on more serious mischief than the waylaying of such settlers as chance threw in their way; but true to their theory of warfare they refrained for a time from further aggressive movements, after the escape of young Ray, and, in the interval thus afforded, the garrison hurried to place the fort in as good a state of defense as possible. Early in the succeeding morning, March 7, the people in the stockade discovered a cabin, situated on the eastern edge of the town, in flames. Thinking it a result of accident, a party sallied forth to extinguish the fire, when the Indians, observing the success of their ruse, attempted to cut off the rescuers from the fort. The whites were too quick for their assailants; hastily retreating they escaped the toils of the savages, and though obliged for a time to take refuge behind trees to beat back the enemy, they eventually reached the fort with four men wounded, having killed one of the attacking band and wounded several others. This ended the present attack, the Indians probably intending only to develop the strength of the garrison, and perhaps strike an effective blow toward crippling the defense, by capturing or killing a number. Though foiled in the achievement of this object, the field was not abandoned; a close watch was maintained upon the place and such injury inflicted as occasion offered.

Boonesborough was similarly scrutinized, and frequent shots exchanged which inflicted casualties on either side. Concerted attacks were made upon the fort on the 15th and 24th of April, on the 23d of May, and 4th of July. Of these, the attacks of the 15th of April and 4th of July are more particularly mentioned by the earlier historians, though Clark mentions the wounding of Boone, Todd, Hite and Stoner in the attack made by forty or fifty savages on the 24th of April.* The first attack was a fierce assault, evidently made with the hope of suddenly breaking into the fort while deprived of any hope of assistance from the other stations, which were threatened at the same time. The defenses proved impregnable to such weapons as the Indians could command, and the garrison, suffering some in wounds, and much in the destruction of corn and cattle, inflicted such punishment upon the exposed savages as to force them to retire with precipitation. On May 23, a more determined attack was made, in which the Indians made several desperate attempts to set the cabins on fire, but without success. Again in July, bent on the destruction of this most formidable stronghold, the savages returned to the attack with redoubled fury, continuing the fire of their muskets until midnight. The number of the assailants was estimated at 200, but after protracting the siege for "two days and nights," they lost all hope of success, and "tumultuously and with clamor departed."

* From "Sketches of the Early Catholic Missions of Kentucky," by Rev. Dr. Spalding. 1844. His information was derived from a son of Coomes. (See Collins, Vol. II, p. 611.)

The Indian campaign of this year bears a strong resemblance to the grand tactics of modern warfare. The left of the line, held by the three outposts, was first developed and "felt," and then, while a show of attack was continued here, and the center threatened, the main assault was hurled at Boonesboro, on the right, and repeated again and again with a desperation that indicated the value they set upon success at this point. Defeated here, the brunt of the attack was aimed at the center, where Logan's Fort, weak in numbers and less elaborate in its defenses, promised a better chance of success, but not so great results if achieved.

This change of attack was accomplished with unusual secrecy. One morning* in the latter part of May, while some of the women were outside of the inclosure, engaged in milking the cows, guarded by the usual sentinels, they were startled by a sudden volley from a party of Indians, who, to the number of 100, had gathered about the station entirely unobserved by the whites. Of the sentinels, one was killed outright, another was mortally wounded, and a third, Burr Harrison, was disabled; the rest of the men, with the women, escaped unhurt to the protection of the palisades. Harrison ran a few paces and fell to the ground within plain view of the garrison, too near to be approached with safety by the Indians, and too far off to permit any attempt for his rescue with hope of success.

The situation was one of the most trying that the pioneers of that day were called upon to face. The agony of the unfortunate man's family in this helpless plight, the forlorn character of any attempt to effect his rescue, and the common danger involved in any further loss to a garrison which at first consisted of only fifteen men, three of whom were already hors de combat, all appealed with a powerful but conflicting force to the brave generosity of the garrison. It was plainly the part of wisdom to forego any attempt to reach the suffering man. Courage could afford no protection against the pitiless bullets of the savage marksmen, who commanded every foot of the ground, and left the wounded man un-

*To watch the Indians and give timely notice of their approach six spies were appointed, for the payment of whom Maj. Clark pledged the faith of Virginia. Boone appointed Kenton and Thomas Brooks, Harrod, Samuel Moore and Bates Collier and Logan, John Conrad and John Martin. These spies performed good service. It was the custom for two each week, by turns, to range up and down the Ohio, and about the deserted stations looking for Indian signs, etc. By this means the settlers had timely notice of the approach of the enemy during the year, save once.

On this occasion, Kenton and two others, early one morning, having loaded their guns for a hunt, were standing in the gate of Boonesborough, when two men in the field were fired on by the Indians. They immediately fled, not being hurt. The Indians pursued them, a warrior overtook and tomahawked one of the men within seventy yards of the fort, and proceeded leisurely to scalp him. Kenton shot the daring savage dead, and immediately with his hunting companions gave chase to the others. Boone, hearing the noise, with ten men hastened out to the assistance of the spies. Kenton turned and observed an Indian taking aim at the party of Boone; quick as thought he brought his rifle to his shoulder, pulled the trigger first, and the red-man bit the dust. Boone, having advanced some distance, now discovered that his small party, consisting of fourteen men, was cut off from the fort by a large body of the foe, which had got between him and the gate. There was no time to be lost: Boone gave the word—"right about—fire—charge!" and the intrepid hunters dashed in among their adversaries, in a desperate endeavor to reach the fort.

At the first fire from the Indians, seven of the fourteen whites were wounded, among the number the gallant Boone, whose leg was broken, which stretched him out on the ground. An Indian sprang on him with an uplifted tomahawk, but before the blow descended, Kenton, everywhere present, rushed on the warrior, discharged his gun into his breast, and bore his leader into the fort. When the gate was closed and all things secure, Boone sent for Kenton; "Well Simon," said the old pioneer, "you have behaved yourself like a man to-day—indeed, you are a fine fellow." This was great praise from Boone, who was a silent man, little given to compliment. Kenton had deserved the eulogium; he had saved the life of his captain and killed three Indians without having time to scalp any of them. There was little time to spare, we may well believe, when Kenton could not stop to take a scalp. (Sketch of Kenton, contributed to McDonald's Biograp ical Sketches, p. 215.)

*Butler and Marshall place the occurrence on the 20th, Clark on the 30th of May.

touched by further shots only to lure other victims within their reach. But neither prudence nor personal danger could steel the heart against the frantic pleading of his wife, and the piteous cries of the man, as he struggled to move toward the fort, or lay weltering in his blood. Logan could withstand the promptings of his heart no longer; he determined to risk his life to bring in his comrade, but he begged in vain for volunteers to assist him. The hazard was too forlorn even for those nurtured amid danger.

At length, inspired by the noble resolve of his leader, one with no interests to compromise but his own, announced his willingness to anticipate the natural end of life, and proposed to accompany him. Together they ran to the gate; and outside, Logan, regardless of his follower, rushed with mad speed through the terrible storm of bullets that greeted him to the spot where the wounded man lay, but Martin, the volunteer, appalled by the fury of the attack, shrank back within the gate. To grasp the wounded man and bear him on his shoulders to the fort, was for Logan the work of a moment. The intrepid frontiersman was equally fortunate, but every portion of his clothing bore significant evidence that the risk had not been over-estimated, and that he owed his life, a hundred times, to the rapidity as well as the audacity of his movements.

The attack upon the fort was now begun with vigor, but the friendly palisades turned death harmlessly aside, while the garrison with unerring rifles inflicted death or wounds wherever the savages exposed themselves. Every adult occupant of the fort was engaged in its defense, the men in their places at the port-holes, and the women running bullets, loading guns, standing guard, or preparing food. But the scarcity of powder and lead foreshadowed a graver danger than did the paucity of numbers. Approach to the other forts was closely guarded, and it is doubtful if they had sufficient ammunition to spare any could it have been brought away. The only other practical source of supply was the Holston settlements, 200 miles away. To reach this point, the vigilance of the investing force must be eluded, and the long journey pursued through forests infested with a numerous savage foe, watchful for any such attempt. Difficult as the outward trip might be, the return was rendered doubly so by the burden which the messengers must carry. There was no immediate prospect of a termination of the siege, which in the end proved the most determined and best sustained in the history of the Kentucky frontier, and the daily expenditure of ammunition only brought the obvious necessity nearer.

Again Logan proved himself an ideal commander, ready to lead where danger threatened most. Selecting two comrades, he cautiously left the fort, and avoiding the beaten paths, guided only by his woodcraft, he escaped the nearer foe. Avoiding Cumberland Gap, which was likely to be guarded by the Indians, he explored his passage "where no man ever traveled before, nor probably since, over the Cumberland Mountain, through clifts, and brush, and cane; clambering rocks and precipices to be encountered only by the strong, the bold and the determined." Having secured the required ammunition and given his comrades directions how to proceed homeward, he flew back to the endangered post with the speed of the chamois, making the 400 miles in ten days. The powder soon afterward arrived, was successfully introduced into the fort, and the little garrison continued the contest with renewed zeal.

The siege thus begun was protracted through three weary months with scarcely any interruption, until even terror grew monotonous. But, fortunately for the sorely beset pioneers, the Indians did not possess that firmness derived from discipline, nor the organization which leads to a division of military duties.

The Indians, in besieging a place, are hence but seldom seen in force upon any quarter; but dispersed and acting individually, or in small parties. They conceal themselves in bushes, or weeds, or behind trees, or stumps of trees; or waylay the path or field, and other places to which their enemies resort; and when one or more can be taken down, in their opinion, they fire a gun or let fly the arrow, aimed at the mark. If necessary they retreat; if they dare they advance upon their killed or crippled adversary; and they watch the watering place for those who go for that article of primary necessity, that they may by these means reduce the place to their possession, or destroy its inhabitants in detail.

In the night they will place themselves near the fort gate, ready to sacrifice the first person who shall appear in the morning; in the day, if there be any cover, such as grass, a bush, a large clod of earth, or a stone as big as a bushel, they will avail themselves of it to approach the fort, by slipping forward on their bellies within gun-shot; and then whosoever appears first gets the fire, while the assailant makes his retreat behind the smoke from the gun. At other times they approach the walls, or palisades, with the utmost audacity, and attempt to fire them, or beat down the gate. They often make feints to draw out the garrison on one side of the fort, and if practicable enter it, by surprise, on the other. And when their stock of provisions is exhausted, this being an individual affair, they supply themselves by hunting; and again, frequently return to the siege, if by any means they hope to get a scalp. (Marshall.)

None of the stations, therefore, were closely environed for a long period. During the spring and summer of this year (1777) the enemy was never very remote from any of the posts, but the necessity for hunting and their inaptitude for laborious watching, when the results of it were generally unprofitable to themselves, led the Indians temporarily to relax their efforts on the forts. The whites, accustomed to the freedom of the forests and the energetic life of pioneers, chafed under the restraint imposed by the presence of the savages, and at the first intermission of attack sought the woods. They considered themselves, as Marshall remarks, "rather the best marksmen, and as likely to see the Indian first as to be seen by him, while the first sight was equivalent to the first fire, and the most expert shooter held the best security for his life." But this exposure was so far impelled by duty as to preserve it from any appearance of idle bravado; game was scarcely less necessary to the whites than to the savages, and the product of their fields was a very important feature in the pioneers' plans "to flusterate the intentions of the Indians and keep the country."

With the exceptions noted, there were few days on which the hardy frontiersman could not evade the vigilance of the enemy to secure game or other supplies at a distance, and thus it happened that, notwithstanding the whole region was in a "state of siege," the garrison were kept supplied with meat, and the fields adjacent to the forts were cultivated. Such exploits, however, were attended by great hazard, and while such a consideration weighed lightly with men inured to daily danger, they paid a severe penalty for any indiscretion.

In this summer, Butler relates that while young Ray was one day shooting at a mark within 150 yards of the fort at Harrodsburg, his single companion was suddenly killed by a shot from an Indian in the woods beyond. A quick glance revealed the perpetrator of the deed, and Ray was about to inflict instant vengeance upon the murderer of his comrade, when he found himself assailed by a number of savages who had taken advantage of his action to steal upon him unawares. Apprised of his danger, the young marksman bounded toward the fort with the speed and agility of a deer. A storm of bullets followed his flight, and so close upon him were the savages that the garrison feared to open the gate sufficient to admit the fugitive. In this fearful dilemma, Ray threw himself down behind a small stump within seven steps of the palisades, where he lay momently expecting death. The savages redoubled their efforts to strike their victim, or to prevent his rescue, and for four hours he lay in this predicament, the rifle balls of the enemy striking all about him in dangerous proximity. At length, seeing no other chance for escape, he cried out to his friends: "For God's sake, dig a hole under the cabin wall and take me in." This was at once done, and the lad rescued from his perilous position.

At times, when the dispersion of the Indians gave the whites opportunity to attack a party not too greatly their superior in numbers, the garrisons assumed the offensive, and gave the savages an impressive idea of their prowess. Some time in June, a party of seventeen men, under command of Maj. Smith, pursued a body of Indians from Boonesborough to the Ohio, where they arrived only to find the savages well over the river.

They succeeded in killing one who lingered behind the others, however, and turned back to retrace their steps. In their homeward march they discovered a band of about thirty Indians idly resting upon the grass, unconscious of danger. Dismounting quietly, and leaving nine of their party with the horses, the rest crept silently forward to the attack. When near the Indians, one of them passed near the whites in the direction of the horses; he was instantly shot, and with a loud yell fell to the ground. The single report did not alarm his companions, who, thinking he had shot a wild animal, laughed boisterously, but gave the incident no further attention. In another instant the whites poured a full volley into their midst, and charged upon them with loud shouts. The startled savages returned a scattering fire and fled, when the whites proceeded on their journey, having but one man wounded.

On the 25th of July, a party of forty-five men from North Carolina reached Boonesborough, and not long afterward Col. Bowman, at the head of 100 of the Virginia militia, arrived at the same place.* The latter force was Virginia's contribution to the defense of her citizens in "that remote country" now known as Kentucky County, the leader of which bore her commission as county-lieutenant of the new political division. Such reinforcements, more than doubling the former numbers of the garrisons, were very welcome to these anxious people, for while Boonesboro and Harrodsburg were relieved of the immediate presence of a hostile force, the enemy was still in the country in strong numbers, and held a close watch, with frequent attacks upon St. Asaph's. Bowman's attention was at once directed to the relief of Logan's devoted little garrison, and the van of the relieving force, which reached his station in September, brought the first intimation that the beleagured pioneers had of the arrival of reinforcements in the country. A detachment, considerably in advance of the main body, found the Indians in force about the fort and drew their fire, from which several were killed, but the savages were dispersed, and the long siege was at last ended.

The Indians still kept in the vicinity of the forts in considerable numbers until a final engagement at Harrodsburg closed this year's active campaign. To somewhat repair the loss inflicted by their inability to raise a crop of corn, the settlers of this place determined, in the fall, to sow a patch of turnips about 200 yards northwest of the station. While clearing the ground for this purpose, one of the guards discovered an Indian and fired on him without effect. On the next day the cattle were observed to give unmistakable evidence of the presence of the enemy—"snuffing the air about a small field in the farthest corner, which had been allowed to grow up in very high weeds." Clark at once proposed to turn the ambuscade upon the plotters. Instructing the workmen to continue their labor in that portion of the field nearest the fort, he proceeded with a party of men to gain the rear of the ambush, by a circuitous route, the workmen in the meantime calling to their comrades in the fort to come out and work.

The maneuver was entirely successful; a sudden volley killed four of the startled savages, the remainder of whom immediately gave way in hasty retreat, rapidly pursued by the exultant whites. Pushing down the creek some 400 yards, the pursuers came upon the remains of a deserted Indian encampment, which gave indications of having been occupied at some time by a force of 400 or 500 savages. This camp had been deserted before the discovery, but it was undoubtedly the point from which the Indians had directed the activity of the hostile bands during the year, and the party so successfully routed was probably the last remnant of the savage host who had lingered to take a last "look" at the pioneers of this station. In this skirmish, James Ray took the last degree in the novitiate of the frontier; he killed his first Indian, was complimented by Clark, and presented with his victim's rifle.

The frontier derived but little permanent strength from the large show of reinforcement noted; the militia was enlisted only for a short term of service, a large part of which was spent on the journey to Kentucky, and their subsequent discharge was followed by their early return homeward. Logan's Station received a welcome accession in "the arrival of Montgomery's party,"* and the other forts were similarly strengthened, but these additions were probably entirely offset by the return of some who, very naturally, found an irresistible attraction in the security of "the settlements," after the year's experience on the frontier. As winter approached, therefore, few remained save those who had "borne the burden and heat of the day." On the 2d of September, an accurate census of the inhabitants was taken, of which the report of Harrodsburg alone has been preserved as follows: men in service, 81; do. not in service, 4; women, 24; children over ten years, 12; do. under ten years, 58; slaves above ten years, 12; do. under ten years, 7; total, 198. This number was probably greater than the other two combined, but of the permanent fighting force that remained through the winter, Marshall estimates the number at 102 men; at Boonesboro, 22; at Harrodsburg, 65; and at St. Asaph's, 15. Truly, "the battle is not to the strong."

*The date of Col. Bowman's arrival is placed "about September," by Marshall (Vol. I, p. 53), whom Mr. Butler follows without question. Clark makes the date August 1st. See diary, ante.

[NOTE.—In reference to the number of remaining whites, it should be said, that it is by no means clear whether this estimate should be referred to the period when the active hostilities of 1777 began or to the close of the campaign, after the balance had been struck between the casualties and the permanent accessions. In the latter case, it will be observed that Logan's Station just "held its own."—See Marshall, Vol. I, p. 55; Butler, p. 95.]

*This indefinite allusion is found in Marshall's History, Vol I, p. 54. It probably refers to William Montgomery, the father of Mrs. Logan who came about this time with several sons.

CHAPTER VII.

KENTUCKY'S PART IN THE WAR FOR INDEPENDENCE.

WHILE Kentucky was thus engaged in an unequal contest with her savage foes, affairs on the sea-board were making momentous progress. The second colonial congress had met, with authority to declare war; echoes from the fields of Lexington and Bunker Hill had summoned patriots everywhere to arms; the United Colonies had declared their independence amid the wild acclaim of the people; the disastrous battle of Long Island had been succeeded by the masterly retreat across the Delaware; the victory on the Stillwater had been followed by the defeat on the Brandywine; and the dreary winter at Valley Forge was, even now, adding new luster to the patriots' devotion; the colonial bark was irrevocably launched upon the flood-tide of revolution.

This changed relation of the older colonies to the crown had not yet affected the character of the conflict in Kentucky. It was still a contest between the adventurous pioneer and the implacable savage, waged on either side for the possession of the fair lands beyond the Big Sandy. Though neither antagonist could claim a victory, the whites had gained a foot hold that was destined to be more firmly planted, and the red men were beginning to read their fate in the quiet determination of the heroic band that defied their fiercest assaults. To an unscrupulous foe, no field could be more inviting, and this "remote country" was not destined longer to escape the ruthless ravages of an enemy, who, deaf to every demand of civilization, incited the savages to bloodier deeds, and armed them with the more effective enginery of war.

A startling evidence of the industry and far-reaching plans of the new foe had already made its way through the forests to the frontier. On the person of one of Bowman's militia men, killed in the first approach to St. Asaph's, was found a proclamation issued by the British commander-in-chief, Lord Howe, offering protection to such as would abjure the colonies and denouncing such as refused. The paper came directly to Logan's possession through the faithful fellow who discovered it, and this insidious attack, so prolific of evil in the old communities, was here turned harmlessly aside.

But a more substantial attack was preparing. Rumors of an impending blow, aimed by the allied British and Indians at the frontier forts, had long been rife in the region beyond the Ohio, but it had been deferred, and by an unfortunate fatality did not fall until the passions of the frontiersmen, not less barbarous than the Indians, and far more culpable, violently removed the last feeble barrier to its consummation.

The British agents at Oswego were busy concerting a general attack, when, in the early summer of 1777, Cornstalk, the great chief of the Shawanese, went to the frontier fort at Point Pleasant to talk over the situation with his friend, Capt. Arbuckle, the commandant. The chief was earnest in his desire for peace, but found himself surrounded by those of his race, of his own tribe and others, bitter in their hatred of the frontiersmen, and eager to join the British. He declared his inability to stem the tide that was setting toward the English, unless the Long Knives would help him.

With fool's caution and the basest treachery, the whites determined to prevent war by removing its only barrier. They retained Cornstalk and Red Hawk, who had accompanied the chief, and thus these savages found themselves entrapped by trusting to a white man's honor. On the succeeding day, the chief's son, alarmed at his father's delay, approached the farther shore and gave a halloo. The whites met him with friendly smiles, and inveigled him into their snare.

On the third day, a hunter for the fort was killed by two unknown Indians. When this fact became known, the murdered hunter's friends demanded vengeance upon the innocent prisoners. Arbuckle showed an expiring spark of manhood in attempting to save the victims of his treachery, but threatened with the rifles of his men, if he further interfered, he stepped aside and the ruffians did their bloody work. Cornstalk met his fate calmly, and fell dead where he had risen to meet his foes, pierced by seven bullets. The others died less easily, and with less composure, but without resistance. This was an atrocious deed, and while it did not precipitate the meditated attack upon the frontier, it confirmed the whole Shawanese nation in their hostility to the Americans, and gave a certain sanction to the reprisals that followed.

Early in the autumn the blow fell; 400 savages, led by Simon Girty,* descended upon Fort Henry at Wheeling, on the 26th of September. † Though garrisoned by only twelve men and boys, besides the women, the fort made a stout resistance, each member of both sexes vying with the other in deeds of heroism. After several days of vigorous but unavailing attack, in which they lost about 100 of their number, the allies suddenly withdrew, burning the fences, and slaughtering the cattle of the settlers as they departed. Enraged, but not discouraged, by this unsuccessful termination of the first campaign of the combined forces, the enemy organized a new expedition, destined for Kentucky, but in the interval the new year dawned.

It was under such auspices that the eventful year of 1778 was ushered in. South of the Ohio, the quiet which succeeded the close of the fall's campaign was yet unbroken, and the settlers improved the opportunity, thus afforded, in effecting such repair of the damages they had received, as was possible. In the winter, the stock of salt in the community was found greatly reduced, and on New Year's day, a company of thirty men, recruited from the several stations, set out under the direction of Boone to manufacture a new supply. While the rest labored at the lick, the leader acted as scout and hunter. For more than a month the work progressed without interruption or incident, and three men had been sent back with the product of their labors, when the enterprise was suddenly brought to an unfortunate conclusion. On the 7th of February, while engaged in his duties as scout and hunter, Boone fell in with a detachment of Indians, led by two Canadians. The discovery was mutual; Boone sought to escape by instant flight, but the enemy, anxious to secure a prisoner from whom they could learn the condition of the forts, reserved their fire and dispatched several of their swiftest runners in pursuit of the fugitive. The hunter was soon captured, but, for some reason, the savages delayed further movements for eight days. Then they proceeded to the Blue Lick, where they captured the remaining twenty-seven salt-makers. Unable to give his comrades warning of their danger, Boone had arranged favorable terms of capitulation, and as the Indians came upon them, signified to his friends that they should surrender without resistance. This was accordingly done, and the savages, too much elated to prosecute their enterprise further, turned back with their prisoners to Chillicothe, on the Little Miami.

The first obvious result of the introduction of the English into Kentucky campaigns was a great amelioration of the conditions of war. The salt-makers surrendered on conditions of life and good treatment, which were scrupulously observed by the enemy. On their return journey of three days, the party encountered very severe weather, but the captors seem to have generously shared every privilege of fire and food with their prisoners. On the 10th of March, Boone, with ten of his companions, was conducted by a band of forty Indians to Detroit, where the prisoners were turned over to Gov. Hamilton, for the offered reward. Boone, however, was reserved by his captors, for whom they had conceived so high a regard, that they refused an offer of £100, made by the governor for the great hunter's ransom. The disappointment of Boone was extreme and excited the sympathy of several English gentlemen, who were cognizant of the affair. They generously offered to supply him with such things as he could use for his comfort, all of which he steadily declined, as he was unwilling to accept courtesies which he saw no immediate prospect of his being able to repay.

*Appendix A, note 10.

†The date usually assigned is September 1. See American Pioneer, Vol. II, pp. 302, 314, 339.

Accordingly, on the 10th of April he parted from his comrades, and returned with his obtrusive admirers to Chillicothe. Here Boone was adopted as a son by "one of the principal families," a relation to which, however little it may have flattered his vanity, he adapted himself with the ready tact of one who was scarcely less a child of nature than his adopted relatives. Recognizing him as facile princeps of the whites on the border, the Indians let slip no opportunity of contesting with him in marksmanship and athletic exploits. In all these contests the captive, with a shrewd insight of the savage character, fell just far enough short of the first place to command their respect without awakening their jealousy. He became an active member of the tribe for the time, and by his skill won the plaudits of the braves, while his well-conceived courtesies to the chief men gained their respectful regard.

Thus time wore on, and could Boone have divested himself of his love for kindred and country, he could not have found more congenial employment, nor more admiring friends. The hunter's stoical acceptance of the situation not only won the admiration of the natives, but served to lull to sleep any lingering apprehension of his desire to escape, which they may have entertained. He was therefore largely freed from restraint, and in June accompanied a party to the Scioto salt lick to procure a quantity of that necessary condiment.

On learning of the capture of Boone and his companions, their friends found it useless to attempt to effect their rescue, but, with eminently practical sense, they sent out a party to bury the kettles until it should be safe to bring them in, which was subsequently done. The portentous character of this event was well understood. The loss of so many experienced men greatly weakened the slender garrison, and the calamity could only be mitigated by an increase of caution. But so inured to the strange vicissitudes of their eventful life were these hardy people, that, no Indian demonstrations following, and none of the captured comrades returning, the incident was allowed to recede in the background of present duties, and the flow of life soon returned to its wonted channels. Boone and his companions were given up as dead; the stricken wife of the leader, accompanied by her unmarried children, returned to the solace of her father's home and the security of the North Carolina settlements; and the garrison, no longer apprehensive of immediate attack, grew careless in their false assumption of security, remitted their caution, and allowed their defenses to fall into decay.

Another event at this time contributed to this result. In the frontier station at Harrodsburg, Clark had fathomed the strategy of the British in the west, and had discerned their points of vantage. He quietly drew his own conclusions, and early in 1777 had sent two scouts to explore the Illinois country, who had been absent from April until June. With information thus derived he set out for Virginia in the fall, reaching Williamsburg on the 5th of November. On the 2d of January, 1778, he received his instructions and commission as lieutenant-colonel; on the 4th of February he proceeded to Pittsburgh to raise troops for his enterprise, while his subordinates were active in the same service in the settlements on the Holston and in western Virginia.

In this expedition the pioneers of Kentucky took a lively interest, although ignorant of its destination. Clark's hopes of large re-enforcements from North Carolina were grievously disappointed, and he therefore called on Col. Bowman to repair to Corn Island with as many of the Kentucky militia as could be safely spared from the exposed stations. It is not recorded how many men these stations furnished, but more were offered than it was deemed prudent to accept, and only William Harrod's company, and a part of another from Kentucky, accompanied the expedition. Besides these, Cols. John Todd and William Linn and Simon Kenton joined the enterprise as volunteers.

Thus constituted, in the latter part of June the little army set forth from the rendezvous, leaving a number of families, who had accompanied Clark against his wish, as garrison of a block-house, which he had caused to be erected for the protection of the army stores left behind, and Clark having caused a spot to be cleared for the purpose, the impromptu garrison planted and succeeded in raising a crop of corn, which gave name to an insignificant spot which has long since been washed bare of soil by the current of the river.

While the thoughts of the frontiersmen of Kentucky were thus drawn out to foreign conquest, events beyond the Ohio were conspiring to bring war's alarms to their very doors. Even before Clark left his depot at Corn Island, Boone had returned to Boonesborough, as one from the dead, bringing the most disturbing intelligence. He had been engaged with his Indian companions at the salt lick but eight or ten days, when a returning war-party passed near the spring. This party consisted of 450 Indians, who had made an unsuccessful raid on a fort in Greenbrier County, Va., and were now on their way to the general rendezvous to concert a new foray. The salt-makers immediately joined the returning warriors, and with them proceeded toward the towns on the Maumee. Boone was not long in ascertaining that an attack on Boonesborough was meditated, and, stimulated by this alarming discovery, soon found means to evade the renewed watchfulness of the savages. When near the present site of Washington, in Fayette County, Ohio, the anxious captive set out one morning before sunrise as if to hunt; once clear of his comrades, he shaped his course for the threatened station, and did not cease his rapid journey* until he reached his destination on the 20th of June.

Under the inspiration of Boone's presence and the news he brought, the garrison hastily set about repairing the fort, "to repair its planks, strengthen its gates and posterns, and to form double bastions; all of which was completed in ten days." In the latter part of July one of Boone's fellow-prisoners escaped from the Indians, and brought the information "that the Indians had, on account of Boone's elopement, postponed their march for three weeks."

In the meantime the enemy guarded the secret of their movements by a strong force of runners, who kept a close watch upon the station. These scouts were observed lurking in the forest near the fort, and Boone, understanding their mission, determined to unmask the enemy's designs by an expedition across the Ohio. Accordingly, on the 18th of August, he left Boonesborough with a party of nineteen men, proceeding rapidly to a point within four miles of Paint Creek Town, near the Scioto. Kenton had returned from Illinois in time to join the expedition, and was at this time somewhat in advance of the main party, acting as scout. While cautiously making his way through the thick underbrush, he was startled by a loud laugh in his immediate vicinity, and had scarcely time to gain the shelter of a tree, when its origin was explained by the approach of two Indians riding on the same horse. Permitting them to ride within short range, Kenton sent a sure shot through the breast of the foremost rider. Both fell instantly to the ground, one dead and the other severely wounded, while the startled pony, wheeling suddenly to the rear, carried the alarm to a body of thirty savages who were approaching.

The scout now found himself assailed by an enemy of superior numbers, who ap-

*The distance, estimated at one 160 miles, was accomplished on foot in four days, during which Boone had but one meal. For this he had provided by secreting a small supply of food in his blanket. This meal, according to certain depositions made seventeen and nineteen years later, was had on the 19th of June, 1778, when he "roasted some meat and got some drink at the forks of three branches of Flat fork of Johnston's fork of Licking River," a spot now included within the limits of Robertson or Fleming County. (See Collins, Vol. II, p. 656.)

proached with such skill as to baffle all his attempts to get a shot. In this perilous position he was soon joined by his comrades, who had hurried forward at the report of his rifle, and a smart skirmish ensued. The Indians were finally forced to give way with one killed and two wounded, the whites escaping any casualty.

Kenton and Montgomery were at once sent forward to reconnoitre the village, which they found entirely deserted. Correctly divining that its inhabitants had left to join the war-party forming at Chillicothe, Boone made haste to retrace his steps in order to gain the fort in advance of the enemy, who, he was assured, was about to carry out their meditated attack. Marching night and day, the little party of whites soon struck the enemy's trail, which they cautiously followed until the 6th of August; making a wide detour, they then passed the savages, and on the next day reached their destination in safety.

The garrison now looked forward to the advance of the enemy with anxiety; nor had it long to await the denouement. On the 8th, the Indians appeared, flaunting the flags of France and England above them. The whole body drew up in plain sight of the fort. Their numbers were imposing, even to the pioneers who were accustomed to give large odds to the enemy, and the commander, Du Quesne, evidently counted much upon the effect which this display was calculated to have upon the garrison. Four hundred and thirty-two "frightfully painted" savages constituted the body of the besieging force, while the presence of the commander, and eleven other Canadians, bespoke discipline and trained resources, which were to be feared more than the great disparity of numbers.

The border struggle had indeed assumed a portentous shape; a new enemy, possessing the powerful accessories of civilized warfare, was now in the field, and even Boone felt that it was a "critical time." That the issue must be fought out was a foregone conclusion with the pioneers, but when the garrison was summoned to surrender in the name of his British majesty, the king of England, Boone took advantage of this touch of civilization introduced in the enemy's procedure, and requested two days for consideration, which were readily granted.

The frontier militia was a very democratic organization, and though there was little doubt of the result of a conference the leader summoned the garrison and placed the whole case before them, clearly pointing out the alternatives involved. The decision was prompt and unanimous to fight, but desirous of gaining all the advantage possible out of the parleying mood of the enemy, Boone withheld this determination for a time, and dispatched some of the men to bring in the stock while the truce lasted. At the expiration of the two days, from one of the bastions of the fort, Boone gave his reply to the summons of Du Quesne, to the effect that they were determined to defend their fort while a man was living.

The Canadian found it impossible to conceal the disappointment which this reply occasioned, and to the astonishment of the garrison, declared that "it was the orders of Gov. Hamilton (the British officer at Detroit) to take them captive, and not to destroy them;" and that if nine of their number would come out and treat with him, he would immediately withdraw his forces, and return home peaceably.

The meditated treachery in this proposal is very thinly veiled, and that Boone should have entertained the invitation for a moment has occasioned an often expressed surprise. The experienced pioneer, as it will appear, was not deceived by so unusual a proposition, but, as he narrates, it "sounded grateful in our ears, and we agreed to treat." The fidelity with which the savage had observed the conditions of capitulation in the case of the salt-makers, certainly afforded some reason to trust this strange proposition, at least within discreet limits; the favorable impression he had gained of Hamilton's humanity rendered the character of the offer far more plausible than would appear at first glance; and the formidable array of enemies, in plain view, seemed to make it expedient to avoid a conflict, if it could be done at no great sacrifice. The issue has somewhat modified the bearing of these considerations, but it does not appear, even now, that Boone was actuated by a short-sighted policy. That the attack failed, was simply due to the lack of determination in the leaders, and hardiness in the savages; and the confirmed treachery of white Indian leaders had not then been so clearly demonstrated as at a later period.

At all events, Boone was careful to guard against treachery; the conference was held within fifty yards of the palisade and the keenest marksmen were placed so as to best cover the retreat of the whites in case of necessity. A brief treaty was accordingly concluded, when the Indian negotiators came forward, saying that it was customary with them, on such occasions, for two Indians to shake hands with every white man in the treaty, as an evidence of entire friendship. "They immediately grappled us," says Boone, "but, although surrounded by hundreds of savages, we extricated ourselves from them, and escaped all safe into the garrison, except one that was wounded." On the first appearance of hostility, the garrison opened fire, doing considerable execution; the Indians were equally ready, and the retreating whites were exceedingly fortunate to escape from the shower of bullets that followed them, with only a single wound.

With this, the battle opened; the Indians, seeking shelter, began a brisk attack on every side, and, as Boone relates, "a constant fire ensued between us day and night, for the space of nine days." Every artifice familiar to the savage was employed in vain. At one time the garrison discovered, by the muddy character of the river, that the enemy was digging a mine, entering through the face of the high river bank. A countermine was immediately sunk within the fort, and the dirt thrown over the palisades as an intimation to the hostle miners that their work was discovered. The Indians were not disposed to prosecute a laborious enterprise in the face of probable failure, and this intimation proved sufficient to put an end to all further subterranean operations in this siege. The whole attack was marked more by vehemence than by valor; a rapid discharge of rifles was maintained throughout the siege, but at a pretty safe distance, and many of the bullets fell short of the fort and sank harmlessly upon the ground.*

The garrison, on the other hand, fired with deliberation, and generally only when a sure mark presented itself. The consequent disproportion of cause and effect on the part of the garrison, as compared with their own efforts, deeply impressed the Indians, and may account for the absence of any attempt to storm the stockade. The garrison numbered nearly fifty men, and an assault could scarcely have been made without the sacrifice of an equal number of the assailants. At such a cost even victory would have been purchased too dear, in the estimation of the Indian, and so the attack was continued at long range.

To such an attack, the fort was impregnable, and the improvident savages, finding their provisions running short, abruptly terminated the siege on August 20. In all this protracted engagement, the most formidable thus far in the history of Kentucky, the whites "had but two men killed, and four wounded; besides a number of cattle" destroyed. The Indians suffered more, having thirty-seven killed and a great number wounded.

On retiring from Boonesborough, the savages did not stay their retreat until they had reached their towns beyond the Ohio, where they found a nearer foe to engage their attention. This ended the regular campaign, but straggling bands of Indians continued to infest the forests of Kentucky, and the fall was not suffered to pass without such incidents as served to challenge the settlers' right of possession. Harrodsburg was attacked by one of these bands, but a sudden sally of the garrison easily beat off the assailants. In this skirmish one of the whites received a flesh wound in the face, which knocked him down. His antagonist, supposing him dead, ran up to secure his scalp, when the prostrate pioneer, having regained his senses in time, shot the savage dead and escaped to the fort.

*It is said that 125 pounds of lead were picked up about the fort, besides the bullets imbedded in the palisade. (See "Boone's Narrative.")

Indians were found frequenting the vicinity of St. Asaph's, and on one occasion, while ranging for "signs," Logan discovered a party at the Big Flat Lick, about two miles from his station. He immediately returned, raised a squad of men, and proceeding to the spring routed the savages with heavy loss. Not long after this event, Logan was again out in search of game and Indians, when, as he approached this lick he received a volley from a band secreted near by. This fire broke his arm, and slightly wounded him in the breast. The Indians immediately rushed upon him to take him captive, but, being mounted, he had the good fortune to escape, after one of his assailants got near enough to grasp his horse's tail. But such incidents were too common to excite serious alarm, and while settlers found in them sufficient cause to use caution in their movements, the general course of frontier life went on without marked interruption. The Indian invasion repelled, Boone sought his family in North Carolina, and did not return until 1780, and Kenton, less domestic in his tastes, sought adventure beyond the Ohio.

Kenton had joined Col. Clark in his Illinois expedition, and after the fall of Kaskaskia, returned to Harrodsburg with dispatches. Notwithstanding the importance of his mission, Kenton's love of adventure led him to indulge in exploits, the success of which alone saved him from rebuke. A little way from his starting point, Kenton and his companions fell in with a camp of Indians with a number of horses. The savages were attacked and dispersed, and the horses sent back to Kaskaskia. Pursuing their journey by way of Vincennes, the party stealthily traversed the village, secured two horses for each man, and pushed on. Reaching the White River, a raft was constructed on which to transport the guns and luggage, while the horses were driven into the water to swim across. On the opposite shore a party of Indians lay encamped, who seized the horses as they emerged, but failed to discover the Kentuckians. Hastily concealing themselves, the whites permitted the raft to float down the stream, and at night constructed a second one, and crossed at another point. Completing his journey without further incident, Kenton reached his destination just in time to take part in Boone's expedition to Paint Creek.

On the determination of the leader to return to Boonesborough, Kenton and Montgomery resolved to remain to "get a shot" and steal some horses. After waiting two days and a night in vain for a "shot," they solaced themselves with a fine horse apiece, on which they safely rode into the fort on the day after the Indians had raised the siege.

In the "piping times of peace" which followed, these adventurous spirits, joined by one named Clark, projected an expedition into the Indian country to procure more horses, and accordingly set out for Chillicothe in September. Reaching their destination in the night, they found a lot of animals in a corral, and succeeded in securing seven of them, but not without raising an alarm. Clinging to their booty, they rapidly made their way to the river, hotly pursued by the pillaged savages. On reaching the Ohio, they found it fretted up by the wind into a tumultuous state, and so boisterous that all their efforts failed to make the horses enter the water. With a foolhardy contempt for their danger, they resolved to wait one day, in the hope that the river would become smooth enough to afford a passage. In this they were not disappointed; but they now found an obstacle in the disposition of the horses, which had not yet recovered from their fright of the preceding day. Recognizing that further delay would bring the savages upon their heels, they turned loose the led horses, intending to escape with the ones they rode, but in an unfortunate moment of indecision, they reconsidered this wise conclusion, and determined to gain or lose all.

Turning about to recapture the horses just set free, the party had ridden but a short distance, when their ears were assailed by the loud whoop of an Indian. Utterly bereft of prudence, Kenton dismounted and cautiously went forward to reconnoiter. On reaching a commmanding ridge, he discovered two of the enemy mounted and in such close proximity that retreat was vain. He instantly presented his weapon, and pulled the trigger, but the gun flashed. The Indians were down upon the audacious horse-thief in an instant, but by rapid flight he gained some fallen timber in safety, and had eluded his pursuers, when, on emerging into an opening, he was espied by another member of the general party and taken captive. The savages, transported with rage at the daring attempt to steal their horses, gathered around him, upbraiding and beating him with their ramrods, when Montgomery, who had thus far escaped detection, chivalrously, but foolishly approached, fired an ineffectual shot and fled, only to yield his life and scalp to the savages that instantly pursued him. Clark, with the best judgment, hastily retreated at the first alarm, and reached the fort in safety.

Kenton was now to pay a severe penalty for his temerity. His captors spent the night near the river, and taxed their ingenuity to devise means to secure their prisoner from any chance of escape. Laying him flat upon his back, his legs were spread apart, and each foot stoutly fastened to a stake driven firmly in the ground; a pole was then laid across his breast, to which his extended arms were securely lashed, the thongs passing under his body from end to end of the pole, to prevent the possibility of his "working" loose; and a lariat, noosed about his neck, was drawn taut and attached to a sapling. It is needless to add that the savages found their victim safe in their toils in the morning.

Rapid preparations were then made to convey their prize to Chillicothe, during which the Indians seemed to find their native language inadequate to express their emotion, and assailed him with cuffs and epithets couched in broken English, the latter ranging from "a teef," "a hoss-steal," "a rascal," to a "d—d white man." Among the animals, for which Kenton dared so much, was an untamed colt, which the fiendish malice of the savages suggested as the proper means to carry him to their destination. The prisoner was accordingly placed upon the colt's back, his hands tied behind him, and his feet fastened by thongs passing under the animal's belly. This done, the horse was turned loose with blows and shouts, carrying his helpless rider through brush and briers to the great danger and suffering of Kenton, and the intense satisfaction of his foes. But fate, more kind than his savage tormentors, interposed, and after a few exhibitions of alarm and astonishment, the beast quietly submitted to its strange burden, and sedately joined the caravan.

On the third day the party reached Chillicothe, where Kenton was stripped of his clothing and tied to a stake. Here he was surrounded by a hooting mob of men, women and children, who scarified his back with repeated blows, and assailed his ears with every opprobrious epithet that their malignity could invent until midnight, when he was released and placed under guard until morning. Contrary to his expectations, instead of being remanded to the stake, he was ordered to run the gauntlet; in this trial his agile strength enabled him to disappoint the vengeance of his enemies by reaching the goal with but few serious blows. A council was then held, and Kenton learned from a brutal renegade white that his final fate had been deferred—that he was to be conducted to Wappatomica, and there burned.

Such intelligence was calculated to stimulate every sense of the captive to devise some way of escape, but it was not until the report of guns, and the shrill scalp halloo of his escort signaled their near approach to a town, that Kenton was emboldened to make such an attempt. With a startling cry he shook off his guards, and bounded into the thick under-brush. The character of the country favored his flight, and he soon left his astonished foes far in the rear, but forgetting his close proximity to the village, he rushed headlong into a group of the new enemy, called out by the signals, and was speedily returned to captivity.

The village was Pickaway, and after spend ing the night tied to a stake and attended by despair, he was led on the following day to his destination. Here he was again forced to run the gauntlet, and was severely hurt. Soon after, he was taken to the council which had been convened to decide his fate, and where he met Simon Girty, to whom he made himself known. The situation of his friend deeply touched the renegade's heart, and thus prompted he exerted his influence with the Indians with such effect as to secure Kenton's release. Taking him to his own wigwam, Girty supplied his old comrade with a complete suit of Indian clothing, and for three weeks was his constant companion.

Though free, Kenton was not unobserved by the savages, and escape was impossible. In the meantime a steady reaction set in, and he was one day suddenly summoned with Girty to attend a council; here, notwithstanding the renegade used his best endeavors, Kenton was bound and delivered to be burned at Sandusky. He was securely pinioned and led by a halter between mounted guards, and while thus marching through an Indian village, he was suddenly assaulted by a savage, who nearly severed his arm from the shoulder with an ax. The demoniacal savage would have inevitably ended Kenton's sufferings with another blow, had not his guards quickly interposed to save him for the torture of the stake. At another town he met the celebrated Mingo chief, Logan, whose noble spirit moved him to intercede for the young captive. After unusual exertions he failed to alter the determination of the warriors, but effected his object through an English Indian agent stationed at Sandusky.

Thus Kenton approached his fate; running the gauntlet thirteen times, narrowly escaping death on several occasions, his body emaciated and gaping with terrible wounds, he reached his destination with the assurance that on the morrow he should be burned. Here, the agent, Drewyer, begged possession of the captive that he might gain information of him concerning the frontier, and to this end wished to take him to Detroit. Permission was at last reluctantly granted, on condition that the prisoner should then be returned to his captors, and on this pretense Kenton was allowed to accompany the agent to the English headquarters. Once within the protection of the garrison, all fear of the stake was removed. Here Kenton rapidly recovered from the effects of the ill-usage, and being placed under little restraint, began to consider plans for a return to Kentucky. He was at this time only twenty-four years of age; "was fine looking, with a dignified and manly deportment and a soft, pleasing voice, and was, wherever he went, a favorite with the ladies." These attractions he turned to a good account in providing for his escape.

There was no difficulty in leaving the post, but the 200 miles of wilderness, which must be traversed, was tenanted with hostile savages, and the fate he had so narrowly escaped was too vivid in his mind to be lightly incurred again. However, his enforced stay gradually became more irksome, and having found two fellow-prisoners willing to accompany him, he set about procuring arms and supplies for the journey. A trader's wife had become greatly interested in his history, and through her assistance, he procured whatever was needed. On June 3, 1779, Kenton, Bullitt and Cofer set out on their perilous journey, which they ventured only to pursue at night, and thus after thirty-three days of alternate hiding and traveling, they reached the falls of the Ohio in safety.

The success of the Illinois campaign and the enactment of the celebrated land-law, passed in May, 1779, gave a remarkable impulse to the settlement of Kentucky. A general spirit of confidence was infused throughout the Territory of Virginia, and not only were large numbers encouraged to emigrate from the eastern settlements, but many of the settlers on the frontier, tired of the restraint imposed by the crowded character of the older stations, ventured out to form new ones. These, obedient to the same necessities, followed the form and character of the older ones, and consisted of a cluster of cabins, which, connected by a wall of palisades, enclosed a space that served the various purposes of park, parade-ground and corral. "Their original population, consisting of small numbers in general, was various, and depended on the party that could be collected—often upon the popularity of the leader. They were sometimes colonies from older stations, sometimes composed of recent immigrants. They were always receptacles for new-comers, and many of them by the accession of numbers, and additional cabins, swelled into villages in the course of a year or two, and were as suddenly depopulated when no longer influenced by surrounding danger." (Marshall.)

Among the earliest movements which mark this development, was that which resulted in the settlement formed near the falls of the Ohio. The families,* left by Clark on the island, waited only to learn the successful issue of the expedition before planting themselves on the main land. This was probably done in the fall of 1778, when, re-enforced by certain of the returning militia, under Col. Linn, they erected a stockade, "on the eastern side of the large ravine, which formerly entered the river at the present (1838) termination of Twelfth Street." In the succeeding spring this station felt the quickening influence of the time, and sent out several colonies. Prominently among these was one which established Linn's Station on Beargrass Creek, in Jefferson County, about ten miles from the falls; another planted Brashear's Station, at the mouth of Floyd's Fork, in Bullitt County; a third founded Sullivan's Station, on the Bardstown road, about five miles southeast of the falls, in Jefferson County; a fourth established itself in the near vicinity of the old stockade, and these became known as the Middle and Spring Stations.

A similar activity manifested itself in the interior. Early in the spring, Robert Patterson organized a company at Harrodsburg, and on April 1st, founded Lexington. It is probable that a single cabin alone marked the site of the proposed station until the 14th instant, when fourteen persons left Harrodsburg to make the new settlement their permanent home. This outpost gained considerable accessions during the year, and subsequently became one of the foremost stations on the frontier.

About the same time, Isaac Ruddle, of St. Asaph, accompanied by John Burger, penetrated still further north and erected a station, including Hinkston's old cabin on the south fork of the Licking, where he was soon afterward joined by his brother, James, and other families. Somewhat later, probably in the fall, Bryan's Station was established on the south bank of the north fork of the Elkhorn, about five miles northeast of Lexington. This colony consisted principally of immigrants from North Carolina, of whom the Bryans were the most conspicuous. There were four brothers of this family: Morgan, James, William and Joseph, all men in easy circumstances, with large families of children approaching maturity. William, though not the eldest, was the natural leader of the party. His wife was the sister of Boone, as was also the wife of William Grant, another member of this settlement. The station early fell a victim to the hostility of the savages. In the following May, while out hunting with a considerable party near the mouth of Cane Run, William Bryan and Grant were both seriously wounded by the Indians. Being mounted on the same horse and able to retain their seat, they escaped to the fort, where Bryan's wound proved fatal. The rest of the family, saddened and discouraged by this event, abandoned the station, and returned to North Carolina. The garrison, thus weakened, must have been obliged to resort to some other settlement, had not a considerable accession of Virginians, at this juncture, repaired this serious loss. The station continued to bear its founder's name, and became prominent in the subsequent "troublous time."

Less prominent settlements planted in this region, in 1779, were known as Martin's, Grant's and Todd's Stations. The first was

* Marshall (Vol. I, p. 67) gives the number of these families as thirteen; Clark, in his letter to the Hon. George Mason, referred to in a preceding part of this work, gives the number at "about twenty families." McMurtrie in his "Sketches of Louisville" 1819), places the number of families at six, but names only five, the record of the other having been lost. Casseday (History of Louisville, 1852), following the latter author, mentions these pioneers in the following strain: "Let this frail record, at least, lend its quota toward the honorable preservation of the names of Capt. James Patton, who piloted the first boat over the falls; Richard Chenoweth, John Tuel, William Faith and John McManus, the only names that history or tradition has given of those earliest settlers of our native city."

located where John Martin had built a cabin in 1775—about five miles south of Ruddle's Station and three miles below the site of Paris. Grant's was planted by a colony, of which Col. John Grant, of North Carolina, and Capt. William Ellis, of Virginia, were leaders, and was situated between Bryan's and the present site of Paris, about five miles northeast of the first-named place. It was greatly harrassed by the Indians, and in 1780 was abandoned by its founders, who returned to the East. Todd's was planted on the Hickman, near the site of Keene, in Jessamine County, by John and Levi Todd. They soon afterward abandoned it, and retired to Lexington.

Save the exceptions noted, these stations northwest of the Kentucky River were off-shoots of Harrodsburg; but while the frontier capital was thus contributing to the settlement of that exposed region, other of its people were planting settlements within the shadow of its protection in Mercer County. Of these, the strongest was known as Bowman's Station, located six miles east of Harrodsburg, which was settled in 1779 by thirty families under the lead of Col. Abram Bowman. Of another, Gordon's Station, only its name has been preserved; while a third was established by the McAfees. The early adventures of this family in Kentucky have been elsewhere noted, and the rise of their station on the Salt River, six or seven miles below Harrodsburg, marks their return after an absence of some four years.

They made a clearing and some other improvements at this point in 1775, but in the fall they had returned to Virginia, leaving their crops and forty head of cattle in the care of the settlers, who had joined them and proposed to remain. In May of the following year they provided an ample stock of necessary supplies and attempted to bring them forward in canoes, by way of the Gauley and Kanawha Rivers, but finding this impracticable, they stored them in a cache and returned for pack-horses. The disturbing events which preceded the Revolutionary war frustrated their plans. and September had arrived before they could return to their depot. This they found broken open, and the supplies wantonly wasted, or from long exposure to the elements rendered entirely worthless. This necessitated a second return to Virginia, where they found the war actually begun, and giving up their plans for emigration, they joined the American army. Two years elapsed before they were free to renew their plans, when they were found once more on the frontier, established in a quadrangular inclosure of cabins and stockades.

Similar signs of development were to be found about Logan's Station. William Whitley, who came from Virginia in 1775 and joined Logan in 1779, established a settlement not far from St. Asaph, within the present limits of Lincoln County. Here he was joined by the family of Samuel Daviess and others in the same year. About the same time, William Worthington, one of the "Long Hunters," erected a station near the present northern line of Lincoln County; others went farther north to the vicinity of Danville, where "Field's lottery cabin" was erected in 1774; and in the fall, Pittman erected a station on the Green River, near the mouth of Pittman's Creek, about five miles west of Greensburg.

From Boonesborough, Col. John Floyd went out in the early spring, and planted a station at the mouth of Beargrass. This he soon afterward abandoned, and settled on the middle fork of this creek, about six miles from the falls. In the succeeding summer or fall, he was followed by Squire Boone, who fixed his settlement at "Painted Stone," on Clear Creek, near the site of Shelbyville. This station grew rapidly in size and numbers, and for upward of two years was the only fort between the posts on the Beargrass and Harrodsburg. Strode made a station two miles from Winchester in Clarke County, in this year, and about a mile above Boonesborough. Nathaniel Hart, in company with a party from Pennsylvania, established another station on the bottom lands of the Kentucky.

Of the large accessions received from the east, some emigrated in parties of considerable numbers, under the direction of competent leaders, and effected a settlement in safety. Others came singly, or in companies of two or three, simply to "spy out the land," while many came hampered by their families, and encumbered with household effects, prepared to settle on "bare creation." These adventurers, inexperienced in the dangers of a land beset by lurking bands of savage foes, fell easy victims to the ambush by day and the assault by night. Murders followed in rapid succession; and the savages, committing their depredations with comparative impunity, threatened to entirely stop the inflowing tide of settlers. Not only humanity, therefore, but the very permanence of the settlements also, demanded that this life-giving current be protected. But with this necessity clearly apparent, it is quite probable that the bold remedy of an invasion of the Indian country would have been indefinitely deferred, had not a terrible victory of the savages incited the frontiersmen to immediate action.*

In 1778, Col. David Rogers had been dispatched to New Orleans by the governor of Virginia, to procure munitions for the military operations in the West. Spain had not yet declared war, and the Spanish authorities were obliged to observe caution in granting such contraband supplies to the Americans. Concealing his large boats and most of his command in the Ozark River, Rogers proceeded to his destination, accompanied by Capt. Benham and a boat's crew. On arriving at New Orleans, he found an English sloop-of-war in port, the captain of which observed the arrival of the Americans with suspicion, and maintained so close a scrutiny upon their movements that their mission seemed likely to end in failure.

It was at this time that Capt. Benham was sent overland to Clark, at Kaskaskia, probably with dispatches. The captain accomplished his task and safely reached the falls of the Ohio, in the spring of 1779. Soon after his arrival, the two keel-boats of Col. Rogers, who had succeeded in evading the watchfulness of the British officers, came up and took Benham on board. The boats then proceeded up the river for Pittsburgh, the captain in command of one of them.

On reaching the sand-bar above the present site of Cincinnati, it was discovered to be bare half the way across the river, and at the same time a number of savages on rafts and in canoes were observed coming down the Little Miami, its flood-tide carrying the Indian flotilla across to the Kentucky side. Confident in the superior strength of his force, Rogers ordered the boats to draw up to the Kentucky shore, and the troops to land for the purpose of surprising these warriors. Impressed with the idea that he had only a small party to deal with, the commander proceeded with too little caution, and just as his movements promised the fullest success of the maneuver, he found himself completely environed by an overwhelming number of the enemy. The first intimation of his perilous situation was followed by a murderous volley from every side, which was instantly succeeded by an irresistible assault with the tomahawk. The whites could make no successful resistance, and of the forty or fifty engaged, not more than ten ever returned to their families. One boat, left in charge of five men, escaped capture by putting off into the river and floating down to the falls; others of the crew escaped by a determined effort to break through the enemy's lines, though most were killed in this attempt.

Two of those who joined in this desperate charge, were Capt. Robert Benham and John Watson, the story of whose sufferings and rescue is one of the most thrilling of the authentic tales of the border. In escaping the toils of the enemy, Benham was disabled by a wound through both his hips. He instantly fell to the ground, but fortunately near a prostrate tree, which afforded him a convenient place of concealment. Here he lay undiscovered through the next day, while the Indians near by were scalping and plundering his slain comrades. On the evening of the second day, having retained his rifle and ammunition, and the savages having abandoned the field, he shot a raccoon, which he discovered descending a tree near him. Scarcely had the report of his gun been heard, when he was startled by a human cry in the near vicinity. Hastily reloading his gun in the expectation of discovering an enemy, he awaited further developments in silence. The cry was soon repeated, but Benham, maintaining his silence, cocked his gun, and prepared to fire at the first sight of an approaching foe. The cry came a third time from a nearer point, and the wounded officer could distinguish the words: "Whoever you are, for God's sake, answer me."

*Appendix A, Note 11.

The cry proved to come from Watson, who had been disabled by wounds in both arms, and had escaped death by hiding. The two wounded men were soon together, and each supplying the other's defect, they supported themselves in their crippled condition for several weeks. In this division of labor, Benham killed and cooked the game, and dressed the wounds of both, tearing off their shirts for bandages; Watson in the meanwhile made his legs useful in kicking the slaughtered game within the reach of his companion, and in raking and rolling brush and small wood where he could use it for fuel. The greatest difficulty was experienced in getting water, but Benham finally contrived to put the brim of his hat between his companion's teeth, who then waded into the water until it reached his neck, when he could manage to fill the hat and return with it to the captain.

In a few days the small game within the reach of Benham's rifle was all destroyed or driven off; when Watson, going out and making a wide detour, would drive the game within the reach of his companion. Wild turkeys were fortunately abundant, and they had no difficulty in securing all the food they needed. In this way they sustained themselves until their wounds so far healed as to permit Benham to travel, and Watson to afford slight assistance with one hand. They then changed their location, erected a small shed at the mouth of the Licking, where they kept watch for some passing boat to effect their escape.

After maintaining this crippled existence for some six weeks, they discovered a flat-boat floating down the stream. Benham made signals to the crew, but fearing an ambush into which they suspected these efforts were intended to decoy them, the occupants of the boat gave no heed, and the poor wretches, with feelings of despair, saw their first chance of rescue slipping from their grasp. After passing them half a mile, however, a crew put off from the boat and cautiously approached the point where they were. Nearly naked, and their countenances rendered repulsive by their unkempt hair and beard, the unfortunate men were objects more calculated to give rise to suspicion than pity; but their true plight was soon revealed, and they were taken to the falls, where they fully recovered.

Early in 1779, Washington projected a movement against the Indians all along the border. Gen. Sullivan was directed against the Six Nations in New York, and with him, Col. Brodhead was ordered to co-operate by an attack on the tribes on the Pennsylvania frontier, from Fort Pitt. On April 21, these plans were so far modified as to change the direction of Brodhead's attack from the tribes on that border to the western Indians, and to make the capture of Detroit his ultimate object. It is probable that it was arranged, through the governor of Virginia, that the frontier militia of Kentucky, should co-operate with Brodhead in his western movements, and Bowman accordingly issued instructions, in April, that the settlers should plant their corn as early as possible, and prepare for an expedition in May. For some unrecorded reason, the western campaign was abandoned; Brodhead proceeded up the Alleghany, inflicted severe chastisement upon the tribes in this region, and the Kentucky expedition did not move.

Public affairs were in this posture when the few of Rogers' command who escaped found their way to Harrodsburg, and brought the fearful tidings of that massacre. Samuel Frazee, a member of Mr. Harrod's company at the falls, also came from the mouth of the Licking, bringing the alarm to the frontier capital. The abandoned expedition was hastily revived, and so much of the fighting strength of the interior settlements as could prudently be spared, was ordered to rendezvous at Lexington, from whence the whole should proceed to the mouth of the Licking, where the contingent from the falls was directed to join them with batteaux, on which to cross the river.

The force thus brought together consisted of five companies. Of those from the interior, one, under Benjamin Logan, was drawn from Logan's, Whitley's and Clark's stations; another from Boonesborough was commanded by John Holder; a third recruited from Bryan's and Lexington Stations, with additions from Harrodsburg, was led by Levi Todd; and the fourth, under the command of Josiah Harlan, was made up of recruits from Wilson's and McAffee's Stations, besides a contingent from Harrodsburg, and a body of men, under the command of Lieut. John Haggin, from Ruddle's and Martin's Stations. The men were all volunteers and "found themselves." Each man carried his munitions and subsistence, the latter being restricted to a "peck of parched corn," though "some public beef" was issued at the rendezvous.

The expedition set forth in July. The line of march led from Lexington down the west bank of the Licking; reaching the headwaters of the Bank Lick Creek, the little army encamped for the night, and on the next day reached the Ohio. Meeting the company of William Harrod here, the organization of the expedition was completed by the appointment of Maj. George Michael Bedinger, as adjutant. On crossing the river, the order of March divided the force into three divisions, commanded respectively by Bowman, Logan and Frazee.* The trail of the red men was struck near the present site of Cincinnati; and followed to old Chillicothe, with such success as to come upon the town without betraying their presence. Scouts were sent forward, who reported, on their return, a large number of savages present, but that they were entirely unconscious of the near approach of an enemy.

The whites had reached a point about a mile distant from the Indian town, when the spies were sent forward. It was in the early part of the night, and when their report was received, some hours later, it was arranged that Logan should lead his force to the left, while Bowman should turn to the right, and together they should encircle the town, the attack to begin when their forces joined in the rear of the village. Logan quickly accomplished his part of the maneuver, and impatiently awaited the arrival of the other wing to begin the attack. The hours slowly passed and daylight began to dawn, but still Bowman's party did not make its appearance. Anxious to avoid jeopardizing the success of the expedition by premature action, Logan ordered his men to secrete themselves in the tall grass and wait for the expected signal to attack. In gaining cover, however, some of the men attracted the attention of one of the dogs in the town, which instantly set up a furious barking. Soon a single warrior was observed to emerge from a cabin and peer carefully about to discover the cause of the dog's disturbance, cautiously advancing at the same time toward where the whites lay concealed. Logan imposed the utmost silence upon his men, hoping to capture the savage without alarming the rest of the inhabitants, but just as this design seemed in a fair way to be realized, a gun was discharged from the other side of the town by one of Bowman's men.

The town was instantly alive; the inhabitants shouting and hurrying to a strong central cabin, intent upon making a stubborn defense. Recognizing the uselessness of further disguise Logan led his men close upon the retreating savages, taking advantage of the deserted cabins to get close to the Indian stronghold. Here he found himself in a critical position; the savages, having recovered from their panic, were maintaining a rapid and well-directed fire upon their assailants. The enemy greatly out-numbered the whites in Logan's party, which was in such a position that neither an advance nor a retreat could be made without great exposure. It was at this juncture that the intrepid leader looked in vain for some evidence of support from the other division. Observing that the Indians had become aware of their superiority in numbers, and were showing an intention of turning his flanks, he began to prepare a movable breast-work of doors and puncheons taken from the deserted cabins, under cover of which he proposed to storm the enemy's position.

*The narrative of Samuel Frazee, which assigns himself the command of one of the divisions, differs materially from other generally accepted accounts of the expedition, but the fact of his participation in the movement, and the fortuitous publication of his story, give it a certain sanction, which may render it worth considering. However, while the evidence at hand does not authoritatively controvert his statements, a reasonable question may arise, whether the prominent part he assumed in his narrative would have entirely escaped the notice even of a somewhat inaccurate record of that event. The order of March as represented in the narrative is confirmed by an independent deposition quoted by Mr. Collins (Vol. II, p. 425), though the leaders are not named. The number of men in the expedition is estimated from 135 to 300.

Before the necessary preparations were completed, a messenger from Bowman reached Logan with orders to retreat. Beside himself with astonishment and indignation, Logan had no recourse save to obey, but such a movement to the undisciplined militia was a difficult one to perform with success. "Each man selected the time, manner and route of his retreat for himself. Here, a solitary Kentuckian would start up from behind a stump and scud away through the grass, dodging and turning to avoid the balls which whistled around him. There, a dozen men would run from a cabin and scatter in every direction, each anxious to save himself and none having leisure to attend to his neighbors." In this way, Logan's men soon rejoined the party under Bowman, which for some unaccountable reason had remained where they had halted the night before.* Here confusion became worse confounded. "Some cursed their colonel, some reproached other officers, one shouted one thing, one bellowed another, but all seemed to agree that they ought to make the best of their way home without the loss of a moment's time."

In the midst of all this disorder the commander of the expedition seemed paralyzed, and Logan, ably seconded by other officers, restored something like discipline among their followers. The sharp crack of the Indians' rifles aided these efforts in no small degree, for nothing cleared the mental vision of the pioneers more readily than a sense of danger. The Indians, astonished to see their foes rout themselves in this unceremonious manner, hesitated for a few moments to make a close pursuit, but recognizing the sincerity of the retreat, they were soon down upon the disordered whites. The Kentuckians quickly formed a square, and taking shelter behind trees, readily repelled the attack. The retreat was then begun in an orderly manner, but the column had proceeded no great distance,* when the savages renewed their attack, this time on all sides.

Matters now assumed a serious aspect; the men began to grow unsteady, the colonel continued incompetent, and the savages seemed likely to succeed in their design of retarding the retreat until re-enforcements could be hurried forward to aid in the attack. At this critical juncture, Capts. Logan and Harrod, Maj. Bedinger and others, leading some of the best mounted of their followers, charged the savages, forcing them to leave their coverts, and cutting many of them down, while the main body made good use of their rifles upon such of the enemy as were forced to expose themselves. This spirited action dispersed the enemy, and the discouraged and weary troops were allowed to continue their march without disturbance. The retreat followed the line of the outward march, crossing to Kentucky; the plunder was disposed of by auction, and the men discharged to take such paths as would the most easily bring them to their several homes.

Of the result of this expedition, the most conflicting opinions were entertained. The whites, at a cost of eight or nine killed, had captured 163 horses, had burned the greater part of the village, and inflicted a loss of fifteen or twenty slain (the noted chief,

*"Sketches of Western Adventure," by Rev. John A. McClung, 1832, p. 113, et. seq. Frazee, in the narrative quoted by Mr. Collins (Vol. II, p. 426), says: "About midnight we attempted to move on three sides of the Indian camp and were to remain stationary, within good gun-shot of the Indians, until daylight, when we were to make a simultaneous attack upon the camp. Just as we had gotten up within a short range, an Indian dog gave the alarm. A tall Indian raised up from the center of their camp and I shot him down, and immediately gave word to my men to fire. The Indians shot from the cracks of their huts, and after we had fired three rounds I gave word to retreat. I saw that we were fighting to a great disadvantage."

*McClung says: "But scarcely had they advanced half a mile." Bradford (notes on Kentucky in the Kentucky Gazette) says: "had not marched more than eight or ten miles."

Blackfish, was among them) upon the savages, yet the expedition had evidently miscarried. While, under the circumstances, the result was far less than a disaster, still it could not be disguised that the object of the campaign, in which the whole strength of Kentucky had been enlisted, had proved sadly inconclusive, and that, too, without any satisfactory reason. Gen. Ray and others, competent to judge intelligently of the matter, did not discredit the commander of the expedition, but the general disappointment made Col. Bowman the object of its resentment. Public sentiment, therefore, gradually retired Bowman and preferred Logan, whose services had certainly been marked by gallantry and efficiency.

Unsatisfactory as the result of this expedition proved, it served, with the more efficient one conducted from Pittsburgh by Col. Brodhead, to temporarily relieve the border of the presence of any formidable array of savages. Predatory attacks were still made, but with less frequency and success, and the tide of immigration continued unabated. Even the rigor of winter failed to oppose a sufficient barrier to the ardor of the immigrants, and many families, traveling to Kentucky, were forced to camp on the way, where they suffered great privations.

The winter of 1779–80 was unusually severe, and is noted in the annals of the State as "the hard winter." The water in the rivers was frozen to an extraordinary depth, while that in the shallow streams was converted into ice to the very bottom. The frequent fall of snow, which the regularity of the temperature preserved from wasting, early covered the ground to a great depth, and remained so long as to threaten the extermination of brute life. Thousands of large and small animals of the forest perished, while the domestic animals of the settlers, despite their care, fell victims to exposure and starvation by hundreds. Families on the road, their progress impeded by the snow, soon exhausted their slender stock of provisions, and in many cases were obliged to feed on the wasted carcasses of their perished animals. The spring brought its share of evils, but it was none the less hailed with lively satisfaction. Much of the stock which had survived cold and hunger was swept away by floods, and travel was greatly impeded, but these were temporary ills.

Privations did not end with the vernal season, however. The game, invigorated with the fresh verdure, supplied the people with wholesome meat, but the supply of corn proved inadequate to the demand occasioned by the large accession to the population on the frontier. Before the end of winter the people were forced to practice the closest economy in the use of bread, and long before a new crop became available there was no corn to be had. During this period the nominal price of the cereal at the falls varied from $50 per bushel in December, 1779, to $165 in January, 1780, and $30 in May. These prices were based on the value of depreciated continental currency, but they represent a wonderful exaggeration of the value, even when expressed in coin.

These facts, unknown or unheeded in the older settlements, did not deter others from seeking new homes in the West, and the spring of 1780 witnessed an unprecedented immigration. Besides those who followed the early routes by tedious overland journeys, large numbers came down the Ohio to the falls, and thence proceeded inland by wagon. In the preceding fall and in this spring, Floyd notes, in his correspondence with Col. Preston, the arrival of 300 large family boats at the falls, and that as many as ten or fifteen wagons could be seen daily setting off for the interior. New stations continued to spring up in all directions, generally in the vicinity of those already established, though a few more adventurous souls settled in the isolated regions now embraced in the counties of Nelson, Hardin, Green and Logan. Many of the new-comers, however, remained in the vicinity of the falls, and the cluster of six stations, planted here, soon numbered as many hundred inhabitants.

The settlement at this point was rapidly growing in importance. Clark, on turning over the civil government of the Illinois country to Col. Todd, had fixed his headquarters at the falls, and here in the spring of 1780, he was joined by Col. George Slaughter with 150 State troops from Virginia. This promise of security, with the natural advantages which the river navigation gave it, confirmed the general opinion that "the Falls of the Ohio is a place, of all others within the colony, will admit of a town." Accordingly in May (1780), the Virginia legislature passed "an act for establishing the town of Louisville." This act, made John Todd, Jr., Stephen Trigg, George Slaughter, John Floyd, William Pope, George Merriweather, Andrew Hines, James Sullivan and Marshall Brashiers, trustees, provided for the platting of certain lands, and for the sale of lots "at the court houses of adjacent counties," and required the purchasers "to hold their said lots subject to the condition of building on each a dwelling-house sixteen feet by twenty at least, with a brick or stone chimney, to be finished within two years from date of sale." This period was subsequently extended, on account of Indian disturbances, but thenceforth the town of Louisville, which received its name in grateful recognition of the French monarch's assistance in the Revolutionary war, had a permanent place in the annals of Kentucky.

On the 10th of May a land office was opened at Harrodsburg for the reception of warrants issued by the treasurer of Virginia, and the holders of these claims, or their agents, thronged the office. The object was to secure the location of lands, to which these warrants entitled the owners, and a majority of the men present in Kentucky were interested in this business. In the presence of this overshadowing interest, the danger to be apprehended from the enemy was forgotten. The report of "fresh signs," that some one was fired on, or even that a settler had been killed or captured, created but a momentary bustle; a scouting party might be induced by the circumstance to go out, but its duties were quickly dispatched, and its members were soon engaged in the pursuit of the hour—the acquisition of land.

There were others, however, who were so situated as to give more attention to public affairs, and Clark about this time was engaged in an enterprise, which, though of the first importance and conceived in wise statesmanship, foreboded no good to Kentucky. The design of erecting a fort near the mouth of the Ohio was intimated in Gov. Patrick Henry's instructions to Col. Clark in 1778, and in the succeeding June, Henry's successor gave express orders to carry it out. The object, though not yet accomplished, had not been forgotten, and Gov. Thomas Jefferson in January and April, 1780, reiterated his orders for the fulfillment of this design. The question of the western boundary of the united colonies had already been broached at the Spanish court—a question, which Jefferson had foreseen must arise with England, in case of a victorious issue of the colonial struggle. In such an event, Jefferson was determined to be in actual possession of the Northwest, by means of a chain of fortified posts, of which the one on the Mississippi, and those in the Illinois country, indicated a direction which must make Detroit the northern terminus.

This was indeed the plan which received the sanction of Jefferson's State policy as well as of Clark's ambition, and accordingly, in the spring of 1780, Clark set out from Louisville with 200 troops to accomplish the first part of the grand design. Going down the river to a point on the Mississippi, five miles below the mouth of the Ohio, he erected a stout stockade, which he called Fort Jefferson, in honor of the governor. Besides a small garrison left in the fort, a number of families, persuaded by the unusual inducements offered, located near by and took forcible possession of a region where the Chickasaws had long held undisputed sway. This nation had been on friendly terms with the whites, and it was a grave oversight that their permission was not sought, before the fort was erected. As it was, however, this unprovoked invasion of their territory aroused their resentful patriotism, and these hitherto peaceful tribes harried the western and southern boundaries of Kentucky, until the evacuation of the fort in the next year removed the cause of their hostilities.

Clark's designs were not greatly misinterpreted by the successor of Hamilton at Detroit, and the new base of operations established on the Ohio incited him to fresh activity in the attempt to cripple the settlements of Kentucky, which thus menaced the British power in the Northwest. Fort Pitt was less feared, not simply because more remote, but also because its expeditions westward had generally proved abortive, and the contest was therefore accepted as lying between Clark, with his fearless frontiersmen, and the British at Detroit, aided by the hostile tribes north of the Ohio. On recovering from the effect of Clark's audacious campaign in the Illinois country, the English commandant at Detroit, descending upon Vincennes, had gained a cheap victory, and planned for the next year an expedition which was to set out from the captured post and fall upon the stations in Kentucky, while another should at the same time strike from the region farther east. The subsequent recapture of Vincennes, and with it the commandant, seriously interrupted this programme, and it was not until 1780 that his successor could prepare a counter-stroke to Clark's gallant victory; but this, he determined, should be overwhelming.

The expedition consisted of about 1,000 Canadians and Indians, with six pieces of artillery, under the command of Col. Byrd. These forces were rendezvoused on the 1st of June, and immediately set out for Kentucky. Such formidable preparations could scarcely be hidden even in the recesses of the Ohio forests. Rumors of the organization of an expedition with artillery, destined to attack Louisville, were noted by Floyd in his correspondence as early as May, and yet such was the overweening confidence or general distraction of the people in securing their lands, that no reasonable precaution was taken to ascertain the truth of the rumor or to guard against surprise. Byrd was accordingly allowed to approach at his convenience without opposition or observation.

In the absence of any wheel-ways, the artillery was brought down the Big Miami; thence to the Licking, which was ascended as far as the present town of Falmouth. Here the ordnance was landed, and the line of march slowly pursued up one branch of the river to Ruddle's Station. The invading force had been twelve days in making the distance from the Ohio River, having chopped out a wagon road most of the way, and yet, on the 22d of June, the first intimation that the garrison of Ruddle's Station had of the approach of the overwhelming army was the discharge of a piece of artillery, in their immediate vicinity. This portentous sound was quickly followed by the appearance of the hostile host and a summons to surrender to the forces of his Brittanic majesty's representative. Resistance was out of the question, and Capt. Ruddle stipulated only that the garrison should become prisoners solely of the English. This was agreed upon, but no sooner were the gates unbarred, than the savages rushed in and seized on the whites, each claiming the victim in his clutches as his individual property.

The most heart-rending scenes were enacted. Several reluctant prisoners were instantly dispatched with the tomahawk. Little children, convulsed with grief and fright, were torn from the arms of their mothers; wives were separated from their husbands, and scarcely two of any family were destined to be near each other in captivity. In vain did Ruddle remonstrate with Col. Byrd. While anxious to fulfill his part of the engagement, the commander found himself helpless in the hands of the insatiable savages. The prisoners were stripped of their property, and divided among their Indian captors, who, having thoroughly rifled the station, now demanded to be led against Martin's Station, only five miles away. This, the British officer refused to do until he had exacted a solemn promise of the chiefs that their followers should be satisfied with the plunder alone.

Martin's Station was found carelessly resting in the same foolish security with the rest of the border, utterly unconscious of the tragedy, which had just been enacted a few miles distant. The demand for the surrender of the station was quickly acceded to by the garrison, who, profiting by the fate of Ruddle's party, were recognized as the prisoners of the English. After plundering this station, the Indians clamored to be led against Lexington, but this Byrd refused to do, assigning the difficulty of moving his artillery, the probability of failure in the attack, and the necessity of taking advantage of the present high water to effect a retreat, as his reasons. While these suggestions had sufficient plausibility to satisfy the savages and still occasion some doubt as to his real sentiments, the reader will not greatly err if he credit the commanding officer with the possession of such humanity as led him to refuse to become accessory to further horrors, such as he had witnessed at the captured stations.

The retreat decided upon, the whole force returned to the point of debarkation, where, the ordnance and stores being reloaded, the Canadians retraced their outward route, while the Indians, separating from their allies, took a shorter road for their towns, carrying the prisoners taken at Ruddle's Station with them. Among the captives was John Hinkston, who had returned to his "improvement" when the advent of Ruddle's party had rendered it reasonably safe. He was a brave and experienced woodsman, and managed to make his escape on the first night of the retreat. Taking advantage of the guard's attempting to start a fire, he leaped into the darkness, where the friendly undergrowth enabled him to elude the swift pursuit of the savages. After many narrow escapes from recapture, he succeeded in reaching the fort at Lexington on the next day, where his story was the first information the garrison had of the disaster which had befallen the more advanced stations.

On the heel of these events, Clark returned from Fort Jefferson to find a letter from the governor, urging an expedition against the Indians on the upper waters of the Miami, and especially with a view to destroy the trading post known as Loramie's Store, which served the English as a depot of supplies for the neighboring tribes. The events just narrated added a more powerful incentive, and Clark immediately proceeded to Harrodsburg to enlist the borderers in the new crusade. Here he found the settlers oblivious of every other interest, eagerly pressing their claims, and deaf to any appeal which was calculated to lead them away from the absorbing pursuit. With the cordial cooperation of the surveyors, Clark issued an order temporarily closing the land office, and sent his proclamation through the settlements, setting forth the urgent reason for his action, and calling for volunteers to aid him in chastising the savages. Thus brought to their senses, the people quickly rallied to his standard. Clark had a body of State troops at Louisville, which was dignified with the title of "regiment," though scarcely numbering more than 300 men. With these, and the volunteers from the various stations, the force assembled at the mouth of Licking in July, numbered about 1,000* men, besides some artillery conveyed up the river from Louisville.

The expedition was conducted with skill and good fortune, and the invaders succeeded in reaching Piqua unannounced. A stubborn skirmish ensued when each of the belligerent forces lost seventeen killed. The Indians finally gave way, and after destroying the town and growing crops, Logan was dispatched with his regiment to destroy the trading post at Pickaway. By this time the savages had learned of the presence of a hostile force in their midst, and Logan found only a deserted town and store. These he burned, and cutting the corn, returned to the main body, when, the whole expedition retiring to the Licking, the volunteers were discharged.

This campaign, though scarcely more conclusive in its results than the one it was designed to retaliate, had the good result of relieving Kentucky of further formidable inroads during the remaining part of the year. The usual predatory bands of savages continued to infest the border, however, and waylaying the unwary hunter at the various licks, or on the frequented trails, inflicted considerable damage. It was in an adventure with one of these bands that Daniel Boone signalized his return to the frontier. He had brought his family from North Carolina to Boonesborough in the summer, and had been closely engaged on his "improvement" until October, when, with his brother Edward, he went to the lower Blue Lick to secure a supply of salt. On their homeward journey they were fired on by a party of Indians; Edward was killed and scalped, and Daniel compelled to seek safety in instant flight. His start and superior skill soon enabled him to place a safe distance between himself and his pursuers, but, with the aid of a dog, the savages found no difficulty in following his trail, and pressed him so closely that concealment was impossible. The situation was becoming critical, but observing that his only chance of escape was in destroying the dog, Boone halted until the baying animal came within range of his gun, when he shot the troublesome brute, and escaped in safety to the fort.

*The papers of Capt. James Patton, of Louisville, placed the number at 998, divided into two regiments under the immediate commands of Cols. Linn and Logan. See Butler, p. 117.

Such attacks were not submitted to by the settlers without some attempt at reprisal, but these efforts on the part of the whites were attended with very meager results. Indeed it was the opinion of leading men in the colonies that the western border could only be rendered reasonably secure by the capture of Detroit. After the failure of McIntosh in 1778, Washington renewed the project, but after vainly making repeated efforts to put the movement on foot he felt obliged to forego this undertaking, as it involved too great an expense for the limited continental resources.

Jefferson could not so readily yield this object. The constant demand upon Virginia for several hundred men and their necessary supplies, all seriously needed on the Atlantic border, urged the Virginia executive to devise some means to rid the commonwealth of this menacing post in the West, and by one grand expenditure of men and money to stop the continual drain upon the resources of the State. The estimated cost of the movement was placed at £2,000,000, a sum which even made this resolute patriot hesitate. In September, 1780, however, Jefferson wrote the American commander-in-chief that the commonwealth had determined to undertake the enterprise, provided he would grant the State such military supplies as were necessary, Virginia furnishing the men and subsistence and conducting the expedition. This was agreed upon, and the New Year opened with the prospect that this troublesome post of the enemy would soon be in the hands of the Americans.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE PRICE OF LIBERTY.

THE early years of Kentucky's struggle with the united forces of the English and Indians, while marked by cruel reverses and discouraging casualties, were nevertheless relieved by such evidences of general success as to encourage the settlers to expect victory in the end. The later years, on the contrary, proved more exacting upon the fortitude of those who still dared to brave the perils of the frontier. The long-continued strain, which the war imposed upon the older communities, greatly reduced their resources for their own defense, and left none to be lightly expended in the defense of the frontier, which the prevailing sentiment began to regard as maintained largely in a spirit of fool-hardiness. The enemy was not similarly affected. Hitherto the allies seemed to have carried on their attacks with more determination, and, though rather by good fortune than by good strategy, secured their most effective victories in these trying years. Happily the end of the war brought relief, just when the frontier forts were about to fail, and the darkest hour of the struggle was thus made to give way to the dawn of peace. But the opening days of 1781 revealed nothing of this. A deceptive lull in hostilities reassured the settlers, while the leaders, planning a new expedition against Detroit, hoped the event was preparing that should bring speedy relief to the border.

Clark had gone to Richmond to aid in concerting these measures, and under date of December 28, 1780, Washington inclosed to Jefferson an order on Brodhead, the officer in command at Fort Pitt, to furnish the representative of Virginia with a company of artillery, ammunition, intrenching tools, and a force of men sufficient for a captain's or major's command. It was provided that beside such regular troops as Clark had at Louisville, and those to be secured at Fort Pitt, the 2,000 troops to form the attacking force should be drawn from the militia of the western counties of Virginia proper, and from Kentucky. Accordingly, on the 22d of January, 1781, Clark was commissioned "brigadier-general of the forces to be embodied in an expedition westward of the Ohio," which was to rendezvous at Louisville by the 15th of March.

In the meantime an obstacle had arisen to delay the enterprise. Benedict Arnold, eager to prove the sincerity of his treason, had secured a commission to lead a raid into Virginia, and Clark took temporary command under Baron Steuben, who covered Petersburg from the attack of the enemy. Relieved from this duty, the general energetically set about recruiting the force destined for the western expedition. In the preceding fall, Kentucky had been divided into three counties, with Floyd, Logan and Todd as county-lieutenants, and the respective regiments of militia placed under their command as colonels, with William Pope, Stephen Trigg and Daniel Boone as lieutenant-colonels. With such names it was not difficult to conjure up a formidable body of militia, especially for an expedition led by Clark, but to raise an available force of 2,000 men was a large undertaking under the most favorable circumstances. It was designed to make the attack after the Wabash had become clear of ice, and before the lakes opened, but the most vexatious delay was experienced, and it was not until the middle of summer that Clark reached Louisville. By this time the golden opportunity had passed, and the activity of the enemy on the border finally put an end to the general's long cherished plan of reducing the English stronghold at Detroit.

It is not probable that the enemy fathomed the plans of the Kentucky general, but the operations of the savages were well calculated to afford the greatest obstacle to their successful execution. With the opening of spring, marauding bands spread through the region south of the Ohio, attacking the less protected settlements, waylaying the unwary by the principal trails and springs, and creating so great a concern for the safety of the stations that it is probable only a comparatively small number of the militia could have prudently been spared for the expedition, had it prospered so far as to set forth. In March the several stations on the Beargrass were attacked, and Col. Linn and Capts. Tipton and Chapman killed. Pursuing one of these bands, Capt. Aquilla Whittaker, with fifteen men, followed the trail of the retreating enemy to the foot of the rapids where, supposing the Indians had crossed the river, the whites took canoes to continue the pursuit. They were scarcely embarked when they were assailed from the shore by a volley which killed or wounded nine of their number. The rest, undaunted by this disaster, returned to the shore and boldly faced the foe, but the Indians did not remain to contest the field.

About the same time another tragedy was being enacted about seventy-five miles to the southeast. Here, on the head-waters of the Green River, the father and brother of Mrs. Benjamin Logan had built four cabins, marking a large, irregular, square area, but unprotected by palisades. These families had been residents of Logan's Fort until this spring, when, thinking that little danger from the Indians was to be apprehended in a locality so remote from the Ohio, they took possession of their new homes. They did not long remain undiscovered. One night in March a small party of Indians concealed themselves near enough to command the doors of the cabins, and in the morning, as William Montgomery, Sr., stepped out of his cabin in the gray of the early dawn, he was immediately shot dead, as was a slave boy who closely followed him. Montgomery's daughter, Jane, then a young woman, promptly closed and barred the door, calling for a rifle. Betsey, her twelve-year-old sister, clambered up the chimney, and gaining the ground from its top, set out at the top of her speed for Pettit's Station, about two and a half miles away. Her escape was observed, and an Indian pursued her some distance, but she out-ran the savage and safely reached the station, from whence a messenger was at once dispatched to St. Asaph's for succor. The bold bearing of the older girl prevented the Indians from trying to force the cabin, though she and a little brother were the only occupants.

William Montgomery, Jr., with his wife and one child and a bound boy, occupied another cabin. The first crack of the rifle alarmed him, and directing the servant to guard the door with a heavy sap-trough, he discharged his rifle through a crevice in rapid succession, killing one and seriously wounding another of the savages before they withdrew out of his range. John Montgomery, but lately married, occupied a third cabin; he was shot while in the act of rising from his bed, his cabin door forced open and his wife made captive. Joseph Russell, who with his wife and three children occupied the fourth cabin, succeeded in making his escape, leaving his family and a mulatto slave girl to fall into the hands of the savages. The escape of Betsey Montgomery probably induced the Indians to beat a hurried retreat, and the pursuer of the little girl found his companions gone on his return. Mounting a log in front of the cabin of William Montgomery, Jr., he began signaling his comrades by a loud halloo, when Montgomery, who had not yet ventured to open his door, sent a fatal shot through the unsuspecting savage.

The arrival of the messenger from Pettit's Station was scarcely announced at St. Asaph's, when a blast of Logan's horn spread the alarm—a magical note, which almost instantly conjured up a company of twelve or fifteen fully armed frontiersmen. The ten or twelve miles' distance to the scene of the attack was quickly traversed, and taking the trail, which was rendered plain by Mrs. Russell's shrewdness in breaking twigs and dropping shreds of her handkerchief as she went, the Indians were soon overtaken. The whites at once made a fierce onset, the Indians leaving their prisoners and a wounded comrade in their hasty flight. All the prisoners were recovered save a little daughter of Mrs. Russell; on hearing the voice of Logan she cried, "There's Uncle Ben," whereupon the cruel savage that had her in charge struck her with his tomahawk. On the march the rescuers found the yellow girl tomahawked, scalped, and left for dead, but on hearing friendly voices, she sprang to her feet and eventually recovered.

In April,* the depredations and continued presence of the Indians created a good deal of alarm among the occupants of Squire Boone's Station on Clear Creek. After deliberation it was decided that prudence demanded the removal of the occupants of that station to the protection of the stronger forts on the Beargrass. Such a movement, in the presence of an enemy, was a hazardous undertaking, and the event proved that the fighting force, encumbered with the care of the women and children, beside household effects and cattle, could not offer the most effective resistance to the savages. The action of the pioneers did not escape the observation of the Indians, who allowed the emigrants to reach Long Run, when they attacked the retreating whites with an overwhelming force, dispersing the company with great loss of life and damage of property, Boone being among the severely wounded. Col. Floyd, gaining intelligence of this disaster, hastily summoned a company of twenty-five men for the purpose of rescuing the party and chastising the enemy, but he seems to have greatly under-estimated the character of the foe. Although approaching with the greatest caution, his party fell into an ambush, and though, after suffering fearful losses, he made a stubborn stand, he was utterly routed by the savages, whose overwhelming numbers emboldened them to charge with their tomahawks. Sixteen of the whites fell dead or mortally wounded, and Col. Floyd himself, dismounted and worn out with exertion, only escaped from a vigorous pursuit through the magnanimous gallantry of Capt. Samuel Wells, with whom Floyd was not then on friendly terms. Henceforth, "they lived and died friends."

The number of the Indians was estimated at 200, and this band was probably the center from which the numberless depredations of this period were directed. After the engagement with Floyd, the band seems to have drifted inland, and in the following month with a part of its numbers assailed McAfee Station. The first notice that the garrison had of their presence was on the morning of the 9th instant. Samuel McAfee and a single companion set out from the station to go to a field lying in the vicinity, and had gone about a fourth of a mile, when they were fired on by a concealed enemy. His companion was instantly killed, but McAfee, uninjured, turned quickly about and ran for the fort. A single Indian had managed to get between him and the stockade, and now barred his progress; both instinctively raised their guns, and both pulled the trigger, but the Indian's weapon "flashed" scarcely an instant before McAfee's bullet reached his brain, and, springing over his prostrate foe, the frontiersman gained the fort.

On hearing the report of the guns, McAfee's brothers hurried out to the rescue, but met Samuel just as he had cleared his foe. Robert determined to take a look at the dead Indian, though warned of his danger and urgently pressed not to do it. On satisfying his curiosity, he turned toward the station, only to find himself beset by five or six of

* See Marshall, Vol. I, p. 115. Butler, p. 115, places this occurrence in September, and refers to "Col. Floyd's letters," which were in manuscript. In the absence of these or other deciding data, the text follows Marshall for the reasons that the first historian of Kentucky, on the whole, may be deemed the more reliable in the matter of dates, and that the earlier date is better supported by the natural presumption in the case. The presence of Clark at Louisville, with considerable re-enforcements, and the means adopted by him to guard the passage of the river, as well as the absence of numerous depredations or any other spirited attack in the fall of 1781 (see Marshall, Vol. I, pp. 118-127) discourage the belief that so large a body of savages was in Kentucky in the latter part of the year, while the events which occurred in the spring, not only warrant the belief in the presence of such a body of the enemy, but independently suggest it. The savages were especially bold in their attacks in the region of the falls at this time, and the frequency of their cruel exploits would naturally give rise to the apprehensions which caused the removal of Boone.

the enemy, who had gained his rear. Rapidly dodging from one tree to another, he sought to flank his enemies and gain the station, and did succeed by his maneuvers in shaking off all but one of his pursuers. Finding himself closely pressed by this one, he hastily threw himself over a fence and turned at bay. The Indian took shelter behind a tree, but presently exposed himself enough for McAfee to lodge a bullet in his brain. This delay had given time for others of the enemy to approach, and, turning to continue his flight, he found himself confronted by several of the Indians. Taking to a tree, he prepared to try conclusions with the new foe, when bullets from another quarter made the bark fly in dangerous proximity to his person. He therefore dashed out from his cover, and made his way to the the stockade gate, followed by a dozen bullets, none of which touched him.

The savages now regularly invested the station and for two hours kept up a rapid fire without doing any damage. The garrison replied in a spirited manner, the women molding the bullets which the men discharged. After killing all the cattle in their reach the Indians suddenly retired, probably warned of the approach of re-enforcements from Harrodsburg, which the firing had called out, and a little later, Maj. McGary, with a strong party, came up at a rapid gallop. All united in pursuit of the enemy, who was swiftly overtaken and a brisk skirmish had, in which the savages were routed with considerable loss. The whites lost in the whole series of encounters two killed and one mortally wounded.

Such was the state of affairs which challenged Clark's attention on his return to Louisville. A formidable foe had entered Kentucky, and for months had committed numberless depredations with comparative impunity. Settlements had been depopulated, a large amount of property had been destroyed, and more than a hundred persons killed or captured, but the crowning stroke of the campaign was yet to be added.

In providing for his western expedition, Clark used every effort to recruit as large a part of his force in the east as possible, and among others enlisted the influence of Col. Archibald Laughrey, the county-lieutenant of Westmoreland County, in Pennsylvania. It was arranged that the western division should rendezvous at Wheeling, and from thence descend to Louisville. Clark reached this point with a portion of his force in July, but, alarmed by the wholesale desertion which began to deplete his ranks in spite of his watchfulness, he found it necessary to proceed down the river without further delay.

The Pennsylvania contingent, consisting of something more than 100 men, set out for Wheeling under the command of Laughrey on the 25th of July. On reaching the appointed place of rendezvous, it was learned that the main body had only recently gone forward, and Capt. Shannon, with four men, was hastened after the army with a letter to the general, conveying the information that the belated detachment was on the way and seriously in need of supplies. This messenger failed to overtake Clark, fell into an ambuscade, and was captured with his men. From the letter Shannon carried, and deserters, the captors learned of Laughrey's coming and of the weakness of his command, and determined to overwhelm it. The five prisoners were conspicuously placed on island No. 54, since known as Laughrey's Island, and promised their lives if they would hail their comrades on their approach and induce them to surrender. Fortunately this supreme test of their heroism was spared them. Before reaching the island, the boats bearing the detachment were landed on the Kentucky shore, and arrangements made to prepare a meal for the men, while the horses were landed to graze sufficient to sustain them until Louisville could be reached.

The point chosen for this purpose was an unhappy selection. A little below, a small creek (Laughrey's) entered the Ohio from the right side, and nearly opposite the creek a large sand-bar, which the low stage of the water left bare, stretched itself from the Kentucky shore nearly across the river. At the landing the boats were commanded by overhanging banks, which clothed with timber and heavy under-brush afforded the greatest advantage to the enemy. The Indians had been warned by their scouts of the approach and landing of the whites, and in the midst of their preparations the volunteers were assailed by a sudden storm of bullets. Surprised, but not demoralized, the militia made a stout resistance, until their supply of ammunition was exhausted, when they retreated to their boats. Here they found themselves completely entrapped; the sluggish current moved them but slowly, and a large body of savages, rushing out upon the bar, poured a murderous fire into their crowded and unprotected ranks. Caught thus between the fire from bank and bar, escape was out of the question, and the survivors were compelled to surrender. The savage victors, mad with success, fell upon their defenseless prisoners and bid fair to exterminate the whites, when a more sagacious chief put a stop to the massacre. Forty-two of the whites were killed and sixty-four were taken prisoners, the greater number of whom were ransomed by the British and exchanged two years later.

On the heels of this disaster came an urgent appeal for help from Fort Jefferson. The Chickasaws, dissatisfied with the result of their predatory attacks, determined by one overwhelming assault to abate this menacing fortress. A force of 1,200 warriors was assembled under the command of a Scotchman, named Colbert, whose half-breed descendants succeeded to the chieftaincy of the nation. Small bands anticipated the approach of the main body, and ravaged the region about the post with fire-brand and tomahawk, until nothing was left upon which the occupants of the fort could draw for their support. The garrison was in a perilous condition; sickness and absences had reduced the number of defenders to about thirty men, of whom two-thirds were ill with the ague. Ammunition was scarce, and all supplies outside of the fort being destroyed, the people were reduced to the verge of starvation. In this predicament, messengers were dispatched to Louisville for help, and preparations were made to hold out until assistance should come.

In their raids about the fort, the Indians had captured one of the settlers, upon whose fears they had wrought so well as to draw from him a true account of the garrison's situation. The main body thereupon advanced upon the post and demanded its immediate surrender. A parley ensued in which Colbert declared that the weakness of the garrison was well known, that the hope of succor was vain, as a large force had been sent to intercept its approach; that the whites could not hope to withstand the overwhelming force ready to be brought against them, and that he would protect the lives of the prisoners, save certain ones whom the savages had determined to butcher. Without discussing his statements, the whites only agreed that if the Indians would retire, they would soon abandon the fort and leave the country. This proposition Colbert agreed to submit to the chiefs, but when in the act of retiring from the conference he was fired on and wounded by an occupant of the fort, whose entire family had recently been murdered by the savage marauders.

This put an end to treaty making, and a fierce attack was begun. For three days and nights, the assailants exhausted every device to gain possession of the stockade. Fortunately it was well armed with cannon, which, loaded with bullets, and discharged at close range, made terrible havoc among the savages. Several attempts to surprise or fire the fort nearly succeeded, and several bold assaults were with diffiulty repelled with the aid of the cannon. There was no food and even the water in the wells began to fail, when the welcome succor arrived. The band sent to waylay it had struck the river too high up, and thus the despairing garrison was permitted once more to hope. The whites, thus relieved and re-enforced, easily repulsed their assailants, who were finally forced to retire with great loss. The garrison only suffered a few wounds, but the isolated location of the fort made it difficult to support, and it was speedily abandoned, most of its occupants going to Kaskaskia, and forming some of the earliest American settlements in Illinois.

This series of untoward events constituted a sum of discouragement which might well have checked the ambition of a far more determined man than Clark. A foreign expedition was obviously out of the question, and the newly commissioned general found himself compelled to act upon the defensive. That he performed this duty with his usual success reflects no less credit upon his genius than the prosecution of the far-reaching plans which prompted his preparations in the early part of the year would have done. The latter achievement would have doubtless yielded him greater renown, but the result of his efforts in the more restricted field demonstrated that his success depended less upon happy strokes of fortune than upon the solid resources of his own ability.

Under his direction a stronger stockade was built at Louisville, spies and scouting parties, who reported directly to him, were scattered all along the border, and a galley, well armed with cannon, patrolled the river from the falls to the mouth of the Licking. The latter device proved a most effective means of protection, and Clark had the satisfaction of the general belief that it was instrumental in averting, at least, one formidable raid. Other precautions were maintained so long as Clark remained in command, but the great aversion of the militia to performing the labor of rowing this galley, and the gradual decrease of the regular troops, obliged him to give up this river defense before the end of the year. However, so effective had been his measures that after the siege of Fort Jefferson, "the Indians were but seldom heard of," and the settlers, blessed with abundant crops and freedom from warlike pursuits, began to complain because the absence of the surveyors of two of the counties prevented their locating lands.

The savages having glutted their vengeance for the time, and finding their adversary on the alert and prepared to inflict swift punishment upon such as should venture across the river, gave up further hostilities for this year, but neither party counted the victory won. Encouraged by their successes, the Shawanese sent their runners far and near to invoke the aid of the other tribes in a contest which involved the fate of all. Clark, in the meantime, was not less active; he did not rest on the precautions already taken, and it is probable that, even in the face of discouragements he had hitherto met, he still cherished the hope that the way would be opened to the achievement of his darling enterprise. The first step toward such a consummation was evidently to place his base of operations beyond the danger of successful attack, and to this end he planned, and had erected at Louisville, the most formidable fortification in Kentucky.

This structure, named Fort Nelson, in honor of the third governor of Virginia, was probably begun in the fall of 1781, and inclosed about an acre of ground. It was constructed on the "second bank" of the river, between the lines now marked by Sixth and Eighth Streets. The work consisted of continuous log pens, filled with earth thrown out of an exterior ditch, and upon this foundation palisades, ten feet high, were erected. At the foot of this barrier, a ditch, eight feet wide and ten feet deep, with a row of blunt pickets along its middle line, was constructed on three sides, the pickets, with the slope of the bank, being considered sufficient protection on the side of the river. The gate was placed opposite Clark's headquarters, about on the line where Seventh Street approaches the river. The armament consisted of several small cannon placed in the bastions, and "a double fortified six pounder," which had been captured at Vincennes, and which constituted the field artillery employed by the general on several of his expeditions. Thus prepared, he awaited the opening of the new campaign.

The winter passed with such absence of hostilities as to encourage the more sanguine of the settlers to hope that the Indians had yielded the struggle, but such hopes were destined to be rudely dispelled. The usual predatory bands of savages were again seen or heard of among the settlements early in the spring. Frequent reports of cattle killed, hunters waylaid, travelers attacked, and horses stolen, came from all directions.

Early in March a band fired on Strode's Station, killing two men, and immediately retired; soon after this attack, the Indians fell upon the occupants of a new station* west of the Kentucky River, and about the same time killed and scalped a young woman in sight of Estill's Fort† a little farther west. At the last named station the savages cap tured a negro, whose plausible but exaggerated story of the strength of the garrison caused the marauders to beat a hasty retreat.

Warning of this raid was conveyed to the garrison at Boonesborough on March 19, 1782, when an abandoned Indian raft was observed floating down the river. This was a pretty sure indication that the enemy had crossed the Kentucky farther up the stream and that they might be expected to commit depredations in the rear of the settlements. This intelligence was immediately sent to Estill's Station, and to Col. Logan, who bore command in this region. The latter took prompt measures to avert the threatened danger. Sending fifteen men to Capt. Estill, he directed that officer to increase the force to forty men, and with this company to discover and drive out the enemy. It was when this duty had stripped the station of every man, except one who was sick, that the Indians made their attack, and were induced to retreat by the loyal sagacity of the captured negro. On the departure of the savages, the women sent two boys to bear the information to the scouting party, which was found by the messengers on the morning of the 21st instant, in what is now the northeast corner of the limits of Madison County.

The intelligence brought by the boys determined the party to proceed in immediate pursuit, though five of the number, who had families in the station, becoming alarmed for their safety in their defenseless condition, turned back. Crossing the river, the rest soon struck the trail of the retreating savages, and on the 22d, after leaving behind ten of their number, whose jaded animals prevented their making a rapid march, the pursuers came upon the enemy two miles below Little Mountain, the present site of Mount Sterling. The whites by successive detachments had been reduced in numbers to twenty-five men, but each one was a thorough woodsman and skillful marksman. Marching in four lines they at length discovered six Indians at a little distance, "preparing rations from the body of a buffalo," at whom Capt. Estill discharged his rifle with such effect as to put them to flight. Another of the pursuing party, pressing forward some distance in advance, fired at a warrior, who halted for a moment, and just as he discharged his weapon, another Indian, passing between him and the object of his aim, received the bullet, which, passing through him, proved fatal to them both. This effective shot, witnessed by the whole company, was accepted as a happy omen of success, and raised the spirits of the whites to a point of enthusiasm.

"The battle began at a buffalo crossing on Small Mountain Creek, a branch of Hinkston, in a bend of the creek, where a small branch put in on the east side, and was fought principally between that and the branch next below." The Indians had just crossed the creek, and were ascending the farther slope as the whites descended the other. The locality was well adapted to the usual form of Indian warfare, the stream having formed a pleasant glade, flanked on both sides by a heavy growth of timber, free from the ordinary dense underbrush. But the savages were still disposed to retreat, when their leader, disabled by a chance shot, called on his followers to dispute the passage of the creek. The casualties suffered by the Indians had reduced their effective number to twenty-five, and now, "every man to his man, and each to his tree," the terrible contest began, with the combatants not over sixty yards apart.

"Never was a battle more like single combat, since the use of firearms; each man sought his man, and fired only when he saw his mark; wounds and death were inflicted on either side, neither advancing nor retreating. The firing was deliberate; with caution

*Appendix A, Note 12.

†This station was founded by Capt. James Estill, probably about 1780. It was situated nearly four miles southwest from the present site of Richmond, in Madison County.

they looked, but look they would for the foe, although life itself was often the forfeit. And thus both sides firmly stood, or bravely fell, for more than one hour; upward of one-fourth of the combatants had fallen, never more to rise, and several others were wounded. Never, probably, was the native bravery or collected fortitude of men put to a test more severe. In the clangor of an ardent battle, when death is forgotten, it is nothing for the brave to die—when even cowards die like brave men—but in the cool and lingering expectation of death, none but the man of true courage can stand. Such were those engaged in this conflict." (Marshall.)

Thus far the results of the combat had left the situation practically unchanged. Neither party could advance or retreat without fatal peril, but in this form of combat the advantage was likely to turn in favor of the Indians, for, though less expert as marksmen, they were more skillful than the whites in sheltering their persons behind a tree. This was a theory generally accepted by the frontiersman, and success in a pitched battle with the savages was gained by the whites generally by a successful turning of their adversaries' flank. Comprehending, therefore, that a long continuance of the contest must insure his defeat or at best give him a victory too dearly purchased, Estill sought an opportunity to effect the usual maneuver. A little valley, flanking and extending to the rear of the Indians' position, suggested the feasibility of such a movement, though only at great hazard, as by weakening the force in front the enemy might gain the advantage which the whites sought. However, the commander determined upon the attempt. Detaching Lieut. William Miller with six men, he directed him to gain the rear of the savages, while their absence from the line was disguised by an extension of the diminished force which remained.

This movement was the beginning of the end. Miller, no longer supported by the calm confidence of his superior officer, became panic-stricken and deserted the field. The savages were not long deceived by the show of strength in their front and soon compelled a portion of the opposing line to retreat to a more advantageous position. In effecting this retrograde movement, the whites unfortunately exposed themselves, and several fell victims to the unerring rifles of their foes. At this juncture one of Estill's warm personal friends received a wound in the head, which, instead of prostrating him, crazed his brain, and, unconscious of his danger, he began to stagger in the space which still separated the two lines. A powerful savage, whose gun had just been discharged, sprang forward with his tomahawk to dispatch the unfortunate man, when Estill, observing the danger of his friend, and his gun also being unloaded, rushed forward knife in hand to defend or avenge him. The able-bodied combatants immediately grappled, and were so evenly matched that neither for a time could use his weapon. Their rapid movements in the meanwhile protected both from the ready rifles on either side, until Estill's arm, which had been shattered by a wound four months before, suddenly gave way, and the savage sealed his victory with a fatal plunge of his knife into his antagonist's breast. Scarcely had his yell of triumph told the result of the struggle, when a bullet from one of the whites stretched him dead upon the body of his victim.

The death of one more of the whites closed the battle. Both leaders were now dead. The voice of the Indian chief which had animated his followers was no longer heard, and the whites, weakened by wounds and desertion, withdrew from the contest, leaving the savages too severely punished to pursue. Seven whites were left dead upon the field, and three were carried off severely wounded. The contest, in fact, was a drawn battle, but the fact that the whites left their dead in the hands of the enemy has given it the name of "Estill's defeat," * and such was the character of the depressing effect which it produced upon the frontiersmen. In this contest the savage displayed a determined courage and fortitude which were new to the borderers, and the even balance in which the battle hung so long as the forces remained equal threatened to dispel forever the bold assumption of superiority of the white man. If the settlers could no longer successfully contend against the numerical superiority of the Indians, then the final extinction of the frontier settlements was a foregone conclusion. The frontiersmen, however, were not of a character to yield to such an abstract conclusion unaided by the logic of events, but it is unquestionably true that the uncertain future was faced with silent forebodings that greatly modified the audacious courage of the pioneers.

* Appendix A, Note 13.

Events which closely followed the "defeat" only confirmed the general impression. The savages seemed inspired with a new boldness; creeping into the very shadows of the stations, they would suddenly assault the unsuspecting pioneer, kill and scalp him before the surprised gaze of his companions, and, escaping with the bloody trophy, would instantly be lost in the mazes of the surrounding wood. The next attack would fall upon some distant point, and often, while commiserating the misfortunes of some remote station, the startled pioneer would be confronted with death at his own door. Occasionally the savage paid the penalty of his temerity with his own life, but this was too infrequent to relieve the fear of the settlers or discourage the Indians. At the beginning of the summer, these depredations suddenly ceased and the months of June and July were passed in such quietude that the people began to hope the worst was passed. But this was only the final precursor of the storm of war that was about to fall upon the border.

The Shawanese had been unusually active in preparing for the new campaign. Their runners had visited all the western tribes between the Ohio and the Mississippi, and Cherokees, Wyandottes, Tawas and Pottawatomies, besides a detachment of Canadians and the Shawanese, were represented in the grand assemblage of warriors which had been convened at old Chillicothe to take part in the grand expedition that was designed to break the power of the whites in Kentucky. To this gathering, even the outlying scouts were called, and thus the stations experienced the lull of battle which precedes the furious charge. The assembled savages, already eager for the fray, were excited to the pitch of madness by the artful harangue of the notorious Girty, when the chiefs led out their followers to the number of about 500 men, with the renegade as commander-in-chief. Of all this preparation the settlers seemed profoundly ignorant, and it was not until the hostile horde was at their doors that the Kentuckians became aware of the terrible danger that threatened.

The first renewal of hostilities occurred on the 10th of August, when an advance party committed depredations at Hoy's Station,* and retired, taking with them two boys as prisoners. The alarm was given out, and Capt. John Holder, from his station on the Kentucky, two miles below Boonesboro, set forth in pursuit of the marauders, recruiting his party, as he passed McGee's and Strode's Stations, to the number of seventeen. The Indians were overtaken near the Upper Blue Lick, and though greatly superior in numbers, the whites boldly attacked them. There was little hope of success, and after a short engagement, finding the enemy was about to overpower his little company, Holder gave orders for a retreat, which was successfully accomplished after losing four men killed or wounded.

After the destruction of Ruddle's and Martin's Stations in 1780, Bryan's occupied the advance line on the frontier, and it was against this station that the Indian host was led. Intelligence of Holder's discomfiture was brought hither late on the 16th instant, and the rest of the day, with the greater part of the night, was spent by the garrison in fitting out the fighting force to go to the relief of the endangered settlement. Amid the bustle of this preparation,† the savages silently surrounded the fort with the intention of assaulting it when the inhabitants were asleep, but disconcerted by the unwonted activity of the settlers, which was manifest at a distance, the enemy changed his plans and decided to make a regular attack in the morning. Their preparations completed, the whites took advantage of the few remaining hours to gain some refreshment in sleep, but at early dawn the whole force was under arms, and the gates thrown open to permit their egress. The Indians, utterly misapprehending the movement, greeted the first advance of the troops with a storm of bullets and war cries, which revealed to the astonished whites that the enemy they sought was before their walls. The gates were quickly closed, and, rushing to the port-holes, the garrison observed about 100 of the savages plainly exposed to view, firing and yelling, and expressing their defiance in violent gestures.

*This station was erected in Madison County, about 400 yards southwest of Foxtown, in the spring of 1781, by William Hoy.

†Appendix A, Note 14.

The fort consisted of some forty cabins disposed in parallel lines and joined at the ends by palisades. It was situated on a gently rising bank on the south side of the Elkhorn, a few yards to the right of the Maysville and Lexington road. The station was ill-prepared to withstand a siege; the palisades had been allowed to get out of repair, and the small supply of water within threatened a greater danger than the foe without. The walls were readily patched, but the lack of water, which was obtained from a spring situated some distance from the fort, was more difficult to remedy. The more experienced of the garrison were not deceived by the antics of the savages. They correctly divined that the object of the Indians was to draw the main body of the whites in pursuit of those who were feigning an attack, when the principal force of the assailants, concealed on the other side, would master the walls thus left undefended. The garrison was not at a loss how to deal with this attack, but the first duty was to place the fort, so far as possible, in condition to successfully sustain a siege, and to that end secure a supply of water before active hostilities made it impossible.

The spring was near a large thicket, in which it was certain the main body of the enemy was concealed. Nevertheless, it was believed that if the women were to go with their pails and bring the water as was their custom, they would be allowed to do so unmolested, as the Indians would believe from this bold adherence to the ordinary procedure that their ambush was undiscovered, and therefore would not hazard the complete success of their plans by revealing their presence in a premature attack. This was sound reasoning, but it required a bold resolution and most determined courage on the part of the women to effect the movement with success.

The women of the station were summoned and the proposition stated. There was some natural demur in acceding to a plan which necessitated such reckless exposure of noncombatants to the mercy of an enemy who regarded neither age nor sex in his warfare, but the matrons of the settlement, confirming the judgment of their husbands, the whole body determined to dare much in a cause which involved the fate of all. The fancy can scarcely picture a more heroic scene in the whole range of border experience than this utterly defenseless company of women, led by those whose lives on the frontier had taught them rightly to appreciate the barbarities of savage warfare, marching out of the stockade gates; and one is at a loss which to pity most in this trying ordeal, the brave women with a show of equanimity facing the lurking horrors of an uncertain fate, or the equally brave men, as from the port-holes they watched the progress of those whose every forward step strained the cracking heart-strings to an anguish that, however intense, must make no sign. The whole journey to and from the spring was made with the most decorous deliberation, the young and timid gaining confidence from the steadiness of their elders. Fortunately the event justified the judgment which planned the undertaking, and the supply of water thus secured, the men at once turned to their part of the work.*

Thirteen young men were then sent out to attack the savages, who had kept up their noisy demonstrations in the meantime. The sallying party was directed to fire rapidly in order to convey to the ambushed enemy an exaggerated impression of the number of the whites engaged, but to discontinue the pursuit as soon as the main body of the Indians attacked the fort. On hearing the heavy firing of the garrison's detachment recede in the distance, confident that their ruse had succeeded, some 300 or 400 savages, with ferocious yells, rushed from their cover to assault what appeared the abandoned walls. Some reached the cabins and fired them with their lighted torches, others reached the pickets with the intention of hewing their way into the inclosure, but the great mass of the assailants fell back in utter astonishment before the deadly volley that did frightful execution on the crowd of unprotected warriors. In two minutes, not an Indian was to be seen. The wind being favorable to the whites, the flames did but little damage, and were soon extinguished, and the young men returning in safety to the fort, both assailants and assailed settled to the duties involved in a regular attack. Thus matters progressed until about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when re-enforcements arrived.

*It may rob this incident of some of its heroism to allow that the danger of the exploit has been exaggerated in the generally accepted accounts, but the author of "Annals of the West," in a foot note, says: "We have it on the best authority, however, that Simon Kenton said this was all romance; by his account there was a covered way to the spring." (Annals of the West, p. 250.)

On the first intimation of danger, two of the garrison, well mounted, had broken through the Indian line and hastened to Lexington to secure assistance. Arriving at this station about sunrise, they found it occupied only by women and children, the rest having gone to the aid of Hoy's Station, which was supposed to be in danger. The messengers pushed on and overtook this party, which had been joined by some volunteers from Boonesborough. The situation of Bryan's Station was soon told, when the whole force, consisting of sixteen horsemen and about twice as many footmen, turned back and marched to the relief of the beleaguered fort. The messengers had left before the full strength of the enemy was known, and the firing having temporarily ceased the re-enforcing party boldly approached the station. The horsemen, taking the usual route, rode rapidly along a narrow lane, on both sides of which the Indians had disposed themselves to receive them. The horsemen were within a few feet of the enemy, until then undiscovered, when they received a terrific fire from both sides. Fortunately the motion of the riders as well as the clouds of dust raised by the horses so protected man and beast that neither received a wound.

The footmen did not fare so well; they were approaching the fort through a cornfield some distance from the position of the savages when the firing began. Anxious to aid their comrades, and heedless of the indications which pointed out the greatly superior numbers of the enemy, the footmen rushed to the attack only to find themselves suddenly cut off from the fort, and in the midst of an overwhelming force. The savages had not had opportunity to reload their guns, and turned upon the footmen with the tomahawk. The whites were still in the corn, which with their loaded rifles alone saved them from annihilation. Reserving their fire the footmen retreated toward Lexington as opportunity offered, while the savages, careful not to precipitate themselves upon the threatening rifles of their enemy, were greatly hampered in their pursuit by the tall corn. Although this outside skirmish continued for an hour or more before the Indians gave up the chase, the whites lost only six men killed or wounded.

The attack upon the fort was renewed, but the events of the day had not been such as to assure the assailants of final success. The chiefs were manifesting a disposition to abandon the enterprise, and about sunset, the fire slackening on both sides, Girty determined to try the effect of negotiation. Approaching the station in the shelter of a stump, he hailed the garrison and demanded the surrender of the place under the pretense of a desire to prevent the further effusion of blood. He declared resistance was useless; that he expected soon to be in possession of cannon, when the destruction of the defenses and the massacre of the defenders would inevitably follow. While the settlers knew Girty and the general unreliability of all he said, the fate of Ruddle's and Martin's Stations was fresh in their minds, and the effect of Girty's address was such as to make many falter. Before there was any opportunity to make any expression of faint-hearted sentiments, if any wish to do so existed, Aaron Reynolds returned a taunting defiance, which so exasperated the renegade that he summarily closed the parley. It was apparent to the savages that there was no hope of success. The fort could not be taken by assault, and the whole country was rising. To linger much longer was to invite destruction, and, killing such stock as they did not take away, the Indian host quietly withdrew just before daylight.

In the meantime the interior settlements had not been inactive. From Lexington, Col. Todd had sent the alarm to Boonesborough and Harrodsburg, leaving Lieut. Col. Trigg of the latter place to notify his superior, Col. Logan, of the situation. There was neither time nor disposition to indulge in "red tape" formalities, and Trigg hurried to the appointed rendezvous with his hastily raised force, not less promptly than Lieut.-Col. Boone. By noon, therefore, on the 18th instant, Col. Todd, at the head of 182* men, reached the imperiled station. The Indians were found gone with evidences of precipitation in their movements, though these were probably intended to deceive the whites, whom the enemy evidently wished to draw into rapid pursuit. The question of following the enemy was discussed, and conflicting suggestions urged with some persistence. On the one hand it was represented that Logan was undoubtedly raising a considerable force, which would arrive within twenty-four hours, and that the large force of Indians suggested the necessity of observing every precaution to guard against disaster. On the other hand it was urged that the pursuit of the savages, if not undertaken promptly, would find them across the Ohio and disbanded, when it would be impossible to inflict any salutary punishment. As to the authors of these opposing arguments, writers are not agreed, but the latter opinion prevailed, and late in the afternoon the whites moved forward in pursuit of the retreating enemy.

The trail of the savages was plain, and the whites had not proceeded many miles when Boone's observant eyes discovered evidence which clearly indicated the wish of the savages to be followed. The trees along their course were marked, and instead of concealing their route everything indicated their intention to leave a broad trail, but at the same time pains had been taken to conceal their numbers. For this purpose, they had marched in single file, each one stepping in the footsteps of his leader, and at their camps the limited number of fires and other indications showed a studied care to disguise their strength. The irresistible inference to be drawn was that an ambush was to be expected, and Boone's thorough knowledge of the country and hunter's instinct at once suggested the Lower Blue Lick as the probable site where a surprise would be attempted. This lick is situated about thirty-five miles from Bryan's Station. "The Licking River at this place is about 300 feet wide at common water, and forms a semi-ellipsis, which embraces on its northeast side, toward Limestone, a great ridge of rocks which had been made bare by the stamping of buffaloes and other game, drawn together from time immemorial to drink the water and lick the clay. Two deep ravines, heading in this ridge near each other, and extending in opposite directions, formed the longest diameter of this ellipsis. This ridge had very little timber on it, and what it had was very indifferent and exhibited a very dreary appearance; but the ravines were furnished, not only plentifully with timber, but with a thick brushwood also."*

The whites encamped that night within about five miles of this point, and on the following morning cautiously proceeded forward. On reaching the southern bank of the Licking, they, for the first time in their march, saw a number of Indians leisurely ascending the rocky ridge on the other side. Here the pursuers came to a halt. Col. Todd was the senior officer and in command;

*Marshall (Vol. I, p. 141) gives the number at 166; Butler (p. 125), on the authority of Gen. Clark, gives the number at 182. This is confirmed by Bradford. The two may perhaps be reconciled by taking the latter estimate as the number which set out from Bryan s Station, where the party must have received some accessions, as there were some sixty men in the fort after accounting for the losses and re-enforcements. If the latter number be correct, the whites must have engaged in the battle of Blue Lick with upward of 200 men.

*Notes on Kentucky by John Bradford.

Trigg was next in point of seniority, and Boone third. Other officers were Majs. Harlan, McBride, McGary and Levi Todd, and Capts. Bulger and Gordon, most of whom were volunteers without command. These, with other officers, to the number of a dozen or twenty, met in front of the ranks and joined in consultation. That the situation was undoubtedly critical was apparent to the least observant of the company. The action of the retreating savages afforded a strong presumption that an ambuscade was formed just where Boone had suggested it would be. At this juncture the officers all turned to the veteran woodsman, and, in response to Col. Todd's request, he said that it would be proper to do one of two things: "Either to await the arrival of Logan,* who was undoubtedly on his march to join them, or, if it was determined to attack without delay, that one-half of their number should march up the river, which there bends in an elliptical form, cross at the rapids and fall upon the rear of the enemy, while the other divisions attacked in front. At any rate, he strongly urged the necessity of reconnoitering the ground carefully before the main body crossed the river." (McClung.)

Scarcely had Boone submitted his opinions when Maj. McGary "raised the war-whoop," and, spurring his horse into the river, called vehemently on all who were not cowards to follow him and he would show them the enemy. Presently the army was in motion. The greater part suffered themselves to be led by McGary; the remainder, perhaps a third of the whole number, lingered awhile with Todd and Boone in council. All at length passed over, and, at Boone's suggestion, the commanding officer ordered another halt. The pioneer then proposed, for a second time, that the army should remain where it was until an opportunity was afforded to reconnoiter the suspected region. So reasonable a proposal was acceded to, and two bold but experienced men were selected to proceed from the lick along the buffalo trace to a point half a mile beyond the ravines, where the road branched off in different directions. They were instructed to examine the country with the utmost care on each side of the road, especially the spot where it passed between the ravines, and upon the first appearance of the enemy to repair in haste to the army. The spies discharged the dangerous and responsible task. They crossed over the ridge, proceeded to the place beyond it, and returned in safety without having made any discovery. No trace of the enemy was to be seen.

The little army of 182 men now marched forward. Col. Trigg was in command of the right wing, Boone of the left, McGary in the center, and Maj. Harlan with the party in front. Such is Boone's account of the positions of the several officers. He does not define Col. Todd's. The historians have assigned him to the right with Col. Trigg. The better opinion seems to be that he commanded the center.

As they approached the ravines, it became apparent that Boone's anticipations were well founded, and that the vigilance of the spies had been completely eluded. The enemy lay concealed in both ravines in great numbers. The columns marched up within forty yards of the Indian line before a gun was fired. The battle immediately commenced with great fury and most destructive effect on both sides. The advantage of position and overwhelming numbers soon determined it in favor of the savages. The fire was peculiarly severe upon the right. Col. Trigg fell, and with him nearly the whole of the Harrodsburg troops. Boone manfully sustained himself on the left. Maj. Harlan defended the front until only three of his men remained. He also fell, covered with wounds. The Indians now rushed upon them with their tomahawks, spreading confusion and dismay through their broken and disabled ranks. The whole right, left and center gave way and a mingled and precipitate retreat commenced. Some regained their horses; others fled on foot. Col. Todd was shot through the body, and when he was last seen was reeling in his saddle, while the blood gushed in profusion from his wound. The Indians were then in close pursuit.—Morehead's Address, p. 99.

The obvious line of retreat was by way of the ford where the army had passed over, and from the battle ground to the river pursuer and pursued mingled in confused flight. Sauve qui peut was the sentiment of the distressed whites, while the exultant savages plied their murderous tomahawks upon the unresisting fugitives. The mounted men generally escaped, but the footmen, cut off from the ford, threw themselves into the river, where they were shot by the remorseless foe, or drowned through their inability to swim. One, Netherland, who had previously been suspected of cowardice, being mounted, had gained the farther bank in safety, but, seeing the terrible danger to which his dismounted comrades were exposed in the water, called upon others who had escaped with him to turn and defend their friends in the river. A temporary rally was thus effected and a few volleys drove the savages back to a less resisting foe, and many were thus saved from destruction. This check to the enemy was very brief. The Indians were discovered crossing the river farther up the stream, and the stampede was renewed.

*A statement, made by Benjamin A. Cooper, who took part in the battle, was furnished by Mann Butler, the historian, to the St. Louis Era, from which it was copied in the Frankfort Commonwealth of January 15, 1846. In this statement he contradicts the common account that Todd's party expected Logan to bring re-enforcements.

Boone bravely sustained his position on the left, until the crumbling of the right and center left him to bear the brunt of the attack unsupported. He still manfully disputed the progress of the Indians, until his idolized son and many of his friends were stricken down, and himself surrounded by some 200 infuriated savages, when he sought to escape. Intimately acquainted with the ground, accompanied by a few friends, and bearing the body of his wounded son, he plunged into the ravine abandoned by the Indians. Escaping the immediate attack of the enemy, and baffling one or two small parties that pursued him a short distance, he swam across the river to a point where he was unobserved. Here, in a well-noted place, he laid the body of his son, who had died in his arms, and made his way in safety to Bryan's Station.

Another instance of that heroism which everywhere embellishes the pages of frontier history, was exhibited by Reynolds, whose reply to Girty before Bryan's Station constituted one of the closing features of that memorable siege. With one or two others he was among the last to turn toward the river, but being well mounted soon overtook the flying crowd and among them discovered Capt. Robert Patterson slowly making his way on foot. This officer was in the rear of the throng, exhausted by his exertions, and impeded in his progress by the effects of injuries received from the savages in previous encounters. The Indians were rapidly approaching and escape was impossible. At this moment Reynolds rode up, hastily dismounted, and, assisting Patterson to take his place, the gallant young fellow pushed rapidly forward and crossed the river on foot. In effecting this passage, his leathern breeches became so heavy with the water they had absorbed that he sat down on a log to remove them, in order to facilitate his movements. In this position he was captured by the enemy. Being in a sound condition he was not dispatched, but hurried forward under heavy guard to be reserved to grace the triumph of the returning victors. A small party of Kentuckians soon attracting the attention of his captors, he was left in charge of three warriors, two of whom, eager to join in the active pursuit, left him in care of their comrade. In this way the two proceeded some distance, when, the savage stooping to tie his moccasin, Reynolds assaulted his guard with his fist, and quickly disappeared in the thicket. The young pioneer eventually escaped and received from Patterson as a token of his appreciation "200 acres of first-rate land."

The Kentuckians sustained few losses after crossing the river, notwithstanding the victorious enemy urged the pursuit for twenty miles. The nearest point of safety was Bryan's Station, and thither the demoralized force made its way, each man after his own fashion. The horsemen followed the buffalo trail and reached their destination in about six hours; the footmen, abandoning the beaten path, reached the station by circuitous routes, most of the survivors gaining the station by nightfall.

In the meantime, Logan had reached a point some miles beyond Bryan's, when he met fugitives from the scene of disastrous battle, and returned. Halting here until the rear came up, late in the afternoon, the troops again set out, marching most of the night. About noon on the following day the battle-ground was reached. Here the bodies of their slain countrymen were found strewn about the ground, mangled by wounds, torn by birds and beasts of prey, and some floating in the river, partly eaten by the fish; all were so swollen and disfigured as to defy recognition. Diligent search was made for evidence of the Indians, but no fresh "sign" being discovered, Logan concluded that they had gone beyond his reach, and having carefully collected and buried the remains left upon the field, he returned to Bryan's Station, where his force was dismissed.

The battle of Blue Lick was the crowning event of a season which had brought only a succession of disasters to the distressed settlements. The hardy society which had grown up amid the perils of savage warfare was not unaccustomed to endure the vicissitudes of such a life with rare fortitude and uncomplaining resignation, but the shadows of this disaster spread over the interior settlements like a pall. Of the sixty men killed in the vigor of manhood, there was scarcely one who did not leave wife and children to mourn his death. Nearly one-half of this terrible loss fell upon Harrodsburg; in Lexington, "many widows were made;"* and Bryan's Station and Boonesborough suffered in proportion. In the loss of the leading men the whole community shared, and to the memory of those whose gentler virtues shone with peculiar luster in the crude civilization of the border, rude strength paid the sad tribute of a tear. Of the gallant men who fell there was none more brave or more beloved than Maj. Harlan. The death of Cols. Trigg and Todd was greatly deplored. They were men of fine intelligence, of personal worth, and of public usefulness. "They were particularly qualified to counsel, enlighten and guide the people in their private and civil concerns; while the suavity of their manners and the urbanity of their minds rendered them easy of access, and always ready to assist those who sought their information or advice."

Col. John Todd was universally beloved; he died without a stain upon his character and, it is believed, without an enemy in the world. He was the eldest of three brothers, was educated at his uncle's in Virginia, and at maturity entered upon the study of the law, subsequently obtaining a license to practice. He settled at Fincastle, Va., for the practice of his profession, but attracted by the glowing accounts of Kentucky visited Boonesborough in 1775, and became a resident there until 1779, when he moved to Lexington. In the spring of 1780 he was a delegate from Kentucky to the assembly at Virginia, and while attending on this session married Miss Hawkins. From the year 1778 he might be considered as residing in Illinois until his marriage. Settling his wife in Lexington, he was obliged to make a long and dangerous trip to visit his family, and besides aiding in the councils held by Clark, and accompanying him in one or more of his expeditions, it is believed he passed the journey from Lexington to Kaskaskia twice and probably four times a year. His duties as lieutenant of Illinois County, and after the fall of 1780 of Fayette County, gave ample scope for the exertion of his great executive ability, and made large demands upon his time and attention. It is said that he had only recently returned from Illinois when the depredations of the Indians summoned him to the battle of Blue Lick* and an untimely grave.

The details of this disastrous engagement were soon known throughout the Kentucky border, and rendered the settlers especially watchful for "signs," as it was feared the enemy might be emboldened by their success to attack other points. But the Indians did not prove in this case an exception to the general rule, and the greater part retired to their towns to enjoy their triumph. The western tribes, which had formed a part of this expedition, however, took their departure from the main body near the scene of the battle, and pursued their homeward course through Kentucky with the hope, probably, of adding to their trophies, and at the same time extending the alarm and confusion created by their unexampled victory. Their presence was heard of about the 1st of September on the Salt River, and Col. Floyd promptly went out at the head of a good force in quest of them. After scouting several days without finding the savages, the party disbanded, the members retiring to the several stations from which they were drawn, believing the enemy had left the country.

*In a letter to Gov. Morehead, in 1840, Nathaniel Hart wrote: "I went with my mother in January, 1783, to Logan's Station to prove my father's will. He had fallen in the preceding July. Twenty armed men were of the party. Twenty-three widows were in attendance upon the court to obtain letters of administration on the estates of their husbands, who had been killed during the past year."

*Appendix A, Note 15.

Among others, Kincheloe Station, on Simpson's Creek, in what is now Spencer County, had contributed to the scouting party. During the absence of its contingent the women alone kept watch and ward without noticing any indications of an enemy. On returning from the fruitless scout, the men, worn out by their duty, and confident that all danger had passed, went to bed without taking any special precautions against a surprise by the savages. Unfortunately, the Indians had only eluded the whites, and observing the exposed condition of this station, made a simultaneous attack upon the cabins, when the occupants were wrapt in the deep slumber which their fatigue induced. Bursting open the doors, the savages commenced an indiscriminate slaughter of men, women and children, and almost before the victims realized the nature of their danger, the whole settlement was still in death. A few women and children were taken prisoners, several of them only to be basely murdered on their journey toward captivity. A few others, taking advantage of the darkness, escaped in the melee and reached other stations.

One of the settlers received the alarm early enough to place his wife and a young woman of the family under the cabin floor, and then escaped in the darkness. Remaining in the neighborhood until assured of the departure of the savages he returned to his cabin, relieved his wife and companion and conducted them in safety to another station. Another, occupying a small cabin with his wife and two children, one an infant, bravely stood at bay and fought the savages who had forced his cabin door, though outnumbered five to one. He had succeeded in killing several of his assailants, when, seeing his wife, with the babe in her arms, cruelly murdered, he instantly placed the other child in the loft, and hastily mounting after it escaped through the roof. On alighting upon the ground, he was assailed by two savages whom he had driven out of his cabin. Wounding one with his knife, he prostrated the other with a powerful blow of his empty gun, and, snatching up his child, plunged into the surrounding woods and escaped.

A Mrs. Polk, who was captured with four children, after narrowly escaping death at the hands of her captor, finally reached Detroit, where she was ransomed with her children by a British officer. A letter from her to her husband apprised him of her fate. He immediately set out for the place of her detention with her letter as his only passport. He succeeded in making the journey in safety, and subsequently returned to Kentucky with his family unharmed. Another of the captive women made her escape, but, totally unacquainted with the region, she wandered about in the wilderness, subsisting on sour grapes and green walnuts until, on the eighteenth day, she was accidentally discovered entirely denuded of clothing and reduced to the physical proportions of a skeleton. She was taken to Lynn's Station, where she eventually recovered. Such is the terrible story of this devastating raid. The whole population of Kentucky was panic-stricken, and if the savages could have been brought to repeat it in the fall, scarcely a station would have remained tenanted through the succeeding winter. On August 30th, Boone wrote the governor of Virginia: "I have encouraged the people in this county all I could; but I can no longer justify them or myself to risk our lives here under such extraordinary hazards. The inhabitants of this county are very much alarmed at the thoughts of the Indians bringing another campaign into our country this fall. If this should be the case, it would break up the settlements." The demand for some measure to restore the pioneer's lost faith in himself was imperative, and Clark early summoned the leading men to Louisville to aid in concerting some movement of reprisal. At this conference it was determined to organize an expedition for the invasion of the Indian country, which should be of such a formidable character as to completely counteract any encouragement the savages might have derived from their recent campaign. To this end it was provided that in case volunteers should not be forthcoming in sufficient numbers, a draft should be enforced, and that horses and provisions should be impressed if necessary. The duty of organizing the force to be employed was assigned to Cols. Floyd and Logan. The troops of the interior were to rendezvous at Bryan's Station, from whence they should march to the mouth of the Licking, there to be joined by the body organized at Louisville.

No compulsory measures were necessary; men and officers offered their services with eagerness, and beef-cattle, horses and other supplies were freely granted by those who could not well be spared from the settlements. It was the last of September before the expedition was organized at the mouth of the Licking River. Here Clark took command, with Floyd and Logan as his lieutenants. The army, consisting of about 1,000 men, marched rapidly and undiscovered until it approached the first of the towns on Mad River. After arriving in this region, when about half a mile from the camp of the rear party of the savages who were engaged in the late raid, the whites were discovered by a straggling Indian, who hastily gave the alarm of "a mighty army on its march." The camp was quickly broken up; the towns with their surrounding fields of grain were abandoned, and the overwhelming force was compelled to satisfy its thirst for vengeance in the destruction of several towns, with their corn-fields, and Loramie's store, which had been rebuilt and restocked since the former invasion. Not more than six or seven Indians were found within range of a rifle, but these were instantly killed. With these rather meager results, the army returned and was disbanded.

However inglorious this campaign may seem, it sufficed to show the savages that their recent bloody victory had not affected the main question of possessing the debated hunting-grounds, and to restore the self-confidence of the settlers, which had been so rudely shaken by the events of the summer. The succeeding fall and winter were passed in unusual freedom from hostilities, and spring brought the welcome tidings of peace. A provisional treaty had been signed at Paris, between England and the colonies, on the 30th of November; on January 20, 1783, the forces of the belligerent powers had ceased active operations; and on the 19th of April following, peace was proclaimed to the American army. While this brought a cessation of hostilities in the East, Kentucky was still threatened with a continuation of the war. The Indians, loth to give up the struggle, were found on the border early in the spring, but at length, becoming convinced that they must prosecute their enterprise unaided by their former allies, they ceased their depredations for a time.

These hostilities obtain importance principally from the fact that they resulted in the death of Col. Floyd. That gallant officer was waylaid and shot by the Indians about three miles north of Shepherdsville, on the 12th of April. There had been some trouble with the Indians in the neighborhood of the Beargrass settlements, but the enemy was supposed to have retired across the Ohio, when the Colonel and his brother Charles, unsuspecting of danger, rode into an ambush. Col. Floyd was wearing his wedding coat of bright scarlet cloth at the time, and thus presented a conspicuous target to the savage marksman. He was mortally wounded at the first fire. Charles Floyd, observing the effect of the shot, abandoned his own horse, which had been struck, mounted behind his brother, steadied him with his arms, and seizing the reins escaped with him to the station, where the wounded man died a few hours later.

Col. John Floyd was born in Virginia about 1750. His father was of Welsh descent; his mother was of English and Indian parentage. Her mother, it is said, was the daughter of Powhatan's brother. Floyd received a good education for the time, which was enriched by the culture derived from unusual advantages of travel. He married at the age of eighteen, but was left a widower within a year afterward. Some ten years later he formed a second marriage with a lady, who, with three children, survived him, He made his advent into Kentucky as a surveyor in 1774, and from that time, with the exception of a little more than a year, he devoted himself to the interests of the growing frontier settlements. In the fall of 1776 he went back to Virginia, fitted out a privateer, and cruised extensively upon the sea with considerable success. He was captured, however, and lay in a British prison for some time, when he made his escape through the assistance of the jailer's wife. Returning to Kentucky he became one of the leading actors during the stormy period of the revolution. He was with Clark in most of his expeditions, and was feared by the Indians and respected by the English. It is said that he was offered a large sum of money, and promised an English title by the British authorities at Detroit, if he would transfer his influence to their cause, an offer which he rejected with scorn. Col. Floyd was a man of fine military bearing, over six feet tall, of an attractive personal appearance and an agreeable manner. His whole character was marked by a calm, impressive confidence in himself, which gave him great influence, while his intelligence and energy made him one of the foremost men in Kentucky. Fortunately for the community, his loss fell at a time when circumstances rendered it less severe, but his memory will ever be cherished as one of the early heroes of the border.

But the era of peace had now dawned, and never was it hailed with more unfeigned joy, than by the Kentuckians in 1783, though the glory of its rising was still dimmed by the clouds that marked the passing storm. The success of the savages in the preceding year had filled the land with mourning, and the opening months of the new year gave no evidence that the expedition led by Gen. Clark had taught any salutary lesson to the indefatigable foe. And yet, while it was generally recognized that the treaty provided only for the civilized belligerents, the restored confidence of the borderers was such that they felt no fear in meeting the savages alone. A further expedition against the Indians, to bring them to terms, seems to have been contemplated, but this was eventually given up and affairs in Kentucky were reduced to a peace basis in the following letter from the governor of Virginia to Gen. Clark:

IN COUNCIL, JULY 2, 1783.

Sir: The conclusion of the war, and the distressed situation of the State, with respect to its finances, call on us to adopt the most prudent economy. It is for this reason alone I have come to a determination to give over all thought for the present of carrying on an offensive war against the Indians, which you will easily perceive will render the services of a general officer in that quarter unnecessary, and will therefore consider yourself as out of command; but before I take leave of you, I feel myself called upon, in the most forcible manner, to return you my thanks, and those of my Council, for the very great and singular services you have rendered your country in wresting so great and valuable a territory out of the hands of the British enemy, repelling the attacks of their savage allies, and carrying on successful war in the heart of their country. This tribute of praise and thanks, so greatly due, I am happy to communicate to you as the united voice of the Executive.

I am, with respect, Sir, Yours, &c.,

BENJAMIN HARRISON.

The pacific influences of the time at length reached even the savages. Organized hostilities entirely ceased, military rank was lost in the common sovereignty of the citizen, and peace, the "gladness-giving queen," reigned supreme over the "dark and bloody ground."

CHAPTER IX.

THE PIONEER AND PIONEER DAYS.

THE peace of 1783 marks the close of the pioneer period in the history of Kentucky. For more than a decade, a few chosen spirits had suffered the "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune" with a patient fortitude unexcelled on any other page of history; but with the dawn of peace, a great tide of immigration set in toward the frontier, bringing new men and questions, and they who had laid the foundations of the State, amid the red billows of savage war, were, in the natural order of things, gradually supplanted. For a little time their influence is traced in the budding civilization which arose out of the crude frontier society, but art and time have at last left only the memory of their virtues to be cherished by an age which finds it difficult to realize that the pioneer was not a privileged character, who led a life of romantic adventure, absolved from the penalties of that primal transgression, which "brought death into the world and all our woe."

The pioneer was the peculiar product of the period in which he acted. The separating and classifying influences of an advanced civilization were not yet prominent, and, save in the tidewater valleys along the Atlantic coast, the homogeneous character of the people was undisturbed by the factitious distinctions of wealth and education. Worth made the man, the want of it the fellow, and comfortable surroundings affected the character of immigration only in restraining such as enjoyed them from giving up a certain good for the untried but flattering promises of the new land, though many well-to-do persons were found among the early settlers. Education played even a less important part than wealth in this matter. Popular education was at a low ebb everywhere, and few of the leading minds comprehended more of learning than the fundamental branches of "reading, writing and arithmetic," and had but a rudimentary acquaintance with these. Of general culture there were scarcely a half-dozen in Kentucky who may be said to have possessed any knowledge, and yet the community on the frontier did not compare unfavorably with that from which it was drawn.

These men and women were not a sordid folk, and in moving to the new country they were influenced scarcely less by the natural beauty of the region than by the opportunities it afforded to improve their fortunes. They were born or reared in a frontier community. They came of a race who sought a refuge in the New World to escape the oppression and bigotry of the old, and here, amid the influences of the boundless forest, had drawn in a spirit of freedom, self-reliance, and of a contented righteousness which characterized their new settlement. They were not saints, indeed, but the first settlers were generally characterized by a sobriety of habit and judgment that counted "the life more than meat." They were enlightened children of nature, and, in their simplicity, they entertained a deep affection for the primitive charms of this new land, as of a fostering mother. To the pioneer, nature was vocal with "a various language." The poet, only, can voice his creed:

The bubbling brook doth leap when I come by,
  Because my feet find measure with its call;
The birds know when the friend they love is nigh,
  For I am known to them, both great and small;
The flower that on the lonely hillside grows
  Expects me there when spring its bloom has given;
And many a tree or bush my wanderings know,
  And e'en the clouds and silent stars of heaven.

To such people the new country beyond the Big Sandy was an Eden, for the possession of which few trials or dangers were considered too great an exaction.

But in all this the pioneers were not visionaries. There can be no greater mistake than the popular error which confuses the character of the founders of this commonwealth with that of the heroes of modern sensational writings, the theatrical terrors of which harrow up the imaginations of the young and timid. The early Kentuckians were not generally adventurers simply in search of hazardous experiences; they were not "one eyed trappers," nor professional "Indian-slayers." On the contrary they were eminently practical men, who sought new homes where their growing families could reap the benefit of cheap lands, and where persevering labor might lead to competence. To this unique blending of sentiment and common sense, Kentucky appealed with captivating power. Its primitive fertility and beauty entranced every beholder, and description became rhapsody. It is somewhat in this strain that Imlay pictures the country in 1784:

"Everything here assumes a dignity and splendor I have never seen in any other part of the world. You ascend a considerable distance from the shore of the Ohio, and when you would suppose you had arrived at the summit of a mountain, you find yourself upon an extensive level. Here an eternal verdure reigns, and the brilliant sun of latitude 39 degrees, piercing through the azure heavens, produces in this prolific soil an early maturity which is truly astonishing. Flowers, full and perfect, as if they had been cultivated by the hand of a florist, with all their captivating odours, and with all the variegated charms which colour and nature can produce, here, in the lap of elegance and beauty, decorate the smiling groves. Soft zephyrs gently breathe sweets, and the inhaled air gives a voluptuous glow of health and vigor that seems to ravish the intoxicated senses. The sweet songsters of the forests appear to feel the influence of this genial clime, and, in more soft and modulated tones, warble their tender notes in unison with love and nature. Everything here gives delight, and in the mild effulgence which beams around us, we feel a glow of gratitude for the elevation which our all bountiful Creator has bestowed on us. * * * *

"You must forgive what I know you will call a rhapsody, but what I really experienced in traveling across the Alleghany Mountains in March, when it was covered with snow, and after finding the country about Pittsburgh bare, and not recovered from the ravages of winter; there was scarcely a blade of grass to be seen, everything looked dreary, and bore those marks of melancholy which the rude hand of frost produces. I embarked immediately for Kentucky, and in less than five days landed at Limestone, where I found nature robed in all her charms.

"From Limestone to Licking Creek the country is immensely rich, and covered with cane, rye-grass, and the native clover. The cane is a reed which grows to the height frequently of fifteen or sixteen feet, but more generally about ten or twelve feet, and in thickness from the size of a goose quill, to that of two inches diameter; sometimes, yet seldom, it is larger. When it is slender, it never grows higher than from four to seven feet; it shoots up in one summer, but produced no leaves until the following year. It is an evergreen, and is, perhaps, the most nourishing food for cattle upon earth. No other milk or butter has such flavor and richness as that which is produced from cows which feed upon cane. Horses which are fed upon it work nearly as well as if they were fed upon corn, provided care is taken to give them once in three or four days a handful of salt, otherwise this food is liable to heat and bind their bowels. The rye-grass, when it arrives to maturity, is from two feet and a half high to three and a half, and the head and beard resemble the real rye, and sometimes produces a small grain, long and slender, not unlike rye. Whether cultivation would bring it to the same perfection, I can form no idea; it is, however, certain that it is a very good and valuable grass. The clover is in no respect different from the clover in Europe, but it is more coarse and luxuriant. There is a variety of grasses which are found in different places, but I have only mentioned the two former, they being esteemed the most valuable.

"In order to travel into the interior parts of the State, the route lies across the branches of Licking Creek. There are several of them which take their rise in the high hills of Great Sandy River, and the spurs of the Alleghany Mountains. They traverse a most delightful country, and form a junction a small distance below the lower Blue Lick. A salt spring is called a lick, from the earth about it being furrowed out in a most curious manner by the buffalo and deer, which lick the earth on account of the saline particles with which it is impregnated. The country from the fork to the Ohio is considerably broken, but generally rich, and continues uneven, except on the banks of the river, quite to the mouth of the Kentucky. * * * *

"After passing the Blue Lick the soil, if possible, increases in richness. From thence to Danville is about fifty miles. Lexington is about midway, and is nearly central of the finest and most luxuriant country, perhaps, on earth. From Lexington to Leesburg is about twenty miles; to Boonesburg it is about twenty; the upper Blue Lick nearly thirty. This square, which is nearly fifty miles, comprehends entirely what is called first-rate land. Leesburg lies on the Kentucky about twenty miles from its mouth by land, and nearly forty by water. The country between that and the Ohio is broken but rich, though it is not deemed a valuable body of land. The Kentucky is bounded everywhere by high, rocky precipices, which are generally 200 feet and upward perpendicular, and which make its passage difficult.

"Few places on it have any bottom land, as the rock rises mostly contiguous to the bed of the river, which confinement, after the heavy rains, renders it very formidable from the impetuosity of its current. On ascending the banks of this river, the land on either side is equally good for a considerable distance above Boonesburg; but adjacent to the mountains, from which the river rises, the country becomes broken, sterile, and of little or no value. Boonesburg lies on the Kentucky, about sixty miles above its mouth by land, and about 130 by water. From Leesburg down the river on the south side, for about ten or twelve miles, the hills are considerably high and steep, but when you pass the waters of Drinnon's Lick Creek, you fall into a body of good champaign land, which extends with little variation to the Rapids of the Ohio. From Leesburg to Danville the country, for the first twenty miles, is of an inferior character of land for this country, but farther on you get into the rich country I have mentioned, comprehended within the square of fifty miles.

"Large bodies of good land lie on every side of Danville for twenty miles and upward, but in the course from thence to the Rapids of the Ohio, on the waters of Salt River (which takes its name from a salt spring called Bullitt's Lick that is on its banks, about twenty miles from the mouth of the river), the country is, in some places, broken into ridges of hills, which are in general good land, but not well watered. As you approach the Rapids the country becomes more level, better watered, and the soil more fertile. The country of Beargrass is beautiful and rich, as indeed is the land on Goose and Harrod's Creeks. In the fork of the Ohio and Salt Rivers, which form a junction about twenty miles below the Rapids, the country is flat and interspersed with small lakes or ponds, occasioned by the extreme lowness of the banks of the Ohio in this fork, which, when flooded, overflows the country, and the water fills these ponds periodically, or as often as those inundations happen, which are frequent from December until April.

"The Rapids of the Ohio lies about 700 miles below Pittsburgh; and about 400 above the confluence with the Mississippi. They are occasioned by a ledge of rocks which stretch across the bed of the river from one side to the other, in some places projecting so much that they are visible when the water is not high, and in most places when the river is extremely low. The fall is not more than between four and five feet in the distance of a mile, so that boats of any burthen may pass with safety when there is a flood, but boats coming up the river must unload.

"The situation of the Rapids is truly delightful. The river is full a mile wide, and the fall of water, which is an eternal cascade, appears as if nature had designed it to show how inimitable and stupendous are her works. * * * The view up the river is terminated at the distance of four leagues, by an island in its center, which is contrasted by the plain on the opposite shore that extends a long way into the country, but the eye receding, finds new beauties and ample subjects for admiration in the rising hills of Silver Creek, which, stretching obliquely to the northwest, proudly rise higher and higher as they extend, until their summits are lost in air. * * * There lies a small island in the river, about 200 yards from the eastern shore, between which and the main there is a quarry of excellent stone for building, and which in great part is dry the latter part of summer. The banks of the river are never overflowed here, they being fifty feet higher than the bed of the river.

* * * * *

"In leaving the Rapids in a southwesterly direction the country is flat, it bordering upon the country I have described in the fork of the Ohio and Salt Rivers. After passing the main branch of the Salt River near Bullitt's Lick, ten miles distant, in the fork of the north and the south branches, the country becomes broken and hilly, but between which and the Cumberland Road, that leads from the upper parts of Kentucky, there is a considerable extent of fine land; but traveling a few leagues farther southward you arrive at extensive plains, which extend upwards of 150 miles in a southwest course, and end only when they join the mountainous country. Some few clumps of trees, and a grove here and there, are the only obstructions to a boundless horizon. It is pleasant to behold the deer bounding over the scraggy shrubs which cover the earth. While the setting sun gilds those extensive plains, the mild breezes of a summer's eve playing upon the enraptured senses, soften the heart to love and friendship. Unperceived upon some eminence you may enjoy the sports of wild animals, which here rove unconcerned lords of the field. Heavens! What charms there are in liberty!

"We now have arrived on the waters of Green River. * * * The plains extend upon the head-waters of this river quite into the limits of North Carolina, but at the mouth, and for forty miles above, there is a large proportion of good land, particularly upon Panther Creek. From the mouth of Green River up the Ohio to Salt River, the land upon the banks of the Ohio is generally fertile and rich; but leaving its banks you soon fall into the plain country, which is considered as little better than barren land,* * * * * yet it is of superior quality to great part of the soil in the lower parts of Virginia, the Carolinas and Georgia. It abounds with hazel, which, it is well-known, never grows kindly in a poor soil.

"The native strawberry is found in these plains in the greatest abundance, as are likewise plums of different sorts; and if we can form any idea of the native grape that grows spontaneously here, what the same soil is capable of producing where they are cultivated, it would appear that no climate or soil in the world is more congenial to the vine, for I have never tasted more delicious grapes; and it is the opinion of some judicious foreigners, who have visited these Arcadian regions, that as good wine as can be made in any part of the globe might be produced from the native grape properly cultivated. There is nothing more common than to meet with a pleasant wine made here by the settlers, who know nothing of the use of vats, or the degree of fermentation necessary to the perfection of the art of wine-making. But I flatter myself some progress will be made in this business, as several foreigners have long had it in agitation to undertake it.† The country between Green and Cumberland Rivers is, in general, rich and finely watered. There is in it a most valuable lead mine, and several salt springs, and two of bitumen, which, when analyzed, is found to be amber. But so much do we stand in need of chemists and mineralists, that we remain ignorant of the properties and value of many fossils which have been discovered. * *

*Appendix A, Note 16.
†Appendix A, Note 17.

"Cumberland River rises among the mountains, considerably to the northeast, and after its several branches have joined it, runs a long way south, and enters the limits of North Carolina. After a course of half a degree within those limits it turns to the northwest, and empties into the Ohio, at some distance above its junction with the Mississippi. The Tenasee runs into the Ohio, not a long way below the mouth of Cumberland. The Tenasee is the most important of the southern branches of the Ohio. * *

"After you leave the plains which extend into the Cumberland country, in your course to the Tenasee, the country is somewhat broken, but mostly rich. Great part of the land lying between these rivers was in military grants, made by Virginia to their officers and soldiers, and is esteemed a valuable situation for its proximity to the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi. Their grants extend as low on the Mississippi as the partition line between Virginia and North Carolina, all of which is a beautiful country, and the banks of the river, which are very high, prevent it from overflowing, which is not the case lower down."*

This early survey of Kentucky has the rare merit of being generally confirmed by experience. But while this is true, and undoubtedly expressed the collated judgment of the early settlers, there were details unnoted which were of the first importance in deciding the pioneer's choice of a new home. A fertile soil was an important consideration, but not so important as others which have long since become obsolete. The demands of the pioneer grew out of the undeveloped condition of the whole country, and made him a hunter rather than a farmer. His resources, as well as inducement for the cultivation of the land, were of the most limited kind, and obliged him to depend upon nature far more than upon art for his subsistence. His education and experience prepared him to prefer this kind of existence, and while he sought a locality which was likely to invite immigration, and thus lead to the appreciation of his preemption, his only hope of an ultimate competence, his experience led him to seek a land where the meager demands for the support of his family could be most readily supplied. This implied an abundance of game, a good range for his few head of stock, convenient materials for the construction of his rude dwelling and limited fencing, and plenty of good water.

These conditions were all happily blended in the new land. Springs bubbled up in all parts of the very garden spot of Kentucky, tall forests crowned the uplands, while in the glades and on the river-bottoms flourished the luxuriant cane, rye-grass and clover. But what more excited the admiration of immigrants was the profusion of game, which everywhere abounded and included "beasts of every American kind." Elks were found in the broken country; deer moving in small companies, or herding together to the number of a hundred head, thronged the uplands and valleys, where bears and buffaloes in large numbers were also found, adding piquancy to the mingled duty and pleasure of the hunt. The latter, it is said, came in vast herds of a thousand head, making broad paths to the licks, which they frequented, and shaking the earth in their ponderous flight.

The buffalo was a new game to the pioneers. The oldest hunters often found themselves at fault in its pursuit, and Butler relates that, in 1781, a body of forty emigrants were discovered by Clark and two companions, "actually starving, from inexperience of the hunters in killing the buffalo." Clark's company soon killed fourteen of these animals for the famished party, as much to their astonishment as to their gratification. "It seems that skillful hunters can arrange themselves so as to run parallel with a herd of buffalo, killing and loading as far as they can run. This conduct of our hunters struck the group of strangers with such astonishment, when they contrasted the success of the new hunters with the failure of their own men, themselves expert woodsmen with all other game, that they were ready to look upon Clark and his two coadjutors as something more than mortals in disguise. A party thus strangely rescued from starvation, in the midst of wild game, might well be disordered in their judgments at first."

*"A Description of the Western Territory of North America," by G. Imlay; Dublin, 1793; pp. 39-52. This work consists of a series of letters by the author to a friend in England. The original edition was published at London, 1792. Several editions were subsequently published, that of 1797 being in two volumes, the second of which contained the work of Filson. A good copy of this edition is rare.

The secret of the successful pursuit of this animal was soon learned by all, and it became the general object of the hunter's prowess, hundreds eventually being slaughtered simply for their tongues, which were considered a great delicacy. Such improvidence in the use of nature's bounties soon drove the buffalo beyond the Mississippi, and in 1784 only a few were to be found in Kentucky. Deer, turkeys, wolves, foxes and those woodland friends of man, the squirrel and raccoon, remained much later, the last two still being the sport of the younger hunters. The departure of the deer and turkey was in some part supplied by the quail and summer-duck, which early followed in the wake of the grain-fields, and still remain.

Into this earthly elysium, the older frontiers sent forth an eager throng ready to riot in its charms, and had not the Indian interposed his claim, nature's magic would have raised up in the Kentucky forests a state which could have been scarcely less turbulent than that which a quarter of a century later arose on the Pacific slope. Desperate as was the contest that ensued, society gained no slight recompense in the clarifying influences of danger. The sordid and vicious were largely deterred from coming, or were frightened into a hurried retreat to safer neighborhoods, where they remained until the frontier community became so far established as to hold disintegrating elements in control.

But with the limitations of an Indian war and an early attempt to plant an orderly colony, the growth of the early society in Kentucky was spontaneous, and exhibited in its evolution a show of regularity which is discoverable in the normal development of the average pioneer community. The first settlers, though not unacquainted with the formalities of government, lightly esteemed its functions, and were prepared to reject its sanctions in their new home. The early attempt to establish a formal government by the Transylvania colonists, though liberally devised, was rejected, primarily, as an innovation upon the inherent freedom of the frontier. The pioneer claimed, by virtue of the risk of his bold adventure, a certain absolution from legal responsibility which the necessities of the case obliged society at large to grant, and it was only when a different class of interests became prominent that the unwritten law of the community assumed something of regularity. With the increase of numbers democracy delegated its powers, and, by a single step farther, lost itself in the embryonic government of the commonwealth.

The order of this development cannot be clearly defined. It was the result of a succession of influences rather than the legislation of classes, and the character of society gradually changed, partly through a change of sentiment in those already on the border, and partly through the accession of others who entertained more advanced notions. The earliest dominant influence was exerted by the hunter or scout, whose presence on the frontier was due to the attractions of the abundant game and the adventures of an unrestrained life; then succeeded the pioneer, whose chief aim was to establish a home and provide for the future; and finally the man of affairs, the prototype of the modern politician, who prepared the way for a more stable order of society. No distinct line of division defined these classes, however. The one often merged into the other, and there were individuals who were successively eminent in each of them, though this was exceeding rare, Benjamin Logan alone affording a conspicuous example.

Of the first class of pioneers, Logston and Kenton may be taken as types of the two extremes. Big Joe Logston, as he was called, was the son of somewhat remarkable parents, who lived in the region of the Alleghany Mountains. Old Joe Logston, as his father was known, was of extraordinary size, superior in athletic accomplishments, and possessed of great muscular strength. His wife, while not remarkably tall, was large of bone and coarse of fiber, and possessed the strength of three ordinary women. The son of such parents was predestined to excel in physical power, and in early manhood he exceeded his father in size, strength and activity. His size became proverbial, and "great as Big Joe Logston" was the most exalted standard of physical excellence in his neighborhood. He early became noted for his skill with the rifle and in athletic sports, and is said to have boasted, with an accuracy that none felt willing to contest, that he could "out-run, out-leap, out-jump, throw down, drag out and whip any man in the country."

Logston took to the woods as naturally as a bear's cub, and spent his early years in quest of such game as the mountain region afforded, resorting to the settlements only to exchange his peltries for powder and lead. As pioneer improvements encroached upon his solitude he grew restive, and when a cabin was erected within two miles of his accustomed haunts, he excepted the fact as a notice to leave, and in 1790 went to the Barren River, in Kentucky. Here he first met the hostile Indian, whom he considered as only a nobler kind of game. With them he had numerous adventures, which gave him distinction among friends and foes, and their recital afforded entertainment at many a frontier fireside. One of the most notorious of these exploits was a fight with two Indians, in which he succeeded in mortally wounding one, and in mauling the other to death with his fists. As the settlement increased in his neighborhood, and Indian hostilities ceased, he went to Illinois, where he was subsequently killed in a contest with a band of desperadoes.

The class of adventurers of which Logston is in some respects rather a mild type was not so conspicuous in numbers or prowess in Kentucky as elsewhere on the western border, but no part of the frontier was without its representatives. They seldom had families, made no pre-emption, or lightly abandoned it with the crude improvements they made, and preferred to live apart from their fellows. They were too often of a quarrelsome disposition, which developed into ferocity when the natives were concerned, and led them to defy law, the general weal, and every consideration of humanity, to satisfy their abnormal thirst for the blood of the savages. These characteristics, it will be observed, represent the least favorable development of a class of people generally designated as "first settlers," "a kind of men," to use the language of Michaux, "who are unable to stop on the soil which they have cleared, and, under pretense of finding better land, a more healthy country, or a greater abundance of beasts of chase, keep always moving farther, constantly direct their steps to the points most remote from every part of the American population, and establish themselves in the vicinity of the nations of the savages, whom they brave even in their own country."

Kenton, in contrast with Logston, while indubitably of the same class, was of a superior order. His endowments were intellectual rather than physical, and while possessed of great powers of endurance and a taste for hazardous exploits, he was endued with a sagacity which alone warrants the higher place accorded him in pioneer annals. The almost tragic event which cast him upon the frontier in the guise of an outlaw undoubtedly turned the course of his life to nobler purposes; and where he sought simply an asylum from outraged justice, he found a field of action in which he could employ his expanding powers and redeem the good name which the passion of undisciplined youth had forfeited. His advent upon the frontier has been noted in the preceding pages. From that time forward he was a prominent actor in Kentucky affairs, though occupying the position of scout until the expedition of 1782, in which he commanded a company. Thus up to the peace, which was announced the following year, his powers found congenial employment in the warlike activities of the border, or during the interval when a temporary cessation of hostilities gave him leisure for peaceful pursuits, in aiding the surveyors as guide and hunter.

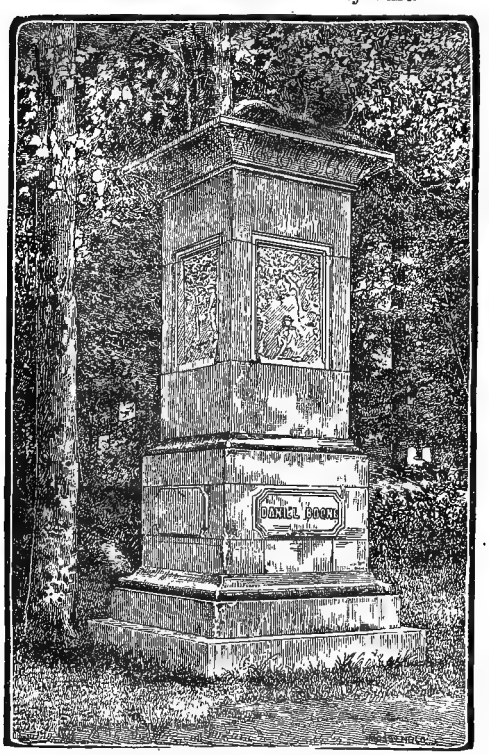
In the meantime Kenton had been known on the border as Simon Butler, having assumed his mother's family name to further avoid discovery of his identity; but some time in 1782 he met his brother, who relieved him of further necessity for disguise by the information that the victim of his assault had recovered and long since forgiven the injury. The supposed crime had long weighed on his heart, and his emancipation from the galling bonds of self-accusation opened a new prospect in life, and gave his activity a new direction. He had secured claims to large tracts of land, and was considered one of the wealthiest men in Kentucky. On the announcement of peace he repaired to his claim on Salt River, and began cultivating it. A considerable settlement gathered about him, and, having prepared a home for his parents, he set out in the late fall of 1783 to visit Virginia for the first time since his flight, nearly thirteen years before. His reception by his family, and even by his old-time rival, was of the most cordial character; old differences were forgotten, and the illustrious scout, whose exploits were the theme of every fireside discussion, became the hero of the hour.

The hardy pioneer spent little time in such seductive dalliance, and early in the spring, with the whole family, whom he had induced by his glowing description to emigrate, he reached Redstone. Here, while preparations were being made to continue the journey by water, his father died and was buried. The rest of the party subsequently proceeded to their destination. At this time the route followed by the great tide of immigration was by way of the river to Limestone (Maysville), and thence by the old trail to the interior. This travel made the site of Kenton's old camp and claim especially valuable, and in July, 1784, he repaired to this point with a party, intent upon establishing a station upon his land. A blockhouse was built, but the Indians, while not generally renewing active hostilities, were beginning to show their restlessness and dissatisfaction by sundry depredations which discouraged Kenton's companions from joining in his venturesome project, and the enterprise was for the time abandoned. In the fall, however, Kenton resolved to take advantage of the circumstances, which were likely to enhance the value of his property, and removed his family to this exposed region. A few of the more venturesome families joined him at once, and in the succeeding spring many newcomers swelled the new station into a strong frontier settlement. Here the distinguished hunter discharged the duties of captain and leader of the settlement with the same success that had crowned his efforts as scout and guide. About 1799,* after reaching the rank of major, and taking an active part in all the campaigns which followed the renewal of the Indian war, he went to the newer lands north of the Ohio, confounded by the subtleties of the land-laws, robbed by unprincipled speculators and beggared by land-suits.



Boone, also, in all his instincts, tastes and habits, was closely allied to this class of "first settlers." He had, at the same time, a prudent regard for the future, which led him to labor for an eventual competence for his family, and amid all the strange vicissitudes of the frontier he never neglected the cultivation of his plantation near Boonesborough. He was, in fact, one of those connecting links between the hunter and the farmer which blended the social product of the early adventurers into the more stable form of society which arose out of the influence of the pioneer husbandman. After the declaration of peace, his name loses significance in the annals of the border, and while at one time he occupied a prominent place in the county government, and once represented the frontier in the Virginia assembly, he was soon superseded in those functions, and wandered amid the scenes of an expanding civilization, a relic of a by-gone period, unappreciative and unappreciated.

*Appendix A, Note 18.

In 1779 he accumulated a considerable sum in paper money, amounting to $20,000, it is said, and set out for Richmond, Va., to invest it in land warrants, but on his way he was unfortunately robbed of the whole of it. He subsequently made claims to considerable land, but eventually lost it all through the intricacies of the law. Rendered discontented by misfortunes, which his unfamiliarity with and distaste for legal niceties made him incapable of repairing or avoiding, he began to long for the untrammeled freedom of the forest. His family no longer needed his care, and about 1794, with his wife, he left Kentucky never again to find here his abode until the State brought his remains to be interred in the public cemetry at Frankfort.* Subsequently the commonwealth,

Slowly wise and meanly just,
To buried merit raised the tardy bust.

MONUMENT TO DANIEL BOONE.

These figures, whose outlines a happy chance has fixed upon the historic page, were not dissimilar to the throng which constituted the advance line of civilization on the border. Of the many, only here and there an exaggerated tale perpetuates the memory of their valor or their virtues, and of them it may be written, as it was of the Romans: "History has left a thousand of their more brilliant actions unrecorded, which would have done them great honor, but for want of eloquent historians." To the curious gaze of the foreigner, these people presented an object of peculiar interest, and a French traveler, who descended the Ohio in 1802, has left the following pen-picture of a common representative of the class:

Before we arrived at Marietta, we fell in with one of these settlers, an inhabitant of the neighborhood of Wheeling, who, like us, was descending the Ohio, and we kept together for two days. Alone, in a canoe of eighteen or twenty feet long, and twelve or fifteen inches wide, he was going to visit the banks of the Missouri, at 150 miles from its mouth. The excellent quality of the land, which is reported to be more fertile than the banks of the Ohio, and which the Spanish government at that time distributed gratis, the multitude of beavers, elks, and more particularly of bisons, were the motives which induced him to emigrate into these distant countries, from whence, when he had determined on a convenient spot to settle with his family, he had to return and seek them on the banks of the Ohio, which obliged him to make a voyage of 1,400 or 1,500 miles three times.

His dress, like that of all the American hunters, consisted of a round waist-coat with sleeves, a pair of pantaloons, and a broad woolen girdle of a red and yellow color. A carbine, a tomahawk, a small hatchet used by the Indians to cut wood and to complete the death of their enemies, two beaver traps and a large knife hanging to his girdle, composed his hunting equipage. One blanket was all his baggage. Every evening he encamped on the banks of the river, or passed the night by a fire, and when he judged the spot to be favorable to the chase, he penetrated into the woods for several days and, from the produce of his hunting, procured the means of subsistence, and obtained fresh supplies with the skins of the animals he had killed.

Such were the first inhabitants of Kentucky and Tennessee, of whom very few are now left. It was they who began to clear those fertile countries and wrested them from the savages, who obstinately disputed the possession of them; it was they who finally secured the property in them after five or six years of bloody war. But, long habituated to a wandering, unemployed life, they were unable to enjoy the fruits of their toil, or to benefit by the extraordinary value to which they had raised these lands in a short time; they have emigrated into more remote countries, where they are forming new establishments.*

*Appendix A, Note 19.

These western nomads were not the precursors of the permanent population in every settlement. Like birds of passage their flight was "from zone to zone," and once the migration was begun they did not stay their course until they reached the remote locality to which rumor, or a kind of instinct, led them. It was a common occurrence for the head of a family to be moved by a sudden impulse to go "farther west." With the facility of the Arabs, the whole household would be on its way in a day or two, sometimes in as many hours, and, boldly plunging into the unmarked wilderness, travel hundreds of miles, Lone, wandering, but not lost.

Occasionally, necessitated by the exigency of the way, a stop would be made long enough "to raise a crop," but, this secured, the journey was resumed and prosecuted to the end. This class of immigrants left slight impress of their personality upon permanent social institutions, but their service to the State was none the less real. Fitted by their tastes and experience to meet the rude shock of border life, they prepared the way for higher forms of society, and then passed off the stage of action almost unheeded.

The pioneer husbandman was a more prosaic figure, and while more permanent than his predecessor, he paved his way to obscurity by the unobtrusive diligence which alone insured his permanence. It will be observed that he was the successor of the "first settler" in wielding the dominant social influence rather than in the matter of immigration. He was among the earliest to reach the frontier, though doubtless in fewer numbers; and here amid the distractions and dangers of an Indian war he gradually extended the area of his clearings, furnished the sinews of war, and, in case of a general expedition, swelled the ranks of the invading army. Many of this class were men of some wealth, for the time, who "took up" large areas of land and on some favorable spot erected a station. Such places of protection were the welcome resort of the less provident class, who, in return for board or the use of certain lands, became the retainers of the founders of the station.

It is difficult to draw a typical figure of these pioneers. Like the men of average and general uniform characteristics of to-day, who constitute the "forgotten millions" of the world, they can be reckoned only in the mass, and indiscriminately designated as "the people" of that day. Among them, more distinguished than the many, may be mentioned the founder of the first settlement in Kentucky, James Harrod. Nothing is known of his early antecedents. He probably came from the Pennsylvania border of Virginia, and justly claimed the distinction of having erected the first cabin in Kentucky. He was tall, erect and commanding in appearance, bold, resolute, and energetic in action, and possessed qualities of a lofty and generous nature. He was unlearned in books, but deeply read in nature and human character. His mild and conciliating manners, his integrity and generous kindness, served to attract and hold in friendly allegiance the rudest characters with whom he came in contact, and made him a power, which neither the advantage of wealth nor prestige could withstand.

In the first years of the Kentucky settlements, when Indian hostilities made stations the only prudent form of habitation, and when the growth and stability of such stations depended upon the numbers that could be attracted to them, Harrod found no difficulty in establishing the most popular one on the frontier, the influence of which eventually proved the most stubborn obstacle to the success of the Transylvania colony, although supported by the reputation of Daniel Boone. Up to 1783, Harrodsburg, originally known as Harrod's Town, continued to be the largest settlement beyond the Big Sandy, and the center of frontier influence. But with the division of Kentucky into three counties, Harrod, whose public importance had some time before begun to wane, became one of the people.

*Michaux's Travels, pp. 136–138.

From the first, Harrod was diverted from the cultivation of his land only by the exigencies of the situation. He was an adept in the use of the rifle, and took keen pleasure in the excitement of the hunt, but in this pursuit he was eminently practical; he hunted for the necessary food which his skill enabled him to procure. He was a formidable adversary to the hostile Indians, and during the first three or four years was prominent as a partisan leader. In succeeding years, when the number of settlers had somewhat increased, he seemed to have left the performance of these duties to others to whom they were more congenial. The attempt of some writers to make him figure as an "Indian-slayer" appears entirely gratuitous. While incidents are related which show him to have possessed a spirit of great daring, his noted encounters with the savages were unsought, and occurred when alone in quest of game. His widow related an incident which is characteristic of the man:

When in the fort, I dreamed one night that the Indians had attacked some of our men outside the fort; and that when my husband ran out to help them, I saw an Indian shoot him, and when he fell, stoop over and stab him. The very next day three men were chopping on a log on the creek alongside the old Harrod fort, close by, when we heard guns fire and saw the three men killed and the Indians scalping them. The Colonel started out with the others, but so forcibly now was my dream impressed upon me that I clung to him. He forcibly tore himself from me, and hurried out. I ran up to the highest point and looked out. The Indians were in turn fired upon, and I saw the Colonel shoot one and run him a short distance down the creek, and when the Indian fell, I plainly saw my husband stoop over (just the "contrary" of my dream) and stab him. When he came back, he did not exult, but seemed distressed, and said he wished never to kill another of the poor natives, who were defending their fatherland, and that this feeling was forced upon him by the rebound of his knife, when he plunged it into the heart of the fallen Indian, who looked up so piteously into his face. He shed a tear when telling me.*

Abundant testimony to his kindly spirit is found in all the books of border tales. New comers, whether prospectors, speculators or surveyors, found a cordial welcome at his station, the reputation of which found its way across the border. Inexperienced settlers found him, in many a case of need, a providential friend, who, without solicitation, provided a haunch of venison, restored a missing animal, or recovered a stolen implement, as though that was his sole business in the world. No case of distress appealed to him in vain, and there were few families in the central settlements to whom his disinterested kindness had not given special cause for gratitude. "In after times," says Gov. Morehead, "when peace and quiet ensued, and the range of the buffalo was filled up with a civilized and enterprising population, and he had become the father of an interesting family, the veteran pioneer would turn away from the scenes of domestic and social life, and plunge again into the wilderness to indulge himself in the cherished enjoyments of his earlier years. From one of these excursions into a distant part of the country he never returned."*

Of those who directed the larger movements of frontier society, the names of Trigg, Floyd, Todd, Clark and Logan were more prominent—names which have not lost their brightness even in the blaze of what it is common to call the civilization of the nineteenth century. In no period of the State's development has its destiny been shaped with greater fidelity or more conspicuous ability than it was by these noble-minded men during the first two decades of its history, but it is of "the people" that this chapter is designed to treat.

The settlement of Kentucky was made under conditions somewhat different from those met with elsewhere on the western border. Nowhere else was the Indian opposition urged with equal determination; nowhere else were the settlements so completely isolated and dependent upon their own unaided resources; and nowhere else were such meagre numbers so often called to defend their homes, not only from the assaults of overwhelming savage hordes, but of savages led by trained officers, re-enforced by white soldiers, and supplied with the most effective war material of the day. How this was accomplished, unaided, save by an unwavering fortitude and the rude defenses of the station, may be read in the thousand tales of daring exploits, of personal heroism, and of unselfish devotion which have their scenes in Kentucky.

*Dr. Christopher Graham in Collins, Vol. II, p. 615.

*Appendix A, Note 20.

At the same time, these tales are not to be relied upon as a complete portraiture of the people. They were not uncouth knights-errant, nor was woodcraft a species of witchcraft. Kentucky immigrants were drawn from the same classes as their contemporaries in other parts of the border, though circumstances already pointed out had a powerful influence in remolding their character as a whole. The approach to this famous "cane-land" was not made by the ordinary extension of the frontier, and a considerable extent of good land intervened between the old and the new settlements. The story of its attractions had reached far into the interior, and emigrants were drawn hither by its enchantments rather than urged by their necessities, and, once in possession, they adopted it as their native land, and defended it with the fervor of patriotism. The spirited opposition with which their advent was met had a salutary influence in driving out the faint-hearted, so that of those who remained each was a hero in the strife. Otherwise the Kentucky pioneer was not unlike his fellows elsewhere. He brought to his new home only the accomplishments of the woodsman. He was a good marksman, was well versed in the habits of familiar game, possessed a keen faculty of observation, and was teachable, patient, persevering. The rest he learned from his experience here.

Upon the character of men thus endowed, the stirring scenes of Kentucky, from 1775 to 1795, could not fail to leave a deep impress. New dangers and difficulties developed new powers to meet and overcome them. Men, whose early experience at most had only revealed the crude astronomy by which they traced their course in the unmarked wilderness, and the natural science which led them to discover the meaning of a mossy bark or the peculiar trail of the various animals, now learned to read a deep significance in a displaced leaf, the bending of a twig, a floating log, or the turning of a human foot-print. Instead of studying the habits of the savage beasts, the pioneer's attention was drawn to a grander quarry, and insensibly acquired many of the habits of the object they so persistently studied. In many respects, Campbell's picture of the Indian might well be applied to the pioneer:

> As monumental bronze unchanged his look;
> A soul that pity touched, but never shook;
> Train'd from his tree-rocked cradle to his bier,
> The fierce extremes of good and ill to brook;
> Impassive—fearing but the shame of fear—
> A stoic of the woods—a man without a tear.

A characteristic story is told of one of the prisoners captured by the Indians at the battle of Blue Lick. With two companions he was taken to Detroit, and in the route passed through several towns of the natives, at each of which he was compelled to run the gauntlet. On one occasion, taking advantage of the arrangement of the Indians, he ran so close to one of the ranks as to come out almost unhurt. Immediately running up to a young warrior, with equal strength and adroitness, he picked up the astonished Indian and hurled him violently to the ground. In another instant, thrusting his head between another Indian's legs, he threw him over his head; then, springing into the air, he knocked his feet rapidly together, and crowed like a victorious cock, finishing this remarkable performance by rallying the natives as a pack of cowards. Such dauntless behavior elicited the admiration of the savages, and one old warrior promptly adopted him as his son.

Such exhibitions were not rare among white captives, and are to be referred for their origin rather to the settler's adoption of the stoicism of the Indian than to a spirit of bravado. There was but little encouragement for the development of such a spirit where all were brave. One excelled another in woodcraft or experience, but all were to be relied upon in emergencies, and many a deed of daring, which is now thoughtlessly assigned to the adventurous class, was done by men in whose quiet career it formed the single notable exception, and was attempted only after a cool calculation of the alternatives. Such a case is the incident related of Alexander McConnell by McClung.

McConnell was a resident of Lexington. He had been out on foot, in quest of deer, had killed one, and had returned to the station for his horse to bring in the game. In his absence, a party of five Indians had chanced upon the carcass, and correctly divining its meaning, they carefully hid near to await the hunter's return. Not suspecting danger, McConnell rode into the ambush; his horse was instantly killed, and while freeing himself from the fallen animal, he was pounced upon by the savages and borne off. His captors, who appear to have been in a peculiarly pleasant mood, permitted him to proceed unbound and to retain his accoutrements. These ill-assorted companions thus traveled harmoniously together for several days, the captive accepting his fate with the sang froid of the true borderer, and gaining favor with the savages by his dexterity in providing game for the party.

On approaching the banks of the Ohio, McConnell felt that his chances of escape would be greatly diminished by crossing the river, and he accordingly determined to make an earnest effort to get away at once. His captors had taken the precaution to bind him each night, though not with their accustomed care, but on this occasion he complained strenuously of the pain it caused him, and had the satisfaction of observing that the thong which bound him to the body of the Indian, was only loosely tied to his wrists. Waiting until his captors were asleep, he cast his eyes about for some suggestion, when he saw a knife blade glittering in the light of the camp-fire. This proved to be within reach of his feet, and grasping it with his toes he succeeded in drawing it near and getting it into his hand. In another instant his thongs were severed, and carefully withdrawing from the embrace of his sleeping guard, he was free to escape to the woods.

The success of such a course was very doubtful. His flight would soon be discovered, and a vigorous pursuit made. In that event, with so long a distance to travel, his recapture seemed certain, when death would undoubtedly seal his fate. The only alternative was to destroy his foes, which was a scarcely less hazardous undertaking. There was no opportunity of taking them off in detail; they were notoriously light sleepers, and what was done, must be done quietly and quickly.

After anxious reflections for a few minutes he formed his plan. The guns of the Indians were stacked near the fire, their knives and tomahawks were in sheaths by their sides. The latter he dared not touch for fear of awakening the owners, but the former he carefully removed with the exception of two, and hid them in the woods, where he knew the Indians would not readily find them. He then returned to the spot where the Indians were still sleeping, ignorant of the fate preparing for them, and taking a gun in each hand, he rested the muzzles upon a log within six feet of his victims, and having taken deliberate aim at the head of one and the heart of another, he pulled both triggers at the same moment.

Both shots were fatal. At the report of their guns, the others sprang to their feet, and stared wildly around them. McConnell, who had run instantly to the spot where the other rifles were hid, hastily seized one of them and fired at two of his enemies who happened to stand in a line with each other. The nearest fell dead, being shot through the center of the body; the second fell also, bellowing loudly, but recovering quickly, limped off into the woods as fast as possible. The fifth and only one who remained unhurt darted off like a deer with a yell which announced equal terror and astonishment. McConnell, not wishing to fight any more such battles, selected his own rifle from the stack and made the best of his way to Lexington, where he arrived safely within two days. (McClung.)

A similar development was silently wrought in the female character. Women who, in 1773, terror-stricken by the Indian attack near Cumberland Gap, demanded the retreat of the first emigrants to Kentucky, in later years stood unswerving amid the vicissitudes that made death, wounds, and captivity the almost daily fate of their sex. So accustomed did they become to the violent form of death that, as Judge Hall relates on one occasion, when a young man died the natural way, the woman of the station sat up all night, gazing at the remains as an object of beauty. The matrons of the frontier, in time, seemed to lose all womanish fears and weaknesses, and emulated the dexterity of their fathers, brothers and husbands in the use of the gun and ax in defense of their homes and children. McClung relates an incident which occurred in the summer of 1787, when the cabin of John Merrill of Nelson County, Ky., was attacked by Indians and defended with singular address and good fortune.

Merrill was alarmed by the barking of a dog about midnight, and, upon opening the door in order to ascertain the cause of the disturbance, he received the fire of six or seven Indians, by which his arm and thigh were both broken. He instantly sank upon the floor and called upon his wife to close the door. This had scarcely been done when it was violently assailed by the tomahawks of the enemy, and a large breach soon effected. Mrs. Merrill, however, being a perfect Amazon, both in strength and courage, guarded it with an ax, and successively killed or badly wounded four of the enemy as they attempted to force their way into the cabin. The Indians then ascended the roof and attempted to enter by way of the chimney; but here again they were met by the same determined enemy. Mrs. Merrill seized the only feather bed the cabin afforded, and hastily ripping it open, poured its contents upon the fire. A furious blaze and stifling smoke instantly ascended the chimney and brought down two of the enemy, who lay for a few moments at the mercy of the woman. Seizing the ax she quickly dispatched them, and was instantly afterward summoned to the door, where the only remaining savage now appeared, endeavoring to effect an entrance while Mrs. Merrill was engaged at the chimney. He soon received a gash in the cheek, which compelled him, with a loud yell, to relinquish his purpose, and return hastily to Chillicothe, where, from the report of a prisoner, he gave an exaggerated account of the fierceness, strength and courage of the "long-knife" squaw.

All were not Amazons in strength, nor was it chiefly by their strength that the women achieved such prodigies of valor which everywhere adorn the pages of frontier history. In presence of mind they were not excelled by the acutest scout, and often outwitted the cunning savage by a bold face or a quickly conceived stratagem. One night, when a settler was forced to be away from his home on business, his wife learned by the snorting of a horse, feeding near by, that the Indians were prowling about. Putting on a bold front, she immediately built up a large blaze in the fire-place, which, sending its light far through the chinks, indicated to the savages the presence of a large company, whereupon they decamped without offering any molestation.

Similar address, under more trying circumstances, was exhibited by the wife of Samuel Daviess, in 1782. On going out of his cabin early one morning, Mr. Daviess was startled, on stepping a few paces from the door, to find an Indian with an upraised tomahawk, barring his return. Entirely unarmed it instantly occurred to him that by running around the cabin he could gain an entrance before his pursuers could overtake him. To think was to act, but on making the circuit he found the cabin occupied by four Indians, whom he had heretofore failed to observe. His pursuer was close upon him; there was no room for hesitation, and he at once plunged into a field of standing corn near by, where, with difficulty, he eluded his pursuer and finally set off for help to the nearest station, five miles away.

The unsuccessful savage, after carefully staining his hands and tomahawk with poke-berries, returned to the cabin and exhibited them to Mrs. Daviess to convince her that there was no hope of rescue. She readily detected the fraud without giving any signs of her discovery, and in response to signs indicated on her fingers that the nearest cabin was eight miles away. Thus lulling the immediate fears of the savages, she slowly arose from the bed and dressed herself and children, at their command. This done, she attracted the Indians by displaying various articles of clothing one after another, and in this way delayed their departure for several hours. Finally, when every resource for effecting delay was exhausted, she was forced to accompany her captors with her children, some of whom were too young to keep pace with the party. Observing this, and knowing the Indians would not hestitate to murder them to save annoyance, she placed them on the backs of the older boys, and carrying an infant at her breast thus preserved their lives.

By her shrewd devices, the rescuing party was enabled to overtake the Indians about 9 o'clock in the morning. Noticing by the agitation of the savages that the pursuers were close at hand, she saved herself and infant by jumping into a sink-hole just as the whites attacked the band, and rescued the whole family. The elder boy, about eleven years of age, was struck down and scalped, but not killed, and his first utterance on rising was: "Curse that Indian, he has got my scalp."

Children of such parents and brought up in such surroundings could not fail to catch something of the heroic spirit of the times. Quieted in their infancy by suggesting the proximity of the Shawanese, supplied with tomahawk and bows and arrows for their earliest toys, they early displayed a precocity in those accomplishments upon which their safety often depended. It is sometimes said that infants of pioneers were less addicted to crying than those of a later period; but whether this be true or not, numerous well-attested incidents are related where nursing children have passed through the terrors of a midnight attack, and afterward lain quietly in hiding, when a single sound would have sealed the doom of mother and child. Children, at an age when parents are now loth to allow them out of their sight, were then found successfully eluding the savages, uninstructed, and carrying appeals for aid through miles of forest beset by Indians.

Boys were early instructed in the use of firearms, and a rifle or shotgun was usually their first piece of property. As a garrison for the station when the men were drawn off for some expedition, or as messengers and hunters, they performed conspicuous service, and greatly augmented the military strength of the frontier. During the winter of 1776–77, the settlements suffered much from the scarcity of food. The small stock of corn was soon exhausted, and, while the forest teemed with game, the Indians were so numerous and watchful that hunters were almost daily killed or wounded. In this predicament a lad only about seventeen years of age became Harrodsburg's sole dependence. This was James Ray, who was accustomed to mount an old but strong horse, the last of forty head belonging to his step-father, Maj. McGary, and starting off before day-break rode up the beds of streams to hide his trail. After gaining a safe distance from the fort, he spent the day in hunting, and returned by the same route after dark, bringing his game with him. Thus day after day and week after week he successfully eluded the enemy and supplied the fort. Older hunters tried his plan but were discovered, and finally resigned the perilous duty to the lad whose boldness and sagacity preserved him through all the peril which beset him.

A more striking incident is related of some lads from eleven to fourteen years of age. At Col. Pope's settlement, near Louisville, several lads were instructed by a tutor whom the Colonel had engaged for the education of his own sons. One Saturday, five of these boys—two sons of Col. Linn, Brashier, Wells, and a lad whose name is not remembered—taking advantage of a holiday, set off for a hunt. They encamped near the bank of the Ohio, some six miles southwest of Louisville, where a wide bottom and a large pond afforded abundance of game. It was February, and in the night a light snow had fallen, which made their trail perfectly plain. The lurking savages soon discovered it, and just as all had laid down their guns and were busy fastening a bear cub, which they had killed, on the back of the elder Linn, the Indians pounced down upon them.

Escape was impossible, and the lads were hurried over to the White River towns, where they showed such spirit in thrashing the Indian boys who molested them, that they were adopted into the tribes of their delighted captors. Wells was taken to a distant nation, with whom he grew to manhood, married a sister of Little Turtle, and subsequently became a noted and trusty scout for Gen Wayne. The rest adapted themselves to their new surroundings, but bided their time for an opportunity to escape.

This came at last; several months after their capture, the four boys found themselves at some distance from the village, fishing in the company of an old man and woman. After some natural hesitation they determined to kill their guardians and escape. Their plans were put in execution, and, having dispatched the Indians at night, they took the nearest course for their homes, traveling by night and lying concealed by day. Their flight was soon discovered by the tribe and a vigorous pursuit made, but they fortunately escaped detection until they reached the Ohio opposite Louisville. Here they found themselves in the greatest danger. Firing their guns to attract their friends made no impression upon the whites, as they supposed it was done by the Indians, but their pursuers were thus guided to their vicinity. In this dilemma the boys marched up the river and, constructing a raft, put such as could not swim upon it, while the elder Linn swam and propelled it across the river. They had scarcely got beyond rifle range of the northern shore when the Indians appeared on the bank, but too late to intercept their flight.

In all this there is much material for romance, and it is in this form that pioneer life is too often presented. But it should not be forgotten that the actual experience was far from what such narratives make it. The dangers were real; the heroes, once dead, did not revive to bow before an enthusiastic audience; the "star" was also the "supe;" and the "acting" was done, without tinsel or false color, in the broad glare of every-day life. It was a play only as

"All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players."

The pioneers had their exits and their entrances, and each one played many parts, but necessity and not applause was the motive power. Each year wrought its changes in the scene; increased numbers multiplied the isolated stations; added power changed the military character of the community for the garb of peace; and the unrestrained life of the forest gave place to the less romantic but more enduring forms of civilization.

The remarkable immigration of 1780 marks the turning point. Thenceforward the tide of population flowed across the border with persistent power; cabins sprang up singly or in settlements of two or three throughout the central region, and in 1783, "the settlement of Kentucky was considered as formed." It was no longer viewed as a hunter's paradise, but a place where a home could be readily planted and a competence easily achieved. It is related of Col. William Whitley that, soon after marrying and setting up an independent establishment, he said to his wife that he heard good reports of Kentucky, and believed that they could make a better living there with less hard work. "Then, Billy, if I was you, I would go and see," was her quick response, and acting upon this advice, they were both soon settled on the frontier. Such was the readiness with which so important a change was made, and such the inducement which subsequently led thousands of families to seek the new land.

The route followed by the greater number of these immigrants, and, indeed, from 1780 to the beginning of the present century by all travelers seeking any part of the West, was by the Ohio River. The principal point of embarkation was Redstone Old Fort—Brownsville, Penn.—a place equally accessible from Maryland, Virginia, and in a direct line from Philadelphia and the East. The emigrant from Virginia directed his course to Cumberland, and thence by Braddock's Road to his destination, some sixty miles northwest. Previous to 1783, and for several years later, the roads were impracticable for wheeled vehicles, and overland transportation was effected by means of pack-horses. Even to this mode of transportation the paths across the mountains were difficult and often dangerous. In some places they were barely passable; at other points they ran along the brink of a precipice, where a single misstep involved great danger if not destruction, or were overflown by streams, which it was necessary to ford.

Most of the early settlers had little to bring with them. Farming implements, a few cooking utensils, a small stock of supplies, and the women and children were all that the emigrant found it necessary to provide for. These were placed on the backs of horses, which with one or more cows and an occasional sheep or hog made up the cavalcade, which was led by the men and boys on foot. Horses which carried the younger children were furnished with a pack-saddle, to either side of which was hung a creel, fashioned from hickory withes in the form of a crate. In these were stowed the clothing and bedding, in the center of which a child or two was securely placed and guarded against accidents by strong lacings, which prevented their falling out. Occasionally a creel would break loose and roll with its precious freight along the ground, throwing the whole company into confusion and alarm. Not unfrequently, accidents and difficulties of the way would separate mothers from their children throughout the day, and the whole family assembled only at the evening meal, when the rear of the train reached the chosen stopping place long after the van. No friendly inn then opened its doors to the weary emigrant, nor could they have afforded to pay for its accommodations, had it existed. The meal was prepared in the open air, and the night was well advanced before the tired parents could seek repose in the protection of a blanket in a retired nook by the road-side.

Arrived at Redstone, the first care of the emigrant was to provide a Kentucky boat,* in which to transport his effects to Limestone, which now became the general landing place of emigrants bound for Kentucky. The building of these boats became, at a later date, quite an important business at this place, but the earlier voyagers, either from necessity or motives of economy, constructed their own vessels, which caused considerable delay. The journey was usually so timed that the party arrived early enough to accomplish this preparation before the end of the spring flood, which began about the middle of February and continued about three months. Considerable numbers were often thus brought together at this general rendezvous, and proved of mutual advantage, several families often occupying the same boat, and several boats frequently making the voyage in company. A familiar scene of that period is thus described by Michaux:

> I was alone on the banks of the Monongahela, when, for the first time, I observed five or six of these boats floating down the river. I could not conceive what these large square boxes were, which, abandoned to the current, presented by turns their ends, their sides and their corners. As they approached, I heard a confused noise, but the height of their sides prevented me from distinguishing anything. By getting on the bank of the river, I at length discovered several families in these boats, which also conveyed their horses, their cows, their poultry, their dismounted carriages, their plows, their harness, their beds, their agricultural tools, in fact everything which is required for furnishing a farm house, and cultivating the land. These people abandoned themselves in this manner for several hundred miles to the current of the river, probably without knowing the place where they might stop, and enjoy in tranquility the fruits of their industry, under one of the best governments existing in the world. (Travels Westward, etc., 1802.)

The mouth of Cabin Creek, about five and a half miles above Limestone, had long been the accustomed landing place of Indian war parties from north of the Ohio, and from this point two trails led to the Upper Blue Lick, the one known as the Upper War Road, and the other, sometimes called the Lower War Road, but generally the Buffalo Trace. The Upper Road was the one generally traveled by the whites and best known. War roads were distinctly characterized by their leading by the shortest practical route from one point to another, and by having their course blazed by tomahawk-chips in the trees. Buffalo trails were made by the travel of these animals; were much broader than the others, but were otherwise unmarked and wound along ridges and creeks. From the landing place a trail led to Washington, a settlement three or four miles in the interior, which was for years the only place in this part of the country for the accommodation of travelers. Although formally laid out in 1786, under an act of the Virginia assembly, it continued for some years completely hidden in the tall cane which grew upon its site. Here the newcomers gained information as to the lands open to settlers or of improvements for sale, and could procure a guide for the exploration of the country if they wished.

*Appendix A, Note 21.

This region was permanently occupied in 1784 by Kenton. A vigorous settlement was planted, but its growth was retarded by the dangers incident to its exposed location until 1790, when it took a new start and increased rapidly. The early immigration, therefore, pushed its way to the interior, where good lands were secured and homes established at a cost scarcely exceeding the labor involved in building a cabin or clearing the ground. Before the general pacification of the Indians, in 1795, few single cabins were reared in localities remote from others. The newcomer would usually select land in the immediate vicinity of some settlement which afforded his family shelter, while he, "camping out" in the meantime, would prepare the new home. When sites at considerable distance from settlements were chosen, it was the custom for several families to join in the enterprise, and locate their lands in such a way as to allow the several cabins to be erected within "supporting" distance of each other.*

The earlier settlers generally brought their families to some strong station, and then, equipped with an ax, rifle, frying-pan and a small stock of salt and meal, the fathers would set out on a prospecting tour, to be gone, frequently, for several months. Before his return he often made the first necessary clearing, and erected a temporary hut to receive his family. Later, as cabins were more frequently found in the country, the immigrant manifested no hesitation in breaking up his home in a distant State, and with his family and household goods, on pack-animals or wagons, start out for a new home, influenced and guided solely by rumors and picked-up information on the road. Deciding upon a locality for his future residence, he found no difficulty in securing temporary shelter for his family in some cabin, already well filled by its owners, but which the simplicity of early manners and an unstinted hospitality rendered elastic enough to comfortably entertain the welcome addition to the community.

A new arrival of this nature was heralded with a cordial welcome for miles about, and a neighborhood, which scarcely knew limits, hastened to lend its friendly offices in rearing a cabin. A day was appointed, and no invitation was needed to draw together a company of willing, capable hands. To assist in raising a cabin for a new family was a duty, which the unwritten law of the community imperatively laid upon every able-bodied man, and to know of the occasion was a sufficient invitation. On gathering, one party was told off as choppers, whose business it was to fell the trees and cut the logs of proper dimensions; a man and team brought these logs to the site of the proposed building; others assorted, "saddled," and otherwise prepared the logs to form the structure, which was finished on one day and occupied the next. It was not unfrequently the case that the necessity of preparing the ground for the first crop obliged the settler to forego the floor, and even a permanent roof, until the planted crop granted the opportunity. In its best estate* it was a rude though not uncomfortable structure: a puncheon floor below, and a clap-board roof above, a small, square window without glass, and a chimney carried up with "cats and clay"—short pieces of small poles firmly imbedded in mud or mortar—to the height of the ridge-pole.

*Appendix A, Note 22.

*There were a few cabins which were quite pretentious, and one of these had the first shingle roof in the county. It belonged to Adams, who sold out to Kennedy in 1809, and is thus described by the latter: "Adams was a thrifty, industrious man, and said to my father, 'I gad, I thought I would build the best and finest house in all the country.' It was constructed of large, hewed white oak logs, twenty-four feet long by eighteen feet wide, covered with black walnut shingles rounded at the butt end, and every one put on with walnut pegs, bored through shingles and lath with a brace and bit. It was a good roof, and lasted about thirty years. Then the lower and upper floors were laid with poplar plank, sawed by hand with a whip-saw, nicely dressed, tongued and grooved, and put down with pegs. Three windows two feet square, with nice shutters, but not a pane of glass, nor a nail in all the house, save in the three doors. For these a few nails were made by a blacksmith, his brother, Andy Adams. The chimneys were of stone, the first in the country, and contained at least 150 loads of rock. The fire-places were six feet wide, with wooden mantel-pieces."—History of Todd County, Ky., published by F. A. Battey Publishing Co., Chicago, 1884.

There was little underwood in any part of the country, and in the more open lands it was only necessary to cut the cane and girdle the larger trees to prepare the ground for cultivation. In the more heavily timbered country the mattock, as well as the ax, was required to prepare the way for the plow and hoe, which were of the simplest construction, and were calculated more for strength and durability than to economize labor. Fortunately the fertility of the soil obviated the necessity of thorough tillage, as the roots, which ramified the soil, successfully defied the strongest plow. The first cultivation of the soil, therefore, was but a tickling of the surface, to which the prolific soil responded with a harvest of from fifty to eighty bushels of corn to the acre.

Maize was invariably the first crop, and until the beginning of the present century the only general crop cultivated in Kentucky. A small space was usually devoted to garden vegetables; a small patch of turnips was sown, the product of which in winter evenings afforded those who had enjoyed apples elsewhere a not unpleasant substitute; and occasionally a secluded spot in the center of the corn-field was devoted to water and musk-melons. It was several years before wheat could be grown on new lands, the weevil and its rank growth preventing its successful cultivation earlier. But even then its culture languished. Emigrants from Virginia and the Southern States brought with them a relish for corn, which is still a marked feature of the culinary predilections of the average Kentuckian; and wheat, save in the case of the emigrant from the Eastern States, or for "company" purposes, was for many years only raised for exportation. Other obstacles to its cultivation were undoubtedly the lack of the superior machinery which was required to prepare it for use, in the rather more exacting nature of its culture, and in the restricted uses to which it could be applied. The ground was prepared with a shovel-plow, and when sown was covered with a wooden-tooth harrow or the bushy limb of a tree. It was cut with a sickle and threshed with a flail, and there was little to relieve the tedium of these duties. The whisky-jug did add a touch of luxury to the work, but the result was rather to intoxicate the laborer than to mitigate the severity of the mid-summer sun, or to dispel the stifling dust.

Nothing could equal the Indian corn for the necessities of settlers in a new and isolated country. It furnished food for man and beast, it often supplied a roof as well as bed, and the harvest could be partially anticipated by several weeks, an availability which was not the least of its recommendations to public favor. Its earliest foes, the squirrel and crow, gave the boys a pleasurable occupation in defending the fields, which often afforded them the first opportunity of using a rifle or shot-gun. After the ear was formed and the grain half-grown, this contest, which had ceased for a time for want of a pretext, was renewed, for the squirrel seemed to recognize the era of "roasting ears" as quickly as the farmer. The tender corn shaved off and eaten in milk was a dish that is still highly praised, and, grated fine, in times of scarcity supplied a very palatable substitute for meal. As the ears ripened, the blades were pulled off and tied in bundles; the tops above the ear were cut off and shocked to cover the "fodder barn;" and finally the ear was pulled and stored to furnish the crowning occasion of the fall, the husking-bee.

Another and important source of wealth, or rather of comfort, which was the form in which frontier affluence expressed itself, was the stock, which immigrants took care to bring with them in unusual variety. Among these the cow obtained a prominence which the plainness of frontier fare exalted to the distinction of a public benefactor. As Dr. Drake expresses the fact—"old Brindle was then a veritable member of the family, and took her slop at the cabin door, while the children feasted on her warm milk within. The calf grew up in their companionship, and disputed with them for its portion of the delicious beverage which she distilled from the cane and luxuriant herbage in which she waded through the day."

Next to the cow, and scarcely second in the estimation of the early Kentuckians, was the horse, which acquired an importance unknown elsewhere on the western border. From the first these animals were used, to the almost entire exclusion of oxen, in all the labors of the frontier. This doubtless arose from the predilections of the people, who came largely from Virginia, where the passion for the horse had been fostered from an early date. The habit and necessity of traveling on horseback emphasized this tendency, and the demand for speed and endurance in the conflict with the Indians added an incentive to the cultivation of this animal, which produced a race-track before the Indians had yielded peaceable possession of the land. The first "track" was probably a straight-quarter-course in the neighborhood of Foxtown, Madison County, where, it is said, an enthusiastic horse-trainer was shot by an Indian from the cane-brake just as he was pulling up his steed at the end of the track.

Swine came quite as much a matter of course as of necessity. They had long occupied an important place in the domestic economy of the section which peopled this country, and later years have so far confirmed this early taste that their favorite meat and cereal, "hog and hominy," have almost become of sectional significance. Sheep were also brought to the new country, but in small numbers. Most families had one or two, which, in some cases, increased to flocks of twenty to forty head, but in more instances the few first brought fell early victims to the wolves. They were brought principally in obedience to the necessity for material from which to manufacture clothing, and sufficient survived for this purpose. They were little cared for as food, and save during the presence of harvest hands, or a large company on other special occasions, mutton seldom graced the farmer's board.

Stock found in this new land a free support, unrestrained in range or bounty. The first settlers found little necessity for giving their stock other care, the year round, than to provide a little salt at stated occasions. Bells were used on all but the hogs, which were marked by sundry slits and crops in the ear and allowed to run at large until wanted for food, when they were found in good condition, to which the abundant fall of nuts amply contributed. Horses were in regular use, and, as the farmer's crop increased, were fed more or less corn. Milch cows were fed the provender preserved from the corn crop, and pumpkins, which were raised for the purpose. In these the sheep sometimes shared, but it was not until the settlements considerably increased that even this was thought necessary. In a later day, when the store of provender ran short, and a peculiarly severe winter made it necessary to provide natural food, which the snow prevented the stock from procuring for themselves, recourse was had to "browsing." For this purpose the farmer drove his stock to the woodland, and, cutting down a red or white elm, or a white hickory, would leave it to the hungry animals, which needed no urging to attack the smaller and tender twigs, and even the bark stripped from the larger parts of the slippery elm. In the meantime the farmer and his boys prepared fuel for the evening fire, or, if not too pressed with care, would be drawn off by sundry tracks in pursuit of "coons" and rabbits.

Sheep were usually folded each night to guard them against the attacks of wolves. This protection consisted of a rude log pen near the cabin, and not unfrequently, when the configuration of the ground permitted, a space under the cabin was devoted to the purpose. As settlements extended, fences sufficient to guard the growing crops from the incursions of hogs and cattle were found necessary, and gradually restricted the home range. The stock was then frequently driven to some distance, where a good scope of unoccupied country and plenty of water afforded the desired range. Here a handful of salt laid on the ground established a rendezvous, which the stock never abandoned. Hunting the cows or horses was not then a trivial undertaking, and the "hunter" would often prosecute his search to such a distance from accustomed landmarks as to be obliged to depend upon the instinct of the animal to lead him back. Failing to find the animal he was utterly lost, and not unfrequently within two or three miles of home. This service fell principally to the share of the younger members of the family, who early developed so acute and quick observation as to enable them to distinguish the peculiar tone of their own bells from that of their neighbors.*

But outdoor activities were only of secondary importance in solving the problem of pioneer life. These produced the crude materials, but their adaptation to the necessities of life, the development of new possibilities from meager resources,† and the ingenious ameliorations of an experience full of obdurate exactions, pertain to the mysteries of the cabin, the presiding genius of which was the wife and mother. Woman was something more than man's helpmate on the frontier, and after a lapse of nearly two centuries the opinion of the first deliberative assembly on this continent (1619)—that, "in a new plantation, it is not known whether the man or woman be the most necessary"—remained unchallenged.

The interior of the cabin was in harmony with the rude simplicity of its outward construction. Housekeeping conveniences were not yet contrived, and the "inside finish" consisted solely of some pegs driven into the wall for the accommodation of the few articles of spare clothing, and two larger ones, or a pair of buck horns over the fire place, for the rifle. "Moving in" was a trivial affair. The limited possessions of the pioneers and the more restricted mode of early transportation compelled the immigrant to bring only such necessary things as the frontier did not furnish material for making. The furniture consisted of a few articles roughly made on the spot. A split slab, smoothed with an ax and supported by four legs, did duty as a table; three-legged stools or long benches of the same material supplied the place of chairs; a log-trough cradled the baby, while the bed, if raised from the floor, rested upon a one-legged fixture in the corner of the cabin. The bed was often only a few bear and buffalo skins thrown upon the floor, but provident housewives generally took care to bring a bed-tick, which was filled with leaves until the first corn-crop supplied husks for the purpose; and this, covered with bear or buffalo skins, lent a touch of luxury to this necessary feature of cabin furniture.

A similar ingenuity provided kitchen and table utensils, which consisted principally of articles turned or "coopered" out of wood. These included noggins, trays, trenchers, bowls, spoons and ladles, besides the larger vessels, such as buckets, milk-pails, churns, tubs, etc., etc. A kettle and frying-pan or "Dutch-oven" were almost the only metal articles used in the cabin. A tin cup was an article of delicate luxury, almost as rare as an iron fork, and few knives were to be found save those which each man carried as a part of his equipment; at best, two or three sufficed for the use of the family. Another article, which was an important factor in the domestic economy of the cabin, was the grater. A piece of tin, eight or nine inches long, its surface closely set with the jagged results of rude perforations, was bent in semi-circular form and fastened to a piece of wood. On this the unripe corn, too soft to pound or grind, was reduced to a sort of pulp, which could then be made into bread or otherwise prepared for food. It was often called the "blood-mill," from the frequent lacerations which befel the fingers of those who operated it. When the grain became harder, the "hominy-block," to be found about every cabin, was brought into requisition. This was a rude wooden mortar, the concavity of which was made by burning and scraping. The pestle was an iron wedge let into a wood-

*The faculty of distinguishing the delicate differences in ordinary sounds was one of the prime essentials in successful woodcraft, and was possessed by all pioneers in a wonderful degree. An incident related by Judge Robertson in a public address, in 1843, illustrates this feature of the frontier education. Among the captured whites at the battle of Blue Lick was an excellent husband and father. He fortunately escaped the fate of many of his comrades in captivity, but for a year his wife and friends knew only that he was reported certainly dead—killed on the field of battle. She, however, hoped against reason, and when wooed by another, postponed the nuptials, declaring her belief that her husband would return. "Her expostulating friends finally succeeding in their efforts to stifle her affectionate instinct, she reluctantly yielded, and the nuptial day was fixed. But just before it dawned, the crack of a rifle was heard near her lonely cabin. At the familiar sound she leaped out like a liberated fawn, ejaculating as she sprang, 'That's John's gun.' It was John's gun, sure enough; and in an instant she was once more in her lost husband's arms" (See Collins, Vol. II, p. 289) en handle, which was often attached to a spring-pole to aid the operation.

†The wife of William Poague, who came to Harrodsburg in 1776, brought the first spinning wheel to Kentucky, and, her husband having contrived a rude loom by sinking the posts in the ground and piecing the beams and sleys to them, she made the first linen manufactured in the State from the lint of nettles, and the first linsey-woolsey from this lint and buffalo wool.

In this day of diversified industry, when one labor-saving invention crowds another off the stage in endless and rapid succession, one can scarcely comprehend the patient, persevering effort required of the pioneer housewife, even for the successful discharge of the ordinary duties of the cabin. The lack of costly furniture, unwholesome carpets, of fragile bric-a-brac and expensive hangings, did not lessen her care. She was both mistress and servant, matron and nursery-maid, housekeeper and charwoman, dairy-maid and cook. Neatness was not less demanded of her than of the modern housewife, and her split-broom and scrub-brush found ample service in keeping floor and furniture clean and white. Food was abundant and wholesome, but, like everything else that the pioneer possessed, it was to be derived only from the crude natural product. The richest milk, the choicest butter, and the finest meats, with wild fruit, nuts and honey, were to be had for the trouble of taking them from Nature's bountiful hand. Bread was most difficult to obtain, and its scarcity was often a great privation. At such times the corn-pone was esteemed a great luxury, but this would at length pall on the taste, and the settler would yearn for the "neat and abounding wheat-bread trays" of his earlier home.*

The labor involved in this was not unequally divided between the sexes. "The men hunted and brought in the meat; they planted, plowed and gathered the corn; grinding it into meal at a hand-mill, or pounding it into hominy in the mortar, was occasionally the work of either, or the joint labor of both." But with these offices women's labor was scarcely begun. Custom and necessity united to lay upon her the duty of providing for every household need that the rude agriculture of the period did not supply, and in all the multifarious activities which engaged her skill and energy, she labored unaided by labor-saving machinery. And so she milked the cows in all weather, while sturdy men and boys watched an operation too effeminate to enlist their service; churned the butter and pressed the cheese; carried the tubs to the spring or caught rain water for the weekly "washing" from the eaves in troughs and barrels; made her own soft-soap; washed, picked, carded and dyed the wool; pulled, broke, hatcheled and bleached the hemp; spun the thread, and wove the cloth; contrived and made the garments; reared her children, nursed the sick, sympathized with the distressed and encouraged the disheartened laborer at her side. In all this, and above it all, woman was the tutelar saint of the frontier.

The dress of the women consisted of linen and linsey-woolsey—linen and wool combined. An over-shadowing sun-bonnet of linen, neatly washed and ironed, and a check apron made of the heavier material, with home-made stockings and a pair of heavy cowhide shoes, constituted the lady's outfit for the most important occasion. Deer skins were much used in men's wear, and both men and women so much resembled the savages in their general attire, that in the excitement of an attack they were often mistaken for Indians.*

The hunting-shirt was universally worn. This was a kind of loose frock, reaching half way down the thighs, with large sleeves, open before, and so wide as to lap over a foot or more when belted. The cape was large and sometimes handsomely fringed with a raveled piece of cloth of a different color from that of the hunting-shirt itself. The bosom of this dress served as a wallet to hold a chunk of bread, cakes, jerk, tow for wiping the barrel of the rifle, or any other necessary for the hunter or warrior. The belt, which was always tied behind, answered several purposes beside that of holding the dress together. In cold weather the mittens, and sometimes the bullet-bag, occupied the front part of it. To the right side was suspended the tomahawk, and to the left the scalping knife in its leathern sheath.*

*Dr. Drake relates that when a little child he cried and begged for bread, which could not be had, until his parents were obliged to leave the table to hide their distress. Casseday (Hist. of Louisville, p. 31,) records "that when the first patch of wheat was raised about this place, after being ground in a rude and laborious hand-mill, it was sifted through a gauze neckerchief, as the best bolting cloth to be had. It was then shortened with raccoon fat, and the whole station invited to partake of a sumptuous feast upon flour cake."

*Numerous incidents illustrative of this fact are to be found throughout the tales of the border. In the rescue of the Callaway sisters and Jemima Boone, Elizabeth Callaway was found sitting against a tree with a red bandanna handkerchief on her head. One of the rescuers was about to bring the raised butt of his gun down upon her head with fatal force, when one who happened to recognize her warded off the blow. Coomes, who figured in an adventure near Harrodsburg, was subsequently out with a party getting corn at a distant crib, when the Indians made an attack, killing eight of the whites at the first fire. The blood of a comrade was spattered in Coomes' face, and so changed his appearance that a comrade leveled his rifle at him which the former observed barely in time to declare his identity. These incidents might be added to almost indefinitely.

The hunting-shirt was generally made of linsey, sometimes of coarse linen, and a few of dressed deer skins. These last were very cold and uncomfortable in wet weather. The shirt and jacket were of the common fashion. A pair of drawers or breeches and leggins were the dress of thighs and legs, and a pair of moccasins answered for the feet much better than shoes. These were made of dressed deer-skins. They were mostly made of a single piece, with a gathering seam along the top of the foot, and another from the bottom of the heel, without gathers, as high as the ankle joint or a little higher. Flaps were left on each side to reach some distance up the legs. These were nicely adapted to the ankles and lower part of the legs by thongs of deer skins, so that no dust, gravel or snow could get within the moccasin.

The moccasins in ordinary use cost but a few hours' labor to make them. This was done by an instrument denominated a moccasin-awl, which was made of the back spring of an old clasp knife. This awl, with its buck-horn handle, was an appendage of every shot-pouch strap, together with a roll of buck-skin for mending the moccasin. This was the labor of almost every evening. They were sewed together and patched with deer-skin thongs, or whangs, as they were commonly called. In cold weather the moccasins were well stuffed with deer's hair or dry leaves, so as to keep the feet comfortably warm; but in wet weather it was usually said that wearing them was a "decent way of going barefooted;" and such was the fact, owing to the spongy texture of the leather of which they were made.

Owing to this defective covering of the feet, more than to any other circumstance, the greater number of our hunters and warriors were afflicted with rheumatism in their limbs. Of this disease they were all apprehensive in wet and cold weather, and therefore always slept with their feet to the fire to prevent or cure it as well as they could. This practice unquestionably had a very salutary effect, and prevented many of them from becoming confirmed cripples in early life.†

*An almost inseparable companion of the early Kentuckian was the rifle, a small bored, long, heavy barreled gun, with flint lock. It required only a small charge, and up to 150 yards, the ordinary limit of forest range, it was exceedingly accurate. Such was the prejudice in favor of the long barrel that no other gun was thought fit for a woodsman. It is related that when the first attempt to run the boundary line between Kentucky and Tennessee was made, one of the guard, which attended the surveying party, had a short rifled gun, which was an object of derision to the whole party. On one occasion Dr. Walker called up the owner of the despised weapon, and said: "We don't think much of your short gun, but here's a chance to test it—a target for you; hit it if you can." The object was a turkey's head, about 100 yards distant, upon a dead limb of a standing tree. More in a spirit of desperation than of confidence, the challenged marksman drew sight on the object, fired, and brought down the bird. His success was greeted with approving shouts of the company, and Walker said, if his father had risen from the dead, and told him he could kill that turkey with that thing, he would not have believed it. (See Appendix A, Note 23)

†Doddridge's Notes, p. 114.

Early emigrants came principally from the "back settlements" of the Atlantic colonies. With few exceptions they came from the poorer farming classes, and possessed little of the refinement to be found in the older communities in the region from which they came. But where refinement did exist, a few months of isolation and an experience of the dependence of each family upon the friendly offices of every other served to do away with any fastidiousness which may have been cherished at first, and gradually molded the whole community into a homogeneous society. The average early settlement consisted of a cluster of clearings—from two to ten acres in extent and inclosed by a brush fence—separated by intervening forests, through which foot-trails, bridle-paths, and, finally, narrow wagon-ways wound their devious course amid stumps, pitfalls and other obstacles to travel. Thus, a dozen or more clearings were often situated within sound of a rifle or falling tree, but completely hidden in the forest, and only marked as the site of human habitation by a one-story round-log cabin, about which four or five ragged children pursued their noisy play. Neighborhoods were not limited to such narrow bounds, however, but several such settlements, situated miles apart, were closely linked together by social ties.

Social gatherings were frequent and were closely allied to useful occupations. Meetings to raise log-cabins, barns, etc., to roll up logs in a new clearing, or later for the opening of new roads, were occasions when the men, after a hard day's work, would spend the evening in the rough sports of the period. "Profanity, vulgarity and drinking" are described by Dr. Drake as the "most eminent characteristics" of these gatherings. "All drank, though not to excess, but all, of course, did not participate in other vices; yet I am bound to say that coarse jocularities were scarcely frowned upon by any. Some sort of physical amusements, including fights, in which biting and gouging were essential elements, with the beastly intoxication of several, would generally wind up these meetings."* Other gatherings in which the women took the leading part were quilting and spinning-bees. "Toward evening the younger men would assemble and amuse themselves by athletic exercises without, and talking to and 'plaguing the gals' within the cabin. The quilt being removed, the supper table took its place, and after the ladies had risen from the cream of the feast, the gentlemen, who had whetted their appetites by drinking whisky and looking on, proceeded to glut themselves on the reliquiæ. Then came on plays of various kinds, interlarded with jokes and bursts of laughter till bed-time, when the dispersion took place."

CENTRE COLLEGE, MAIN BUILDING, DANVILLE.—SEE PAGE 504.

Corn huskings engaged both sexes, and were popular sources of rude but absorbing amusement.

When the crop was gathered in, the ears were heaped into a long pile or rick, a night fixed on, and the neighborhood notified rather than invited, for it was an affair of mutual assistance. As they assembled at nightfall, the green-glass-quart-whisky-bottle, stopped with a cob, was handed to every one, man and boy, as they arrived, to take a drink. A sufficient number to constitute a sort of quorum having arrived, two men, or more commonly two boys, constituted themselves, or were by acclamation declared captains. They paced the rick and estimated its contractions and expansions with the eye, till they were able to fix on the spot on which the end of the dividing rail should be.

The choice depended on the tossing of a chip, one side of which had been spit upon; the first choice of men was decided in the same manner, and in a few minutes the rick was charged upon by the rival forces. As others arrived, as soon as the owner had given each the bottle, he fell in according to the end that he belonged to. The captains planted themselves on each side of the rail, sustained by their most active operatives. There at the beginning was the great contest, for it was lawful to cause the rail to slide or fall toward your own end, shortening it and lengthening the other. Corn might be thrown over unhusked, the rail might be pulled toward you by the hand dexterously applied underneath, your feet might push corn to the other side of the rail, your husked corn might be thrown so short a distance as to bury up the projecting base of the pile on the other side; if charged with any of these tricks, you of course denied it, and there the matter sometimes rested; at other times the charge was reaffirmed, then rebutted with "you're a liar," and then a fight, at the moment or at the end, settled the question of veracity.

The heap cut in two, the parties turned their backs upon each other, and making their hands keep time with a peculiar sort of tune, the chorus of voices on a still night might be heard a mile. The oft-replenished whisky bottle meanwhile circulated freely, and at the close the victorious captain, mounted on the shoulders of some of the stoutest men, with the bottle in one hand and his hat in the other, was carried in triumph around the vanquished party amidst shouts of victory, which rent the air. Then came the supper, on which the women had been busily employed, and which always included a "pot-pie." Either before or after eating the fighting took place, and by midnight, the sober were found assisting the drunken home. (Pioneer Life in Kentucky; pp. 54–56.)

Courtship and marriage were marked by the same rude zest. There was a little romance and less formality in frontier life, and marriage was viewed with far more practical concern then than now. There was little philandering; the character of pioneer recreations brought the young of both sexes frequently together, and marriages were made up with little previous formality. It was quite the thing, if the young man possessed the means, to escort one's lady-love to church on horse-back; the less fortunate swain met his sweetheart at the church and walked home with her. On such occasions it was no uncommon occurrence, after getting out of sight of the church, for the young lady to remove her morocco slippers and stockings—when stores finally brought such luxuries in reach—and walk home with her escort barefooted. If an old pioneer* may be trusted, "the general custom was to see your sweetheart at night, take your seat by her and embrace her in your arms, with many kisses sometimes reciprocated; take her in your lap, with your arms wound around each other in

*Drake's "Pioneer Life in Kentucky," p. 184: A meeting for road-making in 1797 is described in the autobiography of Rev. Jacob Young. The company consisted of about 100 men, each provided with an ax, three days' provisions and a knapsack for baggage, under the direction of a captain. The day was spent in hard work, and as it was in November, and the night promised to be cold, large fires were built. This done and supper eaten, hunting stories and "some pretty fine singing under the circumstances," were the order. "Thus far well, but a change began to take place. They became very rude and raised the war-whoop. Their shrill shrieks made me tremble They chose two captains, divided the men into two companies, and commenced fighting with fire-brands—the log heaps being burned down. The only law for their government was that no man should throw a brand without fire on it, so that they might know how to dodge. They fought for two or three hours in perfect good nature till brands became scarce, and they began to violate the law. Some were severely wounded, blood began to flow freely, and they were in fair way of commencing a fight in earnest. At this moment the loud voice of the captain rang out above the din, ordering every man to retire to rest. They dropped their weapons of warfare, rekindled the fires and laid down to sleep." (See Collins, Vol. II, p. 734.)

*Hon. Urban E. Kennedy, for seventy years a resident of Todd County, Ky. (See History of Todd County; pp. 56 and 273.)

all innocence and virtue." In describing an instance, where with a friend he put this theory into practice, the same gentleman gives the following illustration of early courtship:

Well, Henry took his girl to one corner and I the other one in the remote opposite corner. We sat down as close as we could, and Henry laid off his fine beaver (which cost $12) carefully in the corner near the wall, and happened to set it very plumb in the skillet, in which they had fried meat for supper. It was quite dark in the house; the little fire had gone out, so we enjoyed ourselves until the small hours of the night. I proposed that we leave, and Henry, seizing his hat by the brim, raised with it the skillet and all. The gravy, a half inch deep, had cooled enough to stick tight. He soon discovered the situation, and the poor girls were greatly mortified. They got a little stump of a tallow dip, and with a case-knife we scraped off all we could. We were not in the habit of swearing, but Henry said that he could not do the subject justice without some profanity.

The early settlers generally married young, boys of eighteen and girls of sixteen entering into the marriage relation. There were no arbitrary social distinctions, a family establishment cost little more than labor to provide, and there were no prudential reasons to prevent the first impression of love being speedily followed by marriage. This was the usual order, and was a matter which enlisted the eager interest of the whole community. The wedding was a public occasion, and the only one in the social regime of the frontier that was not associated with a season of vigorous exertion. It was anticipated, therefore, with the liveliest satisfaction, and was attended by a revel in which the wildest spirit of frolic ruled the hour.

The wedding commonly occurred in the daytime. In the morning of the appointed day the groom with his friends of both sexes set forth on horseback from the house of his father in time to reach their destination about noon. On reaching a point about a mile from the bride's residence, two young men of the party would elect to "run for the bottle," and starting at a given signal would rush their horses by the most direct practicable route to the cabin. The more difficult the way, the better the sport, and logs, brush, swail, hills and hollows were passed unheeded in their eager emulation for the victory. The one first at the door received from the bride's father a bottle of whisky, with which the victor returned to the approaching cavalcade, and, first presenting the trophy to the groom, it rapidly made its way to the mouth of man and maid throughout the company, when it was returned to the victor. The ceremony followed the arrival of the company; the dinner, made up of a great variety of substantial food and whisky, succeeded, after which dancing or games were begun and generally kept up until next morning.

About 9 or 10 o'clock, a deputation of the young ladies stole off with the bride and put her to bed in the loft; and this done, a delegation of young men took the groom and snugly placed him beside her. The merriment then went on, and if seats were scarce, as was generally the case in the frontier cabins, the young men, when not engaged upon the floor, were obliged to offer their laps as seats for the girls, an offer that was never rejected. In the zest of the wedding hilarity, the bride and groom were not forgotten. Late in the night some one would suggest that the new couple must be in need of refreshments, and "black Betty"—the whisky bottle—with a generous allowance of the fragments of the substantial dinner, would be sent up by a deputation, and bride and groom obliged to partake of a liberal portion of the fare provided. On the following day the "infare" would be held at the cabin of the groom's father, and thither the picturesque cavalcade, "headed by the bride and groom," would early wend its way. Here the scenes of the wedding occasion would be re-enacted "with such new accompaniments as new members of the company could suggest, or the inventions of a night of excited genius had brought forth."

Dancing was not a universal custom. Many of the early settlers were piously opposed to this form of amusement, but there were few settlements from which the exercise was entirely excluded. As described by Doddridge, "the figures of the dance were three or four-handed reels, and square sets and jigs. The commencement was always a square four, which was followed by what was called jigging it off; that is, two of the four would single out for a jig, and were followed by the remaining couple. The jigs were often accompanied with what was called cutting out; that is, when either of the parties became tired of the dance, on intimation the place was supplied by some one of the company without any interruption of the dance. In this way the dance was often continued till the musician was heartily tired of his situation. Toward the latter part of the night, if any of the company, through weariness, attempted to conceal themselves for the purpose of sleeping, they were hunted up, paraded on the floor, and the fiddler ordered to play "Hang on till to-morrow morning."

The use of intoxicants was nearly universal. For a short time the first settlers were abstainers from the force of circumstances. The nearest point where whisky could be obtained was hundreds of miles away, and its importation as well as manufacture was rendered difficult, if not impossible, by the hostile activity of the savages. But it was hardly to be expected that a class of people who had been educated to use it as a regular beverage would be forced to settle down to the practice of total abstinence by a danger which they braved without hesitation for objects of a much less pressing nature. When its manufacture was first introduced into Kentucky has not been ascertained, but its sale in hotels was regulated as early as 1781, and it was certainly manufactured here as early as 1783, if not before. As has been indicated in the foregoing pages, it rapidly came into general use, and formed a part of not only every public entertaiment, but of every cabin's hospitality. For a friend to call and find the bottle empty occasioned the host a feeling of chagrin, and gave rise to a suspicion of stinginess in the mind of the caller. There were some, however, who were exceptions to the general rule. These were usually Methodists, whose discipline required abstinence, but it was a cause of reproach among members of other sects, and of no sect, who did not hesitate to suggest that they probably "drank behind the door."

Dissenting religionists were an important element of the early society of Kentucky. So long as the people remained cooped up in stations, religious activity was held somewhat in abeyance, but this restraint removed, the zeal fostered by the conflict in Virginia sprang into new life on the frontier. Probably the first preacher on the border was the Rev. John Lythe, "of the Church of England," who conducted divine service under the magnificent elm at Boonesborough, in 1775. But the old antagonisms were transferred from Virginia to Kentucky, and the Episcopal Church found no encouragement in the new settlements. It was known only as the Church of England, and was generally regarded as "an organized body of Arminians enlisted in the service of despotism."

All dissenting sects found the freedom of the newly settled region congenial to the propagation of their faith, and each was represented in the creeds of some of the first settlers. Of these, the Baptists were the first to plant their organization here. As early as 1776, William Hickman, Sr., began traveling among the stations confirming the Baptist membership in the faith. In 1780, Lewis Craig, one of the valiant champions of the dissenting cause who was carried singing to prison in Fredericksburg, led the most of his church from Spottsylvania County, Va., to Gilbert's Creek, in Garrard County. Here a church was organized in the following year. In 1782 others were planted in the region of Nelson and Hardin Counties, and in 1783 a fourth was established on South Elkhorn, five miles south of Lexington.

In the latter year (1783) the Rev. David Rice, a minister of the Presbyterian faith, came to Kentucky and gathered the scattered membership of this church into three congregations, at Danville, Cane Run and at the forks of Dick's River. Other ministers followed, established other churches, and in due course of time the Transylvania Presbytery was formed, which, in 1786, represented twelve congregations in more or less perfect state of organization.

In this year (1786), also, the name of Kentucky first appears in the general minutes of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The whole area of the present State was then constituted a circuit, and James Haw and Benjamin Ogden appointed the first itinerants. A class had been established as early as 1783 in the region of Mercer County, but the first church was not organized until three years later. In 1788 the original circuit was divided under the names of Lexington and Danville, and in 1790 the first Methodist Church edifice, a log-cabin at Masterson's Station, five miles northwest of Lexington, was erected.

The first Catholic emigrants were William Coomes and Dr. Hart, who came to Harrodsburg in 1775. Ten years later, a colony of Catholics emigrated from Maryland and settled principally on Pottinger's Creek, in the region of Bardstown. In the next year a second colony followed, and settled in the same vicinity; and in 1787 another company came, settling on Rolling Fork, in the present county of Marion. The number of Catholic families in Kentucky was now estimated at fifty, and at their solicitation a priest was sent to minister to them. Other of the clergy followed, who proved indefatigable missionaries, but it was not until after 1793 that the denomination gained strength enough to organize the first church.

From such beginnings the various church organizations developed, until there was scarcely a settlement without its meeting-house, and at least one rudimentary church. Where more than one sect was represented, as was generally the case, the same building served the purposes of all by turns, the whole church-going community attending whenever there were services. When the attendance of ministers became somewhat regular, Sunday became an occasion of special interest. As Dr. Drake describes it:

> It was a day for dressing up; and none but those who labor through the week, in coarse dirty clothes, can estimate the cheering influence of a clean face and feet, a clean shirt and "boughten" clothes on a Sabbath morning. All preparation had to be finished at an early hour, for to reach the meeting-house was a work of time. At length we take our departure, mother in a calico dress, with her black silk bonnet covering a newly ironed cap, with the tabs tied beneath her chin with a piece of narrow ribbon; father with his shoes just greased, and blackened with fat and soot mixed together; in his shirt sleeves if the weather was hot, or in his Sunday coat if cool; a worn dress hat over his short smooth black hair; a bandanna handkerchief in his pocket for that day, and his walking-stick in his hand or the baby in his arms; myself in fustian jacket, with my hat brushed and set up, my feet clean, and a new rag on some luckless "stubbed" and festering toe; the younger children in their best Sunday clothes, and the whole of us slowly, yet cheerfully, playfully, moving onward through the cool and quiet woods to the house of God.
>
> The scene around this village temple can never fade from my memory and heart. Horses hitched along the fence, and men and women on foot or horseback arriving from all quarters; within the inclosure, neighbors shaking hands and inquiring after each other's families; a little group leaning against the fence in conversation; another seated on a bench "talking it over;" another little party strolling among the graves; and squads of children sitting or lying on the grass to rest themselves. The hour for worship arrived, the congregation were seated in and around the cabin-church on benches without backs, and there stood Deacon Morris, beneath the pulpit, giving out the hymns, while Old Hundred, by twice as many voices, was mingled with the notes of birds in the surrounding trees. It was the custom of those who came from a distance to bring with them some kind of food, and in the hour of intermission they might be seen in scattered groups engaged in lunching.

The early preachers were generally illiterate men, lacking in dignity and solemnity, but possessing considerable natural talents, and inspired by an indefatigable zeal. They were men who had grown up under the influences of the religious agitation which preceded and accompanied the Revolution, and, repelled by the apathy which followed the success of the dissenters, in their contest with the established church, sought fresher fields on the frontier. These circumstances brought to Kentucky a set of men who were well calculated to "turn the world upside down." Their lax system of morals, crude logic, and vigorous declamation met with great acceptation in a society where spirited action was much better understood than moral philosophy; and where religion meant the "belonging" to some church, the earnest opposition to the peculiar tenets of other sects, and the abstaining from certain capital violations of the law-and-order sentiment of the community.

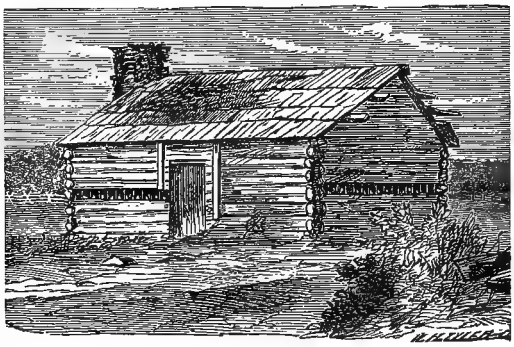
The camp-meeting was the mighty agency of pioneer propagandism. The lack of ministers as well as of commodious buildings led to frequent out-door meetings. To these a preacher who touched the popular fancy would draw large numbers, who gathered at the appointed time from miles around. The Methodists were the earliest to convert these services into a series of meetings held on successive days and nights, but the practice became general, and each denomination commonly held a series of camp-meetings each year. In such cases the people came prepared with provisions to remain several days, and even weeks on some occasions. In the meanwhile, when not in attendance upon the exercises, they found shelter in their wagons or in rudely constructed booths in the woods. The earliest of these religious gatherings occurred in Logan County, at the time of the great revival which originated under the preaching of the Rev. James McGready, taking form in 1799, and continuing for several years. Various denominations took part in the initial meeting, and, as the interest extended, camp-meetings multiplied, at some of which it was estimated that from 20,000 to 25,000 persons were in attendance.

A remarkable characteristic of these early camp-meetings was the bodily agitations which attended the excitement incident to the services. The manifestations, often bordering on the ridiculous, seem to baffle philosophical investigation. Men of rugged mind and physique and women and children alike succumbed to the "jerks," or rather the "exercises," as they were popularly termed.

The "jerks" were the most common form of this strange malady, and generally preceded the other forms of activity. An eye-witness thus describes these scenes:

> Many times I have seen them unexpectedly jerked flat on their backs, and the next instant jerked full length on their faces. Ladies, while sitting intently observant of the exercises, were jerked so violently that their bonnets, capes, handkerchiefs and loose apparel would be thrown clear away, and their long, beautiful hair, unrestrained by combs, fillets, etc., flowing down to their waists, would crack like an ox-whip with the violent vibrations of their heads and shoulders. Others would jump and run, like an antelope, perhaps for fifty or one hundred yards, and then fall prone upon the ground and lie apparently lifeless, sometimes for hours. Some would say it was the chastening work of an Almighty God, others, that it was the work of the devil. You might see the skeptical high-flyers stand on the outskirts of the assembly, winking and making sport of these manifestations, and often, in five minutes, they would be screaming and howling like madmen. Once two old church-members of great formality and incredulity visited a meeting of this kind to observe with their own eyes what they had heard and disbelieved of these manifestations. After critically scrutinizing the whole matter they pronounced it heterodox, and left the ground. However, before reaching home, they took the "jerks," and were thrown to the ground, giving utterance to piercing yells. After a time the ridiculing and unbelieving portion of the community became afraid to attend these meetings, lest they should feel this supernatural power, and stayed at home. But many, even here, in the midst of ridicule and philosophical speculation on the subject, would be taken with the jerks, and send for the minister and elders for instruction and relief. Most of those who were thus affected became members of some church, though quite a number, while they abated their skepticism in regard to the reality of the jerks, did not yield to its converting influence.* (History of Todd County, p. 87.)



A large part of the explanation of these manifestations may probably be found in the superstitious and credulous character of the early settlers. Respect for signs and omens constituted a conspicuous feature of their mental characteristics, and made them easily moved by shrewd interpretations of natural phenomena. A peculiar storm-cloud, with vivid flashes of lightning, made the threatenings of the sacred word more tangible, and, under certain circumstances, even raised a fear that the end of all things was at hand. The preachers of the time were not always proof against the temptation to use the power thus put in their hands, and numerous anecdotes are related which indicate that much of their remarkable power was due to a somewhat unscrupulous play upon the credulity of unsophisticated minds.

*It is said that the first camp-meeting held in Christendom was in 1800, at the Gasper River meeting-house, in Logan County. (See Collins, Vol I, p. 434.) In the "Biography of Elder Warren Stone" (by Elder John Rogers, Cincinnati, 1847), p 39, is found another and more complete description of these bodily agitations. In the same work, pp. 348-404, is a somewhat elaborate review of the history and character of these manifestations.

The ignorance of the people was not confined to supernatural things, however, and it is difficult, at this day, to conceive that such a degree of simplicity could anywhere exist among the adults of an enlightened nation. Dr. Drake mentions instances of families cooking bohea tea with a ham of bacon as greens, and cooking a considerable quantity in a Dutch oven, from which the whole family made their breakfast, each dipping it up with a tin cup. In this matter the early society was not without its gradations, the Eastern emigrant being counted the most intelligent, the Virginian next, and the Marylanders third in the intellectual scale. Books were rare, and included sundry volumes of hymns, the Bible, Pilgrim's Progress, and one or more almanacs. Even this limited supply was not found everywhere, and in the most favored families the variety was seldom enlarged by a volume of poems, and never by a romance.

Until the publication of a Kentucky almanac by Bradford, in 1788, these sybilline leaves were imported from Philadelphia, and were filled with anecdotes and bon-mots, "often profane, and oftener licentious in their character." "Poor Richard's Almanac" was a rare exception, and was used by the more refined. But it was the record of the moon's phases, which were held of most practical account. With the waxing and waning of this mysterious planet the whole tide of social affairs ebbed and flowed. Babies were weaned, grains and vegetables were planted, and hogs were killed with strict regard for the inconstant moon. This credulity was universal, and made the almanac as indispensable to the cabin as the newspaper in modern homes.

It is a creditable feature of this early society that with such training, and surrounded by the discouragements of poverty, lack of books and lack of school facilities and teachers, the people should have made such early efforts to secure the benefits of schools. The school teacher was early abroad in Kentucky. The first of these knights of the birchen rod was William Coomes. He was among the first settlers at Harrodsburg, and from 1775 until he moved to the Catholic settlements in Marion County, he plied his vocation at that station. But schools were not generally established until some time after the large immigration of 1788, and were thenceforward, for years, only the crudest attempts to organize for educational objects. The schoolhouse was the familiar log structure, with greased paper covered windows, puncheon benches and desks, and a mammoth fire-place. Dillworth's Speller and the New Testament were the sole text books; geography and arithmetic were taught orally, the propositions of these perplexing sciences often being further complicated by being expressed in a doggerel verse. Writing was more akin to manual than mental exercise, and required the teacher to be expert in making pens as well as marks. There was little of the orderly progression of latter-day systems, and few pretended to go beyond "capitals" and "large joining hand."

The teachers were generally of Scotch or Irish extraction, with now and then a Yankee. Unhampered by text books each teacher gave full scope to his peculiar theories, which generally expressed his mental limitations and peculiarities of temperament and habits, and seldom failed to include a liberal use of the rod. The first quarter of the present century was marked by a rapid progress in the scholastic attainments of the teacher, and in central Kentucky were found not only such mathematical and classical instructors as Filson and his contemporaries, but the beginnings of that higher instruction which has since developed into such grand proportions. The early common schools were of course supported by subscription, each patron bearing such a proportion of the general cost as his children bore to the whole number instructed. But the teacher, being a man of necessities similar to his patrons, made no difficulty in accepting his salary in pork, corn or whisky, and thus these grosser articles were transmuted into those faculties which charmed a senate or held the world in awe.

"Business" had little recognition in frontier society. The great occupation of the new settlers was clearing away the forest and cultivating the soil. They had access to no markets; produce had no commercial value at home; and accustomed to find all their necessities supplied through their own skill and industry from nature, they did not encourage a division of labor. Each man was his own blacksmith, carpenter, tanner, shoe and harness-maker, while the women supplied the place of weaver and tailor. The work of the turner and cooper was less readily accomplished, and when William Poague began the manufacture of tubs, churns, pails, noggins, etc., at Harrodsburg, the neighboring stations found it a great convenience to exchange their produce for these indispensable articles of cabin furniture.

Closely following this pioneer industry came the primitive inn. It was scarcely to be distinguished from the simple home of the private citizen, and differed from the ordinary cabin principally in that its hospitality was dispensed at a fixed price. Its patronage was derived from prospectors who thronged to the new land, the temporary character of whose stay rendered such an establishment a necessity. The earliest of this class of public purveyors was situated near "the Falls," and the regulation of its charges by the county court, in 1781, suggests the condition of things at that time. Whisky was provided at $15 per half pint; corn at $10 a gallon; "stablage" or pasturage one night at $4; "a diet" at $12, and "lodging in a feather bed" at $6. These prices represent the depreciation of the continental currency rather than the scarcity of food, but the cost of all provisions which involved the use of machinery in their manufacture was necessarily high for many years.

The first step toward the reduction of food prices was taken when the water-mill was introduced. The hominy-block and grater had, in many cases, been superseded by the hand mill, a small buhr propelled by hand, but this, while it improved the quality of the product, did not appreciably lessen the labor. The water-mill did both, but, dependent upon the inconstant streams, it proved only a partial substitute for the more laborious methods. Sawing facilities were soon added, and the pioneer began to rejoice in many conveniences which the ax had failed to supply. These, with an occasional tan-yard, comprised the public industries of pioneer days—enterprises which contributed much to the comfort of the early settlements, but failed alone to afford a support for those who employed their capital in them. There was, therefore, little inducement to "go into business," and those who did so still made farming their chief dependence for support and a future competency. Accordingly, the chief pursuit of the early settlers for more than a quarter of a century was the acquisition of land.

The public lands in Kentucky were acquired on easy terms. Before the "old French war," the commercial value of lands beyond the Alleghanies was very small, and the crown, anxious to build up a barrier of English settlements in the way of French pretensions, made liberal grants to corporations and individuals who would undertake to introduce immigration. Hostilities intervened, and these grants served rather to lay the foundation of land claims than of settlements. The five years which followed this war, before the purchase at Fort Stanwix, were characterized by great activity in multiplying these claims. It was provided that the land bounties of the Virginian troops should be located on the waters of the Ohio, but these with the earlier grants were suspended for a time, while their conflicting interests were examined by the English ministry. But in the meantime, regardless of royal proclamation or Indian threatenings, the individual prospector was pushing his explorations and marking his claims farther and farther toward the west. The extinction of the Indian title and the adjudication of bounty claims removed the last barrier to the possession of the coveted region. Adventurous land hunters, under the provision of Virginia enactments, vied with the military claimants in securing "settlement rights." A few chips cut by a tomahawk from a tree, or a rude log pen without roof, door, or window, were sufficient with some show of cultivation to constitute a claim to certain adjacent lands, and "tomahawk" and "improver's" rights were well recognized property in that period. The latter class of claims became very numerous, the owners of which, who were in the habit of coming down the Ohio in the spring, doing a little work toward raising a crop of corn, and then returning to the older settlements, were generally known as "cabiners."

Thus up to 1779, land was acquired without money and practically without price, but at this time the public lands of Virginia assumed a new importance. The burdens of the war for independence were beginning to be seriously felt, and the eager demand for the western lands suggested their availability as a means of relief. Accordingly, the assembly enacted the famous land law, which, after providing for the various claims previously authorized, arranged for the sale of the remaining portion of the public lands for the benefit of the State treasury. The recognized claims may be classified as follows: First, those of the Ohio, Walpole and other companies, which had a title more or less perfect from the British government, though none of them were patented. Second, those founded on the military bounty warrants of 1763, some of which had been secured by patent. Third, Henderson's claim by purchase from the Indians at Watauga. Fourth, those based simply upon selection and occupancy. Fifth, those resting upon selection and survey without occupancy. Sixth, those of persons who had imported settlers, to whom an old law of Virginia allowed fifty acres for each settler thus imported. Seventh, those of persons who had paid money into the old colonial treasury for land. Eighth, those of the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, to whom Virginia was indebted.

The adjudication of these claims was committed to a special court consisting of William Fleming, Edmund Lyne, James Barbour and Stephen Trigg, which, after hearing the evidence in support of claims, was authorized to render final judgment, though it was provided that such judgments should be held open for revision until December 1, 1780. The whole matter was an intricate and perplexing subject, and to facilitate the work of the commission the assembly laid down the following principles for its guidance:

First—When no patent existed, all surveys made before January 1, 1778, by any county surveyor commissioned by William and Mary College, and founded (a) upon charter; (b) upon importation rights duly proved; (c) upon treasury rights, i. e., money paid into the colonial treasury; (d) upon entries not exceeding 400 acres, made before October 26, 1763; (e) upon acts of the Virginia Assembly resulting from orders in council, etc.; (f) upon any warrants from a colonial governor for military services, etc., were to be good; all other surveys were null and void.

Second—Where no survey had been made, claims made (a) under importation rights; (b) under treasury rights; (c) under warrants for military services, were to be admitted to survey and entry.

Third—Those who had actually settled or caused, at their cost, others to settle on unappropriated lands, before January 1, 1778, were to have 400 acres or less, as they pleased, for every family so settled, paying $2.25 for each hundred acres.

Fourth—Those who had settled in villages before January 1, 1778, were to receive for each family 400 acres adjacent to the village, at $2.25 per 100 acres, and the village property was to remain unsurveyed until the general assembly could examine the title to it, and do full justice.

Fifth—To all having settlement rights as above described was given also a right of pre-emption to 1,000 acres adjoining the settlement, at 40 cents an acre.

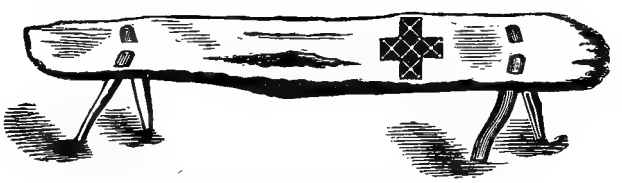
Sixth—To those who had settled since January 1, 1778, was given a pre-emption right to 400 acres, adjoining and including the settlement made by them.

Seventh—All the region between the Green River, the Cumberland Mountains, Tenn., the river Tennessee, and the Ohio was reserved for military claims.

Eighth—The 200,000 acres granted Henderson & Co. was to remain thus appropriated.*

The commission began its work on the 13th of October, 1779, at St. Asaph's, and for the convenience of claimants held its sessions at various points in Kentucky until the 26th of April, 1780, when, having accomplished its mission, it adjourned without day. In this period about 3,000 claims were passed upon, the first of which, it is said, was a claim of Isaac Shelby to a settlement and pre-emption for having raised a crop of corn in 1776. The greater part of the claims thus adjusted required the survey and entry of the lands before a perfect title could be had, but such was the inadequate provision of Virginia, in these important matters, that few claims could be indisputably established. The radical and incurable defect of the law was the neglect of Virginia to provide for the general survey of the whole country at public expense. The plan of division by ranges and meridian lines had not then been suggested, but the Transylvania Company had conceived the idea of surveying "by the four cardinal points, except where rivers and mountains make it too inconvenient," and so far as this work proceeded it was superior to what followed. By the Virginia law each possessor of a warrant was allowed to locate the same where he pleased, and was required to survey it at his own cost; but his entry was required to be so exact that each subsequent locator might recognize the land already taken up. To make a good entry, therefore, required a precision and accuracy of description which was almost impossible. In the unskilled hands of the pioneers, entries, surveys and patents were filed upon each other, crossing each other's lines in inextricable confusion, the full fruition of which was not reached until the country became more thickly settled. All vague entries became null and void, but a good entry did not give an undisputed title. All entries were accepted for record, and when any of them were found to conflict the claimants were referred to the courts; thus countless unhappy, vexatious lawsuits followed, in which scant justice was secured to any one.*

The conclusion of the special commission's work was followed by an unfortunate scramble among the claimants to secure the survey and entry of their lands. George May opened his office in Harrodsburg in 1780, but was soon obliged to temporarily close it on account of Indian hostilities, and the offices at Lexington and Coxe's Station were not opened until the latter part of 1782. This delay occasioned a great clamor which was re-enforced by the speculators and immigrant purchasers, whom the ill-advised legislation of Virginia had brought to Kentucky in large numbers. After satisfying existing claims the assembly provided that the remaining public lands should be offered to the general public in unrestricted quantities at 40 cents an acre. The purchase money was paid into the treasury, from whence a warrant was issued to the purchaser for the specified quantity of land. This authorized the county surveyor to locate and enter the land where the purchaser was pleased to select it. It was also provided that land to the extent of 400 acres in any single case might be sold on credit, the surveyor's authorization in such case consisting of an order from the county court. Such terms had the effect to greatly multiply the demand for surveyors, and so keen was the anxiety to select lands that even the fear of the Indians failed to deter the adventurous land-hunters from pushing their explorations.



In the closing month of 1781, land speculation received an additional impulse from the questionable funding plan of Virginia. The paper issues of the State had shared the fate of the continental scrip, so that a hat was valued at £100, a coat and waistcoat at £250, and a bushel of salt at £240. The depreciation of the State currency had been legally recognized, and a silver dollar rated at $1.50 in paper, but trade had long since established a higher rate of exchange, and at this time the assembly sought to stem the current by additional legislation. It was accordingly provided that the early issue should be taken up by new certificates at the rate of $1,000 in paper for one in silver. This new issue was made a legal tender for taxes and in the purchase of public lands, and the price of land was fixed at a specie valuation, but such was the depreciation of the new currency that 100 acres brought less than the value of 50 cents in silver.

*See Annals of the West, pp. 218–220.

*Appendix A, Note 24.

The inevitable and immediate result was to flood the treasury with the discredited currency in exchange for Kentucky lands, and to involve all land titles in a ruinous state of insecurity. The discovery of flaws in these titles eventually became the object of regular pursuit by unscrupulous men, who immediately took advantage of any legal defect to enter such lands and eject the settler whose industry had reclaimed it from the original wild condition. The almost universal distress and discontent which followed, seriously reacted upon the general prosperity, and such remedial legislation as was possible was early applied. The ejector was compelled to pay for the improvements made, which under the circumstances were not lightly valued. It followed, therefore, that the ejector found the investment rather unprofitable, for after such outlay the danger of being ejected in his turn still remained. The statute of limitations eventually ended these vexatious litigations, and land-titles in Kentucky are now as generally secure as elsewhere, though business prudence leads large investors to take the necessary steps to secure the court's confirmation of their titles.

PUNCHEON SEAT OF PIONEER SCHOOLHOUSE.

CHAPTER X.

THE ERA OF SOCIAL EVOLUTION.

THE period of the Revolutionary war was an era of the most rapid and marvelous development in America. It abounded in new forms of virtue and greatness. "Fidelity to principle pervaded the masses; an unorganized people, of their own free will, suspended commerce by universal assent; poverty rejected bribes. Heroism, greater than that of chivalry, burst into action from lowly men; citizens with their families fled from their homes and wealth in towns, rather than yield to oppression. Battalions sprang up in a night from spontaneous patriotism; where eminent statesmen hesitated, the instinctive action of the multitude revealed the counsels of maganimity; youth and genius gave up life freely for the liberties of mankind. A nation without union, without magazines and without a treasury, without credit, without government, fought successfully against the whole strength and wealth of Great Britain; an army of veteran soldiers capitulated to insurgent husbandmen." (Bancroft.) Into this struggle the people had thrown themselves with a patriotic abandon which reserved no interest beyond the present, and when the victory was achieved and peace crowned the long and arduous contest, many found their occupation gone, the charm of old associations broken, and thousands, whose course of life was thus interrupted, discovered inclination not less than necessity suggesting the expediency of beginning life anew.

To people thus circumstanced, the availability of the western country was suggested in a hundred ways. The story of its beauty and fertility was well and widely known, and was further emphasized by the general discussion which preceded the cession of State public lands to the general government. Bounties granted to State and continental troops took the form of warrants for certain of these lands, and the liberal terms on which Virginia offered her Kentucky possessions, all served to attract thousands of the Revolutionary soldiery to the western settlements. But this interest was not confined to the rank and file of the army. Large numbers of bounty warrants found their way, through the improvidence or ignorance of the original grantees, into the hands of capitalists, while the suicidal policy of Virginia, in making her depreciated currency a legal tender for lands, increased the speculative mania and added thousands to the throng of emigrants who crowded into the Ohio Valley. The New England "Ohio Company," originally projected in 1785 and taking form two years later, added its influence to the general movement, and the great immigration which began immediately after the proclamation of peace continued with almost unabated force until after the opening of the present century.

In 1783, Kentucky alone received an addition of 8,000 to her population. In the succeeding year 10,000 more came, and each flood-tide of the Ohio bore striking evidence to the increasing rage for westward emigration. In 1786, an observer at the mouth of the Big Miami noted the passage of thirty-four boats in thirty-nine days; another at Pittsburgh, in 1787, reported the departure of fifty flat-boats from that point between the 1st of March and the middle of April; at Fort Harmar, the adjutant recorded the number of boats passing that post between October, 1786, and May, 1787, at 177, carrying 2,700 persons. In 1788, it was estimated that not less than 10,000 emigrants went by Marietta, and in twelve months, comprising portions of the years of 1788 and 1789, the official register kept at Fort Harmar showed that 20,000 souls had descended the Ohio in 850 boats, containing also 600 wagons, 7,000 horses, 3,000 cows and 900 head of sheep.*

While the larger part of these emigrants found the end of their journey in Kentucky, another current came into this favored region by way of Cumberland Gap. This was the route followed by a considerable portion of the Virginia and all of the Carolina emigration. A block-house had been erected on the Holston, and here immigrants would collect until a sufficient number had rendezvoused to make it safe to pass the "wilderness," an uninhabited interval of 130 miles, which separated the Holston from Crab Orchard, the nearest settled point in Kentucky. In the broken country through which this path led, pack animals alone could be used for transportation, and a motley throng of horses, cows and oxen, all bearing packs, was a familiar sight on this route long after wagons were in common use elsewhere in the State.

The effect of this wonderful movement of the people was to increase the population of Kentucky with marvelous rapidity. In 1783 it was estimated at 12,000; in the spring of 1784 it was placed at 20,000; at the beginning of 1785 it was thought to have reached 30,000; and at the first regular census, in 1790, it was found to be 73,677. Of this number 61,103 were free whites, the remainder being chiefly slaves and free persons of color. About one-half of the white population and two-thirds of the slaves were drawn from Virginia; the balance came principally from Pennsylvania, Maryland and North Carolina, though there was a considerable representation of foreigners and of emigrants from Philadelphia, New Jersey, New York and the New England States.

But this vast in-flowing tide of humanity was not less remarkable in the character of its elements than in its great numbers. Kentucky was no longer regarded as simply a haven for the repair of desperate fortunes, but rather a land, the future prospects of which invited the investment of wealth by the promise of profit, and the employment of professional genius by the hope of preferment. This mighty immigration was therefore something more than a curious incident; it was "the chaos of a mighty world rounding into form,"

> The raw material of a State,
> Its [muscle and its mind].

Shelby and Brown had already come, and in the throng which followed into the frontier settlements of Kentucky could be discovered such leading characters as Innes, Bullitt, Marshall, Christian, Wilkinson, Muter, Nicholas, Daviess and the future "great commoner," Henry Clay.*

All forms of social life felt the invigorating impulse. Isolated clearings expanded into fruitful and contiguous plantations. Stations grew into villages; and towns developed into cities with a sustained rapidity scarcely equaled by the present progress of the Northwest. Agriculture began to flourish, new arts and manufactures sprang up; stores were opened and trade with distant points established; schools and churches multiplied, and society, re-enforced by wealth and culture, began to assume new airs of gentility.

Hitherto the adventurous population settled south of the Ohio had only been able to secure a precarious foothold in this contested region, and even this slight tenure was barely maintained by the greatest exertion. A few stations, principally confined to the upper valleys of the Kentucky, Salt and Green Rivers, and at the Falls of the Ohio constituted an isolated settlement on the verge of extinction. Five hundred miles away, through the "great woods" and over three mountain ranges, on the Atlantic slope, lay the seat of government at Richmond. Of the intervening country, the greater part was unmarked by human habitation. On the Kanawha, Greenbrier, Elk and Cheat Rivers, scattered at wide intervals, were feeble settlements which proved an induce-

* McMaster's "History of American People," Vol. I, p. 149, and Monette's "History of Valley of the Mississippi," Vol. II, p. 177.

* Came in 1797.

ment rather than a barrier to the incursions of the savages, while on the Ohio, Pittsburgh, with its hundred dwellings, Wheeling with half as many board and log-cabins, Point Pleasant, marked simply by a stockade, and later, Marietta, planted near the mouth of the Muskingum, served to mark the slender tie which bound Kentucky to the older centers of colonial life.

Since Braddock's time, a well-marked roadway had connected the upper Potomac with Pittsburgh, and a bridle path, leading from the Shenandoah Valley by way of the Holston and Cumberland Gap to Crab Orchard, was nearly as old and well traveled, but it was not until 1782 that a route was thus marked out eastward from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia, the great national center of commercial and political life. In Kentucky at this time there was not a single wheelway. The trail from Limestone to Lexington had been widened at intervals along its upper extent, and in 1783, a resolute pioneer by the name of Smith had managed to take his wagon from one terminus to the other; but so remarkable was this feat, that it gave this pioneer wagoner a certain claim to distinction, which was popularly recognized in the name of "Smith's wagon-road," a name that for years was applied to this route. Impelled by the increased demand for more convenient modes of transportation, this line of travel was gradually improved by private enterprise, until about 1788 it began to be a scene of busy traffic, with lines of loaded wagons passing regularly between the termini. The earliest attempt to improve the public roads by special legislation was in 1795, when the Kentucky legislature provided for the widening, leveling and otherwise improving the trail from Cumberland Gap to Crab Orchard. This was originally blazed out in 1775 by Daniel Boone, but for which he wrote Gov. Shelby he had received no compensation. He wished to contract for the work proposed, but it was eventually let to others. Under the Virginia law county roads were laid out thirty feet wide, and from this date (1795) forward, considerable attention was paid to the construction of wheelways, but as late as 1840, bridle-paths and obscure wagon-trails greatly outnumbered the roads regularly laid out.

Under the changed circumstances, business instincts were quickened. The great increase of population created a brisk demand for every surplus product; money became fairly abundant, and the addition of a considerable number of wealthy settlers created new wants, to which those skilled in the various trades were not slow to cater. The tailor, weaver, hatter, cabinetmaker, workers in leather, the blacksmith and even the carpenter soon found well-paid employment. A few fields of wheat south of the Kentucky marked the improvement of agricultural pursuits, and several small distilleries gave promise of a home market for increased quantities of corn. Nor were trade activities long limited to domestic exchanges. Enterprising merchants, who had kept pace with the advancing line of settlements, had some time before opened their wares at Brownsville, and now felt the general impulse to move with the flowing tide. In 1783, therefore, Daniel Brodhead left the Monongahela and established a store at Louisville. In the succeeding year James Wilkinson, who had represented a New England trading company at the former place, also came to Kentucky and opened a store at Lexington.

From this beginning an important commerce sprang up between the thrifty settlements in Kentucky and Philadelphia and Nashville. This was soon very generally controlled by the merchants of Lexington, who brought their merchandise by wagon from Philadelphia or Baltimore to Pittsburgh, and thence by boat to Limestone, which early became the great entrepot for all the region south of the Ohio. Thirty-five or forty days were consumed in thus transporting goods to Lexington, including the two days and a half required to bring them from the landing place, the cost of carriage amounting to about $7 or $8 per hundred. The merchandise consisted of coarse and fine iron goods, cutlery, nails and tinware, dry goods, drugs, queensware and such groceries as tea, coffee and sugar, and were in demand in about this order. From Lexington these commodities were distributed to the interior, the operations of the merchants extending to the growing settlements of Tennessee, to which goods were transported by land.

The scarcity of money which soon prevailed largely reduced business exchanges to a system of barter, which enabled the merchants to reap large profits. The local merchant was granted a year's credit by the importing houses of the East, and made a considerable part of his payment in such products of the country as would bear the expense of transportation. He was careful, nevertheless, to secure what money there was in circulation. In receiving produce in payment for goods, a difference of fifteen or twenty per cent in favor of the merchant was exacted. Certain goods were sold only for cash or exchanged for domestic, linen and hemp, articles which commanded a ready sale, and in this way the country was gradually drained of its circulating medium of exchange.

Coin was the only form of money in general use. United States bank notes, when issued, commanded a premium, but while these were accepted by the merchants without difficulty, the common people feared the skill of the counterfeiter, and generally refused to use them. The piaster, or Spanish dollar, was the current money of Virginia, and consequently of Kentucky and Tennessee, and was valued at six shillings sterling; but even when this coin was fairly abundant there was a great scarcity of fractional currency, which led to the evil practice of cutting the whole coin into quarters, eighths and sixteenths. This division was made by any one and every one, a custom which was promptly taken advantage of by unscrupulous persons to convert a portion of the metal to their own profit. "Sharp-shins," or cut coins, were, therefore, soon taken by the merchants only by weight, and even then at a discount on the whole coin. Still, under the rule of trade, the coin came in large quantities into the hands of the merchants, who packed it on horses and sent it to Philadelphia, as many as fifteen or twenty animals laden with this precious stuff at times setting out in company.

There was scarcely anything produced in Kentucky which would bear the high cost of transportation by way of Pittsburgh to the East. East-bound freight was carried cheaper than the goods coming west, from the fact, that otherwise the great number of wagons employed in this traffic would return empty; but even with this abatement merchants found little save the more valuable furs and ginseng* to export to their markets. When first discovered on this continent the latter was worth its weight in gold. It was subsequently found abounding in Pennsylvania and Kentucky, where it was secured by such of the inhabitants whose usual occupations allowed sufficient leisure to collect it. Hunters gathered a large proportion of the amount early exported from Kentucky, who, in addition to their usual accoutrements, carried a bag and a small pickaxe for the purpose. This found ready sale with the merchants at about a shilling a pound, and was sold in the seaports at 100 per cent advance.

The expanding settlements of Tennessee and the Spanish possessions soon afforded a market for the more bulky products of Kentucky, and, among these, salt became the earliest article of trade. The region south of the Ohio was richly furnished with salt springs, and the pioneers found many places where this necessary condiment could be manufactured for their own supply, but many of them subsequently proved unprofitable for the purposes of commerce. There were at least twelve important salt springs between the Big Sandy and the Cumberland, of which the leading ones were May's Lick and the Blue Licks, on the Licking, Big-Bone Lick, Drennon's Lick and Bullitt's Lick. The latter was situated on Salt River, about twenty miles from Louisville, and was the first that was extensively worked. It eventually became the property of the United States and was leased to various contractors, under whose management the business expanded to such proportions as to engage fifty furnaces and 500 men in the manufacture.

*Appendix A, Note 25.

The first attempts to produce salt were characterized by the rudest simplicity. The ordinary pots and kettles used in the cabins were hung over an open fire, to which was transferred the brine laboriously dipped from the spring. In this way twenty or thirty men were able to manufacture a few bushels of salt in a month. When the development of the country suggested the more methodical prosecution of the enterprise and gave protection to those engaged in the work, improvements were rapidly introduced. The brine was then collected in pits, some twenty feet deep, and transferred from thence to kettles designed for the purpose. These were of "yellow copper," had a capacity of "two hundred pints," and for some years were solely manufactured at "Probes' Furnace" in West Liberty, Penn. Ten or twelve of these kettles were arranged in a row upon a trench four feet in depth, and of a breadth suitable to afford a support for them. The interstices between the kettles were stopped with clay, forming a rude sort of furnace which was universally used in this region for many years. In both ends of this trench a wood fire was maintained night and day, but the cost of cutting and transporting the fuel, and the weakness of the brine, made the cost of the manufactured article reach $4 per hundred-weight at the furnace, which proved a fatal obstacle to its exportation.

These furnaces were subsequently enlarged so as to accommodate sixty kettles, and the supply of brine improved by boring to a considerable depth in the ground. From these wells, the brine was pumped by hand or horse-power, and conveyed by means of troughs directly to the kettles. With these improvements, a single furnace produced thirty-five or forty bushels a day. By increasing the number of furnaces to ten or fifteen, the annual product was raised to 150,000 bushels, and the proportional cost of labor was so reduced, that the manufactured product was sold at $1.40 per hundred-weight. At this price, this commodity became the leading article of export, and was shipped in large quantities to Nashville, where it was disposed of for money, furs, cotton, etc. The Kentucky works were not long without sharp competition. Salt springs were early discovered on the Kanawha, where the brine was found to be much richer. A large part of the product of these springs found a market in Pittsburgh, where it came in competition with the Onondaga salt, which, with improved shipping facilities, eventually monopolized the trade of all.

Fortunately, long before this event the fertile lands of Kentucky had developed new articles of commerce, for which the opening of the Mississippi provided a ready market. The isolated wheat-fields of 1783 rapidly expanded into a broad acreage, which, in 1802, furnished not less than 60,000 barrels of flour for the New Orleans market; tobacco, the cultivation of which, in 1802, had only recently been introduced, swelled the list with several thousand hogsheads, weighing from 1,000 to 1,200 pounds each; and the hemp-fields, beside supplying the busy hand-looms to be found in every cabin (in 1802) furnished 42,048 pounds of the raw staple, and 2,402 hundred-weight manufactured into cables and cordage, for export. To these should be added the rapidly expanding crops of corn, rye and oats, which, though not found in the list of exports, swelled the products of the soil to an immense aggregate. Almost the entire yield of rye was disposed of to the distilleries, while oats and corn found an equally good demand at home.

An increasing quantity of maize was each year consumed by the distilleries and fed to stock. This was especially true in the case of horses, the breeding of which was rapidly assuming a prominent place in the agricultural system of the new land. The number of horses was greatly augmented by the new immigration, and of the animals thus brought in, some were of breeds for which Virginia was then so justly celebrated. Many of the new comers were persons of wealth and luxurious habits, whose influence was such as to give a new impulse to the early predilections of the Kentuckians, and care in breeding this animal became well-nigh universal. Nearly every plantation had a portion devoted to horses. They were never tied up. An "un-chinked" log stable afforded some protection from the weather, when they chose to avail themselves of it, and here a manger was kept supplied with corn, which the animals ate at their pleasure. Popular taste inclined only to carriage and saddle-horses, which were characterized by "a delicate leg, a well proportioned head, and an elegant slender form." Such an animal was worth in Kentucky about $130 to $140. Farther south, and especially in the Carolinas, they were worth from 25 to 30 per cent more, and large numbers were annually taken there for sale. Strings of from fifteen to thirty animals were frequently seen setting off at the beginning of winter destined for Charleston, a distance of 700 miles, which they accomplished in eighteen or twenty days. Brood-mares found ready sale in Tennessee, and altogether, horses formed no inconsiderable part of the early commerce.

AN OLD TIME "WAIN" OR WAGON.

The growing prosperity of the planters was not less marked in the increase of other kinds of stock. The number of horned cattle rapidly redoubled, and many engaged in buying the surplus animals to drive to Virginia, where they were sold to the graziers on the banks of the Potomac to fatten for the markets of Baltimore and Philadelphia. Cows, valued at $10 or $12 a head, were found everywhere in large numbers. Milk formed an important part of the food of the common people. Butter was made in considerable quantities, but not much used, and "barreled butter" formed a not insignificant item in the exports of the time. But of all stock, hogs formed the most important feature in the domestic economy of the region, both in the matter of numbers and income. They were allowed to run loose in the unfenced forests, where they rapidly multiplied and fattened for market with little attention from the owners. They afforded the staple food of the whole people, and were represented in the exports of the first six months of 1802 by 272,000 weight of smoked, and 24,085 barrels of salted pork.

Such commercial activity early wrought great changes in the modes of transportation. The long lines of pack-horses gave way to huge covered-wains drawn by four curiously caparisoned horses, the passing of which, during a large part of the year, was indicated by large clouds of dust like that produced by a moving army.*

*The Pittsburgh Gazette of November, 1814, contained an account of a gentleman living on "the great road," four miles from the city, to the effect that the number of these wagons

These wagoners in time became exceedingly arrogant and often refused to grant the rights of the road to others. They became overbearing to immigrant travel, and especially to any who showed evidence of wealth in their equipage. Travelers in carriages considered themselves fortunate if they were permitted to stand by the roadside with no greater inconvenience than being stifled with the dust of the passing train, and having their ears assailed by the gibes of the drivers. Cases where carriages were maliciously overturned or broken down were frequent and unredressed. A similar influence marked the development of the river traffic. The old Kentucky boat, with its ark-like capacity and heedless navigation, gradually gave place to the keel-boat and its professional crew.

Pittsburgh became more and more generally the point of embarkation for merchandise. Here, merchants found better storage for their goods while awaiting river transportation, and boats proceeded from this port with less difficulty at low stages of water than from any other. The Kentucky boat, built and navigated by the merchants, was employed by shippers for a time, but these boats were found to be carelessly made, and the dangers and difficulties of navigation so often resulted in serious loss to inexperienced mariners, that river transportation gradually fell into the hands of persons who made river freightage a regular business. Such persons were not slow to observe that the early modes of navigation were susceptible of easy improvements, and the keel-boat, with its lighter draught and better appliances, rapidly superseded the earlier vessel. These boats were commonly manned by from five to ten men, under the command of a "patroon," and carried from twenty to thirty tons of freight. After the opening of the Mississippi, the increased demands of trade gave rise to the barge, a vessel similar to the keel-boat, but of greater capacity, provided with oars, and carrying a crew sometimes reaching the number of fifty men. Both kinds of vessels were furnished with a mast, a square sail and coils of cordage known as cordelles. A horn was also a regular part of each boat's equipage. It was originally intended for making signals, but it became the custom of the boatmen, at intervals, to sound on it a sort of cadence, the mellow notes of which, floating land-ward, announced the passing boat in melodious tones, which have been celebrated in a touching poem by Gen. W. O. Butler.

The trip down the river in times of freshet was made without difficulty in thirty-five to fifty days, but to return was a very different undertaking, and the boat which left New Orleans on the 1st of March seldom reached Louisville before the middle of June or 1st of July, and sometimes not until October. The celebrated ornithologist, Audubon, has left the following graphic picture of the tedious journey up-stream:

We will suppose one of these boats under way, and having passed Natchez, entering upon what were called the difficulties of their ascent. Wherever a point projected so as to render the course or bend below it of some magnitude, there was an eddy, the returning current of which was sometimes as strong as that of the middle of the great stream. The bargemen, therefore, rowed up pretty close under the bank, and had merely to keep watch in the bow least the boat should run against a planter or sawyer. But the boat has reached the point, and there the current is to all appearance of double strength and right against it. The men who have rested a few minutes are ordered to take their stations and lay hold of their oars, for the river must be crossed, it being seldom possible to double such a point and proceed along shore. The boat is crossing, its head slanting to the current, which is, however, too strong for the rowers, and when the other side of the river has been reached, it has drifted perhaps a quarter of mile. The men are by this time exhausted, and, as we will suppose it to be 12 o'clock, fasten the boat to a tree on the shore. A small glass of whisky is given to each, when they cook and eat their dinner, and after resting from their fatigue for an hour, recommence their labors. The boat is again seen slowly advancing against the stream. It has reached the lower end of a sand-bar, along the edge of which it is propelled by means of long poles, if the bottom be hard. Two men, called bowsmen, remain at the prow to assist, in concert with the steersman, in managing the boat and keeping its head right against the current. The rest place themselves on the land side of the footway of the vessel, put one end of their poles on the ground and the other against their shoulders, and push with all their laden with merchandise which passed his farm for Pittsburgh, from the 1st of January, 1813, to the 1st of January, 1814, amounted to 4,055.

might. As each of the men reaches the stern, he crosses it to the other side, runs along it and comes again to the landward side of the bow, when he recommences operations. The barge, in the meantime, is ascending at a rate not exceeding one mile in the hour.

The bar is at length passed, and as the shore in sight is straight on both sides and the current uniformly strong, the poles are laid aside, and the men being equally divided, those on the river side take to their oars, while those on the land side lay hold of the branches of the willows or other trees, and thus slowly propel the boat. Here and there, however, the trunk of a fallen tree, partly lying on the bank and partly projecting beyond it, impedes their progress and requires to be doubled. This is performed by striking into it the iron points of the poles and gaff-hooks, and so pulling around it. The sun is now quite low, and the barge is again secured in the best harbor within reach for the night, after having accomplished her distance of perhaps fifteen miles. The next day the wind proves favorable, the sail is set, the boat takes all advantages, and meeting with no accidents, has ascended thirty miles, perhaps double that distance. The next day comes with a very different aspect. The wind is right ahead, the shores are without trees of any kind, and the canes on the bank are so thick and stout that not even the cordelles can be used. This occasions a halt. The time is not altogether lost, as most of the men, being provided with rifles, betake themselves to the woods and search for the deer, the bears or the turkeys that are generally abundant there. Three days may pass before the wind changes, and the advantages gained on the previous five days are forgotten. Again the boat proceeds, but in passing over a shallow place runs on a log, swings with the current, but hangs fast with her lee-side almost under water. Now for the poles! All hands are on deck, bustling and pushing. At length toward sunset the boat is once more afloat, and is again taken to the shore, where the wearied crew pass another night.

Such were some of the less serious difficulties of a river voyage. Until after the general pacification of the Indians, in 1795, the perils of the land were greater than those of the water, though these were not of a trivial character. Wrecks, more or less complete, were frequent, three-fourths of which were probably occasioned by the careless construction of the boats. The "broadhorns," as the Kentucky boats were popularly called, were especially distinguished in this way. A bad, knotty, or rotten plank in the bottom, a weak gunwale of tender wood, or the want of stoutness in the first or second row of planking above the gunwale, was frequently the causes of a total or partial loss of a valuable cargo. The character of the boatmen was another prolific source of trouble. Few of them had any experience as mariners, or observed anything like nautical discipline, and none, save the "patroon," seemed to feel any responsibility for the safe issue of the voyage. A boat often grounded or was staved in by obstructions, simply because the "patroon," being below, failed to give the necessary orders to avert the danger. Barges were sometimes overturned and lost by the ignorant handling of the sail, and sometimes by the willful abandonment of the crew.

Of the natural dangers to early navigation, ice was probably the most formidable. Eager to gain the utmost advantage of the flood-tide, shippers often ventured out with their frail craft before the river was fairly cleared, and, caught in a jam, the slender plank structure broke up like tinder-wood. In February, 1811, sixteen boats were thus caught in the ice at the mouth of the Tennessee, "three of which were sunk and lost; two stove and sunk but got afloat again and were repaired, five had their sides driven in, but were repaired before they sank, and the rest scarcely escaped from the general wreck." The passage of the falls at Louisville was dangerous, and many boats were lost in attempting it. This gave rise to a class of persons who offered their services to guide passing boats; but many of them proving incompetent, the danger was scarcely lessened, until 1798, when the office of pilot was established and a regular officer appointed, who was authorized to charge a fee of $2 for each boat.

Another source of danger was the "boat-wrecker," who infested the uninhabited region from old Fort Massac to the junction of the Mississippi River. These land pirates were accomplished in all the details of their nefarious business, and did not hesitate to boldly attack a boat's crew, or secretly scuttle the craft, whichever promised the easiest success. Their usual plan was to draw the crew into a game of cards, of which the boatmen were passionately fond, and then cheat them out of everything they possessed.

When this plan did not serve, they frequently offered their services as pilots, or by suggestions from the shore too often insured fatal injury to the boat. At other times they would creep into the boat when tied up for the night, and bore holes in the bottom, or dig out the caulking. As soon as the boat showed signs of sinking, these miscreants would swarm out from the shore in their skiffs, to assist in saving the cargo, which they conveyed to secret places along the smaller affluents of the river beyond the chance of discovery. If an owner was hardy enough to push his search so far as to promise discovery of the hidden goods, he generally met his death in some of the obscure recesses of the marshy river margin.

A certain Col. Fluger, known on the river as "Col. Plug," was the leader of a band, which operated near Cache Creek. He was one of the boldest of the "wreckers," and was believed to possess skeleton keys to all the warehouses between that point and Louisville. On one occasion, the crew of a "broadhorn," which had suffered from his band in the previous year, determined on their next trip to be revenged. Before reaching the vicinity of his rendezvous, several of the crew went ashore, and, making their way unobserved by land, secreted themselves near the usual landing of the boat. This with its reduced crew subsequently arrived; the men were hospitably received by the freebooters, and the usual game of cards begun. When well engaged in the game and with considerable money on the table, a sharp whistle suddenly gave the signal for an attack by those of the band who were secreted near by. The hidden boatmen heard it also, and understanding its import rushed to support their comrades. The struggle was short and sharp. Three of Plug's men were thrown into the river, when the rest fled, leaving their leader in the hands of the victorious boatmen. The freebooter was quickly stripped, compelled to embrace a good-sized tree, to which he was firmly bound, and then whipped with a "cowhide" so long as any of the crew had strength to wield it effectively. In this condition, Plug was left to be relieved by the chance return of his comrades. Not long after, this desperado met his death while digging the caulking out of a river boat. A sudden tempest tore the boat from its moorings, and dashing it into the raging river, wrecker and boat were both lost.

The life of the boatman was not calculated to invite the better class of men to enter the river service. A crew was engaged for the down trip only. The return trip was made overland or in the service of such returning boats as needed an increase of force for the upward voyage. The life was full of hazardous adventure, and none but the hardy, unsettled portion of frontier society could be induced to undergo the necessary privations and dangers incident to the service; but to this class there was an attraction in the unrestrained, irresponsible life, which kept the demand for hands fully supplied. The association of such characters brought on frequent collisions among themselves; and fighting, in which the most brutal practices were indulged, was of such common occurrence as to pass without particular comment, and gradually came to be looked upon almost as a pastime. Island No. 57, in the Ohio River, gained its name of Battle Island from an encounter which is described, in the barge captain's journal, as follows:

> Two of my stoutest men having quarreled during the day while at the oars, and having clinched, had a small round under deck. Hearing the noise, I ran and parted them, and could appease them in no other way than by granting them permission to take it out on land. Accordingly at evening, as soon as we dropped anchor, the parties having chosen their stand-by friends, set out from the barge in the jolly-boat, and landed on Island No. 57, where, after it was agreed that it should be "rough and tumble," and the signal for parting should be "enough," the combatants stripped off their jackets —the weather being cold—and taking their distance, flew at each other most ferociously. Two rounds brought them fast clinched in each other's hug to the ground, when the undermost, finding the thumb of his antagonist removing his eye from its socket hollowed out vociferously to the bystanders: "Take him off! take him off! he's gouging me!" This was done immediately, and the boys got on their feet again; and discovering there was not much harm done except a bite from the one and a gouge from the other, they returned good-naturedly to the barge again, and as usual worked friendly together during the remainder of the voyage.*

Such encounters were not always so satisfactorily ended, nor were they confined to themselves. Bullies along the shore and at the principal ports, when opportunity offered, seldom failed to challenge the noted champions of the river, and the landing of a boat's crew was generally the signal for a drunken debauch, during which gambling and set fights were freely indulged. These rough champions adopted suggestive noms de guerre, such as "Half horse, half alligator," "Snapping-turtle," and the like, and the exaggerated reports which came to the peaceable portion of the community gave rise to the belief that these names were not inappropriately applied. Their unlawful and, too often, outrageous conduct on their return trip by land, made them the terror of such families as lived along their route of travel, and a rule "not to lodge Kentuckians on any account" was at length pretty generally adopted by such persons, to the distress of the innocent as well as guilty.

The exaggerated stories, in which the exploits of the boatman have been perpetuated, undoubtedly make him the "hero of fields his valor never won," but enough has been authenticated to give these tales a foundation in fact. Of these river heroes, none forms a more striking figure in early annals than Mike Fink. His early home was in Pittsburgh, where he distinguished himself as an Indian spy before he reached his majority; but while thus employed the wild, adventurous life of the boatman attracted his youthful fancy, and, lured away by the soft enchantment of the boat-horn, he engaged in the minor offices of the river service. Here he proved an apt scholar, and from this modest beginning became one of the most notorious of his class. When the river was low, Mike spent his time with his rifle and soon distanced his competitors in the use of this weapon. His skill was so universally acknowledged that whenever he made one in a shooting-match for beef, such as was then of common occurrence in Kentucky, he was always allowed the "fifth quarter"—the hide and tallow—without a shot. This was a perquisite of his skill; one which he always claimed, always obtained, and always sold for whisky with which to treat the assembled company. His capacity as a drinker was enormous; he could drink a gallon in twenty-four hours without its effect being perceptible in his language or demeanor. He was also something of a wag, and had an uncomfortable way of enforcing his jests. He used to say that he told his jokes to be laughed at, and no man should treat them lightly. The consequence was that when one refused to laugh, the offender received a sound drubbing as an admonition for the future, which usually proved effective.

His practical jokes, as he and his associates were accustomed to call their predations upon the inhabitants along the line of the river, were bold and ingenious. On a certain occasion, while passing down the river, Mike observed a flock of sheep grazing on shore, and hit upon a characteristic expedient to secure a supply of mutton without paying for it. As it was about dusk, he landed his boat in an eddy he had discovered, and having made all fast, he took some Scotch snuff, which formed a part of his cargo, and with it besmutted the faces of several of the animals. Returning to his boat, he sent one of his men to the owner to say that he would better come down and see what ailed his sheep. The startled sheep-owner found some of his flock bleating, rubbing themselves, and capering about in the strangest fashion, and sorely puzzled, turned to the plotter of the mischief for his opinion. With the gravest demeanor, Mike assured the man that the "black murrain" had attacked his sheep, and would probably destroy the whole flock if not promptly arrested. After exciting the farmer's fears to the highest pitch by an artfully concocted story, he convinced his victim that only the summary killing of the diseased animals could save him from total loss. Mike was at once deputed to shoot the infected sheep, which were then thrown into the river by the crew. After dark, the carcasses, which had been caught in the eddy, were hauled on board, and by daylight the boat, with its fresh supply of mutton, was gliding down stream to its destination.

*"The Navigator," p. 306. Pittsburgh, 1814.

But many of these "jokes" were characterized by a wanton cruelty which indicated a malevolent disposition on the part of the perpetrator. A negro had come down to the river bank to see the passing boat. Mike's keen observation caught sight of the negro's heel, which was peculiar in its excessive length, and quick as thought the boatman raised his rifle and fired, the bullet instantly tearing away a part of the exposed member. For this piece of deviltry he was arraigned by the law officers at St. Louis, but there is no record showing that he was ever compelled to pay any penalty for his crime. The power of law was regularly defied by these audacious characters, and notwithstanding they were charged with the whole catalogue of infamous crimes, from murder down, the officers found themselves powerless to inflict punishment. Mike was finally outlawed, and a reward offered for his apprehension.

For a time the desperado evaded the clutches of the officers; but one day, when his boat was moored at Louisville, an old friend who had attained the dignity of a constable, came to him pleading the necessity of his family, and pointing out the fact that while his captor would secure the much-needed reward the captive would in all probability escape conviction, he persuaded Mike to permit himself to be taken. This compromise was effected only on one condition, which Casseday thus describes:

> He felt at home nowhere but in his boat and among his men; let them take him and his men in the yawl and they would go. It was the only hope of procuring his appearance at court, and the constable consented. Accordingly a long coupled wagon was procured, and, with oxen attached, went down the hill, at Third Street, for Mike's yawl. The road, for it was not then a street, was very steep and very muddy at this point. Regardless of this, however, the boat was set upon the wagon, and Mike and his men, with their long poles ready, as if for an aquatic excursion, were put aboard, Mike in the stern. By dint of laborious dragging, the wagon had attained half the height of the hill, when out shouted the stentorian voice of Mike, calling to his men: "Set poles!" and the end of every long pole was set firmly in the thick mud. "Back her!" roared Mike, and down the hill again went wagon, yawl, men and oxen. Mike had been revolving the matter in his mind, and had concluded that it was best not to go; and well knowing that each of his men was equal to a moderately strong ox, he had at once conceived and executed this retrograde movement. Once at the bottom, another parley was held and Mike was again overpowered. This time they had almost reached the top of the hill, when "Set poles!" "Back her!" was again ordered and again executed. A third attempt was successful, and Mike reached the court house in safety, and, as his friend, the constable, had endeavored to induce him to believe, he was acquitted for lack of sufficient evidence. Other indictments, however, were found against him, but Mike preferred not to wait to hear them tried, so at a given signal he and his men boarded their craft again, and stood ready to weigh anchor. The dread of the long poles in the hands of Mike's men prevented the posse from urging any serious remonstrance against their departure. And off they started with poles "tossed." As they left the court house yard Mike waved his red bandanna, which he fixed on one of the poles, and promising to "call again" was borne back to his element, and launched once more upon the waters.*

Mike's end formed a fitting close to an infamous career. With the introduction of steam navigation his career as a boatman ended, but, unwilling to abandon his wild life, with two or three companions he turned his attention to trapping on the upper Missouri. Here he quarreled with a comrade, whom he cowardly murdered, only to meet a similar fate at the hands of the murdered man's friend. The latter assassin met his death a few months later, while attempting to swim across the river. Thus perished the last of the boatmen.

With all this laborious effort and risk, a barge could bring up the river only a few bags of coffee, and at best 100 hogsheads of sugar. A regular line of these boats was established at Cincinnati, which plied to and from New Orleans, each carrying in its downward trip a crew of nine men, which was re-enforced to twenty-five or thirty men on the return voyage. A similar line was established at Louisville and Pittsburgh, but as late as 1808, the whole number of barges engaged on the river did not exceed twenty-five or thirty, the largest of which scarcely reached 100 tons burthen. Then succeeded the sailing vessel. It is said the inhabitants of Marietta first conceived the idea of exporting native products directly to the West Indies, a vessel being constructed at that place and sent to Jamaica. The success which attended this venture inspired a strong emulation among boat-builders and shippers on the Ohio, and Pittsburgh and Louisville at once engaged in similar enterprises, the vessels going to the West Indies or to New York and Philadelphia. From 1802 to 1805, there were built at Pittsburgh the ships "Pittsburgh," "Louisiana," "Gen. Butler" and "Western Trader;" the brigs "Nanina," "Dean" and "Black Walnut;" and the schooners "Amity," "Alleghany" and "Conquest." The "Monongahela Farmer" and the brig "Ann Jean" were built at Elizabethtown, besides others at Marietta and Louisville, of which the record has been lost. The misfortunes which attended many of these later vessels, arising from bad management in their course down the river, served to dampen the ardor of ship-builders, and the business had greatly declined, when the first steamboat, in 1811–12, was constructed.

*"History of Louisville," p. 78. Much of the foregoing sketch of Mike Fink is compiled from this work, which is indebted for its data principally to sketches which appeared in the Western Souvenir for 1829, and in the Western Review for 1830.

But commercial circles were not alone in profiting from the invigorating impulse of the great immigration. Evidences of wealth and prosperity were everywhere multiplying among planters. The increasing number of stores brought in new articles of luxury, which the improved market for the products of the plantations enabled the owners to purchase to a considerable extent. This change was principally observable in the increase of home comforts. There was little of ostentation displayed. Log-houses, constructed, it is true, with greater care, continued the ordinary residence of all classes, though here and there plank and brick formed a more substantial as well as sightly material for this purpose. Orchards were multiplied, the peach forming the favorite fruit of the people, though apples were scarcely second in the public esteem. These were propagated from seed, and such was the favorable character of the climate that the peach tree bore abundantly in three or four years from the planting. So general was this prosperity that, in 1802, Michaux found nowhere in Kentucky "a single family without milk, butter, smoked or salted meat and maize for their food; the poorest man has always one or more horses, and it is very seldom that a planter goes on foot to see his neighbors." Improved table furniture was gradually introduced; knives and forks of metal in limited numbers took the place of the earlier substitutes; tinware displaced the noggin and bowl; pewter plates, succeeding the wooden-platters, gave a touch of brightness to the somber interior of the cabin; and the tinker, with his small pony, nearly covered by a huge pair of saddle-bags, filled with the molds and soldering irons with which he turned old pewter dishes into new and by sundry patches prolonged the usefulness of dilapidated tinware, becomes a regular visitant of the scattered plantations.

There were growing signs of a more luxurious living among the wealthy. The habits of the "old dominion" society were gradually transplanted into the new land. Slaves rapidly increased; silver plate began to adorn their tables; imported wines cheered their guests; and a growing disposition, on the part of a certain class of the Virginians, to arrogate something of superiority to those of their neighbors, who could lay no claims to the mystic virtue expressed in the title of "F. F. V.," began to be manifested. With the progress of political development this tendency became confirmed. Public offices were filled for the period of "good behavior," and, once supplied, there was no rotation in office to act as a stimulant to the people to qualify themselves for places of honor and trust. It accordingly became very generally accepted that some were born to rule, and that the many were born to be ruled, and both parties came to view this division as natural and desirable. This was the starting point of that harmless form of caste which has dubbed every man of parts with a title.

With the increase of prosperity this society began to show some effort to supersede the primitive style of clothing, and calico and broadcloth began to be seen more frequently. Little by little the old colonial magnificence appeared at official receptions and other important public occasions. At such times the representative part of the community appeared in a fine cloth or velvet coat, cut "round-breasted," with long or swallow tail, large gilt buttons on both sides, set from collar to waist; the vest, if for winter, was of swan's down; if for summer, white marseilles with small gilt buttons; the lower limbs were clothed in "breeches," made for winter of cloth or velvet, or corduroy, and of nankeen or linen for summer. These reached down from the waist to the knee, where a cloth band, reaching just below that joint, fitted close to the leg, and was ornamented by a silver buckle on the outside seam. A long stocking of worsted for winter, or of silk or home-knit fleece for summer, and held in place by the knee-band instead of a garter, clothed the calf of the leg, while low shoes with silver buckles on the outer slope of the instep clothed the feet. A white and black stock with silver buckle supplied the place of a cravat. The hat was black, of fur or mixture of lamb's wool and fur, with very large brim, and if worn by a person of distinction the brim was cocked with a silver boss. Pantaloons, then called "overalls," were sometimes worn. Boots were equally rare, but when worn they extended to the knee and had a scallop in front, from the center of which a silk tassel some three inches long was suspended. These were known as "fair-tops," being made of a nice piece of fair leather. Nearly all who could wore a queue. The back hair was suffered to grow long; this was bound round with blue or pink ribbon with a double bow-knot; and if the hair was not long enough, false hair was nicely spliced to the stub, which was thus sometimes extended to the waist. The dress of the ladies in the same social circle was somewhat less elaborate. A few silk gowns, or of bombazet or gingham, the latter often homespun, with what was then called a "spencer," constituted the indoor dress. Ladies' hats or bonnets were of straw or silk, moderately trimmed. The gown was worn short, below which a neat pair of morocco shoes with buckles and fine silk or thread stockings were revealed. In Louisville, it was said, "There is a circle, small 'tis true, but within whose magic round abounds every pleasure that wealth regulated by taste can bestow. There the 'red-heel' of Versailles may imagine himself in the very emporium of fashion, and, whilst leading beauty through the mazes of the dance, forget that he is in the wilds of America."

The influence of this change upon the common people was very marked. Respectful deference to elders or those in official station became a notable feature of family and school-training, though generally unmixed with anything of servility. "Honor" became a prominent word in the early vocabulary, and the habit of attaching an exaggerated importance to insult, a strong and universal custom. In close correlation with these features was a marked courtesy in ordinary intercourse that approached the verge of gallantry. Friendships were warm and constant; resentments were bitter and revengeful. Unbounded hospitality, which freely offered entertainment to neighbor or stranger, prevailed. Neighborhoods lived, worked, feasted or suffered together in cordial harmony; families intermarried so that every one was the natural ally of each one, ready to espouse his cause in danger, or to congratulate him in success. The limits of neighborhoods extended over a wide area, and a ride of several miles on horseback to pay a friendly visit was an unnoted and frequent occurrence. Nor was this social duty devolved solely upon the women, as in the Northwest. The habits and agricultural system of the new land gave the man a large amount of leisure, which was employed principally in masculine gossip. On coming together, men disposed of each other's business projects and prospects with short shrift and fell to discussing genealogies and politics. The pipe was invariably an "unobtrusive third," the mild influence of which served to keep political talk well within friendly bounds. Short visits were neither desired nor made. The guest for the time was put in full possession of the resources of his host, whose domestic habits experienced scarcely a ripple of interruption by the temporary addition to his household. The entertainment was without ostentation, and the table, though rudely spread with substantial food, was large in its bounty.

At the same time "smart signs of wickedness" began to appear in the popular amusements. A passion for gaming and spirituous liquors seemed to prevail; the taverns became the places of general resort, where drinking bouts commonly ended in the most sanguinary encounters. Horse-racing, dog and cock-fighting, raffling and shooting-matches were the favorite sports whenever the people came together. For many years it was the custom on each Saturday for the justices of the peace in the country around to repair to the nearest village to hold their courts. This brought together a large concourse of litigants, their friends and witnesses, besides those who came simply to see the sports. On this day, work was generally suspended in the country, and in the town the afternoon was usually observed as a holiday by the shop-keepers. The cases before the courts attracted little attention from any, save those directly affected by their decision, and were quickly disposed of, when all joined the throng and engaged in the real business of the hour. The drinking began early in the day, and by afternoon the fun grew fast and furious. The horse-racing and a cock or dog-fight were followed by various athletic contests. By this time the day was far spent, and the disappointed ambitions of the crowd were sufficiently inflamed by the constant drinking to bring on a number of disgraceful fights, which were always a part of the day's excitement. As night fell the crowd dispersed, some dangerously reeling on their horses, and all shouting and yelling like savages. Many were too drunk to get away and might be seen on Sunday seeking their homes after a night's drunken sleep in some secluded corner of the town. These scenes followed in a weekly round, each Saturday providing a programme for the succeeding one. The regular muster of the militia was another occasion on which the whole people gave loose rein to their propensities. Not only the enrolled members, but the whole population attended, when pony-racing, foot-racing, wrestling, fighting and drunkenness were engaged in far more than military movements. It was the favorite resort also of the candidate for political honors, who delighted his half-drunken audience with a speech, of which the most remarkable feature was its ribaldry.

But there was another side to the picture thus presented. While the arts of peace were rapidly removing the rude evidences of frontier life, war still hovered on the border. The provisions of the treaties made between England and the colonies did not include the savages, who still pressed their claims to the Ohio Valley with a pertinacity which even defeat could not abate. But the successful issue of the revolutionary movement none the less powerfully affected the interests of the savages. The re-enforced frontier settlements no longer thought solely of defense, but began to meditate revenge, and instead of a few despairing pioneers the Indians found themselves confronted by the strength which had humbled their more powerful allies.

On the conclusion of peace with the English, the national government set about measures for the pacification of the natives, and as early as May, 1783, congress instructed the secretary of war to take steps to notify the savages of the results of the recent contest, and to bring about a general cessation of hostilities. On October 15, following, the secretary reported the result of his efforts, and expressed the belief "that although the hostile tribes of the Indians in the northern and middle departments are seriously disposed to a pacification, yet they are not in a temper to relinquish their territorial claims without a further struggle." Congress nevertheless determined to hold formal conventions with the various tribes in the hope that by establishing territorial boundaries between the two races "all occasion for future animosities, disquiet and contention" might be avoided. While doubtless sincere in the avowal of this sentiment, this unwieldy body found itself greatly hampered in its action by its limited executive power, as well as by the almost entire absence of anything like national spirit among its members. Though generally agreed upon the object to be achieved, there was no end to the difficulties raised in effecting its accomplishment, and it was not until October, 1784, therefore, that the first of these conferences was held. This occurred with the Iroquois at Fort Stanwix, where, on the 27th instant a treaty was entered into by which the old indefinite claim of this confederacy to the West was finally extinguished. On January 21, 1785, a treaty was made with the warriors of the Wyandot, Delaware, Chippewa and Ottawa nations at Fort McIntosh, by which the southern half of the present state of Ohio was ceded to the whites. In the following November, a treaty of peace and friendship was negotiated with the Cherokees at Hopewell, on the Keowee, in Georgia; with the Choctaws on January 3, 1786; and with the Chickasaws on the 10th of the same month. In the meantime, while congress debated the matter of a convention with the "Pottawatama, Twightwee, Piankeshaw and other western nations" at Vincennes, prompt steps were taken to secure the ceded lands on the Ohio, and in the fall of 1785 Maj. Doughty descended the river and erected Fort Harmar at the mouth of the Muskingum.

Various circumstances concurred to change the original time and place set for the last-named convention, which eventually was held on January 31, 1786, at the mouth of the Big Miami, where Fort Finney, a temporary defense, was erected. A growing spirit of hostility was manifested by the savages. The Wabash tribes refused to attend, influenced by the Shawanese, who subsequently so far reconsidered their own determination as to meet the commissioners. They came in no very amicable spirit, however, and it was probably due to the sagacity of the congressional representatives that so favorable an issue of the convention was reached.

The Indians came into the apartment exhibiting marks of disrespect for the whites. The commissioners, without noticing the disorderly conduct of the other party or appearing to have discovered their meditated treachery, opened the council in due form. They lighted the peace-pipe, and after drawing a few whiffs, passed it to the chiefs, who received it. Gen. Clark then rose to explain the purpose for which the treaty was ordered. With an unembarrassed air, with the tone of one accustomed to command, and an easy assurance of perfect security and self-possession, he stated that the commissioners had been sent to offer peace to the Shawanese; that the president had no wish to continue the war; he had no resentment to gratify; and if the red men desired peace, they could have it on reasonable terms. "If such be the will of the Shawanese," he concluded, "let some of their wise men speak."

A chief arose, drew his tall person to its full height, and assuming a haughty attitude, threw his eye contemptuously over the commissioners and their small retinue, as if to measure their insignificance, in comparison with his own numerous train, and then stalking to the table, threw upon it two belts of wampum of different colors—the war and the peace belt. "We come here," he exclaimed, "to offer you two pieces of wampum; they are of different colors; you know what they mean; you can take which you like," and, turning upon his heel, he resumed his seat.

The chiefs drew themselves up in the consciousness of having hurled defiance in the teeth of the white men. They had offered an insult to the renowned leader of the Long Knives, to which they knew it would be hard to submit, while they did not suppose he dare resent it. The council-pipe was laid aside. Those fierce wild men gazed intently at Clark. The Americans saw that the crisis had arrived; they could no longer doubt that the Indians understood the advantage they possessed, and were disposed to use it, and a common sense of danger caused each eye to be turned on the leading commissioner. He sat undisturbed, and apparently careless, until the chief, who had thrown the belts upon the table, had taken his seat; then with a small cane, which he held in his hand he reached, as if playfully, toward the war-belt, entangled the end of the stick in it, drew it toward him, and then with a switch of the cane threw the belt into the midst of the chiefs. The effect was electric. Every man in the council, of each party, sprang to his feet, the savages with a loud exclamation of astonishment, "Hugh!" the Americans in expectation of a hopeless conflict against overwhelming numbers. Every hand grasped a weapon. Clark alone was unawed. The expression of his countenance changed to a ferocious sternness, and his eye flashed, but otherwise he was unmoved. A bitter smile was perceptible upon his compressed lips, as he gazed upon that savage band, whose hundred eyes were bent fiercely and in horrid exultation upon him, as they stood like a pack of wolves at bay thirsting for blood, and ready to rush upon him whenever one bolder than the rest should commence the attack. It was one of those moments of indecision when the slightest weight thrown into either scale will make it preponderate; a moment in which a bold man, conversant with the springs of human action, may seize upon the minds of all around him and sway them at his will.

Such a man was the intrepid Virginian. He spoke, and there was no man bold enough to gainsay him—none that could return the fierce glance of his eye. Raising his arm and waving his hand toward the door, he exclaimed, "Dogs! You may go!" The Indians hesitated for a moment, and then rushed tumultuously out of the council room.*

The savages subsequently returned and sued for peace, when the Shawanese, with certain of the Wyandots and Delawares, united in a treaty of peace and friendship. The good results of such treaties were not likely to prove long-lived. None of the parties interested, save the general government, seemed to desire peace. "The British agents, our own traders, and the inhabitants of Kentucky, I am convinced, are all opposed to a treaty," wrote Parsons, "and are using every measure to prevent it. Strange as this may seem, I have convincing proofs of its reality." It happened, therefore, that while the "plenipotentiaries" of congress and the various Indian nations on the borders of Kentucky were negotiating treaties of "peace and friendship," the region south of the Ohio was the scene of predatory incursions and reprisals, scarcely less active, though attended with less serious results than before the close of the revolutionary war.

After the close of hostilities in 1783, the savages seem to have observed a kind of armed neutrality. Surveyors in the uninhabited region north of the Licking found "fresh sign" of Indians, and realizing the unsettled state of affairs prudently withdrew. In other sections similar indications of the presence of savages were found, and now and then small straggling bands were met. On such occasions, the natives were found sometimes rude and predatory in their behavior, at other times only suspicious, but at all times sullen and distrustful, though offering no violence. The whites were in scarcely better temper, though many, desiring to avoid a renewal of the bloody experience of an Indian war, exerted themselves to cultivate friendly relations with these roving foresters. Mainly through such efforts, the natives were led to frequent the settlements and engage in an interchange of good offices, which promised to solve the perplexing problem of Indian affairs. Unhappily at this juncture a visiting native was lured into the forest and murdered by a vindictive settler. Some attempt was made to prosecute the murderer, but so powerful was the public prejudice that the attempt utterly failed.

The effect upon the savages was widespread and instantaneous. Their worst suspicions seemed confirmed, and the fact that the British had not yielded possession of the northern posts gave rise to a belief that the Americans had deceived them as to the actual issue of the war, a belief that was fortified by the representations of the traders and agents of the English. All friendly intercourse between the races was summarily ended, and old-time depredations were renewed. The southern tribes were the first to proceed to hostilities, and in the spring of 1784 emphasized the changed relations by stealing horses from the settlers in Lincoln County. Several encounters occurred in the course of the year, in which a number of the savages were killed, and in the fall such were the alarming rumors in regard to the Cherokees that Col. Logan called a convention of the leading people to concert measures to avert the danger. The rumor proved greatly exaggerated, and no action was taken by the assembled whites.

These minor depredations were continued, but in March, 1785, they were unpleasantly varied by an attack upon a new settlement at the mouth of the Kentucky by the Shawanese; Elliot was killed and scalped, his cabin burned and his family dispersed. Other evidences of the more determined character of the hostilities to be expected were observed from time to time, but no further murders are noted until October, when some of the southern warriors appeared on the Wilderness Road, and attacked emigrants on their way to Kentucky settlements. McClure's company was assaulted one night while in camp near the head of Scagg's Creek; six were killed and scalped, and the rest dispersed. Mrs. McClure gained the underbrush with her four children, and would have escaped with three of them, had she been willing to abandon the fourth, an infant in her arms. This one by its cries discovered her retreat, and the savages coming upon her cruelly murdered the three children, and took mother and babe captives.

*"Wilderness and War-path" by Judge Hall, in Wiley and Putnam's Library. By some writers, the leading role in this transaction is assigned to Gen. Richard Butler, who, with R. H. Parsons, was associated with Clark as commissioner. The intensely dramatic character of the interview is considered by others to be largely the product of Mr. Hall's fertile imagination. (See Annals of the West, note p. 278.)

The news of the outrage was quickly brought to Whitley's Station, but the captain being absent, his wife promptly dispatched a messenger for him, and in the meantime summoned his company of twenty-one men. Hastily returning, Whitley found his men fully equipped for an expedition, awaiting him. Believing the savages would at once take the war-road toward their villages, the rescuing party directed their course to intercept the enemy's retreat. Fortunately for the success of this plan, the Indians delayed to divide their plunder, and the whites had just time enough to form an ambuscade, when the war-party came up. Two of the warriors were instantly killed and two wounded. The rest dispersed, leaving Mrs. McClure, her child, a negro woman and the six scalps in the hands of the rescuers. Ten days later, a Mr. Moore and his party of emigrants were attacked near Raccoon Creek, on the same road, when nine of the company were killed and the rest scattered. Whitley was again notified, who, after five days' scout, came upon the hostile band, and inflicted a severe punishment on them. Three of them were killed, and a rich booty, consisting of twenty-eight horses, £50 in coin, and a quantity of household goods, was taken. In November two men were killed on Rolling Fork, of Salt River.

The inconclusive result which attended the meeting of the convention called by Col. Logan, in 1784, was occasioned more by the discovery that it lacked the authority to organize an expedition than by the conviction that such a measure was unnecessary. Here it dawned upon the frontiersmen, who had hitherto known no law save that of necessity, that the issue of the war had changed their relations to the natives, and that what had been permitted when the whole nation was engaged in a doubtful struggle for existence, in justice to the general weal, could no longer be allowed. Indian affairs had now become the care of the general government alone, by which the tribes were considered as independent nations with whom peace or war could be concluded only by its authority. Thus, with national independence came its responsibilities, and instead of prompt reprisal the Kentuckians found themselves obliged to employ official circumlocution—to prefer their complaints to the governor, by whom they were referred to congress for redress. This obviously did not prevent a defense of their homes and property, or the infliction of such punishment as was possible without an invasion of the territory secured by treaty to the several tribes, but the experience of former years had demonstrated that the only practicable defense of the frontier lay in such an invasion, and it was, therefore, with the greatest reluctance that the hardy woodsmen acquiesced in the new order of things.

As the depredations increased, the forbearance of the settlers diminished, and in the spring of 1786, after suffering repeated losses by the Indians, the inhabitants on the Blue Grass determined to undertake their own redress. In April, the savages made a successful raid after horses, and as usual effected their escape across the river. A party of settlers was immediately organized under the command of Col. William Christian, who had settled here in the previous year, and the thieves rapidly followed. A part of the predatory band was overtaken some twenty miles within the limits of their territory, and when brought to bay made a stubborn resistance. In numbers each party suffered an equal loss, two falling on either side; but one of the whites was Col. Christian, a man that the growing State could ill afford to lose.*

Such action was undoubtedly without legal sanction, and can be justified only by a consideration of the undisciplined state of society, and the great provocation offered by the savages. At the same time the settlers did not fail to make urgent complaint to the governor, who promptly presented their case to the general government, but in the nature of the circumstances these complaints assigned the authorship of these troubles with such indefiniteness that congress, slow to move at best, found it difficult to act intelligently. A communication of the governor on May 16, 1786, however, elicited the prompt action of the government. Two companies of troops were sent to Louisville, and on June 30, the organization of the Kentucky militia for an expedition into the country of the mischief-makers, under the command of the leading government officer, was authorized. The expedition thus suggested does not seem to have been ordered by the national authorities, but while congress delayed, the governor appears to have given some general instructions to the Kentucky officials "to adopt the necessary means of defense." Under such authority, the county-lieutenants were convened, and the question whether the act of congress referred to empowered them to impress men and materials for an expedition, was submitted to the legal officers of the district.

On the receipt of a favorable reply, the assembled officers promptly decided upon a campaign against the tribes on the Wabash. Gen. Clark was chosen for the chief command, and such was the general enthusiasm, that 1,000 men were quickly equipped and assembled at Louisville. Vincennes was selected as the base of operations, and thither the supplies for the army were shipped in nine keel-boats. The troops proceeded by land, and reached their destination some time in September, but the provisions and ammunition being delayed by the low water in the Wabash, it was decided, much against Clark's wish, to await the arrival of the boats. Nine days were thus consumed in inactivity, and with the most disastrous consequences. The scanty supplies at hand had daily diminished; the troops began to manifest a restless, discontented spirit; and a rumor prevailed that a messenger dispatched by the general to offer peace or war to the savages had cut off the last hope of surprising the enemy. To these disheartening conditions was added a lamentable want of harmony among the officers, and a growing lack of confidence in the commanding general. In his retirement after the revolutionary war, Clark had contracted a serious habit of intoxication, and, overruled in his desire for prompt action by the majority of his subordinate officers, he sought relief from his vexation in drinking, and even appeared in camp completely under the influence of whisky. Seizing upon this fact, some of his lieutenants, acting, it is charged, from motives of jealousy, encouraged the growing feeling of general discontent.

It was under such circumstances that the troops were at length put in motion to achieve the design of the campaign. Each hour rendered the disintegrating influences more potent, and when only about two days' march from the Indian town, 300 men refused to proceed further, and, turning their backs upon their comrades, took up their march homeward. The most earnest entrea-

*William Christian was born in Augusta County, Va.; was educated at Staunton; and when a young man, commanded a company in Col. Bird's regiment, which served on the southwestern frontier in the early part of the French and Indian war. In this service he proved a brave and skillful partisan, and on the return of peace, retired to his private pursuits with a widespread reputation for ability. He subsequently married a sister of Patrick Henry, and settled in Botetourt County, where he was made colonel of militia. In the Dunmore war he again took the field at the head of 300 men, reaching Point Pleasant on the day following the great battle which was fought here on October 10, 1774.

In the following year he was a member of the general State convention, and in 1776 was appointed second in command of the First Virginia Regiment. The resignation of the colonel in the same year occasioned the promotion of Mr. Christian to the first place, when he was ordered with a force of 1,200 men to quell the Cherokee outbreak. This he achieved with singular ability and good fortune, and returned to find ample demand for his services in counteracting the machinations of the tories. For this purpose he resigned his commission in the line, and served in command of the militia of his county. He was thus engaged during the war and rendered signal service to the patriotic cause, exhibiting the highest executive ability and good judgment in dealing with the difficult questions which the complicated state of society presented. He subsequently represented his county in the State assembly for several years, when, in 1785, he cast in his fortunes with those of Kentucky. His reputation had preceded him here, and he was at once advanced to the place in public esteem left vacant by the death of Col. Floyd. As the discussion of a separation from Virginia progressed, Col. Christian's ability made him a conspicuous candidate in the hearts of the people for the first governor of the projected State, but all such anticipations were summarily ended by his sudden death, which was learned with universal regret.

ties failed to shake their purpose, and after a somewhat disorderly council, and notwithstanding that sufficient remained to promise the success of the enterprise, the whole force was ordered to follow. On reaching Vincennes the greater part of the troops broke into small parties, each of which sought its own course homeward, ending the campaign in disgrace, for which none were wholly free from responsibility. The public censure, however, fell with greatest severity upon the commanding officer, of whom it was written at this time with too much truth: "The sun of Gen. Clark's military glory has set, never more to rise."

Logan set out with his expedition, but in crossing the river it was decided in council that he should return to Kentucky and organize a new force to be directed against the Shawanese, whose attention, it was thought, would be drawn toward the earlier movement, and would, therefore, be unprepared for nearer hostilities. This Col. Logan promptly accomplished. Seven hundred men were enlisted and rendezvoused at Washington, from whence the second expedition, commanded by Logan and guided by Kenton, at the head of his own company of scouts, proceeded by a rapid and direct march to the Mackacheek and Pickaway towns. The Indians were completely surprised, and the country east and west for 100 miles visited with terrible destruction. Four towns, with all their standing crops, were destroyed; about twenty warriors were killed, and a number of women and children taken prisoners, at a total loss to the whites of only ten men killed or wounded. But while the whites were thus exerting their power against the northern and western tribes, the savages still harried the southern border. Here, in October, 1786, the Indians made a night attack on McKnitt's company of emigrants, as they lay encamped between the Big and Little Laurel Rivers, killing twenty-one, and dispersing or taking the rest prisoners. In December, they made another night attack upon a party of whites at the mouth of Buck Creek, on the Cumberland, killing one man and putting the rest to flight. Thus the year, which was marked in its opening months by the successful negotiation of treaties with the various Indian tribes, closed amid the discordant cries and angry clash of the embattled races.

The year of 1787 witnessed the renewal of warlike activities on all sides, with all their old-time barbarities. The invasion of the Shawanese country served only to exasperate that fierce and vindictive nation, and during the succeeding winter and spring they engaged in such active hostilities as to keep the whole country bordering on the Ohio, in a constant state of alarm. In the counties of Mason and Bourbon the settlers were again compelled to resort to stations for protection; labor in the fields and intercourse between settlements were interrupted or carried on under a strong guard, and the system of scouts and rangers, adopted only in times of great danger, was again established. The great increase in the number of settlers forbade the savages to hope for success in a bold attack upon the forts, and their vigilance rendered it impossible for large bands to safely penetrate far into the interior. The hostility of the natives, therefore, found expression chiefly in predatory raids, though attacks were not wanting, which evinced their prowess, and inspired the frontier with terror. Unwary settlers were everywhere picked off by the keen-sighted enemy, and on one occasion the savages descended upon the well-traveled road from Limestone to Lexington, capturing a wagon and teamster. In December a small detached station at Drennon's Lick was captured, and two men killed, but with these exceptions the great complaint was the loss of horses. In stealing these animals, the savages displayed a dexterity which threatened to exhaust the whole supply on the border.

At first it was the custom for one or two Indians to secretly make their way into a settlement at night, secure a horse for each one, and retire to their villages unobserved; but as they became more proficient in their operations, they improved upon the original plan. The parties were then increased from six to a dozen warriors, who selected some retired rendezvous on the south side of the river, to which they brought their booty. Leaving their first captures in care of a guard, the rest would again disperse to bring other animals until fifteen or twenty were collected, when they would secretly take them across the Ohio, and thence to their towns. In this way it was no unusual thing for each savage to bring a horse to the rendezvous every night. It consequently often happened that a predatory party would set out from their villages, traverse the more than 100 miles to the settlements, and return in fifteen or twenty days with as many horses, while, such was the extent of these depredations, a single county in Kentucky often lost 100 of these animals in a single month.

Such wholesale depredations were calculated to exasperate the settlers and lead them to ignore the formalities imposed by existing treaties. Reprisals promptly followed. Early in the year Luttrell was killed on Fishing Creek by the Indians. Logan at once collected a party of settlers, repaired to the scene of murder, fell on a trail and pursued it across the Cumberland, where he came upon an Indian band. He attacked them without parley, killed several, and dispersed the rest, returning in triumph with the furs and skins found in the camp. A little later Kenton, who had been active in waylaying the marauders from the north, solicited the aid of Col. Robert Todd, of Fayette County, in making an expedition into the Paint Creek country. This appeal called forth a prompt response, and a formidable force penetrated the Indian territory to Chillicothe, burning the town and ravaging the country for miles around. The enemy made no resistance, and suffered a loss of three killed and seven taken prisoners, who were so carelessly guarded, however, that they made their escape before the expedition recrossed the river. In June Maj. Oldham crossed the Ohio River with a scouting party, and made his way to the Wabash, but without meeting any of the enemy.

These expeditions served little better purpose than to infuriate the Indians, and the depredations of the succeeding year (1788) were marked by greater frequency and audacity. The progress of the settlements north of the river contributed to the same result. The different States claiming territory in the region northwest of the Ohio having relinquished their pretensions, congress, on July 13, 1787, formulated an ordinance for its government; on the 27th instant Dr. Cutler and his associates had secured a grant of 3,500,000 acres on the Ohio and Scioto, extending eastward; in October St. Clair had been appointed governor, and 700 troops* ordered for the defense of the region, and to prevent the unauthorized intrusion of the whites. In the succeeding winter the Ohio Company's surveyors and pioneers had reached the Youghiogheny, and on the 7th of April reached the mouth of the Muskingum, where the foundation of Marietta was laid. Here subsequent arrivals were more rapid than convenient covering could be provided, though houses were being constantly erected, and by the middle of December fifteen ladies, as well accomplished in the manners of polite circles as were to be seen in the older States, graced the first ball.

Such progress in the settlements of the whites might well challenge the attention of the savages, who, notwithstanding the recent treaties, still claimed the region north of the Ohio. Alarmed by the danger which thus threatened all alike, and exasperated by inconclusive expeditions, the tribes generally united to resist the new encroachments. While the northern Indians were thus harassing the border settlements with redoubled effort, the southern tribes maintained their hostilities with unabated vigor, and scarcely a month passed without its list of brutal murders and exasperating thefts. "In Kentucky," wrote Symmes, "a man a week falls by their hands," while on the river the increasing travel felt their vindictive power with scarcely less effect. An incautious landing was almost certain destruction, while skillful decoys, narrow passages and accidents of navigation all served the murderous purpose of the relentless enemy. Emigrants soon learned to make the voyage in fleets, and were thus comparatively secure, but single boats, or the unshielded person of a passenger seldom escaped some permanent memorial of the sleepless enmity of the savages.

*These troops were stationed at Venango, Fort Pitt, Fort McIntosh, on the Muskingum, on the Miami, at Vincennes and Louisville

Despite these hostilities the settlements on both sides of the river continued to increase. Late in the fall, and in the succeeding winter, Symmes having secured his grant on the Miamis, the settlements of Columbia and Losantiville were established, which, contrary to expectation, were allowed by the savages, not only without molestation, but with expressions of good will and friendship. This change of sentiment did not extend to the settlements south of the river, however.

The hostile incursions into the Kentucky settlements in 1789 commenced early in March, and were continued occasionally until May, when they became frequent and alarming. These parties consisted chiefly of warriors from the towns upon the sources of the Little Miami and of branches flowing into the Scioto and Great Miami, and the field of their operations was the whole range of settlements near the Ohio, from Fort Harmar to the mouth of Salt River.

From the first of May to the first of August, there had been thirteen persons killed and ten wounded by the Indians in the county of Jefferson, beside twenty horses stolen. In the county of Nelson, two persons had been killed and two wounded, beside twenty horses stolen. In Lincoln County, two persons had been killed and two wounded, and twenty-five horses stolen. In Madison County, one person had been killed and three wounded, and ten horses stolen. In Bourbon County, two persons had been wounded, and fifteen horses stolen. In Mason County, two persons had been killed and forty-one horses stolen. In Woodford County, one boy had been killed, and several horses stolen. Many other harassing depredations of less note had been perpetrated by lurking parties of savages, so that the whole frontier region within thirty miles of the Ohio was kept in a state of continual alarm and apprehension. Parties of Indians often penetrated unperceived into the heart of Kentucky, at least fifty or sixty miles from the Ohio. In Woodford County, on the 10th of August, two men were fired upon by a party of Indians, but escaped with the loss of one horse, saddle and bridle. On the night succeeding, the same party stole eleven horses in that vicinity. A party of men set out next day in pursuit of the Indians, and, having overtaken them, killed two of them, and recovered most of the horses. On the 16th of August, a party of Indians in ambuscade captured six negroes. Having retreated half a mile with the captives, and fearing pursuit, they tomahawked four of them, and the other two escaped. Two of these, who were left for dead, finally recovered. The same party on the following night stole a number of horses, with which they fled across the Ohio. Next day a party of forty men, under Lieut. Robert Johnson, set out in pursuit and followed them to the Ohio River, about twenty-five miles below the mouth of the Great Miami. Here part of the company returned, but twenty-six of them volunteered to cross the river, and continue the pursuit. Having followed their trail about twelve miles further, they came upon the Indians, encamped at a salt lick. By a vigorous and unexpected attack, in two divisions, the Indians were at length routed, and forty horses recovered. Lieut. Johnson lost two men killed and three wounded. Other parties of Indians had penetrated the settlements, and served to keep up alarm and apprehension among the frontier people; and occasional murders and depredations were continued, with but little intermission, until checked by the severity of winter. In December the Indians killed three men within twelve miles of Danville, at "Carpenter's Station," and five others on Russell's Creek, besides some who were wounded and escaped.*

Early in January, 1789, new treaties were negotiated by the general government with the Iroquois, confirming the treaty of 1784 at Fort Stanwix; and with the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pottawatomies and Sacs, confirming and extending the treaty of Fort McIntosh, but these still left the cause of hostilities unsettled. So far as the Iroquois, Wyandots, Delawares and Shawanese were concerned, the transfers of territory thus effected were not disputed. But some time previous to 1787, a confederation of the other tribes of the northwest had been formed, which resolutely refused to acknowledge the act of certain of their tribes that were represented in the last named treaty. Of this fact they informed St. Clair, and demanded that the Ohio River be made the perpetual boundary between the white and red man. In spite of these representations, however, the settlements increased on the northern bank of the Ohio, and in June, 1789, Maj. Doughty, with 140 men, came to the site of Cincinnati and began the construction of Fort Washington, which, in the following December was further strengthened by the arrival of Gen. Harmar with 300 more troops.

Notwithstanding this show of power, the hostile tribes continued their hostilities with the results noted, and opened the succeeding year (1790) with even more vigorous and extended effort to beat back the invaders than before. Again the vast numbers on the river attracted the vindictive rage of the savages, which fell with cruel effect upon inexperienced men, women and children, who were hastening to the inviting regions of the Ohio Valley. In January a boat containing ten persons was captured within sixteen miles of Limestone, and all murdered, save one woman, who was taken captive. In March a band of fifty Shawanese and Cherokees gathered at the mouth of the Scioto, and for several weeks almost blockaded the river. With white prisoners, whom they compelled to decoy boats to their relief, they deceived and captured a number of vessels, the crews of which fell an easy prey. Such as escaped this device suffered more or less from the rifles discharged from the banks. On the 20th of March they decoyed the boat of John May to the shore and captured it, killing May and a young woman, and taking the rest prisoners. On the following day an open pirogue with six men was fired upon and every one on board killed. In the latter part of the month a party of Wabash Indians captured a boat ladened with salt, at the mouth of Salt River, and killed the three men in charge.

*History of Mississippi Valley, by John W. Monette, New York, 1846, Vol. II, pp. 158, 159.

Nor were the settlements forgotten. In March, Indians captured and carried off three persons from Brashear's Creek, near Louisville, and a few days later killed two men working in a field in the same vicinity. Earlier in the month two men were killed, and a woman and five children taken captive in Kennedy's Bottom, twenty-five miles above Limestone.

The month of April was signalized by the remarkable audacity and success of Indian attacks. On the 2d instant several family boats were attacked near Kennedy's Bottom. One man was killed, and the rest of the company, abandoning one boat and its contents to the enemy, united their force, and after a chase of two hours, succeeded in effecting their escape with the others. On the 4th, after failing in their attempts to decoy three family boats, the savages manned a captured barge with thirty warriors, and set out in vigorous pursuit. To preserve the lives of the non-combatants, two boats were abandoned and their crews transferred to the other barge, which, with oars double-manned, succeeded in escaping, after a vigorous pursuit of fifteen miles. The boats lost in this encounter contained twenty-eight horses, and dry goods, besides household furniture, to the value of nearly $5,000. On Sunday, the 18th, a company of defenseless women and children, returning from church service at Hartford to a station on Rough Creek, were attacked by Indians, a boy and girl killed and scalped, an old woman tomahawked and scalped alive, and her daughter carried off captive.

On the 11th of May, a barge, containing a company of sixteen persons, including an officer and eight soldiers of the regular service, was captured by twenty warriors. Five of the captives were barbarously murdered, three escaped, and the rest were carried away. Soon after two boys out hunting near Loudon Station, on the head-waters of Drennon's Lick Creek, were captured. On the 23d a collection of men, women and children, returning home from a sermon on Beargrass Creek, were fired on by the savages, one man killed and a woman made captive. On being pursued, soon after, the captors tomahawked the woman and escaped unpunished. In June, of two spies, sent to reconnoiter toward the Ohio, one was killed near the Big Bone Lick. On the 19th, one man was killed and scalped, and another wounded, at Baker's Station. On the 26th, at Morgan's Station, nine men were attacked and three of them wounded, one of them mortally. On the same day, a family boat, guarded by three men, was attacked near Three Islands, in the Ohio. There were sixteen of the Indians in four bark canoes. These approached the whites, boarded the boat in spite of their resistance, and took all on board prisoners.

Such effective hostilities on the part of the savages could not fail to call forth the most vigorous reprisals on the part of the Kentuckians, and, notwithstanding the peace policy of the general government greatly hampered their movements, volunteer expeditions, carried on by individual enterprise and at individual expense, were constantly in motion along all the borders of Kentucky. Detachments were occasionally sent out from Forts Harmar and Washington to break up hostile camps in their near vicinity, but all these efforts did little more than to incite the unsubdued savages to more energetic action. In April, Gen. Scott, who had settled in Kentucky in 1786, led a body of 230 volunteers across the river at Limestone to chastise the marauders, who carried on their depredations from the mouth of the Scioto, but the expedition found the Indian camp abandoned, and effected nothing more serious than the killing of four of the enemy. This force was re-enforced by 100 regulars from Fort Harmar, but, in the main, in spite of this openly hostile attitude of the savages, the general government persisted in its policy of ignoring the state of war which actually existed, and from 1783 to 1790, exerted its influence to secure a peaceful solution of the trouble through treaties.

On the failure of the Wabash campaign in 1786, Clark had taken position at Vincennes with such troops as he could induce to remain, and, upon his own authority, attempted to negotiate with the neighboring tribes. This action was disallowed by the Virginian authorities, who recommended congress to appoint commissioners to conduct the negotiations. The suggestion reached congress too late for action in this matter, but in October (1787) action was taken to secure a conference with the savages early in 1788, and Gov. St. Clair was instructed accordingly. It was not until January 9, 1789, however, that anything was accomplished, when the futile treaties at Fort Harmar were negotiated. In pursuance of the general policy, and in order to reduce the exasperating conflicts between the Indians and Kentuckians, the president directed the governor of Virginia to discharge the scouts and rangers heretofore employed in the counties of Kentucky at public expense. This order was received (July, 1789,) by the settlers on the exposed frontier with earnest protests from the leading men, and with practical refusal to obey it from the people.

There was little difference of opinion as to the character and necessities of the situation among those who were in a position to know the facts, and their oft-repeated representations gradually led the general government to adopt a less forbearing policy. As early as September 29, 1789, congress had empowered the president to call out the militia and he, on October 6, had authorized the territorial governor to draw 1,500 men from the western counties of Pennsylvania and Virginia, if absolutely necessary, but added instructions which required delay and further parley. Late in the same month, the Virginia legislature recognized the good intentions of the president, called his attention to the continued hostilities, and urged the adoption of aggressive measures. The Kentuckians supported this action of the legislature by numerous addresses, to one of which the president replied, on December 15, that measures for the defense of the frontier would certainly be taken, and a few days later, brought to the attention of congress a letter of Gov. St. Clair, in which he represented the nature of the Indian depredations;* that the Kentuckians constantly traversed his territory in pursuit of the enemy, whom he was enabled to chastise; and recommending active measures against the savages. Accordingly, while the last means to avoid a war were being employed, the secretary of war wrote (April 13, 1790,) Judge Innes, that the president wished to extend to Kentucky the benefits of certain regulations adopted for the defense of the frontier, and empowered him to authorize the county lieutenants to call out the scouts in cases of emergency.

On the 1st or 2d of January, 1790, Gov. St. Clair reached Losantiville, the name of which he changed to Cincinnati, in honor of the military society bearing that name, and

*The results of the partisan war, which had prevailed since 1783, were indeed startling, when summed up. In a calm presentation of the subject, it was stated upon personal knowledge that in the period referred to—1783 to 1790—1,500 persons had been killed or captured in Kentucky; 20,000 horses had been taken from immigrants or settlements, and household goods and other property stolen or destroyed to the value of $50,000. (See American State Papers, Vol. V, p. 88.)

on the 8th instant reached Fort Steuben, on the site of Jeffersonville, from whence he set off for Kaskaskia. On the 5th of April, under instructions of the governor, the commandant at Vincennes sent Anthony Gamelin on a mission to the hostile Indians to learn their real sentiments. He first approached the Wabash tribes, the Piankeshaws, the Kickapoos and Weas, by whom he was severally referred to their elder brethren, the Miamis. Accordingly the envoy proceeded to the villages of the Miamis, who were closely associated with the Shawanese and Delawares. This point was reached on the 23d of the month, and on the following day negotiations were opened with the representatives of the three nations. Several days were consumed in inconclusive talks, the Indians wishing to confer with the neighboring and lake tribes, as well as the English commandant at Detroit, before rendering a final answer. This the instructions of the envoy did not permit, but on the 29th instant, the sentiment of the Indians was conveyed to him in a private manner, of which he makes record in his journal as follows:

In the evening, Blue Jacket, chief of the Shawanese, having taken me to supper with him, told me, in a private manner, that the Shawanese nation was in doubt of the sincerity of the Big Knives, so called, having been already deceived by them. That they had first destroyed their lands, put out their fires, and sent away their young men, being a hunting without a mouthful of meat; also, had taken away their women; wherefore, many of them would with a great deal of pain, forget these affronts. Moreover that some other nations were apprehending that offers of peace would, may be, tend to take away, by degrees, their lands; and would serve them as they did before; a certain proof that they intended to encroach on our lands, is their new settlement on the Ohio. If they don't keep this side (of the Ohio) clear, it will never be a proper reconcilement with the nations Shawanese, Iroquois, Wyandots, and perhaps many others. Le Gris, chief of the Miamis, asked me, in private discourse, what chief had made a treaty with the Americans at Muskingum (Fort Harmar). I answered him that their names were mentioned in the treaty. He told me he had heard of it some time ago; but they are not chiefs, neither delegates, who made that treaty; they are only young men, who, without authority and instructions from their chiefs, have concluded that treaty, which will not be approved. They went to the treaty clandestinely, and they intend to make mention of it in the next council to be held.*

With this Gamelin was forced to be satisfied, and on the 8th of May, returned to Vincennes. Three days later, traders from the Upper Wabash arrived at the same place, bringing the news that the northern Indians had joined the Wabash tribes, and that three days after Gamelin's departure, an American captive had been burned in their village. War was thus seen to be inevitable, and St. Clair hastened to return to Fort Washington, in order to concert offensive measures with Gen. Harmar. The governor reached his destination on the 13th of July, and two days later called upon Virginia for 1,000 men, and on Pennsylvania for 500 more. A double campaign was planned, one movement to be conducted against the Wabash tribes, for which 300 of the militia were ordered to repair to Fort Steuben, to act in concert with the troops from Fort Knox, at Vincennes. The other was to be directed against the villages at the junction of the St. Mary and St. Joseph Rivers, for which 700 of the militia were to gather at Fort Washington, and 500 just below Wheeling, to act in conjunction with a body of regulars, under Harmar, from Fort Washington.

Under the call for troops, the quota for that portion of the district of Kentucky included within the counties of Nelson, Lincoln and Jefferson was fixed at 300 men, to rendezvous at Fort Steuben on the 12th of September, and of that within the counties of Madison, Mercer, Fayette, Bourbon, Woodford and Mason, the quota was fixed at 700 men, to rendezvous at Fort Washington, on the 15th of September. There was a strong and widespread aversion, on the part of the frontier militia, to serve with the regulars, or under the command of their officers, and the troops which responded to the call of St. Clair, were totally unlike those who had hitherto afforded such exalted evidence of the prowess of the frontiersmen.

They were ill-equipped, being almost destitute of camp-kettles and axes; nor could a supply of these essential articles be procured. Their arms were generally very bad, and unfit for service; as I was the commanding officer of the artillery, they came under my inspection, in making what repairs the time would permit; and as a specimen of their badness, I would inform the court, that a rifle was brought to be repaired without a lock, and another without a stock. I often asked the owners what induced them to think that those guns could be repaired at that time? And they gave me for an answer that they were told in Kentucky that all repairs would be made at Fort Washington. Many of the officers told me that they had no idea of there being half the number of bad arms in the whole district of Kentucky as were then in the hands of their men. As soon as the principal part of the Kentucky militia arrived, the general began to organize them; in this he had many difficulties to encounter. Col. Trotter aspired to the command although Col. Hardin was the eldest officer, and in this he was encouraged both by men and officers, who openly declared unless Col. Trotter commanded them they would return home. After two or three days the business was settled, and they (i. e. the Kentucky men) were formed into three battalions under the command of Col. Trotter, and Col. Hardin had the command of all the militia (both Pennsylvania and Virginia). As soon as they were arranged, they were mustered, crossed the Ohio, and on the twenty-sixth marched and encamped about ten miles from Fort Washington. The last of the Pennsylvania militia arrived on the twenty-fifth of September. They were equipped nearly as the Kentucky, but were worse armed; several were without any. The general ordered all the arms in store to be delivered to those who had none and those whose guns could not be repaired. Amongst the militia were a great many hardly able to bear arms, such as old, infirm men, and young boys; they were not such as might be expected from a frontier country, viz.: the smart active woodsmen, well accustomed to arms, eager and alert to revenge the injuries done them and their connections. No, there were a great number of them substitutes, who probably had never fired a gun. Maj. Paul, of Pennsylvania, told me, that many of his men were so awkward, that they could not take their gun-locks off to oil them and put them on again, nor could they put in their flints, so as to be useful; and even of such material, the numbers came far short of what was ordered, as may be seen by the returns.*

*American State Papers, Vol. V, p. 93.

Thus constituted and organized, the expedition set forth on the 4th of October. The route followed was the "old war-path," which led across the head-waters of the Little Miami and Mad Rivers to Piqua, and thence in a westerly direction to a few miles below the mouth of Loramie's Creek. From this point the line of march lay a little west of north on the west side of the creek for about thirty miles, when, crossing the head-waters of the St. Mary's, it led up to its junction with the St. Joseph's, where were located the principal villages of the Miamis. At Loramie's Creek, the first Indians were seen, three warriors, who were evidently watching the movements of the army. They were instantly pursued and one of them captured. From information thus derived, it was determined on the 13th of October, when about thirty-five miles from the village, to send a strong detachment forward to hold the savages in their defenses until the rest of the army with the artillery could be brought up. Accordingly, Col. Hardin and Maj. Paul were detailed in command of 600 men for this duty. On the 14th, the detachment set forward, and about 3 o'clock on the next day reached the villages, which they found deserted. Here the advance remained inactive until the approach of the main army on the 17th, when the work of destruction was begun. In four days the main village and four others and 20,000 bushels of corn were destroyed.

Gen. Harmar's instructions provided that, in case of success at this point, the expedition should be directed against the Indian villages on the Wabash, and on finding the enemy gone, it was the General's intention to proceed westward at once. This movement was frustrated, however, by the carelessness of the militia, who, regardless of the success of the movement, allowed the savages to easily capture the pack-horses, for which the owners,

*Maj. Ferguson's evidence before court of inquiry. See American State Papers, Vol. XII, p. 20. In the same volume, page 24, is found an account of the organization and advance of the army as follows: The Kentuckians composed three battalions, under Majs. Hall, McMullen and Ray, with Lieut.-Col. Commandant Trotter at their head. The Pennsylvanians were formed into one battalion, under Lieut.-Col. Trubly and Maj. Paul, the whole to be commanded by Col. John Hardin, subject to the orders of Gen. Harmar. The 30th, the General having got forward all the supplies that he expected, moved out with the Federal troops, formed into two small battalions, under the immediate command of Maj. Wyllys and Maj. Doughty, together with Capt. Ferguson's company of artillery and three pieces of ordnance. On the 3d of October, Gen. Harmar joined the advance troops early in the morning; the remaining part of the day was spent in forming the line of march, the order of encampment and battle, and explaining the same to the militia field officers. Gen. Harmar's orders will show the several formations. On the 4th, the army took up the order of march as is described in the orders: On the 5th, a re-enforcement of horsemen and mounted infantry joined from Kentucky. The dragoons were formed into two troops; the mounted riflemen made a company, and this small battalion of light troops was put under command of Maj. Fontaine. The whole of Gen. Harmar's command may be stated thus:

3 battalions of Kentucky militia 1 battalion Pennsylvania militia	1133
1 battalion light troops mounted militia 2 battalions Federal troops	320
Total	1453

after demanding pay for their use, promptly asked reimbursement for their loss. The proposed attack upon the Wabash villages was therefore given up, and the traces of women and children having been discovered, Col. Trotter was dispatched with 300 men, on the 18th, to develop the hiding-place of the enemy. The conduct of this officer was very unsatisfactory. A small force of the enemy was found, but such was the lack of discipline and soldierly bearing of both officers and men, that nothing was accomplished. Dissatisfied with the inconclusive result, Hardin assumed the command on the following day, and at an early hour came upon a determined detachment of the enemy. Here the unsoldierly conduct of Hardin precipitated a sad defeat. When informed of the evidence which betokened the presence of a watchful enemy, he declared they would not fight, and failed to adopt any military precautions. He was, therefore, riding in front of his troops when the Indians opened a sharp fire upon the troops, forcing him to make a quick retreat, in which he was followed by most of his followers. Nine of the militia and twenty-four of the regulars stood fast, and were instantly killed. Armstrong, who was in command of the detachment thus immolated, threw himself into a thicket, where for "three hours in daylight" he remained, according to Marshall, sunk in a swamp, "up to his neck in mud and water within 100 yards of the horrid scene." He subsequently escaped, and gave the following opinion of the causes of the defeat. "During that time," he says, "I had an opportunity of seeing the enemy pass and repass, and conceived their numbers did not amount to 100 men; some were mounted, others armed with rifles, and the advance, with tomahawks only. I am of opinion that had Col. Trotter proceeded, on the 18th, agreeably to his orders, having killed the enemy's sentinels, he would have surprised their camp and with ease defeated them; or had Col. Hardin arranged his troops, or made any military disposition, on the 19th, that he would have gained a victory. Our defeat I therefore ascribe to two causes: the unofficer-like conduct of Col. Hardin (who I believe was a brave man) and the cowardly behavior of the militia; many of them threw down their arms loaded, and I believe that none except the party under my command fired a gun.*

With an army on the verge of insubordination, its councils distracted by the jealous rivalry of officers, and the whole organization utterly lacking in discipline and equipment, such a defeat was calculated to hurry the retreat of the most determined general, and on the 21st instant the expedition began its retrograde movement toward Fort Washington. But Hardin, uneasy under his defeat, strongly urged Harmar to permit him to return that night to the destroyed villages and inflict punishment upon the savages, who were likely to return to their old sites on the retreat of the army. To this the general reluctantly assented, and a detachment of 340 militia, forty of whom were mounted and sixty regular troops, were sent under the command of Hardin and Maj. Wyllys to effect the object proposed by Col. Hardin. Unfortunate delays occurred, but notwithstanding these, had there been no wanton disobedience of orders, the plan would probably have succeeded. As it was, the attack fell soon after sunrise, and the Indians, giving way with precipitation, were suddenly followed by the militia, leaving the small body of regulars alone to hold the line of battle. The savages had not been so demoralized as at first appeared, and rallying their main body they fell upon the unsupported regulars in overwhelming numbers, and utterly destroyed them. The militia, in the meantime, found they had only been led away by a clever strategem, and after a pursuit of two miles sought to return. It was then that they found the real enemy. The line of their retreat was a continuous ambuscade, the savages safely pouring a destructive fire from elevated ground into the ranks of the returning militia. But eight of the regulars survived, and of the militia, 100 privates and ten officers were killed, beside those wounded.

On rejoining the main body, Hardin urged the general to send another party, or lead back the whole army to the scene of the defeat. This Harmar refused to do, and, according to Col. Hardin's statement, but one other man in the whole army could be found to support his proposition. The retreat was now steadily continued, until the remains of the expedition was once more within the defenses from which it set forth, and here the militia was discharged to spread the jealous discontent, which had narrowly escaped expression in general mutiny on the homeward march. Hardin and Harmar rapidly became exceedingly unpopular in Kentucky; and such was the general censure of their conduct in this campaign, that each sought a negative sort of defense against public opinion in an acquittal before a court of inquiry. In official circles, however, the campaign obtained more credit. Harmar and St. Clair considered it highly successful; the whites had inflicted a loss upon the Indians of fifty warriors slain, a large quantity of corn destroyed, and five or six villages burned, the largest of which contained 250 cabins. The invaders had lost, besides considerable material, 183 men killed, and about forty wounded. The list of casualties was undoubtedly large in proportion to the achievements of the army, but the general offset of this consideration with the fact that the whites were "able to lose ten men to their one," and that, notwithstanding the retreat seemed forced, the great object of the campaign, "the destruction of the Miami towns," had been accomplished.

*American State Papers, Vol. XII, p. 26.

In respect to its achievements, the campaigns of other leaders on the frontier had scarcely accomplished more, but it could not be disguised that the expedition had signally failed in the main purpose for which all aggressive movements were primarily planned, that of intimidating the savages. On the contrary, the Indians looked upon the campaign as a failure and followed the retreating whites almost to the river, and were especially active in their depredations during the succeeding fall and winter. In the spring, their war parties continued their incursions against the unprotected settlements on the Ohio from Fort Pitt to Louisville with unabated ardor, achieving in this time some of their most noted successes. The general government recognized the necessity for decisive action, and early adopted measures for subduing the exultant savages. A threefold plan was accordingly resorted to. It was decided to first send to the western tribes a messenger, supported, if possible, by the presence of influential Iroquois chiefs, with offers of peace. At the same time provisions were made to organize a volunteer expedition to be directed against the Wea, Miami and Shawanese towns in case the negotiations should fail, and to follow this movement by an overwhelming federal force which should invade the hostile region, and plant and garrison a fort in the midst of the unfriendly tribes. In the meantime, to guard the exposed stations from immediate attack, certain posts on the frontier were indicated which were to be regularly garrisoned by the militia.*

Col. Thomas Proctor, the chosen messenger of peace, set out from Philadelphia March 12, 1791, and it was hoped that he would be able to reach Fort Washington with a report of his mission by the 5th of May. In the preceding December, the Kentuckians had petitioned congress to be permitted to fight the Indians in their own way, and accordingly in March, Brig.-Gen. Charles Scott was authorized, in conjunction with Innes, Brown, Logan and Shelby, to organize an expedition of mounted men against the Wabash tribes, which should start on the 10th of May, provided it was not delayed by the order of St. Clair, to whom such authority was given.

The failure of Proctor to reach, or send news to, Fort Washington, did effect the delay of the expedition until the 23d instant, when, despairing of favorable news from the north, St. Clair gave orders for the force to proceed.

Gen. Scott's command consisted of some 800 light troops and mounted riflemen. Wilkinson had joined as a volunteer, but was at once elected second in command, with the title of lieutenant-colonel commandant. Col. Hardin, burning to redeem his military reputation, had also joined the expedition as a volunteer, and was placed in command of the advance guard and the guides. The little army rapidly pursued the course of Harmar's expedition until it crossed the St. Mary's, when suddenly taking a westward course it came upon the Wabash and Eel River towns. The former were sighted on the 1st of June, and found situated on the low ground bordering the river. Col. Hardin was immediately detached with a force to attack them on the left, while the main body moved forward by the direct approach. On turning a point of woods, the main body discovered a cabin situated considerably in advance of the village. This was promptly stormed by Capt. Price with forty men, and two warriors killed. On gaining the summit of an eminence, which overlooked the villages, the enemy was observed in great confusion, endeavoring to escape across the river in canoes. Wilkinson was ordered forward with the first battalion, which reached the brink of the river just as the last of the enemy left the shore, and notwithstanding a brisk discharge of guns from the Kickapoo town on the other side, the troops opened fire on the retreating Indians with such effect as to "destroy all the savages with which five canoes were crowded."

*The stations in Kentucky, and their garrisons, were as follows: At Three Islands, 20 men; at Locust Creek, 18; the "Iron Works," 17; forks of the Licking, 12; Big Bone Lick, 18; Tanner's Station, 5; Drenon's Lick, 10; mouth of Kentucky, 9; Patton's Creek, 10; mouth of Salt River, 19; Hardin's settlement, 12; Russell's Creek, 15; Severn's Valley, 10; Widow Wilson's, 5; Estill's Station, 10; Stephenson's, 18; Knob Lick, 9.

Immediate steps were taken to dislodge the enemy, who had taken position in the Kickapoo town, but, the river proving unfordable, there was some delay, though a considerable force, by swimming or in canoes, got on the other side unobserved. About this time word came to Gen. Scott that Hardin was encumbered with prisoners, and that having discovered a stronger village, hitherto unobserved and farther to the left, he was about to attack it. Troops were at once detached for his support, but the village being some six miles distant, all was over before the supports came up. A little before sunset, Hardin returned with fifty-two prisoners, besides inflicting a loss of six warriors killed. The Kickapoo town having been abandoned as soon as the movement to that side was discovered, the troops rested until next morning, when it was proposed to dispatch Wilkinson with 500 men to destroy an important town at the mouth of the Wild Cat Creek, eighteen miles distant. On parading the troops they were found in such an exhausted condition, that only 360 were believed capable of performing the service, but with this reduced force the march was begun on foot at "half after five in the evening." The vicinity of the town was reached about 11 o'clock that night, when the troops went to rest upon their arms until morning. At half-past four the towns were attacked on all sides, and the Indians, completely surprised, instantly took refuge in flight. After burning the town, consisting of some seventy cabins, and destroying the growing crops, peltries and other belongings, the detachment returned, having been gone only about twelve hours.

The expedition now turned homeward, and on the 14th of June reached Louisville. The result of the campaign had done much to justify the hesitation which the Kentuckians manifested in joining the regulars in such expeditions. In three weeks they had traveled more than 300 miles; had engaged in numerous skirmishes with the enemy; had burned several large towns and adjacent villages; destroyed immense quantities of growing crops; killed thirty-two Indians, "chiefly warriors of size and figure;" and taken fifty-eight prisoners. All this had been accomplished without the loss of a single man killed, and of only five wounded among the whites. Such success could not fail of recognition, and the general government, not yet ready to exert its power, authorized a second expedition by the Kentuckians to be directed against the Eel River towns. Wilkinson was appointed to organize and command the next expedition, who, with Hardin and Caldwell as majors, soon raised a force of 530 mounted men.

On the 1st of August, these troops set forth from Fort Washington, and rapidly following the course toward the Miama towns, as before, turned again toward the west, and on the 7th of August came suddenly upon the towns upon the Eel and Tippecanoe branches of the Wabash. The former were found "scattered along Eel River for full three miles, on an uneven, scrubby oak barren, intersected alternately by bogs almost impassable, and impervious thickets of plum, hazel and black jacks." The Indians, expecting a second expedition, had prepared for it by packing and burying their goods; the warriors were generally absent watching the paths leading up from the Ohio, or procuring ammunition, and so sudden and determined was the onset that few in the town escaped. Eight warriors were killed and one wounded. After burning the cabins, and cutting up the corn, which was "scarcely in the milk," the troops set out for the Kickapoo town in the prairie, but such was the state of the country and the sore condition of the horses, that this enterprise had to be given up, and the expedition, after ravaging much of the Wabash and Weatonon country, and traveling some 450 miles, returned to Fort Washington, where it arrived on the 23d of August.

In the meantime, while Wilkinson was floundering up to his armpits in the boggy Wabash country, and Proctor was making his ineffectual attempts to gain an audience with the disaffected tribes, the government was gradually perfecting arrangements to carry out the third part of the proposed programme—"to establish a strong military post at the Miami Village," to be supported by a chain of similar posts connecting it with Fort Washington. St. Clair had been selected for the chief command.

At the close of April he was in Pittsburgh, toward which point troops from all quarters, horses, stores and ammunition were going forward. The forces, it was thought, would be assembled by the last of July or the first of August. By the middle of July, however, it was clear that the early part of September would be as soon as the expedition could get under way; but the commander was urged to press everything, and act with the utmost promptness and decision. But this was more easily urged than accomplished. On the 15th of May, St. Clair had reached Fort Washington, and at that time, the United States' troops in the West amounted to but 264 non-commissioned officers and privates fit for duty;* on the 15th of July, this number was more than doubled, however, as the first regiment, containing 299 men, on that day reached Fort Washington. Gen. Butler, who had been appointed second in command, was employed through part of April and May in obtaining recruits; but when obtained, there was no money to pay them, nor to provide stores for them. In the quartermaster's department, meantime, everything went on slowly and badly; tents, pack-saddles, kettles, knapsacks and cartridge-boxes were all "deficient in quantity and quality." Worse than this, the powder was poor or injured, the arms and accoutrements out of repair, and not even proper tools to mend them. And as the troops gathered slowly at Fort Washington, after some wearisome detentions at Pittsburgh and upon the river, a new source of trouble arose in the habits of intemperance indulged in and acquired by the idlers. To withdraw them from temptation, St. Clair was forced to remove his men, now numbering 2,000, to Ludlow's Station, about six miles from the fort; by which, however, he more than doubled his cost of providing for the troops. Here the army continued until September 17, when, being 2,300 strong, exclusive of militia, it moved forward to a point upon the Great Miami, where Fort Hamilton was built, the first in the proposed chain of fortresses. This being completed the troops moved on forty-four miles farther, and on the 12th of October commenced Fort Jefferson, about six miles south of the town of Greenville, Darke County. On the 24th, the toilsome march through the wilderness began again. At this time the commander-in-chief, whose duties through the summer had been very severe, was suffering from an indisposition, which was by turns in his stomach, lungs and limbs; provisions were scarce; the roads wet and heavy; the troops going with "much difficulty," seven miles a day; the militia deserting sixty at a time. Thus toiling along, the army—rapidly lessening by desertion, sickness and troops sent to arrest deserters—on the 3d of November, reached a stream twelve yards wide, which St. Clair supposed to be the St. Mary of the Maumee, but which was in reality a branch of the Wabash, just south of the head-waters of the stream for which the commander mistook it. Upon the banks of this creek, the army, now about 1,400 strong, encamped in two lines.*

The right wing, composed of Butler's, Clark's and Patterson's battalions, and commanded by Gen. Butler, constituted the first line; and seventy yards in the rear, which was all the space the situation would allow, was the second line, formed by the left wing of Col. Darke, and composed of Bedinger's and Gaither's battalions, and the Second Regiment. Across the creek, about a quarter of a mile in advance of the main body, the militia was encamped in similar order. It was proposed on the following day to inclose the main camp before proceeding toward the Miami towns, and plans of the intended fortification were agreed upon between the engineer officer and St. Clair that night. But these plans were destined to remain unaccomplished. The Indians had been gathering to dispute the passage of the army, and several had been observed near the creek who had precipitately fled on the approach of the troops. Orders had been given to Lieut. Col. Oldham, who commanded the militia, to have the woods thoroughly examined by his scouts, while Capt. Slough, with a volunteer troop of regulars, reconnoitered still farther in advance. Slough in the night discovered so strong a body of the enemy, a mile beyond the foremost camp, that he prudently fell back and reported the fact to Gen. Butler. Oldham also detected the presence of the savages in significant numbers, and reported the fact to the same officer, but for some unexplained reason this important information did not reach St. Clair, nor induce Butler or Oldham to make any new disposition to meet the imminent danger thus discovered.

*Forty-five at Fort Harmar, seventy-five at Fort Washington, sixty-one at Fort Stueben, and eighty-three at Fort Knox (Vincennes).

*Annals of the West, pp. 358, 359.

Thus the night passed, and in the morning, considerably before daylight, as was the constant practice, the troops were paraded under arms. About half an hour before sunrise, however, just as the troops had been dismissed, the savages opened a fierce attack upon the militia. They soon gave way in a disorderly scramble for the rear, and rushing through the first line, with the Indians at their heels, threw it into considerable disorder, which was never altogether remedied. The fire of this line, however, checked the victorious pursuit for the moment, but the enemy returned to the attack with renewed vigor, and with the second line it was immediately involved in a desperate struggle with the intrepid assailants. The weight of the attack was directed against the center, where the artillery was placed, and such was the effect of the concentrated fire that the troops were repeatedly driven back at this point with great slaughter, and the cannon silenced, the artillerymen being all killed or driven off. A charge by Col. Darke afforded temporary relief, but the savages soon gained the interior of the camp by a flank movement, and wrested the only line of retreat from the sorely beset troops. Confusion was rapidly spreading among the whites, in spite of the gallant efforts of the officers, and retreat was the only course left open to the commander. To effect this movement with moderate success the road must be regained, and a charge was accordingly ordered. Fortunately, it proved successful, and along the route thus opened the militia hastened, followed by the regulars, Maj. Darke with his battalion covering the rear. In his official report to the secretary of war St. Clair said:

> The retreat, in those circumstances, was, you may be sure, a very precipitate one. It was, in fact, a flight. The camp and artillery were abandoned; but that was unavoidable; for not a horse was left alive to have drawn it off, had it otherwise been practicable. But the most disgraceful part of the business is, that the greatest part of the men threw away their arms and accoutrements, even after the pursuit, which continued about four miles, had ceased. I found the road strewed with them for many miles, but was not able to remedy it; for, having had all my horses killed, and being mounted upon one that could not be pricked out of a walk, I could not get forward myself, and the orders I sent forward either to halt at the front, or to prevent the men from parting with their arms, were unattended to. The rout continued quite to Fort Jefferson, twenty-nine miles, which was reached a little after sun-setting. The action began about half an hour before sunrise, and the retreat was attempted at half an hour after nine o'clock. I have not yet been able to get returns of the killed and wounded; but Maj.-Gen. Butler, Lieut.-Col. Oldham, of the militia, Maj. Ferguson, Maj. Hart and Maj. Clarke are among the former; Col. Sargent, my adjutant-general, Lieut.-Col. Darke, Lieut.-Col. Gibson, Maj. Butler, and the Viscount Malartie, who served me as aid-de-camp, are among the latter; and a great number of captains and subalterns in both.

At Fort Jefferson a garrison was left in charge of the defenses and the wounded, while the demoralized army pressed on to Fort Washington, where it arrived in broken detachments on the 8th of November. The troops had suffered a terrible loss. In the one disastrous battle 38 commissioned officers were killed, and 600 non-commissioned officers and privates were either killed or missing. Among the wounded were 21 commissioned officers, and 242 non-commissioned officers and privates. The loss of the Indians in killed was placed at 56. But disheartening as was this comparison, scarcely anything can be reckoned more permanently serious, among the disasters of this unfortunate campaign, than the utter demoralization of the troops. So overcome with terror were the men that it was with difficulty that the sentinels at Fort Jefferson were prevented from systematically deserting, and the militia, dispersing to their homes, spread the consternation throughout the border.*

The odium of this campaign fell heaviest upon St. Clair, though a congressional committee soon after the event, and history, much later, have exonerated him from blame. The unfortunate commander, "a veteran of the Revolution, possessed of both talent and experience, but old and infirm," was an unhappy selection, but the more prominent causes which contributed to the disaster are to be sought elsewhere. The leading causes of the disaster were the surprise of the enemy and the unsteadiness of the militia. What good reasons could be assigned for the neglect of Butler and Oldham to adopt precautions in face of a well ascertained danger, and for their failure to acquaint St. Clair with the facts, can never be known, as both of the delinquent officers lost their lives upon the field of battle, but they may be held principally responsible for the unexpected character of the attack.

The militia was similar to that which served with Harmar. The contrast drawn between the campaigns of Scott and Wilkinson and that of the former general did not tend to remove the general prejudice existing among the Kentuckians against serving with regulars. To this was added a growing preference for the mounted service, and when the government called for volunteers, no general officer could be found who would accept command, and none of the best fighting force who would offer their service. Resort was, therefore, had to a draft, and the command of the troops thus raised assigned to Lieut.-Col. Oldham. This militia served with great reluctance, and sought every opportunity to desert, a body of sixty men turning back on October 31st, in spite of their officers. It was such depletions and the absence of troops sent to bring them back that reduced St. Clair's effective force at the time of battle. Probably not more than 500 of these half-hearted troops were present when the Indians attacked, and having no relish for the work, nor any cohesive power as a collective body, they easily gave way under the effect of the surprise and a vigorous assault. In their headlong stampede they were scarcely less effective than the enemy in demoralizing the army.

Whatever may be said of the causes, the effect was not in doubt. The savages, emboldened by their success, renewed their attacks upon all the frontier settlements, and Kentucky, which, in 1791, had "enjoyed more repose, and sustaind less injury, than for any year since the war with Great Britain," was once more harassed by hostilities which for nearly twenty years had kept the people upon the verge of despair. The counties of Mason, Bourbon, Nelson and Jefferson were the chief sufferers. In this exposed region the settlers maintained patrolling parties of volunteers, which scoured the country in all directions with such effect as to greatly limit the success of the enemy's incursions, but, in spite of these precautions, the settlers suffered the most cruel losses.

An incident related of the heroic defense of a cabin in Innis Bottom, on the Elkhorn, illustrates the common experience of the period. Six families had settled here in the latter part of 1791, and in the succeeding spring the various cabins were simultaneously

*One of many petitions sent to the governor or president will suffice to illustrate the state of public feeling in Kentucky. "From the representatives of the county of Ohio to the governor of Virginia—Sir: The alarming intelligence lately received, of the defeat of the army in the western country, fills our mind with dreadful fears and apprehensions, concerning the safety of our fellow-citizens in the county we represent, and we confidently hope will be an excuse to your Excellency, whose zeal has been so frequently evinced in behalf of the distressed frontier counties, for the request we are now compelled to make. In the course of last year upward of fifty of our people were killed, and a great part of our country plundered, notwithstanding the aid afforded by the Pennsylvanians, who joined the Virginians in our defense. The success of the Indians in their late engagement with Gen. St. Clair, will, no doubt, render them more daring and bold in their future incursions and attacks upon our defenseless inhabitants; (those adjoining the county of Harrison, extending a hundred miles; covering the county of Monongalia; and we conceive that not less than sixty or seventy men will be sufficient to defend them. Through you, sir, we beg leave to request this assistance." (American State Papers, Vol. V, p. 222).

assaulted by upward of 100 savages. Jesse and Hosea Cook, with their families, occupied one of the cabins, and at the time of the attack the men were shearing their sheep in front of the cabin door. The first fire killed one of the brothers, and mortally wounded the other, who had just enough strength left to gain the interior before he expired. The women immediately closed and barred the door, which, being unusually heavy, repelled the bullets fired into it by the Indians as well as the assaults of their tomahawks.

In the meantime the women searched in vain for means to defend their log citadel. No bullets could be found for a time, and the assailants, believing there was nothing to fear from the inmates, carelessly exposed themselves in front. Fortunately a single bullet was at length discovered, which one of the women, with nervous strength, bit in two. A rifle was hastily charged with one part, and observing a savage sitting astride a log a few feet from the door, the courageous woman discharged the gun and instantly killed him. This deed turned the fury of the assailants upon the cabin, and, mounting upon the roof they fired the clapboards. Not a moment was lost in confronting the new danger. One woman mounted to the loft, while the other handed up water that was found within. This sufficed to check, but not extinguish the fire. The water exhausted, a quantity of eggs was crushed and applied to the burning roof. Still the fire was unsubdued, and recourse was had to the dead man's coat saturated with his blood. These expedients still left enough life in the fire to endanger their lives, when the contents of a "chamber bucket," relieved them from this danger, and eventually proved their salvation, as the savages soon afterward hastily decamped.

Such incidents called forth numerous reprisals, of which none were more bold and effective than those conducted by Kenton. Situated near the direct route of the war parties from the North, his watchfulness generally obtained the earliest information of their presence in Kentucky. His promptness to act usually brought him upon the heels of the retreating marauders, who seldom escaped with all their booty, and generally paid the penalty of their temerity with the lives of some of their number. In this year (1792) he came in contact with a band under the command of the famous chieftain, Tecumseh. The depredations by Indians on the Little Miami aroused the settlers to concert measures for revenge, and an expedition was organized with Kenton in command. The little party of rangers cautiously advanced across the Ohio, and up the course of the former river to near the present site of Williamsburg, before they discovered any fresh "signs." Here a single Indian on horseback, hunting with bell open, was waylaid and killed. A few hundred yards farther on brought the party in sight of a considerable encampment of Indians. Their linen tents and markees indicated that they had shared the spoils of St. Clair's defeat, and that their number was greatly superior to that of the whites. Relying upon the effect of its audacity and surprise, Kenton determined to make a night attack. The day closed in dark and drizzly, and having separated into four divisions, a simultaneous attack was made at the appointed time. Each rifle did execution upon a warrior at the first fire, when the rangers charged with terrific yells upon the tents. The first alarm and confusion having subsided, under the influence of their able leader, the Indians were led to observe the small number of the assailants, and to return to the fight. Kenton, equally quick to note the change and its import, gave orders to retreat, which was effected in safety. The band subsequently proved to be a party of 200 warriors under Tecumseh. Thirty were killed outright, and others wounded; the whites lost one killed and one captured, who was executed by the savages on the following morning.

In June, 1793, the Indians had attacked and captured Morgan's Station, and then retired to a village on Paint Creek. This again called out Kenton, who with thirty men hastily took the trail, hoping to intercept their retreat near the Scioto. On reaching Reeve's Crossing on Paint Creek, "fresh signs" were discovered, and a reconnoisance developed the fact that the Indians had encamped some distance down the creek with three fires. The savages, utterly unsuspicious of danger, were giving vent to their satisfaction in singing and carousal, and the whites, after inspecting the camp, deferred the attack until just before daylight the next morning. Kenton divided his party into three equal divisions, which, at a given signal, made a furious attack from three different directions. The Indians were put to flight in the greatest consternation, leaving four of their number dead upon the ground. The whites lost one man killed.

Again, in August of the same year, the scouts brought to Kenton the information that a party of savages had crossed the river. Promptly sending the news to the militia officers of Bourbon County, Kenton prepared to waylay the Indians upon their retreat. With a party of seven chosen spirits he crossed the river at Limestone and proceeded down to the mouth of Holt's Creek. After waiting nearly four days, three Indians were observed to approach with six horses. The animals were driven into the river, and, raising a canoe which they had previously sunk, the savages followed. As the canoe approached the shore, one of its occupants was discovered to be a white man and he was spared, but the Indians fell victims to the unerring marksmanship of the rangers. The white man, however, proved so thoroughly Indianized that Kenton's party was obliged to shoot him in self defense. Four hours later, two more Indians and a white man with five horses approached in a similar manner, and met a similar fate.

In the night the main body came up with thirty horses, and began to signal their comrades by imitating the hooting of owls. Receiving no response the wary savages became suspicious, and after a cautious reconnoisance, one of their number quietly swam across the river. He soon discovered the fate of his friends, and quickly gaining the hills in the rear of the whites signaled the waiting savages south of the river with three loud and long yells, which were followed by a warning of the lurking danger in their native tongue. This warning was quickly acted upon by the Indians, who instantly fled, leaving their booty to fall into the hands of the militia, which came up in hot haste an hour later. This is believed to have been the last incursion of the Indians into Kentucky.

In the meantime, the government had not been unmindful of the necessities of the situation. The disastrous battle was fought on the 4th of November; on the 8th, the broken fragments of the army reached Fort Washington; on the 9th, St. Clair wrote his report; on December 12th, the information was laid before congress; and on the 26th of the same month, the secretary of war, Gen. Knox, submitted to the president the outlines of new measures to be undertaken against the hostile tribes. Before this date, however, it was generally agreed among the responsible heads of the government that a new campaign, with a competent army, would be required, but it was the wish, chiefly of Washington, that the last possible effort to prevent further bloodshed should first be exhausted. This disposition gained a wider support because it was generally feared that the effect of St. Clair's defeat had been such as to shake the loyalty of the hitherto friendly nations, and that premature action might precipitate the tribes all along the border into a general war.

Accordingly, the greatest activity was displayed in dispatching envoys bearing messages of peace to the various Indian nations. In January, 1792, two agents were sent from Philadelphia, via Niagara, to the Miami and Wabash tribes. In February, the efforts of the commandants at Forts Washington and Knox were enlisted, and on April 7th Freeman was dispatched from the former post on a peace mission; on the 13th instant, William May followed his trail and "deserted" to the enemy to aid or learn of Freeman. On May 22d, Capt. Trueman was sent on an embassy to the Miami village; and on the same day, Col. Hardin set out for Sandusky. With the exception of May, none of the envoys thus sent out from Fort Washington escaped death at the hands of the treacherous savages.

In the East, affairs with the Iroquois seemed to progress with a better show of success. In March, fifty of their chiefs visited Philadelphia, and returned to use their good offices in behalf of peace at the council of the northwest Indians, to be held at the mouth of the Auglaize. At this grand convocation, beside the western, New York and Canadian Indians, there were twenty-seven other nations present, but no decisive action was taken. The matter of peace and war was referred to another council, to be held in the spring, but the prevailing sentiment of the assembled natives was that the Ohio must be made the boundary between the races, and the treaties of Forts Harmar and McIntosh annulled. To such an impotent conclusion did the year's negotiations come.

An unimportant exception to this list of failures occurred in the West. On June 26 Rufus Putnam set out from Marietta for the Miami towns, but learning at Fort Washington of the probable fate of his predecessors, and the hostilities of the savages, he determined to go to Vincennes to detach the Wabash tribes from the general league, if possible. He set forth from Cincinnati on the 17th of August, with presents and certain Indian prisoners to be given to their friends. Safely reaching his destination, Putnam opened negotiations with such address that on the 27th of September he concluded a treaty with ten of the leading tribes, but as the senate refused to ratify it, it also must be added to the list of failures.

The sterner argument of force, however, had not been entirely lost sight of amid all this futile negotiation. In January, 1792, St. Clair had proceeded to Philadelphia to demand a court of inquiry, leaving Wilkinson, appointed lieutenant-colonel of the Second Regiment, in command at Fort Washington. The posts erected in the previous year were still held by garrisons of regulars and detachments of militia, to keep the savages, who lurked about them, in awe. Soon after St. Clair's departure the new commandant led a body of regulars and 170 militia, under Maj. Gano, to relieve the garrison at Fort Jefferson, and from that point advanced to the scene of the late battle, where he collected more than 200 muskets and brought them to the fort, with three of eight gun carriages, from which the cannon had been taken. As spring advanced the number of lurking savages increased, attacking supply trains and relieving detachments, with the hope of forcing the abandonment of these detached posts.

The most serious of these attacks occurred on the 6th of November. Capt. John Adair, with 100 mounted Kentuckians, had been called out to escort a "brigade of pack horses" to Fort Jefferson. The trip out and back to Cincinnati took six days, the train camping each night near one of the forts for protection. It happened about the same time that a body of 250 savages had concerted an attack on one of the Miami settlements, and in passing Fort Hamilton had captured some wood-choppers from the fort. These prisoners informed their captors that, the day previous, a train had gone forward with supplies for the other posts. The Indians at once changed their plans and laid an ambuscade in which to entrap the returning convoy. Reaching Fort Jefferson on Saturday, Adair allowed the men and horses to rest over Sunday, and reached Fort St. Clair on Monday night. Learning of this through their scouts, the Indians left their hiding place, and about day-break on Tuesday made a spirited attack on three sides of the camp. The militia retired in good order "beyond the shine of their fires, on the side next to the fort," and when the enemy became engaged in plundering the abandoned camp, made a spirited attack on both flanks and forced them to give way. It was not done, however, without stubborn fighting, in which the tomahawk and war club were freely employed. The savages retreated in good order, repeatedly turning upon the whites and driving them back. On returning to their camp the militia found 140 horses killed or stolen, with all their camp equipage, six of their number wounded and an equal number killed. The loss of the savages is said to have been only six killed.

Notwithstanding such striking evidences of determined hostilities on the part of the Indians, and the failure which had attended every employment of peaceful measures during the previous year, the government still proposed one further effort to negotiate a peace, and on the 1st of March, 1793, secured the services of three commissioners to attend a meeting of the hostile tribes "at the rapids of the Miami (Maumee) when the leaves were fully out." Sandusky was finally selected as the place of meeting, and the commissioners set out for that place by way of Niagara. Here they were delayed by one cause or another until the 15th of July, when fifty natives, headed by the tory Butler and the half-breed Brant, arrived from the Maumee. These envoys from the savages claimed to represent sixteen of the leading Indian nations, but did nothing more than demand the meaning of the war-like preparations on the Miami. The commissioners subsequently crossed the lake to the mouth of the Detroit River, where, on the 21st of July, they took up their residence in the house of the notorious English agent, Matthew Elliott. They took immediate steps to hasten the proposed meeting at Sandusky, but on the 29th instant twenty Indians came from the Maumee, and on the 31st the plenipotentiaries of the two races met in council, with Simon Girty as interpreter. Negotiations were prolonged until the 16th of August, when the tribes submitted their ultimatum, which may be gathered from the closing paragraph of their final message:

Brothers:—At our general council, held at the Glaize last fall, we agreed to meet commissioners from the United States, for the purpose of restoring peace, provided they consented to acknowledge and confirm our boundary line to be the Ohio, and we determined not to meet you until you gave us satisfaction on that point; that is the reason we have never met.

We desire you to consider, brothers, that our only demand is the peaceable possession of a small part of our once great country. Look back and review the lands from whence we have been driven to this spot. We can retreat no farther, because the country behind hardly affords food for its inhabitants, and we have, therefore, resolved to leave our bones in this small space to which we are now confined.*

This closed all hope of preventing a contest of arms. The commissioners immediately set out on their return, reaching Fort Erie, near Niagara, on the 23d instant, whence they dispatched to Gen. Wayne a report of the issue of their negotiations by three different channels. These reached the general at "Hobson's Choice," near Cincinnati, when that energetic officer was struggling to overcome the unwillingness of the Kentuckians to volunteer, and against those even more intractable forces, "the fever, influenza and desertion."

Washington had early persuaded congress to authorize the increase of the army by the addition of three regiments of infantry, and a full squadron of 2,000 horsemen, to be enlisted for three years, or until a settled peace had been effected. St. Clair having resigned, the choice of a new commander devolved upon the president, who, from a number of excellent officers suggested, appointed Gen. Anthony Wayne, not, however, without the strong opposition of leading men and the "extreme disgust" of the Virginians. Through the summer of 1792, the enlistment and discipline of the new levies were not neglected, and in December they were rendezvoused at a point twenty-two miles below Pittsburgh, which took the name of Legionville from the title adopted by the new army—the legion of the United States. Here the new troops passed the winter, sparing neither powder nor lead in perfecting their marksmanship. In April they descended the river and encamped near Fort Washington, where drilling and other preparations were continued until October, 1793. On the 5th instant Wayne estimated the effective force which he could lead beyond Fort Jefferson at 2,600 regulars, 360 mounted volunteers, and thirty-six guides and spies. Though this was far short of what he had hoped for, he was by no means discouraged, and, proposing a defensive campaign, argued from the unorganized character of Indian warfare the probability of a successful issue.

*The nations joining in this reply were the Wyandots, Seven Nations of Canada, Pottawatomies, Senecas of the Glaize, Shawanese, Cherokees, Miamis, Ottawas, Messasagoes, Chippewas, Munsees, Mohicans, Connoys, Delawares. Nantakokies and Creeks. (See American State Papers, Vol. V, p. 306.)

On the 7th instant the army began its advance, and six days later took up a strong position in advance of Fort Jefferson. On the 17th, although no opposition had hitherto been met with, the watchfulness of the enemy was evinced by a fierce attack upon a supply train, about twenty miles beyond Fort St. Clair. The troops, consisting of ninety regulars under command of two commissioned officers, were forced to retreat to the fort, leaving seventy horses and the stores in twenty-one wagons, beside both officers and thirteen men, to the mercy of the savages. The wagons and a large part of their contents were subsequently recovered. On the 24th instant, Gen. Scott joined the army with 1,000 mounted Kentuckians. In raising these troops, the same obstacle which had so powerfully obstructed the previous campaigns of Harmar and St. Clair had been encountered. The best men obstinately refused to volunteer, and on the 28th of September a draft had been enforced by the governor, which, with Gen. Wayne's personal efforts, had achieved the result mentioned. The militia was retained but a short time, however, when it was dismissed until spring, the general in command having decided to fortify his position and remain there through the winter.

Fort Greenville was according built on the site of the present county seat of Darke County, which takes its name from the fort. This completed, a force was sent to erect a military post on the site of St. Clair's defeat. The troops reached their destination Christmas day, and at night found the ground so thickly strewn with human bones that they had to be removed from the tents before the beds could be made. On the following day, these sad mementos of the fatal engagement were buried in trenches dug for the purpose. Fort Recovery was thus erected, twenty-three miles northwest of Greenville, on a branch of the Wabash, and garrisoned by a company of artillery and one of riflemen under the command of Capt. Alexander Gibson.

Thus the winter passed unmarked by any serious hostilities, though Wayne's scouts, under the command of Kenton, brought intelligence which indicated the concentration of a formidable force on the Maumee. Nor were the Indians alone to be feared. The treacherous English had not only early supplied the savages with powder and lead, in large quantities, but in the fall of 1793 they had advanced with three companies of troops and erected a military post at the Maumee Rapids, ostensibly to guard the approach to Detroit against the advance of the hostile American army. Indubitable evidence was gained. also, that the British had given the savages good reason to believe that they would receive assistance from the troops in time of battle.

Undisturbed by these warlike preparations, Wayne matured his plans for an advance which he proposed should be irresistible, whatever force should oppose. On the 30th of June, 1794, the long truce was broken by an attack on Fort Recovery. A thousand or fifteen hundred Indians and English, under the command of Little Turtle, furiously assailed the fort on every side. The assailants were repeatedly repulsed with great loss, but returned to the attack with fresh determination until night fell. Fortunately for the slender garrison, a convoy of fifty dragoons and ninety riflemen had just arrived, though not yet entered, and lent valuable aid in resisting the savages. The succeeding night being dark and foggy, the detachment effected an entrance to the fort in safety. On the following day the fight was renewed, but early despairing of success the savages withdrew to their camp seven miles away, where they remained two days encumbered with their dead.

On the 26th of July, Scott returned with the militia, this time increased to 1,600 men. The visit to Wayne's camp in the preceding fall had impressed the captious Kentuckians with a profound respect for the military ability of the new commander-in-chief, and there was no difficulty experienced in the spring in raising the full complement of militia. Two days after the arrival of this re-enforcement, the army advanced. On the 1st of August, the army reached the St. Mary's River, twenty-four miles from Fort Recovery, where the erection of a stockade (Fort Adams) detained it three days. On the 8th, after a march of fifty-three miles, the legion reached the junction of the Auglaize and Maumee, where Wayne proceeded to build Fort Defiance. While engaged in erecting this fort, he sent on the 13th a last offer of peace to the hostile tribes, which elicited no response save a request for a delay until the 18th instant. Unwilling to await the tardy return of the envoy, however, the troops moved forward, and on the last date mentioned arrived at a point forty-one miles from Fort Defiance, where some light works were thrown up for protection of the baggage, and called Fort Deposit. On the 20th, the baggage having been stored away to be left behind, the army began its advance between 7 and 8 o'clock in the morning. The enemy was now reported to be in force at the foot of the Maumee Rapids, seven miles away, and after advancing about five miles the skirmishers reported the discovery of the savages. A heavy fire from the Indians caused the advance guard to retreat when the main lines were formed.

The legion was immediately formed into two lines, principally in a close thick wood, which extended for miles on our left, and for a very considerable distance in front, the ground being covered with old fallen timber, probably occasioned by a tornado, which rendered it impracticable for the cavalry to act with effect, and afforded the enemy the most favorable covert for their mode of warfare. The savages were formed in three lines within supporting distance of each other and extending for near two miles at right angles with the river. I soon discovered from the weight of the fire and extent of their lines that the enemy were in full force in front, in possession of their favorite ground, and endeavoring to turn our left flank. I therefore gave orders for the second line to advance and support the first; and directed Maj.-Gen. Scott to gain and turn the right flank of the savages, with the whole of the mounted volunteers, by a circuitous route; at the same time I ordered the front line to advance and charge with trailed arms, and rouse the Indians from their coverts at the point of the bayonet, and when up, to deliver a close and well directed fire on their backs, followed by a brisk charge so as not to give them time to load again.

I also ordered Capt. MisCampbell, who commanded the legionary cavalry, to turn the left flank of the enemy next the river, and which afforded a favorable field for that corps to act in. All these orders were obeyed with spirit and promptitude; but such was the impetuosity of the charge by the first line of infantry, that the Indians and Canadian militia and volunteers were driven from all their coverts in so short a time, that although every possible exertion was used by the officers of the second line of the legion, and by Gens. Scott, Todd and Barbee of the mounted volunteers to gain their proper positions, but part of each could get up in season to participate in the action, the enemy being drove in the course of one hour more than two miles, through the thick woods already mentioned, by less than one-half their numbers. From every account the enemy amounted to 2,000 combatants. The troops actually engaged against them were short of 900. This horde of savages, with their allies, abandoned themselves to flight and dispersed with terror and dismay, leaving our victorious army in full and quiet possession of the field of battle, which terminated under the influence of the guns of the British garrison.*

For three days and nights the American army remained on the banks of the Maumee, ravaging the country about with fire and sword. Houses and corn-fields were consumed and destroyed both above and below the British post; and all the houses, stores and goods of the English agent, McKee, were burned, as well as every sort of property about the fort beyond pistol range of the British garrison. This done, the army retired by easy marches to Fort Defiance, where it arrived on the 27th instant. Until September 14 the troops were engaged in strengthening the works of this fort, and in destroying the abandoned crops and villages, which made the margins of the confluent streams for miles above and below the fort appear like one grand inland town. On the 14th, therefore, the army set out for the principal Miami towns, where, in the bend of the St. Mary, a new fortress was completed on the 22nd of October, and named Fort Wayne, by Col.

*Gen. Wayne's report; (see American State Papers, Vol. V, p. 491.) In this engagement the legion had twenty-six killed, five of them officers; eighty-seven wounded, thirteen of them officers; the Kentucky volunteers had seven killed, all privates, and thirteen wounded, three of whom were officers. The loss of the enemy was estimated at more than double that of the Americans. "The woods were strewn for a considerable distance with the dead bodies of Indians, and their white auxiliaries, the latter armed with British muskets and bayonets." "Brig.-Gen. Wilkinson and Col. Hamtramck, the commander of the right and left wings of the legion," were complimented in the report for bravery and efficiency; and among the aid-de-camps who were similarly mentioned occurs the name of Lieut. W. H. Harrison.

Hamtramck, who was left in command. While here the troops suffered much from sickness and the lack of supplies, and the militia becoming troublesome, they were dispatched on the 12th instant to Greenville for discharge. On the 28th the rest of the army, after leaving a garrison to hold the new fort, began its march for the same place. On the return march a detachment was left to garrison Fort Loramie,* which was erected on the creek of that name, where the old French and English trading posts were early established.

The blow inflicted upon the Indians fell with crushing weight. Their bravest warriors, those who had triumphed over Harmar and St. Clair, were now beaten and dismayed; their most important and cherished villages had been consumed, and all the winter's supply for thousands was destroyed; and what was infinitely more disastrous, the white man had built a chain of impregnable fortresses into the very heart of their country. The promise of English help had proven a delusion and a snare, and there was no further escape save to seek what they had so often disdainfully rejected. And now all indications began to point to a speedy restoration of peace. In the East a new treaty was made with the Iroquois early in November; in the West the number of hostile Indians lurking about the forts began to diminish; in December, chiefs of the Chippewas, Ottawas, Sacs, Pottawatomies and Miamis came with messages of peace to the commandant at Fort Wayne; in January, 1795, these nations, with the Delawares, Wyandots and Shawanese entered into preliminary articles with Gen. Wayne, at Greenville, and on the 30th of July a treaty was agreed upon, which was to bury the hatchet forever. Thus was Kentucky at last freed from the fear of savage incursions.

*Sixteen miles northwest of Sidney, in Shelby County, Ohio.

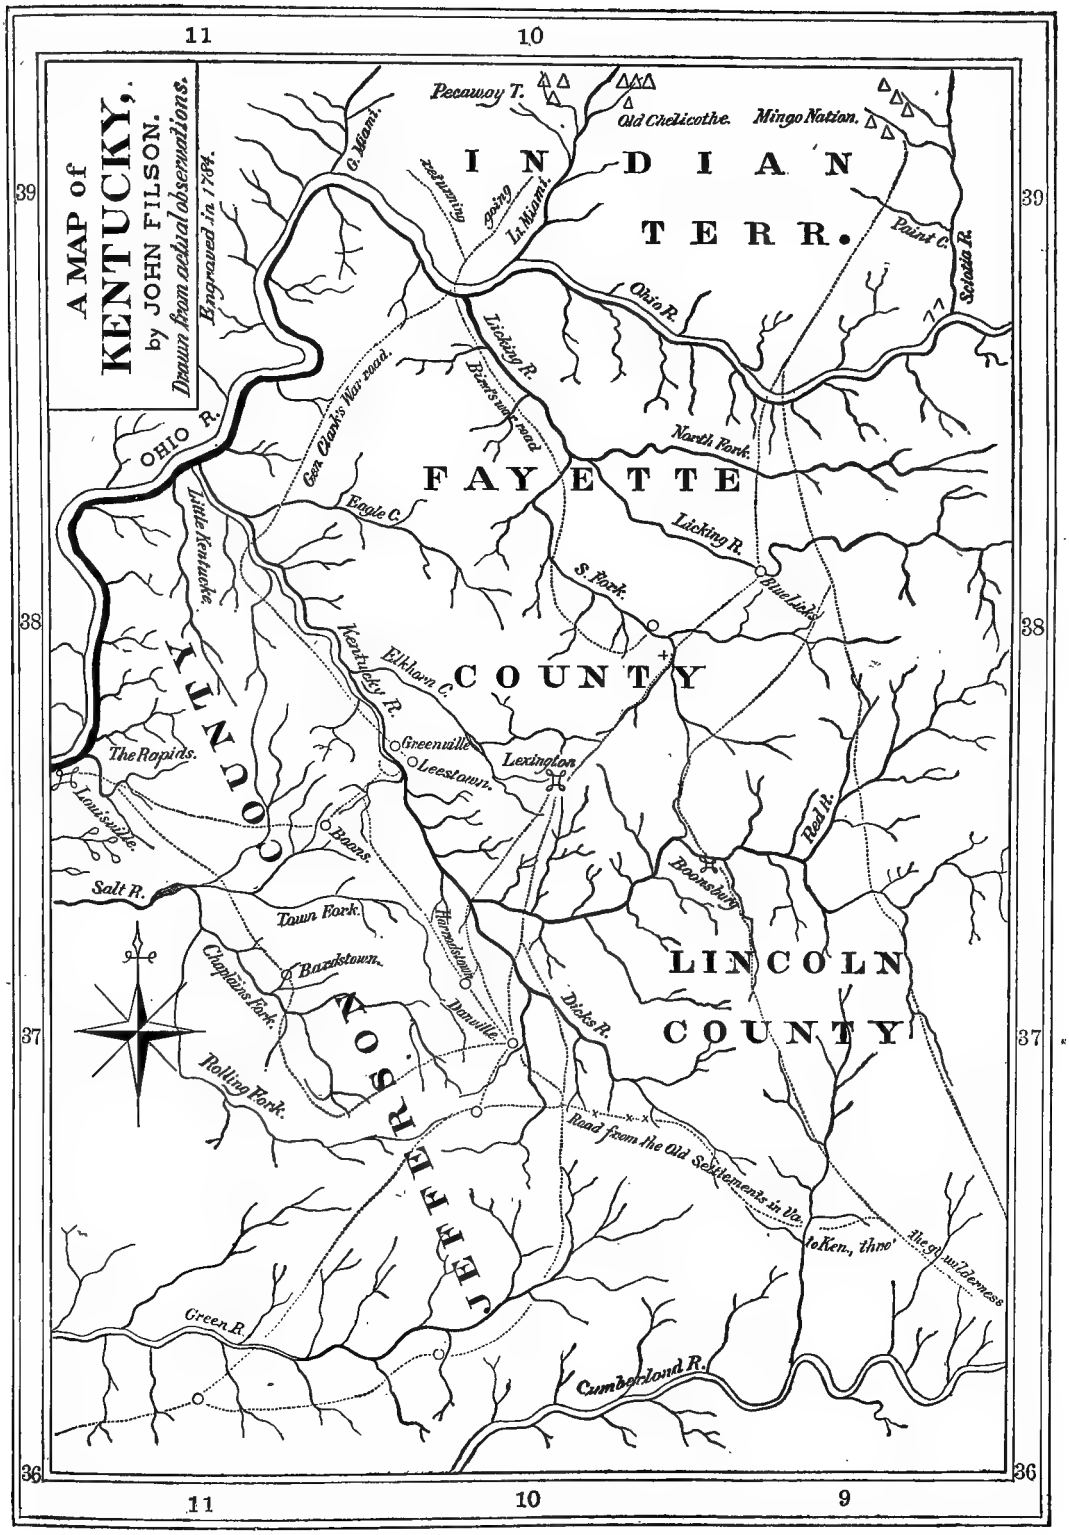
MASONIC WIDOW'S AND ORPHAN'S HOME.—LOUISVILLE.

CHAPTER XI.

EARLY POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT.

THE autumn of 1784 marks the beginning of a new phase in the development of Kentucky. The gradual transformation of society had brought the frontier community to the verge of a new experience. Like the boy, growing up within the precincts of the home, unmindful of its larger responsibilities, and careful only of the duties assigned him, when suddenly made aware of his majority finds the careless dream of youth magically dispelled, so Kentucky suddenly awoke to find its days of tutelage ended. Unconsciously, society had been preparing for the inevitable change. Gradually the scattered stations upon a distant frontier, with their few hundreds of occupants, had expanded in territorial limits and inhabitants to the proportions of a State. Its early heroes had one by one quit the stage of action, and new men had fallen heir to their achievements, their responsibilities and their positions. Of all the early leaders, Clark and Logan alone remained, and the latter performed the final act of the old regime when he issued the call for a convention, which met in this fall. With its organization, a new dynasty came to the throne.

The political lines of Virginia had followed close upon the westward progress of her population. Until her frontier crossed the Blue Ridge, the unexplored region beyond the mountains was recognized only as the "great woods." In 1734, Orange County was formed and included all that region west of the Blue Ridge which Virginia claimed under the comprehensive charter of the crown. In the fall session of 1738, the Virginia assembly divided this vast outlying region into two counties, Frederick and Augusta; the former was bounded on the north by the Potomac, on the east by the Blue Ridge, and on the south and west by a line to be run from the head spring of Hedgman to the head spring of the Potomac; the remainder of Virginia, west of the Blue Ridge, constituted Augusta, a territory which at present comprises four entire States and nearly forty counties in the western part of what was originally Virginia. In 1769, Botetourt County was formed from the outlying part of Augusta; in 1772, Fincastle was formed out of the western part of Botetourt; and on December 31, 1776, the latter county was extinguished by the division of its territory between the new counties of Washington, Montgomery and Kentucky, the name of old Fincastle being perpetuated only by the shire town of Botetourt County.



In this division, "all that part thereof which lies to the south and westward of a line beginning on the Ohio, at the mouth of Great Sandy Creek, and running up the same and the main and northeasterly branch thereof to the Great Laurel Ridge or Cumberland Mountain; thence southwesterly along the said mountain to the line of North Carolina," was assigned to a distinct county to be called Kentucky. Upon the organization of Fincastle, this region was specifically attached to it for judicial and other purposes, but the character of the people, as well as the vast extent of wild country, forbade the exercise of anything like supervision, and the pioneers in Kentucky received little active sympathy and no protection, either of a civil or military character. With the organization of a new county, however, the machinery of government was placed in their own hands; they were henceforth represented in the general assembly by two representatives; justices of the peace and a county court took cognizance of questions of law and equity, and the county-lieutenant, sheriff, coroner and surveyor were the authorized leaders of all public activities.

Indian hostilities led to the early organization of the militia, but the same cause operated to prevent the instituting of civil government until after the suspension of the Indian campaign. In the fall, therefore, the first court met at Harrodsburg, consisting of John Todd, presiding justice, and John Floyd, Benjamin Logan and Richard Calloway, associate justices. Its organization was completed by the appointment of Levi Todd as clerk. Officers for a regiment of militia were promptly commissioned, and the county-lieutenant, Col. John Bowman, proceeded to regularly enroll all citizens, whether resident or not, into companies and battalions. This organization sufficed for the simple purposes of the frontier community until the 1st of November, 1780, when the county of Kentucky was divided; "all that part of the aforesaid county on the south side of the Kentucky River, which lies west and north of a line beginning at the mouth of Benson's Big Creek, and running up the same and its main fork to the head; thence south to the nearest waters of Hammon's Creek, and down the same to the town fork of Salt River; thence south to Green River; and down the same to its junction with the Ohio, to be called Jefferson County. All that part of the said county of Kentucky, which lies north of a line beginning at the Mouth of the Kentucky River, and up the same and its middle fork to the head; and thence southeast to the Washington line, to be called Fayette County. And all the residue of the said county of Kentucky, to be called Lincoln County."

The original governmental authority was now divided among three similar organizations with separate jurisdiction. These courts possessed only a qualified authority in civil and criminal matters. All capital cases were referred to the only competent court at Richmond; misdemeanors, punishable by fine and imprisonment, were brought before the county court at its quarterly session, which at these sessions had cognizance also of all matters at common law, or in chancery, when of a civil nature, not exceeding the value of 25 shillings. The monthly session of the court took cognizance of all other business pertaining to the civil administration of the county. In their individual capacity as justices of the peace, the members of the court were conservators of the peace, superintendents of local concerns, with power to examine and commit persons charged with crimes affecting life or limb; to bind them for further trial or finally discharge them. Such, however, was the pressure of danger, the simplicity of manner, the integrity of the people, and the state of property, according to Marshall, that there was but little use for criminal law until a later period.

In March, 1783, agreeably to an act of the Virginia assembly, a new court was established. The three counties had been formed into a judicial district, to designate which the discarded name of Kentucky was revived. Within these limits, the new court was invested with civil and criminal jurisdiction, similar to the circuit courts of Virginia, and was composed of John Floyd, Samuel McDowell and George Muter, judges; John May, clerk; and Walker Daniel, prosecuting attorney. Its first session was opened in Harrodsburg, the first two judges named only being present, Muter not putting in an appearance until two years later. At this session, nine cases for selling liquor without license, eight for adultery or fornication, one against the clerk of Lincoln County, for failing to keep account of his fees, and several for minor offenses were presented by the grand jury. No house in Harrodsburg could be secured that would conveniently accommodate the business of the court, and the remainder of the sessions was therefore adjourned to a meeting-house near "Dutch Station," six miles distant. For its next session, the court authorized Daniel and May to select some safe place, near Crow's Station, in which the business could be transacted, and empowered them to employ persons to erect a log-house, large enough for a court room in one end and two jury rooms in

A MAP of
KENTUCKY,
by JOHN FILSON.
Drawn from actual observations.
Engraved in 1784.
11
10
9 39
38
37
36
Pecaway T.
Old Chelicothe.
Mingo Nation.
C. Miami.
Ind. running going
Lt. Miami.
INDIAN
TERR.
Paint C.
Scioto R.
Ohio R.
Licking R.
Beat's wat. road
Gen. Clark's War road.
OHIO R.
North Fork.
FAYETTE COUNTY
Eagle C.
Licking R.
Little Kentucke
S. Fork.
Blue Licks
Kentucky R.
Elkhorn C.
COUNTY
Greenville
Leestown
Lexington
The Rapids.
Louisville
Boons
Red R.
Boonsbury
Salt R.
Town Fork.
Harrodstown
LINCOLN COUNTY
Chaplains Fork.
Bardstown
Danville
Dicks R.
JEFFERSON
Rolling Fork.
Road from the Old Settlements in Va. to Ken., thro' the great wilderness
Green R.
Cumberland R.

the other, on the same floor. They were also authorized to contract for the erection of a hewed or sawed-log prison, the walls to be at least nine inches thick. No provision was made for the expense of these buildings, save that in case the court, for any reason, removed its sessions to any other place these gentlemen were to be reimbursed out of the court funds, or through its influence by the legislature. The agents of the court had no difficulty in securing a donation of these buildings on the court's engagement to hold its session there, and from this beginning, the town of Danville took its origin. Thenceforward, this village became the district capital and a noted point for public meetings, until the separation of Kentucky from the parent State inaugurated a new regime.

Such was the state of political development when Col. Logan called a meeting of the citizens, in the fall of 1784, to consider the situation of the district with regard to the threatened invasion of the savages.* But in the powers thus conferred, the assembled pioneers found none to authorize the independent action to which they had so long been accustomed. The same resources were found in the country; the settlers still possessed their trusty rifles; horses and trappings, cornmeal and bacon were still abundant, but the question which confronted the convention was how these could be commanded in any general effort against the enemy. So long as the danger was imminent and threatened all alike, private interests would insure a ready response to the call to arms, even if there was no prospect of remuneration by the government for time and losses. But the declaration of peace, and the rapidly extending lines of the settlements, had wrought great changes in the public temper. The central settlements no longer felt the same apprehension of danger as those in more exposed situations, and the natural feeling began to prevail that, now the emergency had passed, it was due those who had suffered so much for the general weal that the government should undertake, at its own expense, the defense of those from whom it claimed the allegiance of subjects. This sentiment was daily strengthened by the accession of those who had not been trained in the stern school of border experience, and whose presence on the frontier was induced by a wish rather to improve their private fortunes than to cultivate the grace of patriotism.

The source of the difficulties under which the district labored was not far to seek. It lay in the inability of the frontier community, through legal restrictions, to exert the power it amply possessed. The formality of governmental sanction had hitherto been largely ignored by tacit consent, but now the Virginia authorities, complaining of the burden of the war, began to scrutinize unauthorized expense. The evils complained of were remote from the seat of government; they were of a kind not fully appreciated by those who had long been removed from frontier scenes, and failed, therefore, to awaken sympathetic promptness in promoting measures of relief. But with even these obstacles removed, there still remained the long, tedious journey to and fro, which must be accomplished before action could be authorized, and hopelessly prevented that promptness of reprisal, which the nature of the case rendered the only effective redress.*

All this came vividly before the men whom Logan's call had brought together. They discovered that the remedy to be applied lay beyond their power, and, while suggesting an appeal to the legislature, they recommitted the whole subject to a body which should be more representative of the people than themselves. A circular letter was accordingly addressed to the citizens of the district,

*Appendix A, Note 26.

*The difficulty of communicating with the frontier can scarcely now be imagined. In April, 1781, Gov. Jefferson sent orders to Clark for a military expedition into the Indian country which did not reach their destination until the 11th of the following July. On the 30th of November, 1782, the provisional articles of peace were signed in Paris, but news of this event, though known in the East in January, did not reach Kentucky until April. As late as 1788, there was little improvement in this respect to be observed. In a letter of John Brown to Judge Muter, dated New York, July 10, 1788, it was written: "An answer to your favor of the 16th of March, was, together with several other letters, put into the hands of one of Gen. Harmar's officers, who set out in May last for the Ohio, and who promised to forward them to the district. But I fear that they have miscarried, as I was a few days ago informed, that his orders had been countermanded, and that he had been sent to the garrison at West Point. Indeed, I have found it almost impracticable to transmit a letter to Kentucky, as there is scarce any communication between this place and that country. A post is now established from this place to Fort Pitt, to set out once in two weeks, after the 20th instant; this will render the communication easy and certain." Marshall, Vol. I, p. 304.)

recommending that each militia company should appoint a delegate to a convention to be held at Danville on the 27th of December, 1784. To this recommendation there was a very cordial and general response; representatives were chosen and convened at Danville on the appointed day, and promptly completing their organization by the election of Samuel McDowell as president and Thomas Todd as clerk, they proceeded to the transaction of the business which had brought them together. For ten days this body conducted its deliberations with commendable industry and good sense; the best method of obviating the difficulties which hindered present necessary action, and of preventing their recurrence in the future was soberly discussed; the proposed appeal to the legislature appeared, on the whole, to be only partially effective; the main obstacles in the way of successfully dealing with the frontier problem were believed to exist in the fixed character of the country, in its isolated and exposed condition. For this there seemed no apparent remedy save the one suggested by a provision of the State constitution, one expressly adopted with a view to such an occasion as the present—that of independence.

This bold proposition received the approbation of a "decided majority" of the convention, which found expression in a resolution urging that steps be taken to bring it about, but as so radical a measure was not contemplated by the people when the representatives were chosen, it was thought proper as well as prudent to again refer the matter to the people. It was accordingly suggested by resolution that at the succeeding April election, when legislative representatives were chosen, delegates should be elected to a second convention,* which should meet at Danville in May, for the express purpose of considering the propriety and expediency of seeking a separation of the district from Virginia. The nature of the proposition, which was brought to the attention of the people by circular letters and otherwise, evoked a considerable difference of opinion. None but the most radical accepted the proposed innovation without hesitation; others yielded their assent to what seemed the only practical alternative in the present dilemma, while "those who felt themselves at ease in places of safety those who were strongly attached to Virginia—and there were many who loved her manners, habits and institutions—those who were unmoved by new objects of ambition, and others averse to any radical change, in a word, all those whose property rendered them timid, could but anticipate the event of separation from the parent State with some apprehensions; many openly opposed the measure." (Marshall.)

There was little or no opposition to the convention manifested, however, and the delegates were duly chosen. On the 23d of May, 1785, the new body assembled at Danville, the sessions of which were also attended by a considerable number of interested citizens. Good order and calm deliberation characterized the discussions, and on the ninth day the conclusions to which the convention had come were expressed in the following resolutions:

First. Resolved, unanimously, as the opinion of this convention That a petition be presented to the assembly, praying that this district may be established into a State, separate from Virginia.

Second. Resolved, unanimously, as the opinion of this convention, That this district, when established into a State, ought to be taken into union with the United States of America, and enjoy equal privileges in common with said States.

Third. Resolved, That this convention recommend it to their constituents, to elect deputies in their respective counties to meet at Danville on the second Monday of August next, to serve in convention, and to continue by adjournment till the 1st day of April next, to take further under their consideration the state of the district.

Fourth. Resolved, unanimously, That the election of deputies for the proposed convention, ought to be on the principles of equal representation.

Fifth. Resolved, That the petition to the assembly for establishing this district into a State, and the several resolves of the former and present convention upon which the petition is founded, together with all other matters relative to the interests of the district, that have been under their consideration, be referred to the future convention, that such further measures may be taken thereon as they shall judge proper.

*There is some discrepancy between writers in the number of these conventions. This arises from the fact that some count the informal gathering convened by Col. Logan as the first convention. The succeeding meeting, the first to which delegates were chosen, is properly entitled to that distinction.

These resolutions are chiefly interesting on account of the unanimity they express in favor of separation, and the indication they afford of the independent development of new political ideas which was silently going forward in the frontier community. As has been indicated, the people were considerably divided upon the desirability of separation, and if the delegates may be supposed to have originally fairly represented the sentiment of their constituents, the arguments employed in favor of the radical measure must have been unusually convincing to win over the entire opposition. It is probable, however, that the delegates were chosen from the leading men irrespective of their sentiments, who in such an aggressive society were unlikely to sympathize with the conservative element. The assertion of population as the true basis of representation was a new departure, contrary to the constitution and settled practice of Virginia as well as the aristocratic sentiment which was slowly gaining a foothold in the district. It was an outgrowth of the liberal influences made prominent by the resolution, which, coming in contact with the plastic society of Kentucky, rendered it in important respects superior to the parent State.

Whatever the reasons which led to the unanimity of the convention, the delegates evidently had reason to believe that their constituents were not ready to endorse their action without further discussion, and while they drew up a petition to the legislature, chiefly, it would seem, as a matter of form, they took care not to present it, but referred it to the people with an address in which they presented every consideration in favor of their proposed action. As a complete statement of the grievances complained of at that time, it is worthy of reproduction:

TO THE INHABITANTS OF THE DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY.

Friends and Fellow Citizens: We your representatives, met in convention, in consequence of our appointment, beg leave to address you on a subject which we consider of the last importance to you, to ourselves and to unborn posterity. In every case, where it becomes necessary for one part of the community to separate from the other, duty to Almighty God, and a decent respect for the opinions of mankind, require that the causes which impel them thereto should be clearly and impartially set forth.

We hold it as a self-evident truth, that government is ordained for the ease and protection of the governed; and whenever these ends are not attained by one form of government, it is right, it is the duty of the people, to seek such other mode as will be most likely to insure to themselves and their posterity those blessings to which by nature they are entitled.

In the course of our inquiries, we find that several laws have passed the legislature of Virginia, which, although of a general nature, yet in their operation are particularly oppressive to the people of this district; and we also find, that from our local situation, we are deprived of many benefits of government which every citizen therein has a right to expect; as a few facts will sufficiently demonstrate.

We have no power to call out the militia, our sure and only defense, to oppose the wicked machinations of the savages, unless in case of actual invasion.

We can have no executive power in the district, either to enforce the execution of laws, or to grant pardons to objects of mercy; because such a power, would be inconsistent with the policy of government, and contrary to the present constitution.

We are ignorant of the laws that are passed, until a long time after they are enacted; and in many instances not until they have expired; by means whereof penalties may be inflicted for offenses never designed, and delinquents escape the punishment due to their crimes.

We are subjected to prosecute suits in the high court of appeals at Richmond, under every disadvantage, for the want of evidence, want of friends, and want of money.

Our money must necessarily be drawn from us not only for the support of civil government, but by individuals, who are frequently under the necessity of attending on the same.

Now, is it possible for the inhabitants of this district, at so remote a distance from the seat of government, ever to derive equal benefits with the citizens in the eastern part of the State; and this inconvenience must increase, as our country becomes more populous.

Our commercial interests can never correspond with or be regulated by theirs; and in case of any invasion, the State of Virginia can afford us no adequate protection, in comparison with the advantages we might (if a separate State) derive from the federal union.

On maturely considering truths of such great importance to every inhabitant of the district, with a firm persuasion that we were consulting the general good of our infant country, we have unanimously resolved—"that it is expedient and necessary for this district to be separated from Virginia, and established into a sovereign independent State, to be known by the name of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, and taken into union with the United States of America." In order to effect this purpose, we have agreed on a petition to be presented to the legislature of Virginia, at their next session, praying that a separation may take place; in which petition are fully set forth such terms as we thought beneficial to our infant country, and not inconsistent for Virginia to grant.

It is generally admitted that this district ought at some period, not far distant, to be separated from the government of Virginia. The only question then is, whether we are now of sufficient ability, either to fill the different offices of government, or provide for its support? In answer to the first part of this objection, examples have taught us that sound principles and plain sense suffice for every laudable purpose of government; and we generally find that the liberty of the subject and the laws of the land are in the highest reverence at the foundation and rise of States before the morals of the people have been vitiated by wealth and licentiousness, and their understandings entangled in visionary refinements, and chimerical distinctions; and as to the latter part, we have now in our power several valuable funds, which if by procrastination we suffer to be exhausted, we shall be stripped of every resource but internal taxation, and that under every disadvantage; and, therefore, we do not hesitate to pronounce it as our opinion that the present is preferable to any future period.

By an act of the last session of the assembly, we find that the revenue law is now fully and immediately to be enforced within the district, so that we shall not only pay a very considerable part of the tax for supporting the civil government of the State, but also be obliged to support our supreme court, and every other office we need in this district, at our own charge; and we are of opinion that the additional expense of the salaries to a governor, council, treasurer, and delegates to congress, will for a number of years, be more than saved out of the funds before alluded to, without any additional tax on the people.

To impress you still more with a sense of our regard for your interests as a free people, we have determined not to proceed in a matter of such magnitude without repeated appeals to your opinions; we have, therefore, recommended the election of another convention, to meet at Danville on the second Monday in August next, to take further into consideration the state of the district, and the resolves of this and the preceding convention. In this election we hope you will be actuated by a serious sense of the important objects which the proposed election is designed to promote.

Whatever may have been the true state of the facts thus traversed, the above statement of the case was believed to be well calculated to bring the people to the support of the advanced position of the convention; and, in the absence of a press, written copies were industriously circulated, while the late members of the convention were active in disseminating their views and enforcing them by similar arguments. The opponents of the measure were less active; their apprehensions were scarcely well enough defined to supply arguments, and they therefore passively awaited events rather than sought to control them. The election, accordingly, passed without serious contest, and the delegates-elect assembled at Danville, where, on the 8th of August, 1785, the third convention was organized. In providing for this convention, its predecessor had apportioned the representation among the counties, in the absence of any census, according to the title lists and muster rolls, which afforded a fairly accurate estimate of the population. In this apportionment, the number of delegates assigned to Jefferson County was 6; to Nelson, 6; to Lincoln, 10; and to Fayette, 8; a total of 30 delegates.*

This convention was distinguished by two notable features: the prominent character of its members, and the aggressive tone of its deliberations. To both of these, James Wilkinson contributed in an unusual degree.† He had entered the army early in the revolutionary struggle, and had gradually won honorable distinction and a high official position before its close. On the return of peace he had come to Pennsylvania, had engaged in mercantile pursuits, and had in the meantime served in the assembly of his adopted State. In February of the preceding year, he had

*According to Marshall (Vol. I, p. 207,) only twenty-six members attended, as follows: from Lincoln—Samuel McDowell, George Muter, Christopher Irvin, William Kennedy, Benjamin Logan, Caleb Wallace, Harry Innes, John Edwards and James Speed.

From Fayette—James Wilkinson, James Garrard, Levi Todd, John Coburn, James Trotter, John Craig and Robert Patterson.

From Jefferson—Richard Terrell, George Wilson, Benjamin Sebastian and Philip Barbour.

From Nelson—Isaac Cox, Isaac Morrison, Andrew Hines, Matthew Walton, James Morrison and James Rogers.

Of these, Wilkinson was foremost in brilliant accomplishments and honorable distinction; McDowell, Muter, Wallace and Sebastian were at different times members of the highest court of Kentucky; Innes was attorney-general, and subsequently judge of the United States Court for Kentucky; Logan, Patterson, Todd were scarcely less distinguished by their eminent services in the early history of the district, while scarcely one of the other members failed to prominently identify his name with some of the best achievements of the new State.

†Appendix A, Note 27.

come to Lexington, where his grace of manner and power of intellect easily captivated "the simple and rustic Kentuckians." "A person, not quite tall enough to be perfectly elegant, was compensated by its symmetry and appearance of health and strength. A countenance, open, mild, capacious and beaming with intelligence; a gait, firm, manly and facile; manners, bland, accommodating and popular; an address, easy, polite and gracious; invited approach, gave access, insured attention, cordiality and ease. By these fair forms, he conciliated; by these, he captivated." (Marshall.)

The general was undoubtedly ambitious; was not averse to reaching his ends by indirect methods, and came to Kentucky to improve his fortune in any way that the formative state of society should suggest. Accordingly, while earnestly engaged in pushing his business operations, the growing public interest in the question of separation did not escape his attention. He was not a member of either the first or second convention, though it is believed that he exercised a controlling influence over the action of the second, and inspired, if he did not write, the address put forth by that body. In the third convention he was undoubtedly the vis a tergo, and drew up the petition to the legislature as well as the impassioned appeal to the people. The convention spent several days in the consideration of the papers committed to it by its predecessors, when, "according to the order of the day, it resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the district," and after some time spent in discussion, the committee arose and made its report to the convention at the hand of Mr. Muter. This report recites in an itemized statement the identical grievances which formed the burden of the address already quoted, though in more elegant phrase and more forcible manner. In the address to the legislature, "the complimentary style of adulation and insincerity" was discarded, as it became "freemen, when speaking to freemen, to employ the plain, manly and unadorned language of independence, supported by conscious rectitude." The character of the whole petition, if such it may properly be called, was in keeping with this profession, and after reciting the familiar objections to the present relation, prayed "that an act may pass at the ensuing session of assembly, declaring and acknowledging the sovereignty and independence of this district."

The appeal to the people was of a still more aggressive character, and was well calculated to incite the people to illegal action. The Indians had again begun to harass the frontier with fire-brand and tomahawk, and furnished the ready writer with an argument that touched the most sensitive point in the Kentucky character. It was addressed to the "inhabitants of the district of Kentucky" as "friends and countrymen," and proceeded as follows:

> Your representatives in convention having completed the important business for which they were especially elected, feel it their duty, before they adjourn, to call your attention to the calamities with which our country appears to be threatened—blood has been spilled from the eastern to the western extremity of the district; accounts have been given to the convention, from post St. Vincennes, which indicate a disposition in the savages for general war; in the meantime, if we look nearer home, we shall find our borders infested and constant depredations committed on our property. Whatever may be the remote designs of the savages, these are causes sufficient to rouse our attention, that we may be prepared not only to defend but punish those who, unprovoked, offend us. God and nature have given us the power, and we shall stand condemned, in the eyes of heaven and mankind, if we do not employ it, to redress our wrongs and assert our rights.
>
> The Indians are now reconnoitering our settlements, in order that they may hereafter direct their attacks with more certain effect, and we seem patiently to await the stroke of the tomahawk. Strange indeed it is, that although we can hardly pass a spot which does not remind us of the murder of a father or brother or friend, we should take no single step for our own preservation. Have we forgot the surprise of Bryant's, or the shocking destruction of Kincheloe's station? Let us ask you, ask ourselves, what is there to prevent a repetition of such barbarous scenes? Five hundred Indians might be conducted undiscovered to our very thresholds, and the knife may be put to the throats of our sleeping wives and children. For shame! let us rouse from our lethargy; let us arm, associate and embody; let us call upon our officers to do their duty; and determine to hold in detestation and abhorrence, and treat as enemies to the community, every person who shall withhold his countenance and support of such measures as may be recommended for our common defense. Let it be remembered that a stand must be made somewhere; not to support our present frontier would be the height of cruelty as well as folly. For should it give way, those who now hug themselves in security will take the front of danger, and we shall in a short time be huddled together in stations, a situation, in our present circumstances, scarcely preferable to death. Let us remember that supineness and inaction may entice the enemy to general hostilities, whilst preparation and offensive movements will disconcert their plans, drive them from our borders, secure ourselves, and protect our property; therefore,

Resolved, That the convention in the name and behalf of the people, do call on the lieutenants, or commanding officers of the respective counties of this district, forthwith to carry into operation the law for regulating and disciplining the militia.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the officers, to assemble in their respective counties, and concert such plans as they may deem expedient for the defense of our country, or for carrying expeditions against the hostile nations of Indians.

In view of the actual facts, the entire expression of this convention cannot but be considered in the last degree intemperate. No petition for separation had yet been presented to the assembly, nor had Virginia manifested any disposition to maintain the existing relation longer than should prove to the mutual prosperity of both sections. In fact, every authoritative utterance from 1776 to the date of the legislative address had been to the contrary. The attitude of independence assumed lacked every element of dignity, and betrayed far more of bravado than patriotism. The popular address was simple demagogism. The danger to be feared from the Indians was grossly exaggerated, and the appeal to "arm, associate and embody," as well as the final resolutions, was idle vaporing or an attempt to incite the borderers to unlawful enterprises, which would tend to complicate the situation and render appropriate action by the constituted authorities more difficult and uncertain. To Wilkinson such a view of the matter had little weight. He was essentially selfish in his action, and undoubtedly hoped to profit by thus pandering to the prejudices of the less thoughtful of the community. That the eminent gentlemen who made up the membership of the convention should unanimously endorse such pronunciamentos must excite surprise, but it is probable that the end in view was more closely scanned than the methods by which it was sought.

Copies of the popular address were multiplied by the pen and industriously circulated among the people. Henceforward, there were two active parties among the citizens of the district, both seeking separation, but the one advocating a temperate, legal and dignified course, while the other urged an aggressive, peremptory, and, if need be, a violent dissolution of the tie. Wilkinson became the leader of the latter, and practiced all the arts of a popular leader to engage the attention of the class to whom the address most strongly appealed, and win them to the support of his measures. He set up an ostentatious establishment, cultivated the friendship of the younger and more ardent spirits, and liberally dispensed a lavish hospitality, with such success as to bewilder the judgment of many whose intelligence was unmoved by his arguments. His talents, which were of a high order, accomplished the rest, and he was for the time the leading spirit, if not the autocrat, of district politics.

In the midst of the discussion thus produced, the address to the legislature—committed for presentation to Muter, the chief justice, and Innes, the attorney-general of the district—had come before the assembly. That body found no difficulty in granting the wish of the Kentuckians, and in January, 1786, in recognition of the remoteness of the district and the natural difficulties attending the necessary intercourse between the two sections, it was provided that the expediency of the measure, and "the will of the good people of the district," should be determined by another convention to be held at Danville on the fourth Monday in the following September. The convention was to be composed of five representatives from each of the seven counties (Bourbon, Madison and Mercer were formed in this session), to be elected on the court days in August, and to continue in appointment for one year. Two-thirds of the representatives-elect were to form a quorum, and a majority of votes to decide their action; and if, by such an expression, it appeared to be the will of the people, the district should be erected into an independent State on certain stipulated conditions,* of which the one requiring the assent of congress before the 1st day of June, 1787, proved the greatest obstacle to the wished-for consummation.

This act was received in the district with general disfavor. Many of the aggressive party complained of the delay involved in again submitting the question of expediency when three conventions had given such unmistakable expression upon that point, while objection to other of the conditions was entertained by the people irrespective of factional lines. A fourth convention appeared unavoidable, however, and both parties prepared to contest the election. The increasing depredations of the savages afforded Wilkinson and his following a powerful argument, and with a new boldness they declared their intention in case of success to throw off the authority of Virginia without delay. As the time of election approached, it was publicly given out that Wilkinson would advocate this course in a speech to the people at Lexington at the opening of the polls. The opposite faction, accordingly, selected a champion to reply. The day arrived, the speech was made, and also the reply. In the forensic contest, the general seems to have succeeded in outwitting his antagonist rather than in convincing the voters, many of whom, being from the remoter districts, were less under the influence of aggressive champions. It occurred to these simple people that such action would place Kentucky in an attidude hostile to Virginia, a position they were not prepared to assume. The officers in charge were in the interest of Wilkinson, and observing the unexpected strength of the opposition did not open the polls until late in the day, and, after receiving the votes of about one-fifth of those present, postponed the election to gain time for their favorite to concert measures to counteract the popular tendency.

The law authorized the polls to be opened on five consecutive days, and the opposition, understanding the tactics employed, retired, declaring their intention of massing their forces on the last day. This plan readily suggested the means to circumvent it. Voters favorable to Wilkinson's election were urged to attend the polls on the intervening days, and on the final day, in those sections where the greatest opposition existed, voters were prevented from attending the election through the connivance of the militia officers, who summoned the people to appear at musters set for that date. The result was that Wilkinson and his supporters were elected. It was a barren victory, however, for in the face of such determined and powerful opposition, he found it unadvisable to proceed to extremes, while other events contributed to render the convention of no effect in forwarding the proposed separation.

In this year occurred the futile expedition to the Wabash, and the more successful one against the Shawanese, under Col. Logan. Accordingly, when certain of the members-elect convened at Danville, in the latter part of September, they found that the military activities had drawn upon their numbers so heavily as to leave less than the required quorum to do business. They nevertheless, in the character of a committee, drew up a memorial to the legislature, in which they represented the reasons which prevented the regular organization of the convention, and at the same time suggested that certain changes should be made in the terms of separation. This was transmitted to John Marshall, then resident in Richmond, by whom it was presented to the assembly. In the meantime, a few of the members with the

*A letter from Madison to Washington, under date of December 9, 1785, gives a concise statement of these conditions, as follows: "Kentucky made a formal application for independence. Her memorial has been considered, and the terms of separation fixed by a committee of the whole. The substance of them is, that all private rights and interests, derived from the laws of Virginia, shall be secured; that the unlocated lands shall be applied to the objects to which the laws of Virginia have appropriated them; that the Ohio shall be a common highway for the citizens of the United States, and the jurisdiction of Kentucky and Virginia, as far as the remaining territory of the latter will be thereon, be concurrent only with the new states on the opposite shore; that the proposed State shall take its due share of our state debts; and that the separation shall not take place unless these terms shall be approved by a convention to be held to decide the question, nor until congress shall assent thereto, and fix the terms of their admission into the Union. The limits of the proposed State are to be the same with the present limits of the district. The apparent coolness of the representatives of Kentucky, as to separation, since these terms have been defined, indicates that they had some views, which will not be favored by them. They dislike much to be hung upon the will of congress." Spark's Life of Washington, Vol. IX, p. 510. For conditions in full, see Marshall, Vol. I, p. 223, 224.

clerk assembled, and adjourned from day to day, until some time in January, 1787, when a quorum was secured. The question was then again brought up for consideration and again unanimously affirmed. At this juncture the second act of the legislature was received by which the convention found itself superseded, and the whole matter referred to a fifth convention.

The chagrin and vexation of the members on the reception of this postponement of their wishes was great indeed, and while they with good sense and decorum immediately adjourned, they added this disappointment to the sum of their grievances, and urged it as an additional argument in favor of immediate separation. The action thus complained of was not, however, the result of hostility on the part of Virginia. From a letter of Mr. Marshall, who represented the memorialists before the assembly, as well as from the act itself, the legislature still appeared ready to grant the desired separation, but it considered that the delay of the convention to act made it impossible for congress to give its assent within the stipulated time; "that the twelve months' existence allowed to the convention, for other purposes, might, in the divided state of public opinion, involve difficulties, especially as there did not appear to be in the minority a disposition to submit to the will of the majority; that the proceedings of the convention would be subject to objections in consequence of defects in the law; and that the most safe, accommodating and unexceptionable course would be to pass a new law, in which the defects of the former act might be corrected; and to call another convention, to the decision of which even the disappointed could make no reasonable objection." (Marshall, Vol. I, p. 255).

The new act differed little in the character of its requirements, while it granted certain privileges which provided against the recurrence of the obstacles which had rendered the last convention abortive. Representatives were to be elected on the court days in August, 1787; the convention was to meet at Danville on the third Monday in September following; the limit within which congress was to grant its assent was fixed at the 4th of July, 1787; and the earliest date on which separation could take place was changed from September 1, 1787, as in the first act, to January 1, 1789. At the same time it was provided that five members assembled should have the power to adjourn from day to day, and to issue writs of election, if necessary, to fill vacancies, and that in case two-thirds of the members-elect did not convene within fifteen days of the time appointed, any number, in which a majority should concur in the vote, should be competent to decide in favor of separation. On the contrary, if the requisite two-thirds did assemble within the period indicated, while a majority should be competent to organize, the question of separation must be affirmed by a two-thirds vote to make it valid.

Before the citizens of the district were called upon to provide for a new convention under this act, a fresh source of agitation was developed in the negotiations concerning the navigation of the Mississippi. The origin of this controversy dates back to the year 1780, when Spain, having joined France in the war against England, sought through the French government an alliance with the United States. It was about the time of Mr. Jay's arrival in Madrid, as minister to the Spanish Court, when the French minister was instructed, in behalf of his Catholic majesty of Spain, "to communicate to the congress, certain articles, which his Catholic majesty deems of great importance to the interests of his crown, and on which it is highly necessary that the United States explain themselves, with precision, and with such moderation, as may consist with their essential rights." These "articles" referred to the western boundary of the United States, the navigation of the Mississippi, the possession of Florida and the territory east of the Mississippi. The minister proceeded to give "the idea of the cabinet of Madrid" to the effect "that the United States extend to the westward no farther than settlements were permitted by the royal proclamation, bearing date the 7th day of October, 1763 (that is to say, not west of the Alleghanies); that the United States do not consider themselves as having any right to navigate the Mississippi, no territory belonging to them being situated thereon; that the lands lying on the east side of the Mississippi, whereon the settlements were prohibited by the aforesaid proclamation, are possessions of the crown of Great Britain, and proper objects against which the arms of Spain may be employed, for the purpose of making a permanent conquest for the Spanish crown; that such conquest may, probably, be made during the present war; that, therefore, it would be advisable to restrain the Southern States from making any settlements or conquests in these territories; and that the council of Madrid consider the United States as having no claim to these territories, either as not having possession of them before the present war, or not having any foundation for a claim in the right of the sovereignty of Great Britain, whose dominion they have abjured."*

Such preposterous claims were answered by "a word and a blow, and the blow came first." In the spring of 1780 Clark erected Fort Jefferson on the bank of the river, and in October the American "idea" was dispatched to Mr. Jay, the representative of the United States at Madrid. Neither congress nor Mr. Jay for a moment admitted the claims of Spain, nor did that power readily yield her extravagant pretensions. In January, 1781, under the evident inspiration of his government, a Spanish officer, with sixty-five men, set out from St. Louis, and, proceeding far into the interior, captured the unimportant post of St. Joseph, in the Northwest. This done, and the territory formally taken possession of in behalf of the Spanish crown, the troop quietly returned to the west bank of the Mississippi. In the meantime the American government greatly felt the need of friends, and satisfied for the time with such expressions as had been made, in February, 1781, instructed Mr. Jay not to insist upon the navigation of the river, if a treaty could be concluded without giving it up. Thus matters stood during the year of 1782; Spain, supported by the influence of France, demanding recognition of her extraordinary claims, and the United States politely evading the issue.

In 1785 negotiations were transferred to the Western Hemisphere. Jay had become secretary of State, and Don Diego Gardoqui had been sent hither to press the Spanish demands. On July 20 congress authorized the secretary to negotiate with the Spanish representative, but up to May, 1786, no progress had been made in the matter. At this time the secretary brought the whole business before congress, asking for instructions. That official represented that no adjustment of the conflicting claims had been reached; that the interests of the whole country demanded a commercial treaty with Spain; and that this could probably be effected only by surrendering the right to the free use of the Mississippi. The secretary suggested that a compromise should be made, and that the free use of the river below the bounds of the United States should be yielded for a period of twenty-five or thirty years. This proposition was at once earnestly opposed by the Southern members, but outvoted by the representatives of the Eastern and Middle States, and congress instructed Mr. Jay to continue the negotiations without insisting at all hazards upon the immediate use of the river.

This decision was reached in August, and information of the disposition of the government to practically sacrifice the West gradually found its way across the mountains. There was, at this period, no postoffice in Kentucky, nor any regular or safe mode of transmitting letters or papers from the East. News of governmental affairs came in the form of rumors, which, gathering new forms and colors by each repetition, finally reached the credulous people on the frontier in a shape so distorted as to appear portentous. Thus came the first intimation of congressional action in the matter of the Spanish claims.

At the same time, confirmatory intelligence was received from the Illinois country. On the failure of the Wabash campaign, Gen. Clark had remained at Vincennes, where he enlisted new troops, impressed supplies, and seized upon Spanish property on his own authority. In the following December (1786), a Thomas Green wrote from Louisville to the authorities of Georgia, which was then involved in a boundary controversy with Spain, that the general was ready to demand the river, with troops enough to take and hold the lands in question, if the Georgians would countenance the movement.* Wells, the agent whom Green and Clark united to employ, showed his papers to various persons at Danville, while on his journey south. Copies were taken and forwarded with a communication to the Virginia authorities, signed by Wilkinson and fourteen other leading Kentuckians. In February, 1787, this communication from Kentucky came before the Virginia council, which condemned the action of Clark, disavowed the authority assumed, ordered the prosecution of those concerned in the high-handed measures taken at Vincennes, and laid the whole business before congress. In April, the matter came up for discussion, and on the 24th instant troops were ordered to dispossess the intruders at Vincennes, and to garrison the post.

*See Annals of the West, p. 22, where it is quoted from Pitkin's History of the United States, Vol. II, p. 92.

These transactions were sufficient to excite the people of the district to a political ferment, and when a certain "committee of correspondence in the western part of Pennsylvania" made a formal communication of the proposition of Mr. Jay, certain of the leaders in favor of immediate separation seized the opportunity to appeal to the people in a circular letter addressed "to the different courts in the western country."

*A letter written from Louisville by the same person, ostensibly to some one in the East, found its way to Tennessee, where it was widely circulated. It bore date of December 4, 1786, and was, doubtless, similar to the one dispatched by messenger to Georgia. In this the writer represents: "Our situation is as bad as it possibly can be, therefore every exertion to retrieve our circumstances must be manly, eligible and just.

"We can raise 20,000 troops this side the Alleghany and Appalachian Mountains; and the annual increase of them by immigration from other parts is from 2,000 to 4,000.

"We have taken all the goods belonging to the Spanish merchants of Fort Vincennes and the Illinois, and are determined that they shall not trade up the river, provided they will not let us trade down it. Preparations are now making here (if necessary) to drive the Spaniards from their settlements, at the mouth of the Mississippi. In case we are not countenanced and succored by the United States (if we need it), our allegiance will be thrown off, and some other power applied to. Great Britain stands ready with open arms to receive and support us. They have already offered to open their resources for our supplies. When once re-united to them, 'farewell, a long farewell' to all your boasted greatness. The Province of Canada, and the inhabitants of these waters, of themselves, in time, will be able to conquer you. You are as ignorant of this country as Great Britain was of America. These are hints, that if rightly improved may be of some service; if not, blame yourselves for the neglect." (Annals of the West, p. 282, quoted from Secret Journals Vol. IV, p. 323.)

KENTUCKY, DANVILLE, March 29, 1787.

A respectable number of the inhabitants of the district, having met at this place, being greatly alarmed at the late proceedings of congress, in proposing to cede to the Spanish court the navigation of the Mississippi River for twenty-five or thirty years, have directed us to address the inhabitants on the western waters, and inform them of the measures which it is proper for this district to adopt.

The inhabitants of the several counties in this district will be requested to elect five members in each county, to meet at Danville on the first Monday of May, to take up the consideration of this project of congress; to appoint a committee of correspondence, and to communicate with the one already established on the Monongahela, or any others that may be constituted; to appoint delegates to meet representatives from the several districts on the western waters in convention, should a convention be deemed necessary; and to adopt such other measures as shall be most conducive to our happiness. As we conceive that all the inhabitants residing on the western waters are equally affected by this partial conduct of congress, we doubt not but they will readily approve of our conduct, and cheerfully adopt a similar system to prevent a measure which tends to almost a total destruction of the western country. This is a subject which requires no comment; the injustice of the measure is glaring, and as the inhabitants of this district wish to unite their efforts to oppose the cession of the navigation of the Mississippi with those of their brethren residing on the western waters, we hope to see such an exertion made upon this important occasion, as may convince congress that the inhabitants of the western country are united in the opposition, and consider themselves entitled to all the privileges of freemen, and those blessings procured by the revolution, and will not tamely submit to an act of oppression which would tend to a deprivation of our just rights and privileges.

This document was signed by George Muter, Harry Innes, John Brown* and Benjamin Sebastian. A copy of the letter found its way into each county, and with it a new feeling of alarm, which gradually found its way to the remotest corners. The call for a convention to consider the subject met with a ready response, and in May the delegates convened. A short conference developed the fact that either the case was not so alarming as at first supposed, or that the convention could effect nothing to its purpose, and it

*Save Mr. Brown, the signers of this circular have all been noted as prominent in the public business of the district. Brown was the son of a Virginia Presbyterian clergyman. He finished his education about the close of the revolutionary war, and in 1783 came to Kentucky. He built up an extended law practice and early took an active part in politics. He was a member of the convention of 1786; appeared as signer to this document, and in this year was elected to the legislature, from which he was sent as a delegate to congress.

therefore adjourned without taking action. This agitation, however, contributed in no small degree to the restlessness of the people. The sectional feeling, which notoriously prevailed throughout the country, made the borderers believe that their interests were likely to be made subsidiary to those of the older communities,* and the feeling that they must take care of themselves, already strikingly shown, began rapidly to gain ground with the people of the district. About this time Col. Logan led an expedition against certain of the southern Indians who were included in the Hopewell treaty. These at once sought redress from the authorities, charging the Kentuckians as the aggressors. This brought prompt instructions from the governor to Innes, the attorney-general, to prosecute the offenders and to take measures to prevent a recurrence of similar illegal movements.

To this communication, Innes replied by letter, under date of July 21, 1787, in which he said: "In my official capacity, I cannot do it; in a private capacity, it would render me odious," and with this, all attempt at legal prosecution of such offenses ended. He added, however, as a "hint to your excellency for matter of reflection" that "the Indians have been very troublesome on our frontiers, and still continue to molest us. From which circumstances, I am decidedly of opinion, that this western country will in a few years act for itself, and erect an independent government; for under the present system, we cannot exert our strength; neither does congress seem disposed to protect us, for we are informed that those troops which congress directed the several States to raise for the defense of the western country are disbanded." This was, quite probably, an extreme view of the situation, but one which had far more foundation in truth than the partisan feeling of the historian, Marshall, seems willing to allow. However, with other similar expressions, it had the effect to stimulate the State and national governments to increased efforts to remove the grievance of which complaint was made.

Another circumstance, which tended to somewhat calm the agitation, was the absence of Wilkinson, who would scarcely have allowed such a favorable opportunity for the furtherance of his plans, as the May convention afforded, to pass unimproved. Notwithstanding his activity in public affairs, the general does not appear to have lost sight of his business enterprise, and it was more at the bidding of private interest than public policy that he ventured with a cargo of tobacco, hams and butter, within the forbidden precincts of the Spanish territory. His boat left Louisville in June and reached New Orleans without the usual opposition, where its contents were sold at a good profit. Wilkinson, proceeding south by land, arrived some time after these events, and began those relations with the Spanish authorities of Louisiana which served to involve his character in a cloud of doubt that has never been entirely dispelled.*

It was doubtless due to these facts that the August elections passed without special incident. The delegates to the district convention were chosen without serious contest. and on September 17th assembled at Danville with scarcely a member elect absent. The organization accomplished, the question of expediency proposed by the act of separation was brought forward, and with little discussion again decided unanimously in the affirmative, subject to "the terms and conditions prescribed by law." These significant conditions are indicative of the temper of the convention, which, in this respect, was in marked contrast with its predecessor. Congress was petitioned for the admission of the new State, under the name of Kentucky, and December 31, 1788, fixed upon as the date when the present relation to Virginia should cease. Neither the legislature nor the people were addressed upon the subject, but, for their information, the president of the convention was directed to forward to the governor a copy of its proceedings, and a transcript of its journal was prepared for publication in the Kentucky Gazette, which had been established in the preceding August. The president was also directed to "address the representatives from this district to the general assembly, requesting that they will use their endeavors to have an inhabitant of the district appointed a delegate to congress for the ensuing year." Provision was also made "that a convention should be elected with full power and authority to frame and establish a fundamental constitution of government for the proposed State, and to declare what laws shall be in force therein, until abrogated or altered by the legislative authority acting under the constitution so to be framed and established."

*Washington, who greatly desired the construction of works to connect the Ohio with the Potomac and the James Rivers, thought the temporary closing of the Mississippi might aid this project, as well as drive the West into closer relations with the Atlantic States. These views received the support of such influential men as Henry Lee and Richard Henry Lee. (See "Annals of the West" p. 287, and references to Spark's "Life of Washington.")

* Appendix A, Note 28.

Mr. Marshall accounts for this mildness of temper exhibited by the convention by the facts that "the leader of violent separation" was in New Orleans; "Mr. Brown was probably in Virginia, having been that year elected to the legislature. If Innes and Sebastian were present, they were not yet prepared to lead in such an enterprise, for they were then but as common troopers; while the eyes of Muter being opened, he had drawn back to constitutional grounds." It was probably due more to the absence of leaders than to a change in the public disposition. But in February, 1788, Wilkinson returned from the South, by way of Charleston, S. C., and made his entry into Louisville in state, riding in a "chariot" drawn by four horses and accompanied by several slaves. It was immediately given out that he had secured from the Louisiana authorities the privilege of shipping tobacco to New Orleans on the most advantageous terms, and the general forthwith offered to purchase the unmarketed product, the cultivation of which he had previously urged. Wilkinson appeared to have entered into the speculation with great energy, and in January, 1789, fitted out twenty-five large boats, laden with tobacco, flour and provisions, for New Orleans. These goods were successfully disposed of, and later in the year, two mules loaded with specie were delivered to the general at Frankfort, where a crowd of Lincoln County planters were assembled to receive payment for tobacco sold to Wilkinson.

All this appears to have been open and above reasonable suspicion, but the ambitious trader seems to have been unwilling to confine his efforts to commercial life, and early sought to turn his success with the Spanish authorities to a political account in furthering his advancement in public life. He therefore assumed great credit for securing what the general government was willing to surrender; and so plausible was his argument, so winning his address, that the tide of public favor seemed about to waft him to the goal of his desires. There were not wanting a "few" who suspected "that more was meant than a mere traffic in tobacco," but such was the public temper that they were forced to communicate their fears to political sympathizers in "whispers." Another subject which at this time lent its aid to the plans of Wilkinson was the adoption of the Federal constitution, which had been submitted to the States for ratification in the preceding September. The people of the district were very generally opposed to its ratification. They had experienced what they believed to be the selfish legislation of the Atlantic States in the negotiations concerning the Mississippi River, in the dilatory measures undertaken against the savages, and in the vexatious delays which had repeatedly deferred the separation of the district from Virginia, and they had no wish to have the power, thus unjustly exercised, increased. It was believed that the new constitution would do this, and the feeling of opposition ranged from a wish for its unconditional defeat to its amendment before adoption.

It was with such sentiments that the people prepared for the April election, at which a double set of delegates were to be chosen. In addition to five from each county, authorized by the Fifth District convention (September, 1787), the legislature had authorized each county in the State to elect at the same time two members to meet in convention in June, at Richmond, for the purpose of considering the new Federal constitution. There was little division of sentiment involved in this election, and therefore no special contest. The district convention was called for the purpose of submitting a constitution for the proposed State of Kentucky, and involved none of the issues before the people. In regard to the Federal constitution, with the exception of Jefferson County, which was strongly Federal in sentiment, there was little feeling manifested by the Kentuckians in favor of its ratification. The people had generally settled down to the belief that, for one reason or another, it would be rejected, and delegates were selected chiefly on personal grounds.*

The State convention met, and on the 25th of June ratified the new constitution by a vote of eighty-eight to seventy-eight. Of the Kentucky members, Robert Breckenridge, Rice Bullock and Humphrey Marshall voted with the majority, the latter alone disappointing his constituents. When the result of the convention was known in Kentucky, there was a deep feeling of disappointment and resentment experienced, especially in regard to the conduct of Mr. Marshall. He undoubtedly acted upon the proper view of the relation of representative and constituency, and provided he made no expressed or implied engagement to act otherwise, of which there is no evidence, the member from Fayette cannot be reasonably charged with a violation of good faith. But the people did not view the matter in so calm a manner, and the independent delegate narrowly escaped the violent expression of his constituency's displeasure.

On the 28th of July, the Sixth District convention, but the first called for the framing of a constitution, assembled at Danville, and while in session learned that congress had refused to act upon the question of Kentucky's admission to the confederacy. In accordance with the request of the fifth convention, John Brown had been sent to congress by the legislature in the preceding December; on the 29th of February he had presented the petition of the convention for the admission of the district as an independent member of the Federal union, but there were many obstacles in the way of its early and final disposition, and so the subject was alternately debated and deferred from February to May, from May to June, from June to July, when the whole matter was referred to the first congress under the newly adopted constitution. This decision was announced on the 3d of July by resolution, in which congress directed a copy of the proceedings "relative to the independence of the district of Kentucky" to be sent to the Virginia legislature, and also to Samuel McDowell, "late president" of the fifth convention, and that the inhabitants of the district be informed, "that as the constitution of the United States is now ratified, congress think it unadvisable to adopt any further measures for admitting the district of Kentucky," etc.; "but that congress, thinking it expedient that the said district be made a separate State, and member of the Union, as soon after proceedings shall commence under the said constitution, as circumstances shall permit," recommend to both parties concerned that steps be taken anew to bring it before congress again.

The preamble to this resolution throws no additional light upon the reasons on which this conclusion was reached. It appears that, after fully considering the subject, congress "did, on the 3d day of June last, resolve that it is expedient that the said district be erected into a sovereign and independent State, and a separate member of the Federal union, and appointed a committee to report an act accordingly," but the sentence inconsequently concludes, "which committee on the second instant was discharged," as, by the ninth State having ratified the new constitution, a new order of things had set in. There is nothing in all this to indicate why the committee should have delayed a full month to report upon a matter which congress had declared expedient, after several months' consideration. Letters from Mr. Brown to Judges McDowell and Muter did better in this respect. To the latter he wrote:

*The members of the State Convention, as given by Butler (p. 166, note,) were: From Fayette County, Humphrey Marshall and John Fowler; from Jefferson, Robert Breckenridge and Rice Bullock; Lincoln, John Logan and Henry Pawling; Nelson, John Steele and Matthew Walton; Mercer, Thomas Allen and Alexander Robertson; Madison, G. Clay and William Irvine; Bourbon, Henry Lee and John Edwards

Before this reaches you, I expect you will have heard the determination of congress relative to the separation of Kentucky, as a copy of the proceedings has been forwarded to the district by the secretary of congress a few days ago. It was not in my power to obtain a decision earlier than the 3d instant. Great part of the winter and spring there was not a representation of the States sufficient to proceed to this business, and after it was referred to a grand committee, they could not be prevailed upon to report, a majority of them being opposed to the measure. The Eastern States would not, nor do I think they ever will, assent to the admission of the district into the Union as an independent State, unless Vermont or the province of Maine is brought forward at the same time. The change which has taken place in the general government is made the ostensible objection to the measure; but the jealousy of the growing importance of the western country, and an unwillingness to add a vote to the southern interest, are the real causes of opposition, and I am inclined to believe that they will exist to a certain degree even under the new government, to which the application is referred by congress.*

The effect of these communications upon the members of the Constitutional convention, which were as unexpected as disappointing, may readily be imagined. "The most deep-felt vexation, a share of ill-temper bordering on disaffection to the legal course of things, and strong symptoms of assuming independent government," were manifested. The navigation of the Mississippi, and the trade to New Orleans, now just tasted for the first time, were strenuously pressed into the argument in favor of completing the constitution and organizing government without delay. And had not these dispositions been met with a determined countenance, and overawed by those of a contrary tendency, it is not difficult to believe that immediate separation would have taken place.† It was proposed by the aggressive party that the course to be pursued should be referred to the captains of the various militia companies, who should take the sense of their commands by vote. This proposition was opposed on the most valid grounds by the more conservative members, and finally abandoned, but the session was protracted several days by these spirited discussions, when the convention adjourned after agreeing upon the following recommendation and resolutions:

WHEREAS, It appears to the members of this convention that the United States in congress assembled have for the present declined to ratify the compact entered into between the legislature of Virginia and the people of this district, respecting the erection of the district into an independent State, in consequence of which the powers vested in this convention are dissolved, and whatever order or resolution they pass cannot be considered as having any legal force or obligation; but being anxious for the safety and prosperity of ourselves and constituents, do earnestly recommend to the good people inhabiting the several counties within the district, each to elect five representatives at the times of holding their courts in the month of October next, to meet at Danville on the first Monday in November following, to continue in office until the 1st of January, 1790; and that they delegate to their said representatives full powers to take such measures for obtaining admission of the district as a separate and independent member of the United States of America, and the navigation of the Mississippi, as may appear most conducive to those important purposes; and also to form a constitution of government for the district, and organize the same when they shall judge it necessary, or to do and accomplish whatsoever, on a consideration of the state of the district, may in their opinion promote its interests.

Resolved, That the elections directed by the preceding recommendation be held at the court house of each county, and continue from day to day for five days, including the first day.

Resolved, That the sheriffs within the respective counties of this district be requested to hold the said elections, and make return thereof to the clerk of the supreme court immediately after the same are finished; and also deliver to each representative, so elected, a certificate of his election; and in case there shall be no sheriff in either of the said counties or he should refuse to act, that any two acting magistrates there present may superintend and conduct said elections, and make returns, and grant certificates in the same manner the sheriffs are requested to do.

Resolved, That every free male inhabitant of each county within said district has a right to vote in the said elections within their said counties.

Resolved, That a majority of the members so elected be a quorum to proceed to business.

Resolved, That if the said convention shall not make a house on the first Monday in November, any three or more members then assembled may adjourn from day to day for five days next ensuing, and if a convention should not then be formed at the end of the fifth day, that they may adjourn to any day they think proper, not exceeding one month.

Resolved, That the clerk of each county, or the

*This letter was not made public until 1790, but the one addressed to McDowell was of similar import, and was probably laid before the convention, save a private communication in regard to Spanish affairs, to be referred to hereafter.

†See Marshall, Vol. I, p. 289.

said magistrates, as the case may be, read, or cause to be read, the aforesaid resolutions on each day immediately preceding the opening of the said elections.

Ordered, That the president do request the printer of the Kentucky Gazette to publish the proceedings and resolves of congress, by him laid before this convention; also such of the proceedings of this convention as the president shall think proper; and in particular, that the printer continue to publish weekly, until the 1st of October next, the recommendation for electing another convention, and the several resolutions relative thereto.

Thus the issue of immediate or delayed separation came again before the people for decision, largely at the polls. Fayette County, being the home of the chief leaders, became the scene of a spirited campaign. The militia captains were important factors in the early political machinery of Kentucky, and the wordy contests between the partisans of one or the other of the parties were frequent and warm. Opposed to Wilkinson were Col. Thomas Marshall, Sr., and Judge Muter, who did not hesitate to charge the general with improper and illegal relations with the Spanish authorities, and with designing, under cover of the final clauses of the Sixth convention's recommendation, to form an independent government in the district for the purpose of entering into relations with Spain without the sanction of Virginia or of the general government. These gentlemen were impelled to this course by something more substantial than mere suspicions. The discussions in the last convention had aroused their alarm, which was fully confirmed by the letter from Brown addressed to Muter and immediately shown by the latter to Col. Marshall. In this Brown wrote, in addition to the part already quoted:

The question which the district will now have to determine upon, will be: Whether or not, it will be more expedient to continue the connexion with the State of Virginia, or declare their independence and proceed to frame a constitution of government? 'Tis generally expected that the latter will be the determination, as you have proceeded too far to think of relinquishing the measure, and the interest of the district will render it altogether expedient to continue in your present situation until an application for admission into the Union can be made, in a constitutional mode, to the new government.

This step will, in my opinion, tend to preserve unanimity, and will enable you to adopt with effect such measures as may be necessary to promote the interest of the district. In private conferences which I have had with Mr. Gardoqui, the Spanish minister at this place, I have been assured by him, in the most explicit manner, that if Kentucky will declare her independence, and empower some proper person to negotiate with him, that he has authority, and will engage to open the navigation of the Mississippi, for the exportation of their produce, on terms of mutual advantage. But that this privilege never can be extended to them while part of the United States, by reason of commercial treaties existing between that court and other powers of Europe. As there is no reason to doubt the sincerity of this declaration, I have thought proper to communicate it to a few confidential friends in the district, with his permission, not doubting but they will make a prudent use of the information.*

Without disclosing the contents of this letter to the public, however, and urged by Col. Marshall—who, it is said, is chiefly responsible for the matter of the publication as well as its origin—Judge Muter addressed a letter to the editor of the Kentucky Gazette, in which he called attention to the illegality of the action he believed to be imminent. He said:

Forming a constitution of government, and organizing the same, before the consent of the legislature of Virginia for that purpose is first obtained, will be directly contrary to the letter and spirit of the act of assembly, entitled "an act for punishing certain offenses, and vesting the governor with certain powers;" which declares that every person or persons who shall erect or establish, government separate from, or independent of the State of Virginia within the limits thereof, unless by act of the legislature for that purpose first obtained, or shall exercise any office under such usurped government, shall be guilty of high treason.

The third section of the fourth article of the Federal constitution expressly declares: "that no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed out of the junction of two or more States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the congress." Therefore, the consent of Virginia to the separation must first be obtained agreeably to the above cited section, to afford to Kentucky any prospect of being admitted a member of the Federal union.

*It was subsequently disclosed that Brown had inclosed in the letter to McDowell a separate slip marked "confidential," on which he wrote: "In a conversation I had with Mr. Gardoqui, the Spanish minister, relative to the navigation of the Mississippi, he stated that, if the people of Kentucky would erect themselves into an independent State, and appoint a proper person to negotiate with him, he had authority for that purpose, and would enter into an arrangement with them for the exportation of their produce to New Orleans, on terms of mutual advantage." It is probable that similar communications were sent to Wilkinson, Innes and others of that party.

In the tenth section of the first article of the Federal constitution it is declared: "that no State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation." Of course it must follow that no part of a State can enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation.

The resolution of the late convention, if adopted by the people, might fairly be construed to give authority to the next, to treat with Spain to obtain the navigation of the Mississippi, if they should think such a measure conducive to their interests; when it might plainly appear, by the before-cited section, that any other application than to the assembly of Virginia, and to the congress of the United States, must be contrary to the Federal constitution.

It is, therefore, submitted to the consideration of the inhabitants of Fayette, whether it may not be necessary in their instructions to their delegates, to direct them not to agree to the forming a constitution and form of government, and organizing the same, till the consent of the legislature of Virginia, for that purpose, is first obtained; not to agree to make any application whatever to obtain the navigation of the Mississippi, other than to the legislature of Virginia, and the congress of the United States; to draw up and forward to the assembly of Virginia a memorial requesting them to alter their acts for the separation of this district from Virginia, that the same may be brought before the congress of the United States, in the manner directed by the Federal constitution; and to request them to authorize the convention, by law, to form a constitution of government, and to organize the same; or, direct a new convention to be chosen, to continue in office a reasonable time, and to be vested with these powers.

To forward to the assembly of Virginia, and the congress of the United States (if they judge proper and necessary), a decent and manly memorial requesting that such measures may be pursued by congress, or that Virginia will use her influence with congress to take such measures as shall be most likely to procure for the people of the western country the navigation of the Mississippi.

The effect of such an address by the chief justice of the district could not fail to make a deep impression. A strong agitation took place, and two distinct parties were formed; the one of which Wilkinson was the most prominent leader, its leaders being drawn principally from the court and legal profession, became known as the "court party," while the other assumed the name of the "country party." No such policy as Brown had confidentially communicated, and Muter had publicly intimated, had been distinctly avowed by Wilkinson and his followers in the campaign which followed the last convention; but such were the suspicions excited against these men that the people were greatly aroused to the danger of such a possibility, and the "court party" found it advisable to be less pronounced in their utterances. Still, neither party felt sure of the support of the majority of the people. The rapid immigration was bringing in large numbers of new men, whose lack of border experience caused them to feel less keenly in regard to the grievances complained of, and who gradually strengthened the "country party;" and yet, the adventurous character of many of them, and the wide-spread sectional feeling, tended to keep the two factions pretty evenly balanced.

The contest was probably more spirited in Fayette County than elsewhere in Kentucky. Here, Wilkinson and the other candidates of the "court party," were opposed by Col. Marshall, Muter, Crockett, Allen, and another, whose name is not remembered, of the other party. "The election came on and was exceedingly animated;" the vote at first went very much against the radical candidates, and there was a strong probability that the whole list would be defeated. On the fourth day, therefore, Wilkinson believed it advisable to disclaim the character imputed to him, and to make such professions as to disarm the fears of the people, with whom he was really a great favorite. Accordingly, the return of the poll at the close of the election, showed that the four gentlemen named, of the opposition, and Wilkinson alone, of the "court party," had been chosen delegates. In other parts of the district, the result was more favorable to the latter party, and Brown, Innes, McDowell and others of the leaders were chosen, besides enough of their followers to make the membership of the new convention about evenly divided between the two factions.

The seventh convention met on the 3d of November, 1788; on the 4th, a quorum was present, and on the 5th, it began the business of the session. The leaders of the opposing forces in the convention had already discovered themselves; of the "country party," there were Marshall, Muter, Crockett, and Col. John Edwards, of Bourbon County; of the "court party," there were Wilkinson, Brown, Sebastian and Innes. The first trial of strength came at the very beginning of the real work of the convention. Organization having been accomplished, the resolution of congress relating to the separation of the district was read to the convention and referred to a committee of the whole, into which the convention was resolved, and Mr. Wilkinson called to the chair. In the discussion which followed, a question as to the authority under which the body was acting developed the fact that the recommendation and resolutions of the former convention had not been referred. A resolution that the committee rise in order that this document might be brought before it, was urged and opposed by arguments in which neither party expressed their real object. Both had the empowering clause of the recommendation in view, but the one urged that the navigation of the Mississippi, of which the congressional document made no mention, was too important a subject to be left out of the consideration of the committee, while the other objected to the confusion involved in the discussion of so many topics at the same time.

The debate took a wide range and earnest tone, in the course of which Wilkinson dilated upon the advantages of a free navigation of the river. He pointed out the discouragements experienced; that it was idle to look to the general government for relief; that the same difficulties did not exist in treating with Spain, and declared "that there was information of the first importance on that subject within the power of the convention, which he doubted not it would be equally agreeable for the members to have, and for the gentleman who possessed it, to communicate." The attention of the convention was thus directed to Mr. Brown, who with some hesitation arose and said "that he did not think himself at liberty to disclose what had passed in private conference between the Spanish minister, Mr. Gardoqui, and himself, but this much in general he would venture to inform the convention, that, provided we are unanimous, everything we could wish for is within our reach." This was scarcely so explicit as his friends had been led to expect, nor so forcible as desired by Wilkinson, who probably intended Mr. Brown's authoritative utterance as an introduction to a paper which he had prepared upon the subject of the navigation and commerce of the Mississippi. Nothing daunted by this partial failure of his plans the general proposed, with the permission of the convention, to read his production. It was at once called for by his party associates, and listened to with respect by all. It was addressed to the intendant of Louisiana, covered some fifteen or twenty pages of manuscript, and treated the subject in a way that elicited a unanimous vote of thanks "for the regard he therein manifested for the interests of the western country." The reading of this essay ended the discussion, and the resolutions in question were referred to the committee of the whole, in order that all the interests of the district might come within the scope of its deliberations.

The victory thus gained by the "court party" was barren of any marked results. Whatever the ulterior purpose of its leaders may have been, its achievement required an unanimity that was found to be impossible. Each party had become aware that it was in the presence of a watchful opponent, and each, doubtful of the other's strength and disposition, appeared unwilling to join issue. The whole course of the convention was a series of evasions; every proposition was voted without serious opposition, save in the case just mentioned. Mr. Innes introduced petitions from subscribers in Mercer and Madison Counties praying for an address to congress in behalf of securing the free navigation of the Mississippi, and the convention in due time prepared and forwarded such an address. A little later Mr. Crockett introduced a numerously signed remonstrance against a "violent separation" from Virginia, and Mr. Edwards, by order of the convention, presented a "decent and respectful" address to the legislature, "praying that an act may pass at the present session for enabling the good people of the Kentucky district to obtain an independent government;" and its "friendly interposition with congress for a speedy admission of the district into the Federal union." An amendment being offered, this measure was postponed for a time, and in the meantime Mr. Wilkinson offered a preamble and resolution calling for an address to the people, seeking "instructions in what manner to proceed on the important subject to them submitted." This was also passed, and the business placed in the hands of a committee to prepare. This was brought forward, reported to the committee of the whole, where it was superseded by the address to the legislature which, when adopted by the convention, obviated the necessity for further instructions. This done, the convention adjourned till the first Monday in August, 1789.*

It is almost idle to inquire into the motives which actuated the "court party," but the historian, Marshall, has ascribed such an exceptional character to them, has dealt so freely in suspicion and inuendo, that they seem to have a permanent importance which may not be wholly ignored. Of the persons involved in the supposed conspiracy with Spain, Wilkinson and Brown were the most important. So far as appearance and proof went, the operations of the former were simply of a business character, and his relations with Lousiana authorties were confined to a kind of commercial treaty won by the remarkable audacity of the man. There is no doubt that the privilege he obtained was a very profitable one not only to himself but also to the people of Kentucky, many of whom, through his permits, shared the advantages of the concession. There is no reasonable probability that he ever received a pension from the Spanish authorities, and though repeatedly tried by competent courts, before which he waived legal formalities tending to limit incompetent evidence, he was triumphantly acquitted on every charge preferred, though supported by witnesses of the worst character and most vindictive temper. Brown's relations were of a different character. It was doubtless the hope of Spanish officials to achieve through the disaffection of the Kentuckians what seemed impossible in negotiating with the general government. That the western representative should have given his assent to the Spanish minister's proposition was not so unnatural as undiplomatic. It is well to bear in mind that national sentiment at that time was undeveloped; that the separate action of a State was legally recognized; and that if Kentucky had been "unanimous," the matter of Virginia's opposition would have been of slight consequence. That Brown's attitude was entirely friendly to what he considered the best interests of the district is beyond reasonable doubt, and so far from condemning him, the "good people" of Kentucky, while not indorsing his views in this respect, gave him the best evidence of their regard by continuing him in the United States senate for eighteen years. Even the jaundiced historian, while assailing these men, is compelled to say "that so long as the leaders of the faction for violent separation contiued to offer themselves to the people in elections, they were elected." (Vol. I, p. 369.)

After the contest was ended, the mental vision of many of their opponents cleared, and led them to do justice to the leaders of the "court party." Col. Marshall was an intimate friend of Washington, and when the latter began to be spoken of as the probable first president under the constitution, the colonel wrote him, under date of February 8, 1789, giving an account "of such symptoms of foreign intrigue and internal disaffection as had manifested themselves to him." In this letter, "the names of Wilkinson and Brown are alone mentioned among the implicated." Mr. Marshall was undoubtedly actuated in this matter by the most worthy motives, and his sincerity is evinced by his subsequent conduct when his suspicions were proven unfounded. In a letter to Marshall, Washington subsequently wrote:

In acknowledging the reciept of your letter of the 11th of September (1790), I must beg you to accept my thanks for the pleasing communication which it contains of the good disposition of the people of Kentucky toward the government of the United States. I never doubted but that the operations of this government, if not perverted by prejudice or evil designs, would inspire the citizens of America with such confidence in it, as effectually to do away these apprehensions which, under our former confederation, our best men entertained of divisions among ourselves, or allurements from other nations. I am therefore happy to find, that such a disposition prevails in your part of the country as to remove any idea of that evil, which a few years ago you so much dreaded.

*Marshall gives the proceedings of this convention considerably in detail. He had access to notes of the deliberations taken by Col. Marshall, which were declared by other members to be accurate. See (Vol. I, pp. 316-337.)

"This letter," as Mr. Butler remarks, "taken in connection with the subsequent appointment of Wilkinson to be a lieutenant-colonel in the army, at the recommendation of Col. Marshall,* as well as others, and the repeated military commissions of high trust and expression of thanks to Messrs. Brown, Innes, Scott, Shelby and Logan, amply confirm the idea that the imputed disaffection of any of these distinguished citizens to the union of the States, had been abandoned by Col. Washington himself, and most certainly by Washington, if ever admitted to disturb his serene and benevolent mind." (P. 183.)

The year of 1788 is marked by another characteristic intrigue, which, though unimportant in its results, illustrates how widespread and determined the disaffection of the western country was believed to be. Some time about November, Connolly, the notorious nephew of Lord Dunmore, arrived from Canada, ostensibly to inquire after his lands at the Falls of the Ohio, but really to discover the disposition of the leading men in regard to hostile operations against the Spanish on the lower Mississippi. He was introduced by Col. John Campbell, his partner in the lands, and some time a prisoner among the Indians. He approached Judge Muter and Marshall, urging the necessity of the free navigation of the river, and represented that the Canadian authorities had 4,000 troops, besides two regiments, at Detroit, which they were willing to employ in aiding the Kentuckians to possess New Orleans, beside arms, ammunition, clothing and money. He also approached Gens. Scott and Wilkinson with the same story. The latter, dangerous to the public quiet as he was believed by some to be, treated the plotter in a summary fashion. Although willing to impress the Spanish intendant with the idea, "that should Spain be so blind to her true interests as to refuse the use of the river to the western people, and thereby compel a resort to military means for its attainment, that Great Britain stands ready, with her arms expanded, willing to receive and co-operate with them in their efforts for the accomplishment of this great and favorite object," he was by no means ready to try the experiment. He procured it to be given out that Connolly was an English spy, and engaged a borderer to make a sham assault upon him. This so terrified him that he asked a guide to secretly lead him out of the district, and thus ended the only attempt made by the English to enlist the co-operation of the Kentuckians.

On the 29th of December the legislature, in prompt compliance with the address of the last district convention, passed the third act of separation. This document did not reach Kentucky, however, until in January, 1789, when, its terms being known, it gave rise to severe criticism and to general disappointment. It was found that new conditions had been added to those originally imposed, which, however reasonable they may have appeared to the Virginians, proved highly objectionable to the Kentuckians. It was provided that the new State should pay a portion of the present domestic debt of the commonwealth. This had been suggested by the great expense incurred in carrying on military operations in defense of the district, which, though not always authorized by Virginia, had been assumed. The other new condition proposed to secure to the Virginia officers and soldiers the bounty lands set

*The fact of this recommendation becoming known to his political associates, brought upon him "a degree of censure" which evoked the following explanation. "He considered Wilkinson well qualified for the commission he had solicited and obtained; that while he remained unemployed by government he considered him dangerous to the public quiet of Kentucky, perhaps to her safety; that if his commission did not secure his fidelity, it would at least place him under control, in the midst of faithful officers, whose vigilance would render him harmless, if it did not make him honest. At all events, he could see no good reason for not putting the lion in the toils, which he solicited for himself." (Marshall, Vol. I, p. 391). This explanation, if not distorted by the historian, served the censured gentlemen as an argumentum ad hominem in his reply to his associates, but as a public apology, it does credit neither to his head nor his heart, and would have been much better omitted by his friend, the historian.

apart for them, but it served to continue a certain dependence of the district upon the parent State, so that in case of separation the new State would be "in part independent, and in part dependent on a co-State as to the exercise of legislative power."

This act obliged the people of the district to again travel the whole tedious round of conventions to determine the expediency of separation, to form a constitution, and to organize a government. The election of delegates occurred in April, and Messrs. Marshall and Muter again presented themselves as candidates. Wilkinson, tired of politics, and immersed in business cares, declined to present his name, and the election passed without notable incident. On the third Monday in July (20th), 1789, the eighth convention assembled at Danville. There were many of the "court party" present, but the old issue was not presented, and the deliberations of the body were unmarked by any serious division of sentiment. Discussion first turned upon the new terms of separation, and after a short debate a resolution was adopted providing for a memorial to the legislature "requiring such alterations in the terms proposed to this district for separation as will make them equal to those formerly offered by Virginia, and agreed to on the part of the said district." This done, the convention turned its attention to general legislation. It directed its members to "meet at their court houses, on the October court days, and lay off their respective counties into precincts, and that each delegate make out a list of the souls residing within his respective precinct, discriminating between males and females, and between those over and those under twenty-one years of age." It was further provided that the president of the convention should call the members together again so soon as the amended act of the legislature should come to hand.

The memorial of this convention, in due time, came before the legislature, which, on December 18, 1789, passed an act in conformity with the wishes of the district. This act,* the fourth and final one, required the work to be done de novo; the convention, to determine the expediency of separation was required to meet at Danville, on July 26, 1790; congress to give its assent prior to November 1, 1791; the day of separation to be fixed "posterior" to that date, and a constitutional convention to be provided for and meet prior to the date fixed for final separation. The ninth convention accordingly met on the date appointed; organized with Judge Muter as president; resolved unanimously in favor of the expediency of separation; accepted the terms of the last legislative act, and fixed on June 1, 1792, as the date of final separation; prepared appropriate addresses to Virginia and congress; provided for the election—on the court days in December, 1791—of delegates to constitute a convention, which was to assemble on the first Monday in April, 1792, at Danville, and adjourned. On December 18, 1790, the president strongly recommended the claims of Kentucky to congress, in response to which communication each house made a suitable reply in favorable terms, and on February 4, 1791, both houses had passed the act admitting the district, as the State of Kentucky, on the terms of the "compact" between that section and Virginia. Fourteen days later Vermont was also admitted to the Union, but, as it was not encumbered with delaying conditions, it became a part of the Union immediately after congress rose in March—an indirect confirmation of Mr. Brown's opinion that the historian, Marshall, fails to point out.

In December, 1791, the election of delegates for the tenth* and final convention came on and passed without notable incident, save that "considerable effort" was made to place the district under party discipline. The plan was to organize a system of county committees, "whose first ostensible business was to form tickets, or to recommend to the people fit persons to be elected by them as representatives. The next thing was to furnish the representatives, when chosen, with instructions how to act." The project appears to have been only partially successful, and, as a "principle of practice," was not established in Kentucky until a later time. Electioneering, however, had already become an art, and the people, accustomed to being courted for their votes, elected "those who had taken most pains to please." The deliberations of the convention were harmonious, and the progress of the work so rapid that, notwithstanding the interruption occasioned by the resignation and re-election of Mr. Nicholas,* the members ratified the new instrument by their adoption and signature on the 19th day of the same month.

*Appendix A, Note 29.

*These conventions were assembled on the following dates, December 27, 1784; May 23 and August 8, 1785; September (fourth Monday), 1786; September 17, 1787; July 28 and November 3, 1788; July 20, 1789; July 26, 1790, and April (first Monday), 1792.

The convention provided that the election of State officers and the members of the legislature should occur in May, and that the new government should assemble in Lexington on Monday, the 4th day of June following. Accordingly, on the 3d of the month, Isaac Shelby, the declared governor, left his farm destined for that place. The same day, passing through Danville, he received a congratulatory address from its citizens, to which he returned an appropriate reply, and then proceeded on his journey. The next day he arrived in Lexington, escorted by a troop of volunteers who had met him on the road, pursuant to an order of the trustees of the town, by whom he was received with some parade. The greater number of the senators, with a large proportion of the representatives, arrived the same day, and on the following day the new government was formally inaugurated, with Alexander Scott Bullitt as president of the senate, and Robert Breckinridge as speaker of the house of representatives. Thus, after eight years of vexatious struggle, the State of Kentucky became an integral part of the American Union, fitted and furnished for its career in the sisterhood of States.

The boundaries of the new State had been recognized, by the act of Virginia, as the "same as at present separate the district from the residue of this commonwealth." In 1780 the line 36° 30′ north latitude, which separated Virginia from North Carolina, had been traced only to the Alleghany Mountains. With the extension of settlements westward, disputes arose between the borderers, and serious inconvenience was experienced in the matter of property, as well as jurisdiction. The two governments accordingly provided, in this year, for the further survey of this line, Dr. Walker being selected on the part of Virginia, and Col. Henderson on the part of North Carolina, for this purpose. These gentlemen, with their attendants, immediately set about this business, beginning at the Tennessee River, and proceeding eastward. They soon found the results of their independent observations disagreeing with each other, and each adhering to his own opinion, through a prepossession in favor of his own State, or the inaccuracy of instruments, the lines thus drawn were found to cross each other, and to be quite wide apart on reaching the top of the Cumberland Mountains. At this point Henderson withdrew, but Walker, pursuing his course, had the line marked to the Tennessee River, where he stopped, and subsequently discovered that the projected line would touch the Mississippi instead of the Ohio, as had been supposed.

Such definition of the boundary line by no means obviated the inconvenience experienced, but for many years no further official attention was given the matter, although difficulties occasionally arose which threatened to interrupt the friendly relations of the two governments. On the 14th of October, 1799, the boundary on the east was settled by commissioners acting for the two States interested, and was established to run from the point where the southern boundary crosses the Cumberland Mountains, pursuing a northeast course to the northeastwardly branch of the Big Sandy River; thence to the main west branch, and down the same to the Ohio. In 1811, provision was made by the Kentucky legislature for the survey of the southern boundary westward from the Tennessee River, which was subsequently accomplished by Messrs. Alexander and Munsell, the line reaching the river below New Madrid. In 1820 this line, with the one established by Walker, was mutually agreed upon as the southern boundary of Kentucky. This area, otherwise marked by the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers,* is included between the meridians of 82° 3′ and 89° 30′ west longitude, and between 36° 26′ and 39° 6′ north latitude. Its extreme length from east to west is 308 miles; its greatest breadth from north to south is 172 miles, and contains 37,680 square miles, of which all, save about 1,000 square miles in the sub-valley of the Ohio, lies within the Mississippi Valley.

*This incident is related by Marshall (Vol. I, p. 395) as follows: "Mr. Nicholas, finding it necessary or convenient to revise some opinion which he had advanced previous to his election, and which now stood in his way to a newly conceived measure, resigned his seat in order to submit himself, as regenerated, to the people in another election, rather than forego the desire of bringing forth this recent conception, or run the risk of giving offense to his constituents, or of trusting to the intrinsic merits of the project and subsequent speculations. He was in the midst of his constituents, and beside, this self-immolation could but yield a most savory sacrifice to the popular nostril, and secure to him its patronage. Accordingly he had no opponent, was re-elected, and again took his seat in a few days, re-enforced with all the might and majesty of his county. It is, however, due to Mr. Nicholas to add that if he was a seeker of popularity he was a politician of distinguished eminence." The project for which he made this sacrifice was to vest the court of appeals with original and final jurisdiction in land suits, and it was accordingly incorporated in the constitution.

In 1800 the population had increased since the first census to 220,955 persons, of whom 41,082 were slaves or free persons of color; in 1810 the population was composed of 324,237 whites and 82,274 blacks, and Kentucky rose from the fourteenth State, in point of population, to the ninth in the American Union. This development found expression also in the growth of towns and villages, which, numbering only five, with populations varying from 150 to 834 souls, in 1790, ten years later had increased to twenty-nine, with populations varying from six to 1,795 souls.† A traveler from the East, intent on seeing the country, at this time would take boat at Pittsburgh, and land at Limestone. Until 1784 no structure of any sort marked the site of the landing place, but at that date the Wallers erected a double log-cabin and block-house; and three years later a warehouse, for the reception and inspection of tobacco, was built by authority of the legislature. Immediately after, a plat consisting of 100 acres was laid out by John May and Simon Kenton, "on the lower side of Limestone Creek, and called Maysville." Notwithstanding its importance as a general landing place for Kentucky immigration, this municipal venture developed but slowly. In the same year (1787) the town of Charleston was established by law at the mouth of Lawrence Creek, and two years before, the town of Washington, four miles to the southwest of the landing, had been laid out. This was a pretentious venture, the plat of which covered 700 acres; it grew rapidly under the stimulating influence of the large immigration, and in 1790 possessed a population of 462 souls. In 1800 its inhabitants were returned at 570, and at 815 ten years later. With such competition the famous entrepot grew but slowly. It was noted "as a fine harbor for boats coming down the Ohio," and as being the terminus of a "large wagon-road to Lexington." In 1797, Francis Bailey, the English traveler, estimated that it might contain from thirty to forty houses, which were found to be chiefly log-houses; the place on a near approach appeared very dirty, and presented a much more pleasing prospect from the river; provisions were found to be very dear, owing to the number of boats which had recently landed. As early as 1798 it had reached the dignity of a "post-town," and in 1802 was found by Michaux to consist of not more than thirty or forty houses, though these were built of plank, obtained from the Kentucky boats that were broken up at the end of their journey. A few years later it was described as "quite a bustling place," but with a population numbering about 350 souls.

Inland travel from this point, which was known as Limestone for some years later, was accomplished on horseback, but Michaux warns visitors that they will find it difficult to hire horses here. Such animals were only to be obtained by purchase, and the people, not less well informed than those farther east, knew "how to take advantage when they can." The Frenchman, therefore, determined to make his way to Lexington on foot, a distance of sixty-five miles, which he accomplished in two days and a half. Washington was reached after a tramp of four miles, and was found to consist of "about two hundred houses, all of planks," which were erected on either side of the wagon-road which lead to Lexington. Here trade was brisk, the principal article being flour, which was exported to New Orleans. In the country around were found beautiful plantations, with fences as well kept and fields as well cultivated as in Virginia. From Washington the road led to Springfield, a place then consisting of five or six houses, two of which were "spacious well-built taverns," but which were unknown to the gazetteers and have since entirely passed away. A little further on, the traveler reached May's Lick, nine miles southwest from Washington, which was chiefly interesting for the salt works established there. Millersburg, known to the early gazetteers as "Miller's," was found situated on a branch of the Licking, thirty-two miles northeast of Lexington, and consisting of about fifty houses and two saw-mills. A bridge was constructed over the river, which, like all others of the few to be found in this country, consisted of tree-trunks, not fastened together, placed transversely beside each other. But little care was bestowed upon repairs, and the traveler on horseback is advised that "it is always prudent to alight on crossing them."

*The jurisdiction of Kentucky extends to low-water mark on the north side of the Ohio River.

†The census takers of 1800 returned twenty-nine towns, with a separate enumeration, as follows. The figures before the names indicate the order of each town in point of population: 24, Eddyville, 69; 26, Falmouth, 38; 12, Flemingsburg, 124; 2, Frankfort, 628; 6, Georgetown, 350; 20, Germantown, 81; 22, Greensburg, 71; 27, Greenville, 26; 25, Hardinsburg, 49; 13, Harrodsburg, 124; 21, Hartford, 74; 8, Henderson, 205; 17, Lancaster, 103; 1, Lexington, 1,795; 5, Louisville, 359; 11, Maysville, 137; 19, Mount Sterling, 83; 16, Newport, 106; 28, Nicholasville, 23; 4, Paris, 377; 20, Prestonburg, 6; 15, Richmond, 110; 14, Russellville, 117; 7, Shelbyville, 262; 18, Shepherdsville, 96; 10, Springfield, 63; 9, Versailles, 172; 3, Washington, 570; 23, Williamsburg (now Orangeburg), 70.

Some eighteen miles before reaching Lexington on this road, the town of Paris arose before the early traveler. It was at this time the chief place in Bourbon County. During the pioneer period it was known as Houston's Station, and was eclipsed by the superior importance of Ruddle's and Miller's Stations in its near vicinity. In 1789, it was established as a town by the legislature under the name of Hopewell; a year later the name was changed to Bourbonton, and subsequently to Paris. It was situated in the midst of a pleasant plain of considerable extent, and near the Licking, on which were several "corn-mills." In 1796 it contained only eighteen houses, but in 1802 Michaux notes upward of 150 buildings, "more than half of which are built of brick." Everything at that time indicated the prosperity of the people. "Seven or eight of them," says Michaux, "were drinking whisky in a very neat tavern, where I stopped to let the great heat pass over. After answering the various questions they asked me relative to the intentions of my journey, one of them invited me to dine with him, being desirous of making me acquainted with one of my countrymen, who had lately arrived from Bengal. I yielded to his request, and found a Frenchman who had quitted Calcutta to come and live in Kentucky. He had taken up his residence at Paris, where he exercised the profession of a schoolmaster."

No further aggregation of houses claimed the distinction of a village until Lexington, the early metropolis of Kentucky, was reached. This town was established the same year as Louisville (1780), and rapidly assumed the place of first importance. It was situated in a rich, extensive plain, in the center of that region now known as Bluegrass, on the north side of Town Fork, an affluent of the south branch of Elkhorn. It was early chosen as the site of Wilkinson's commercial operations, to whose enterprise it doubtless owed much of its first prosperity. Its rapid growth, however, may probably be attributed to its position in the center of one of the most fertile regions in the world. In the census of 1790 it is credited with a population of 834, which had reached 2,000 in 1796, as estimated by Jedidiah Morse, the earliest of American gazetteers. At the latter date, there were 250 houses, three places of public worship, a court house and a jail. Two printing offices each issued a weekly gazette, several stores competed in trade, and everything indicated a flourishing condition of prosperity. Its social charms were of the most agreeable character, its population including a number of the most genteel families to be found in Kentucky.

In 1802, it is described as situated in the middle of about 300 acres of cleared ground, surrounded by heavy woods. Its plan was regular; the broad streets, intersecting each other at right angles, were without "footways," and muddy in winter and in the wet season. The houses were mostly brick, and dispersed over an extent of 80 or 100 acres, save on Main Street, where the houses were contiguous to each other. At this time the gazettes were issued twice a week, for which a part of the paper was manufactured in the country. Two good rope-walks found constant employment in furnishing the ship-builders on the Ohio, while the preparation and manufacture of hemp furnished employment for considerable capital and a number of hands in several other establishments. A new invention for "grinding and cleansing" this staple had just been announced by one of its citizens. With this machine, moved by horse-power or by a current of water, it was believed that 8,000 weight of hemp could be thus prepared in a day. A new nail machine had just been patented also, which eventually turned out 5,320 pounds of finished nails in twelve hours, and enabled the manufacturers to export the finished product to Louisville, Cincinnati, and even to Pittsburgh. Michaux further notes that "the manufactures of Lexington are supported, and their proprietors are thought to be doing very well, notwithstanding the extreme high price of labor. This price is occasioned by the inhabitants giving the preference to agriculture, and there being but few who put their children to trades, because they require their assistance in their own employments. The following comparison will render this defect of artisans in the western country more perceptible. At Charleston in Carolina, and at Savannah in Georgia, a white workman, such as a joiner, carpenter, mason, white-smith, tailor, shoemaker, etc., earns two piasters a day, and cannot live a week for less than six. At New York and Philadelphia he receives only one piaster, and it costs him four a week. At Marietta, Lexington and Nashville, Tenn., this workman receives a piaster, or a piaster and a half per day, and can live a week upon one day's wages. Another instance will also assist in giving an idea of the low price of provisions of the first necessity in the western States; the boarding-house at which I lived during my residence at Lexington is reckoned one of the best in the town, and the table is very well supplied for two piasters per week." Outside of the town were several powder-mills, for the use of which sulphur was imported from Philadelphia, and the saltpeter manufactured from the earths of the neighboring caverns. Several tanneries on the river, and potteries where the common ware was made, should also be included in these outside manufactories.

In 1805, Lexington was set down as the "largest and most wealthy town in Kentucky, or indeed west of the Alleghany Mountains;" its main street had all the appearance of Market Street in Philadelphia on a busy day; the dwelling houses were estimated at 500, many of which were elegant, and three stories high; and at that time, thirty brick buildings were in process of construction. In all, save the water, the surroundings of the town were declared to be admirable, and the prospect seemed to warrant the prediction that in a few years Lexington would rival the most populous inland town of the Atlantic States, "not only in wealth, but in population." Two years later, the town had gained a fourth church, a public academy, and "other well regulated schools;" a market-house, in which the produce of the surrounding country was exposed for sale; a book store, and book bindery, two more rope-walks, two nail factories, and two cotton-mills, in one of which the manufacture of duck was made a specialty. The stores were estimated at thirty, several of which were engaged in the wholesale trade; the number of houses by a closer estimate was placed at 400, "many of which are handsomely built," and the population at 2,400 souls.

The census of 1810 showed this progress still active. The population had increased to 4,326; the manufacture of hemp now engaged fifteen rope-walks and bagging factories, which annually worked up about 1,200 or 1,400 tons of hemp. Each bagging factory employed from fifteen to twenty-five black boys in spinning, from ten to twenty looms attended by black men, four or five hands preparing the fibre, and two or three white men as overseers. The rope-walks each employed ten or fifteen men, each man and boy earning for his master about $1 per day. The value of the manufactured products thus turned out was estimated at $500,000 in the Eastern market. The cotton factories had been increased to four, in the newest and most extensive of which the manufactured articles were declared to "do honor to our country." It was further noted by a traveler, that "Mr. Daniel Bradford, has lately established a wool-carding and spinning machinery, and one or two others are in operation," besides an oil-cloth and oil-carpeting business, which succeeded well. It was also reported, that Mr. John Bradford, Sr., was about to erect machinery for spinning ropes by steam power. A second book store, and a third printing press, were also recent accessions to the business of the town. Public enterprise was further marked by a "well regulated and extensive public library," a "public theatre," with its company of actors, and neatly conducted "bath-houses, both warm and cold." The style of building was still handsome, and the public inns, of which there were four, were conducted on a plan and style of neatness, which made a man feel at home, as soon as he entered. Everything went "like clock work," the employees being at their posts night and day, and the landlord's watchful eye constantly over all. It was not unusual to see thirty or forty strangers sit down to the table in Postlewaite's tavern at one time, and the others were not less well patronized.

These facts pertaining to Lexington may be found in the published accounts of the travels of Michaux, Espy (Tour in Ohio and Kentucky in 1805; published in Cincinnati, 1871); the Navigator, Pittsburgh, 1814, and in Fearon's Sketches of America, London, 1818. From the latter a statement of Lexington's business, in 1817, is drawn as follows: twelve cotton mills, employing a capital of £67,500; three woolen-mills, £32,600; three paper-mills, £20,250; three steam grist-mills, £16,875; powder-mills, £9,000; lead factory, £14,800; foundries for casting brass and iron, in connection with a silver-plating establishment, £9,000; four hat factories, £15,000: four coach factories, £12,600; five tanneries, £20,000; twelve factories for making cotton bagging and hempen yarns, £100,400; six cabinet-makers, £5,600; four soap and candle factories, £12,150; three tobacco factories, £11,450; sundry others, £120,000; making the total of employed capital in manufacturing, £467,225.

Southward from Lexington the public road was only a bridle path, though well marked by constant use. This led in a southwest course twenty-two miles to Hickman's Ferry, on the Kentucky River, where a tavern offered entertainment to the belated traveler, and a flat-boat furnished a means of crossing in time of high water. A mile beyond the river a branch road turned abruptly westward toward Harrodsburg, while continuing southwardly for some twenty miles the trail led to Danville. The latter village was established by the legislature in 1787, and, as the district capital, gained some early distinction. It was the place where the various conventions were held from 1784 to 1792, but it was not of much importance as a town until some years later. Its population is not given separately in either the first or second census, and in 1810 contained only 432 inhabitants. On the formation of the district, Harrodsburg lost much of its early prestige. It was early made a post-town, however, and in 1796 contained some twenty scattered houses. In 1802, planks had become conspicuous in the construction of dwellings, but the number had not increased, and the population was only 124 as returned in the previous census. In 1810, there were only 313 inhabitants. The route to Nashville, followed by pack-trains and travelers, led southwestwardly from Harrodsburg to Hay's (Haysville), thence to Skegg's, Bears' Wallow, Dripping Spring and across the Big Barren southward. After leaving Harrodsburg, the country was sparsely settled, and save log "taverns," at intervals of from twenty to thirty miles, there was scarcely a sign of human habitation to be observed along the route. The early tourist was forced, therefore, to turn northward and seek Frankfort, as the trails leading westward were still less inviting.

In the western portion of the new State thus left unexplored, there were two towns, at least, which gave promise of future growth. Of these, Henderson, on the Ohio River was the more important. It was laid out quite early, though not incorporated until 1810; it extended along the river front for half a mile, and from its situation on a high bank commanded a fine view of the river for several miles. It was a post-town and county seat as early as 1793, and in the second census is credited with a population of 205 souls. In 1810 the enumeration fell to 159, though considerable business activity is noted. The town at this time contained about thirty houses, of which many were brick. The business portion of the town was represented by two stores indifferently supplied and two long tobacco warehouses. The other western town was Eddyville, on the Cumberland River, forty-five miles from its mouth. This place was settled in 1799, and thither the notorious Matthew Lyon, of Vermont, came in the spring of 1801. Removed from the political agitations of the East, he turned his ability into commercial channels, erected a successful wool and cotton carding machine, a paper-mill propelled by oxen, and a distillery. He subsequently engaged in boat-building, constructing several gunboats for the government, and a large number of barges and river boats. One of his sons was engaged in the river traffic and made frequent trips to New Orleans. The village was more important for its business activity than for its population, which was only sixty-nine persons in 1800, and does not appear in the census as a separate factor again until 1830, when it reached only 167 souls.

The State capital in 1800 was the second town in Kentucky. The land on which it stood was surveyed as early as 1774 by the McAfees, but these adventurers, finding richer lands elsewhere, neglected to record the plat made. The survey was well known, however, and subsequent locaters were careful not to infringe upon its boundaries. Thus the adjacent lands were entered at various times up to 1789, the omission of the McAfees escaping notice until 1785, when Humphrey Marshall learned of it, and promptly took advantage of the fact to enter it for himself. In the following year, Frankfort was established as a town by the legislature, taking its name, it is said, from the fact that Stephen Frank was killed in 1780 by the Indians on that spot. Its growth was not such as to attract attention until it was made the capital of the new State in 1793, when a new era in its history began. The town was situated on a river bottom, marked by high ground on the northeast, and encircled on the southwest by the river, which forms a semi-circle at this point. A considerable part of the town site was subject to annual inundation, and until 1796 was occupied by a stagnant pond; but at this time, Gen. Wilkinson, being stationed here, took measures to drain this part of the plain and greatly improved the healthfulness of the place. At this date, Frankfort was noted as a flourishing town, regularly laid out, containing many handsome houses, a fine state-house constructed of stone, and a tobacco warehouse. Its population is not given in the first census, but in 1800, it is credited with 628 inhabitants, and in 1810, with 1,099. It then contained about 140 houses, three printing offices, a book store, book-bindery, a public library, eighteen "mercantile" stores, and a bank, established in the fall of 1807.

The buildings were principally of brick and of a pleasing style. The State House, a large three-story stone building, stood in the middle of a "large yard," and appeared "much neglected for want of repairs and cleanliness." The brick building occupied by the bank was a handsome structure, and stood in range with the new bridge and the State House. The penitentiary was a well conducted institution, in which the criminals were employed at various mechanical branches of industry during their term of confinement. A variety of handsome stone and marble work, among which were "some elegantly wrought tombs," was noted. The marble used was a handsome stone, beautifully variegated and susceptible of a high polish, brought from a quarry twenty-five or thirty miles away.

The annual sessions of the legislature contributed to its prosperity, and the evidences of its improvement in buildings, manufactures and commerce were numerous. Some of these marks of prosperity are noted in the Navigator, published in Pittsburgh in 1811, and republished in 1814, as follows:

The Kentucky River at Frankfort is narrow, with bold banks of limestone rock, admirably calculated for building, running in horizontal veins of from six to twelve inches thick. It has been known to rise fifty feet perpendicular in twenty-four hours. The bridge now erecting at Frankfort will add facility to the commerce of the time. It is building on the plan of Judge Finley's chain bridge; will cost about $25,000; is 334½ feet span, having one pier in the middle of the river, sixty-five feet in height; the whole length being 700 feet, and eighteen broad. The two chains for this bridge were made at Pittsburgh by Mr. Thomas Hazleton, and weigh about twelve tons, of inch and a half square bar. Much difficulty has been experienced in getting a foundation for the western abutment, arising from a kind of quicksand, and water rushing in at the bottom upon the workmen as fast as they could discharge them at top with pumps and buckets worked night and day.

Messrs. Hunter & Instone have recently got into operation in Frankfort an extensive bagging manufactory, in which about twenty-five hands, black men and boys, are busily engaged, spinning, weaving, etc. At the end of this, and immediately on the bank of the river, the same gentlemen have erected a large warehouse for the storage of goods, which center here from different parts of the State, to descend the Kentucky River to the Ohio. A bagging manufactory was burned down at Frankfort about twelve months ago, by design, it was conjectured.

An extensive rope-walk was erected (September, 1810) at the edge of the town, calculated to do a large business; and a steamboat, that is, a large boat to be propelled by the power of steam, was on the stocks a little above town. She is intended for the trade of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. A mile below Frankfort there is a saw and grist-mill in the river, which in low water does a good deal of business, but it is not uncommon to see it completely covered by the floods of the river, to withstand which it has no roof and is open on all sides, and heavily loaded down on the corners and in the middle of the frame at top with piles of stones. The mill is owned by a Mr. Hawkins. Boats pass it through a chute, by lifting a few boards at its head, which, when replaced, form a dam for the mill. With some difficulty the Kentucky River can be navigated from Frankfort with light flat-bottomed boats to the Ohio in the lowest stages of the water, but for eight months in the year the navigation is very good.

Two miles below Frankfort there is a bank of fine white sand thrown up by the river, said to be well calculated for the manufacture of glass. Mr. Greenup, former governor of Kentucky, has it in contemplation, it is said, to establish a glass house at or near this place, and the establishment of a brew-house is talked of by the citizens of the town. Thus go on the improvements of interior America, whose inhabitants begin to feel and act like the citizens of an independent nation, possessing an extent of country capable of producing, from the luxury of the soil and variety of climate, everything which ought to make a people happy and independent of all the venomous combinations of maddened Europe.

Frankfort was situated in the most populous part of Kentucky. The lower river valley was then sparsely settled, Newport on the Ohio being the only town north of the capital, and that contained only 106 inhabitants by the second census. But both east and west of the river there were numerous plantations, and several conspicuous towns besides those already mentioned. West of the Limestone and Lexington road was Flemingsburg, with 124 inhabitants in 1800; west of the Lexington and Danville trail was Richmond, with 110 inhabitants; southwest of this town was Lancaster, with 103 inhabitants; and some fourteen miles southeast of Frankfort was Versailles, established in 1792, and eight years later containing 172 inhabitants. But larger than any of these, and the sixth town in the State, was Georgetown, lying midway between Paris and Frankfort. It was originally settled in 1775; was the site of McClellan's Fort; was known as Lebanon until 1790, when it was incorporated by the legislature and named in honor of the first president of the United States. In 1800, it contained 350 inhabitants. West of the river was Springfield, about forty miles southwest of Frankfort. The country about it was settled in 1786, by the leading branch of the Hardin family; was established as a town in 1793, and in the second census is assigned 163 inhabitants. Bardstown, thirteen miles northwest of Springfield, and about equally distant from Louisville and Frankfort, was established by the legislature in 1788; its original plat contained 100 acres, situated on an elevated plain near Beech Fork, an affluent of Salt River. It was first named Bairdstown after one of the original proprietors, from which it has been changed to its present name by the popular pronunciation of the original. In Morse's Gazeteer of 1798, it is mentioned as a "flourishing town," with 216 inhabitants. In the second census it is not enumerated separately, but in 1810 it contained 821 inhabitants. Turning west from Frankfort, twenty one miles away, the traveler reached Shelbyville, in 1800 the seventh town in the State in point of population. In 1779, it was the site of Squire Boone's station, and in 1792 it was laid off by order of the legislature with a plat containing fifty-one acres. Purchasers of lots were required to build thereon a hewed log house, not less than a story and a half high, with a brick or stone chimney. Its growth was steady and permanent; by the second census its population numbered 262, and 424 ten years later.

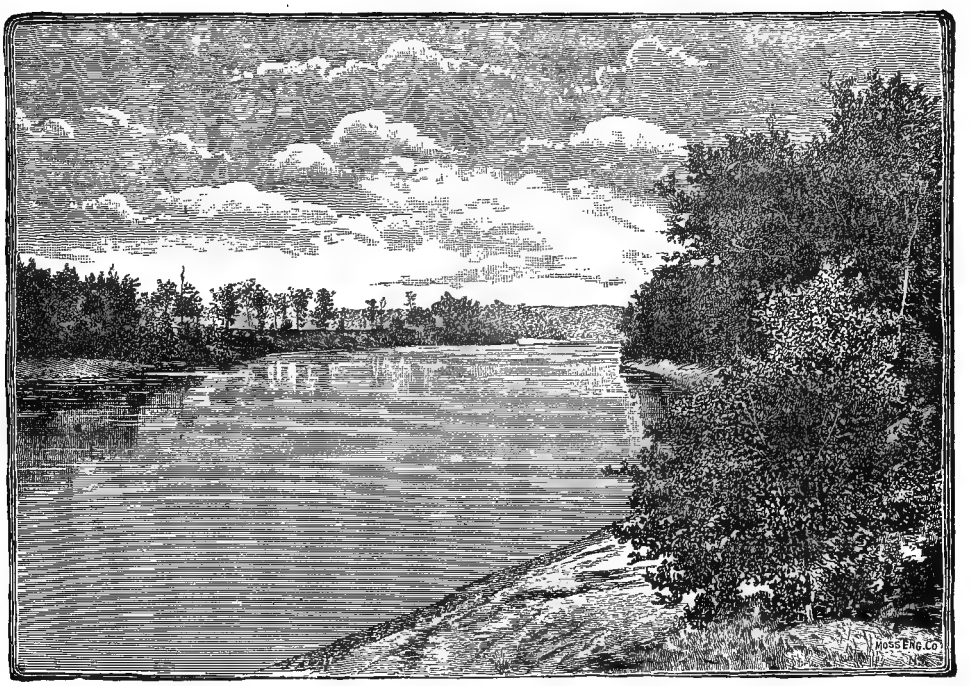
Thirty miles farther west, Louisville was reached, situated at the falls of the Ohio. In 1790, this was the fourth town, and in 1800, the fifth town in the State. It was established as a town, and made the seat of justice for the newly formed county of Jefferson in 1780; the lots were sold by auction, as was the common practice, and purchasers were required to build, within two years of the date of sale, a dwelling house, "sixteen feet by twenty at least, with a brick or stone chimney." The outline of the plat started on the banks of the Ohio, thirty-five poles above the mouth of Bear Grass, running thence to the mouth of the creek; "thence north 87, west 120 poles, north 50, west 110 poles to a heap of stones and a square hole cut in the flat rock; thence (the division line) south 88, east 769 poles to a white oak, poplar and beech, north 37, west 390 poles to the beginning; no variation." Six streets running east and west were laid out in this area, and twelve others crossing them at right angles. A space 180 feet wide, south of Green Street, and extending from First to Twelfth Street, was originally reserved for a public ground, but it was eventually disposed of by the city authorities, and the prospective city robbed of its park. The situation selected for the new town was an unhealthy one, and in time gained for Louisville the not inappropriate title of the "Graveyard of the West." The "second bank" formed a kind of dyke which prevented inundation by the river, but also retained the surface water which gathered in the numerous depressions which characterized the country along the river, so that the whole valley from Bear Grass to Salt River was thickly scatered over with stagnant ponds. "Long Pond" commenced "at the present corner of Sixth and Market Streets, and, inclining a little toward the southwest, extended as far as old Hope Distillery, on or near Sixteenth Street." This was long the early skating resort for all classes in the city. "Gwathmey's or Grayson's Pond" was the second in importance; it extended from Centre Street westwardly half way to Seventh Street, and was preserved by its owners for the fish with which it was stocked. Besides these there were a great number of smaller ponds, which gave the town the appearance of a miniature archipelago. In 1805, the trustees were authorized by the legislature to obviate "those nuisances in such a manner as the majority of them should prescribe," but it was not until the visit of a fearful epidemic, in 1822–23, that any earnest movement was made in this direction.

The military operations of the period contributed to bring here a considerable population of a transient character, but such was the unwillingness or poverty of the lot owners that the period within which dwellings were to be erected was twice extended by the legislature. In 1783 the first store was opened, window glass was first observed in use here, and beside 100 cabins it was noted that there were in the town "sixty-three houses finished, thirty-seven partly finished, and twenty-two raised but not covered."

This estimate of the buildings was probably incorrect, or else indicated the number of lots upon which purchasers had built structures to meet the requirement of the law, as in 1790 the census placed the number of inhabitants at only 200 persons. In 1793 a more accurate observer relates that the houses, constructed of logs and boat-planks, were few and small, and that the town was far more noted for the energy and social abandon of its people than for public enterprise. Upon the authority of Forman's autobiography, McMasters says: "Travelers from the more decorous towns of the East were shocked at the balls, the drinking, the fighting and the utter disregard paid to the Sabbath day. But all agreed that the inhabitants were the most whole-souled and hospitable. The favorite drink was eggnog. The favorite pastime was billiards, and every morning numbers of young women, escorted by the young men, gathered about the one billiard-table in the town. If a stranger of note put up at the only tavern, and gave out that he was come to stay some time, he was sure to be called on, as the phrase was, to sign for a ball. When the night came, the garrison at Fort Jefferson would furnish the music, and the managers would choose the dances. The first was usually the minuet, and, till his number was called, no man knew with whom he was to dance. This over, each was at liberty to choose his own partner for the first 'volunteer.'"*

In 1796, Louisville is described as a port of entry and post-town; it consists of three principal streets, and contains about 100 houses, a court house and jail. It commands a delightful prospect of the river and the adjacent country, and promises to be a place of great trade, but its unhealthiness, owing to stagnated waters back of the town, has considerably retarded its growth. In the following year, a more particular account of the town's progress is gathered from the assessor's returns. Taxes were levied "on all who reside within the limits of the half acre lots," at the rate of 6d. for each horse, 1s. for each negro, 20s. for each billiard-table, 6s. on each tavern license, 10s. on each retail store, 2s. per wheel on all carriages, 6d. on £100 value in town lots, and 3s. on each tithable. The return shows that there were found within the prescribed limits, 50 horses, 65 negroes, 2 billiard-tables, 5 tavern licenses, 5 retail stores, 6 wheels (but whether three gigs or one four-wheeled vehicle and a gig there are no means of determining), and 80 tithables. The whole assessment amounted to £31, 15s. 6d., but out of this, £12 were credited on the delinquent list. In 1800, the population had reached 359 souls, and by an act of the legislature of the same year the citizens were exempted from working on the public ways, out side of town, save the one to the "lower landing;" a "surveyor" was authorized to take charge of the streets, and to summon the inhabitants at proper times to work on them; and £25 were appropriated to build a market house on the public grounds. The latter provision of the act proved of no effect, as no such grounds could be found, and in the following year the legislature repealed this feature of the previous act, but at the same time required the trustees to fix upon a suitable place for the purpose, and thereon to erect a market house. In 1806, the town had begun to engage in the river commerce; but "six keel boats and two barges—the one of thirty tons belonging to Reed, of Cincinnati, the other of forty, owned by Instone, of Frankfort—sufficed for the carrying trade of Louisville and Shipping-port." In 1807 the Farmer's Library, a weekly paper, was established, and in the year following the Louisville Gazette appeared. In 1809 the assessor's returns again afford a clue to the progress of the town, and marks a good degree of growth in the interval since 1797:

$74,000 value of lots at 10 per cent	$740 00
113 white tythes, at 50c	56 50
82 black tythes over 16 yrs., at 25c	20 50
83 black tythes under 16 yrs., at 12½c	10 38
11 retail stores, at $5	55 00
3 tavern licences, at $2	6 00
30 carriage wheels, at 12½c. per wheel	3 75
2 billiard tables, at $2.50	5 00
131 horses, at 12½c	16 37
	$913 50



*History of the People of the United States, Vol. II, p. 152.

In 1808, a theater was erected in Louisville, and though "but little better than a barn," it sufficed the purposes of the town until 1818, without refitting, and after repairing and refurnishing, until 1843, when it burned down. In 1810 a brick court house was begun, in front of which a lofty "Ionic portico," supported by four wooden columns, gave it such distinction as to be considered the handsomest of its kind in the western country. A variety of circumstances appeared to combine to retard the development of the manufacturing interests of Louisville, and in 1810, with 1,357 inhabitants, little mention is made of its factories. There were, however, several rope-walks extensively carried on, and a valuable bagging factory, which was burned down in December, 1810. In the Navigator of 1814, it is noted that "there have lately been added to Louisville a banking company, a paper-mill, a second printing office, a book store, a circulating library, a reading room, an air foundry for casting all kinds of pot metal, a glass house, and a grist and saw-mill by steam, and cotton manufactory by the same power were expected to be in operation this summer (1814), and a number of handsome buildings, altogether having the appearance of its becoming a great commercial and manufacturing town."

An early competitor for metropolitan honors was Shippingport, situated two miles below Louisville, at the foot of the rapids. The plat originally contained forty-five acres, and was laid out on the plain which skirts the Ohio from Beargrass to Salt River. In 1785 it was established by the legislature under the name of "Anonymous," in the absence of any other; Campbelltown was subsequently applied, but the popular name eventually prevailed—a clear instance of "the survival of the fittest." It was regularly laid out, and with the growth of river navigation rapidly developed. In 1803 the whole site was sold to James Berthoud, who three years later disposed of the larger portion to Messrs. Tarascon, two Frenchmen and brothers, to whose enterprising energy and public spirit the town owed its early prosperity. The names of the streets were characteristic: Front, Market, Tobacco, Bengal, Jackson, Hemp, Mill and Tarascon, the next being numbered from Second to Sixteenth Street. During the early period of river navigation the town enjoyed superior advantages. After passing the rapids, boats put in here for supplies, where they found deep water and a bold shore. Boats upward bound were obliged to discharge their cargoes here, from whence all good destined for upper ports were wagoned to Beargrass for reshipment. In 1810, though containing only ninety-eight inhabitants, it was a place of considerable business. Messrs. Tarascon had a large flouring-mill at the foot of the rapids, from which they shipped considerable quantities of flour to New Orleans; they had a store and extensive rope-walk also, and Mr. Berthoud did a large commission business. From 1815 to 1819 the Tarascon brothers greatly extended their business, erecting a mill-race with intention of affording power for a series of factories, which they projected, but never completed. They did erect an immense flouring-mill on a scale that was the wonder of the times. It was six stories, towered 102 feet in the air, and cost $150,000; it was wonderfully complete in all its appointments, and had a capacity of 500 barrels of flour per day. This done, the proprietors began experimenting with water-wheels, intending to erect mills for the manufacture of cotton on a large scale, but the canal was projected, and other obstacles prevented the fulfillment of these ambitious designs.

The lowness of the ground interfered with its building up, though in 1819, McMurtrie gives the average price of lots at from $40 to $50 per front foot. The same writer says: "The population of Shippingport may be estimated at 600 souls, including strangers. Some taste is already perceptible in the construction of their houses, many of which are neatly built and ornamented with galleries, in which, of a Sunday, are displayed all the beauty of the place. It is, in fact, the Bois de Boulogne of Louisville, it being the resort of all classes on high days and holidays. At these times, it exhibits a spectacle at once novel and interesting. The number of steamboats in the port, each bearing one or two flags, the throng of horses, carriages and gigs, and the contented appearance of a crowd of pedestrians, all arrayed in their 'Sunday's best' produce an effect it would be impossible to describe."

VIEW ON THE TENNESSEE RIVER IN WESTERN KENTUCKY.

CHAPTER XII.

THE NEW STATE AND ITS PROBLEMS.

KENTUCKY, from a county of Virginia, had become, as has been shown, an independent commonwealth, and a sovereign member of the sisterhood of States. It was the first-born of the new confederation, and comprised the fourteenth State of the Federal Union. The machinery, civil and political, was set in motion, and the new member embarked on the full tide of municipal experiment. A constitution had been framed and adopted, and in a general way ratified by the people.

Delegates to the convention which framed the constitution of the new State, were elected in December, 1791, and in the following April met in Danville. The constitution which they formed is an index of the state of public feeling at the time on many matters of importance. It totally abandoned the aristocratic features of the parent State, so far as representation by counties was concerned, and established numbers as the basis. Suffrage was universal, and the sheriffs were elected triennially by the people. But while these departures from the constitution of Virginia displayed the general predominance of the democratic principle in Kentucky, there are strong indications that the young statesmen of the West were disposed to curb the luxuriance of this mighty element by strong checks. The executive, the senate and the judiciary were entirely removed from the direct control of the people. The governor was chosen by electors, who were elected by the people for that purpose every fourth year. The members of the senate were appointed by the same electoral college which chose the president, and might be selected indifferently from any part of the State. The judiciary were appointed, and held their office during good behavior. The supreme court, however, had original and final jurisdiction in all land cases. This last feature was engrafted upon the constitution by Col. George Nicholas, and was most expensive and mischievous in practice.*

Col. Nicholas was a master spirit of the convention, and one of the ablest lawyers of the early bar of Kentucky. He was born in Williamsburg, Va., about the year 1743, and was a son of Robert Nicholas, a distinguished lawyer of Virginia. He was a captain in the Virginia line in the revolutionary war, and after the close of the long and sanguinary struggle, he resumed the practice of law and was elected to the legislature from Albemarle County, where, upon his retirement from the army, he had made his home. He was a prominent and influential member of the convention called to ratify the Federal constitution, and zealously advocated its adoption. In 1788, he came to Kentucky and located in Mercer County (now Boyle) near Danville. Of him, and the first constitutional convention of the State, Gov. Morehead said: "It abounded in talent, integrity and patriotism, and George Nicholas was its brightest luminary. A member of the convention that ratified the constitution of the United States, he was the associate of Madison, of Randolph, and of Patrick Henry; and he came to Kentucky in the fullness of his fame and in the maturity of his intellectual strength. He enjoyed in an eminent degree the confidence of the people of Kentucky, and contributed largely, by public speaking and by essays of singular power, to influence the course they took in the great political contest of 1798. He was emphatically a great statesman and a great lawyer." In later years Col. Nicholas removed to Lexington, and for the remainder of his life devoted himself to his profession. When, in 1799, a law department was added to Transylvania University he was elected the first professor, but died in a few months afterward, at the age of fifty-six years.

*Collins, Vol. I, p. 274.

A late writer, in discussing that clause of the first constitution of the State relating to the supreme court, says: "This provision was introduced by Col. George Nicholas. On proposing it, as it had not been an element in his canvass, he took the good way of resigning his seat in the convention and asking for a re-election, which was unanimously given him without contest. This uncontested return of the proposer was taken as evidence that the people desired the arrangement. The object of this provision was to prevent the action of local prejudice in the settlement of legislation concerning land titles. This prejudice is always sure to be strong in the case of such land titles as were growing up under the rough system of 'location' that the laws permitted. Boundaries being unfixed, there was already a disposition to disregard the rights of original patentees, and to use the unoccupied land as common property. Any jury, drawn from the neighborhood in which the disputed land lay, was likely to contain men who had a sinister interest against the establishment of patent claims. Thus the State at the outset found itself in danger, through defective titles, of losing a part of the value of the soil which had inspired the people to its conquest. The remedy was unusual, but fully warranted by the needs of the case, though in experience it was found impracticable."

The first constitution of Kentucky was modeled, in a great degree, after the constitution of the United States, as shown by the adoption of the famous "Kentucky Resolutions."* It has been characterized as an effort to "adapt the framework of the law to the existing needs of the community, rather than to seek any ideal perfection," and Marshall, the historian, says the "scheme was that of a democracy rather than that of a republic." This could scarcely be considered an objection, as the people were democratic in their political spirit, and their society was a pure democracy. Hence, it was only natural that their law should conform to their motives and conditions. Some of the features of the document deserve more than a passing notice. The first of these is the clause relating to suffrage, which was given to all male citizens who were twenty-one years old, and had not been disfranchised through the conviction of crime. Another feature, and one to be commended, was that the whole body of the judiciary was "constituted by appointment, and without specified term of office." This was the custom of the time, and might still be followed with advantage to the country and considerable benefit to society. Another very good provision was keeping "separate church and state" by excluding from the legislature ministers of the gospel. One of the most important provisions was the clause concerning slavery. It shows a strong prejudice against the commercial traffic in slaves, and forbids their introduction "into the State as merchandise, and none were to be brought that were imported into America since 1789." It further recommended the legislature to pass laws "permitting the emancipation of slaves under the limitation that they shall not become a charge on the county in which they reside." This clause is indubitable evidence that the slavery problem had already presented itself to the people, and that they apprehended danger, sooner or later, from its influence.

It is a singular fact, and one deserving of some criticism, that this constitution made no reference in any manner to a system of public schools. "In this," says a recent writer, "it differs from the constitution of the Northern States." This is true. But, it must be remembered, that when many of the Northern and all of the Northwestern States were organized, the public school system was better understood than it was when

*These resolutions were framed and adopted by the Kentucky legislature as a protest against what was deemed the "unconstitutional action of the Federal congress in enacting the alien and sedition laws." In her protest, Kentucky intended to manifest her displeasure at the passage of these acts, and also to show unmistakably the interpretation which she put upon the Federal compact. These resolutions, for these reasons have in Kentucky ever been held of great political importance. (See Appendix A, Note 30.)

Kentucky became a State and framed her first constitution. This neglect, however, greatly retarded the growth and prosperity of the State, and resulted in keeping her in the rear of many of her younger sisters of the Northwest.

Gen. Isaac Shelby was elected the first governor of the State, as already noticed, and was a man well qualified for the position. He was a native of Maryland, born in 1750, and was of Welsh descent, his father, Gen. Evan Shelby, having emigrated from Wales. In 1780, Isaac Shelby, who had removed to western Virginia, found himself a citizen of North Carolina, by the extension of the boundary line of that State. He was a gallant soldier of the revolutionary war, and was second in command at the battle of King's Mountain, where 1,000 British prisoners were captured—an event that served to greatly revive the drooping spirits of the friends of liberty in the South. He came to Kentucky about the close of the war, and pre-empted large bodies of land, some of which, lying in Fayette County, is still in possession of his descendants. His election to the chief magistracy was an act of wisdom on the part of the people, and highly beneficial to the infant commonwealth.

The effect produced in Kentucky by the French revolution, and the extent to which prominent Kentuckians were involved in the intrigue, has been shown. Many believed that Gov. Shelby himself was in sympathy with the movement to open, through the means afforded by the disturbances in France, the navigation of the Mississippi River. To this charge a late writer replies: "The ultra-Federalists of Kentucky believed that Gov. Shelby was conniving with the French party, but it appears, after a careful reading of the evidence, that his action was only the proper caution of a man who had very limited power to act under the circumstances of the situation. The matter was really one that concerned the Federal government alone. The laws that appeared likely to be violated were Federal and not State laws; it would not have been fit that the governor of Kentucky should have strained his limited powers to meddle with the business. As an individual he doubtless sympathized with the project of opening the Mississippi to free navigation; yet he held himself ready not only to enforce the laws of Kentucky, but to perform whatever was constitutionally required of him as governor by the president of the United States. His letter to Washington is admirable in its tone and exhibits more submission to the Federal authority than would now be shown by most governors." This seems to set at rest any charge of unfaithfulness on the part of Gov. Shelby toward the general government.

A great majority of the people of Kentucky, however, sympathized strongly with the French, and to the same extent opposed the Federalist party, then predominant. They cherished considerable distrust of the Federal government, which they believed was tending toward an aristocracy. Their feelings and views were heralded abroad by the democratic societies organized in different parts of the State, the prime object of which doubtless was "to resist the increasing encroachments of the Federal authority on the province of the local governments." This was the almost universal feeling in Kentucky, when Gen. Wayne's great victory over the Indians, followed shortly after by news of the treaty between Spain and the United States, changed somewhat the prevailing sentiment. By this treaty with Spain the right to navigate the Mississippi River to the ocean was conceded to the United States, with other benefits and privileges, among which was the right of deposit at New Orleans. This was all that Kentucky had desired, and yet many of her leading spirits were still dissatisfied. "So much more powerful is passion than interest," says a writer upon the subject, "that the intelligence of this treaty was received with a burst of fury throughout the State that knew no bounds. The people regarded it as a base desertion of an ancient friend struggling with a host of enemies, and a cowardly truckling to England from cold-blooded policy, or a secret attachment to aristocratic institutions." To such an extent was their passions for a time inflamed, that

ISAAC SHELBY.

Humphrey Marshall, United States senator from Kentucky, was subjected to violence by the people for having voted for the ratification of the treaty, contrary to the wishes of a majority of his constituents. But this state of affairs soon settled down into tranquillity.

Kentucky, it would seem, ought now to be satisfied. Peace had been obtained with the Indians by Gen. Wayne; the posts on the northwestern frontier had finally been surrendered by England, and the free navigation of the Mississippi conceded to the United States. But the troubles with Spain were not yet ended, and to more fully understand the intrigue, it is necessary to go back prior to the conclusion of the treaty. It is thus described by Mr. McClung, in Collins' History of Kentucky:

Pending the negotiations with Spain, an intrigue was commenced between the agents of that power and certain citizens of Kentucky, which was not fully disclosed to the country until the year 1806, and the full extent of which is not even yet certainly known. In July, 1795, the Spanish governor, Carondelet, dispatched a certain Thomas Power to Kentucky with a letter to Benjamin Sebastian, then a judge of the court of appeals of Kentucky. In this communication he alludes to the confidence reposed in the judge by his predecessor, Gen. Miro, and the former correspondence which had passed between them. He declared that his Catholic majesty was willing to open the Mississippi to the western country; and to effect that object, and to negotiate a treaty, in relation to this and other matters, Sebastian was requested to have agents chosen by the people of Kentucky, who should meet Col. Gayoso, a Spanish agent, at New Madrid, when all matters could be adjusted. Judge Sebastian communicated this letter to Judge Innes, George Nicholas and William Murray, the latter a very eminent lawyer of Kentucky, of the Federal party, and they all agreed that Sebastian should meet Gayoso at New Madrid, and hear what he had to propose. The meeting accordingly took place, and the outline of a treaty was agreed to, but before matters were concluded, intelligence was received of the treaty with Spain by the United States, by which the navigation was effectually and legally secured. The Spanish governor broke up the negotiation, much to the dissatisfaction of Sebastian, who concluded that the regular treaty would not be ratified, and preferred carrying out the irregular negotiation then commenced.

All communication then ceased, so far as is known, until 1797. The commissioners were busily engaged in marking the line of boundary between Spain and the United States, as fixed by the treaty, when Carondelet again opened the negotiation. His former agent, Thomas Power, again appeared in Louisville, with a letter to Sebastian, and a request that Sebastian disclose its contents to Innes, Nicholas and Murray. Sebastian positively refused to hold any intercourse with Murray, but instantly showed the letter to Judge Innes. The scheme unfolded in this letter was, "to withdraw from the Federal Union and form an independent western government. To effect this object it was suggested that these gentlemen should, by a series of eloquently written publications, dispose the public mind to withdraw from any further connection with the Atlantic States. In consideration of the devotion of their time and talents to this purpose, it was proposed that the sum of $100,000 should be appropriated to their use, by his Catholic majesty. Should any one in office, in Kentucky, be deprived thereof, on account of his connection with Spain, the full value of said office was to be paid to him by his majesty." This article was inserted at the suggestion of Sebastian.

To effect these great objects, it was proposed that twenty pieces of field artillery, with a large supply of small arms and munitions of war, together with $100,000 in money, should instantly be furnished to Kentucky by the king of Spain, as his majesty's quota in the aid of the enterprise. Fort Massac was to be seized instantly, and the Federal troops were to be dispossessed of all posts upon the western waters. The only stipulation for the benefit of his Catholic majesty was an extension of his northern boundary, to the mouth of the Yazoo, and thence due east to the Tombigbee. For this miserable pittance of desert territory, this corrupt and worn out despotism was willing to violate its faith recently plighted in a solemn treaty, and by treachery and intrigue, to sow the seeds of discord and revolution, where all was peace and confidence. Such was the morality of courts in the eighteenth century.

This proposal was received by Sebastian with great coolness, and submitted to Innes for his opinion. The testimony of Innes himself is all we have to rely on, as to the manner in which he received the proposition. He declares that he denounced the proposal as dangerous and improper, and gave it as his opinion that it ought to be rejected. Sebastian concurred in this opinion, but desired Innes to see Col. Nicholas, and have a written answer prepared for Power, declaring that whatever they concurred in would be approved by him. Innes saw Nicholas, who wrote a refusal, couched in calm but decisive language, which was signed by them both, and delivered to Power, through the medium of Judge Sebastian. No disclosure was made by either of the parties of this proposal from the Spanish government. Power in the meantime visited Gen. Wilkinson, who still held a command in the regular army, and then was stationed in garrison at Detroit. Power's ostensible object in visiting Wilkinson was to deliver to him a letter of remonstrance from Gov. Carondelet, against the United States taking immediate possession of the posts on the Mississippi. His real object was, no doubt, to sound him upon the Spanish proposition. Power afterward reported to Carondelet that Wilkinson received him coldly, informed him that the governor of the Northwest had orders from the President to arrest him and send him on to Philadelphia, and that there was no way for him to escape, but to permit himself to be conducted, under guard, to Fort Massac, whence he could find his way to New Madrid. He states that in their first conference Wilkinson observed, bitterly · "We are both lost, without deriving any benefit from your journey." He pronounced the Spanish proposal a chimerical project; that the West, having obtained by the late treaty all that they desired, had no motive to form any connection with Spain; that the best thing Spain could do would be honestly to comply with the treaty; that his personal honor forbade him to listen to the project; that the late treaty had overturned all his plans, and rendered his labors for ten years useless; that he had destroyed his ciphers, and complained that his secret had been divulged; that he might be named governor of Natchez, and he might then, perhaps, have power to realize his political projects.

In his report to Carondelet, Power represents Sebastian as speaking to him in a more encouraging tone of the prospect of a union of Kentucky with Spain. Sebastian expressed the opinion that, in case of war with Spain, Kentucky might be induced to take part against the Atlantic States. In conclusion Power gives his own opinion that nothing short of war with France, or the denial of the navigation of the Mississippi, could induce Kentucky to separate herself from the Eastern States. After visiting Wilkinson, instead of returning to Louisville, as he had at first intended, he was sent by Wilkinson under escort of Captain Shaumberg, of the United States army, to Fort Massac, and thence returned to New Madrid. At Massac he received from Sebastian the letter of Nicholas and Innes. Nothing certain was known of the particulars of this transaction until 1806, when it became public that Sebastian had received a pension from Spain, from 1795 to 1806, of $2,000.

For the prominent part taken in this bit of Kentucky's early history, and particularly for receiving a pension from the Spanish government, Judge Sebastian was arraigned by the legislature, and found guilty of the latter charge. As there was no law to punish him for this act, he was allowed to resign his seat as one of the judges of the court of appeals, and pass into obscurity. The following sketch of Sebastian has been given: "British by birth, he began life as an Episcopalian clergyman. Drifting to this country he became a lawyer, and finally a jurist of excellent ability. Despite his great talents, he seems to have been a man always in straits for money. This led to his fall. It may be said, however, in extenuation, that the position of a foreign pensioner was not regarded with the same abhorrence in the last century that it is in this, and that the beginning of his relations with the Spanish government dates from a time when he was a private citizen."

This intrigue with Spain is one of the darkest pages in the history of Kentucky. The moving spirits on the part of Kentucky were some of the ablest men and most profound lawyers of the young State. Innes, Nicholas and Murray, the compeers of Sebastian, possessed but few equals, intellectually, in the commonwealth. They disclaimed all knowledge of his being a pensioner of the Spanish government, and their greatest error seems to have been their failure to report the whole matter to the Federal government. Innes, at the time, was judge of the United States Court for the district of Kentucky, and as such was bound by his oath of office to guard the government against foreign intermeddling. His conduct was severely criticized, and a committee appointed by the legislature to inquire into the charges made against him. In his defense, before this committee, he gave as the reasons for not communicating the subject to the executive of the United States, the following, which at the time were considered rather lame: "First —It was known that neither of us (Col. Nicholas and himself) approved Mr. Adams' administration, and that we believed that he kept a watchful eye over our actions; that the communication must depend upon his opinion of our veracity, and that it would have the appearance of courting his favor. Second— We both had reason, and did believe, that the then administration were disposed, upon the slightest pretext, to send an army into this State, which we considered would be a grievance upon the people, and therefore declined making any communication on the subject, as we apprehended no trouble from the Spanish government."

Plausible as this may seem, few believed it to be the true reason of their omission to report the matter to the president. There were other reasons, of interest to themselves, which it was believed kept them silent upon the subject. The following view taken of the matter by a recent historian is, perhaps, not far wrong:

We cannot determine how far these men felt these propositions to be attractive, but it is clear that one and all they deemed them entirely impracticable, and that they not only absolutely refused the offer, but kept the proposition from the knowledge of the people. Their statements make it clear that they did not think that at this time it would be possible to form any party in Kentucky to advocate secession. There can be no doubt that the Spanish governor chose his confederates with discretion, and that his offer of immediate money, amounting in value to about the equivalent of $500,000 in our day, and of place and power beyond, was tempting to these men, who were poor and of an adventurous type of mind. Its unhesitating rejection shows clearly that it was not a thing that they deemed in any way possible.

John Adams was elected president, and Thomas Jefferson vice-president, of the United States, in 1796. This election, particularly that of Mr. Adams, was exceedingly obnoxious to Kentuckians. The people of that State, by a large majority, were Republicans or Democrats, as then called, and zealously opposed the Federalist party—the party to which Mr. Adams owed his election. The struggle between these rival political organizations raged fiercely, and was characterized by all the bitter invective of more modern political warfare. Washington's adherence to and his affiliation with the Federalist party made his administration unpopular in Kentucky, while that of Adams, who was known to be a zealous advocate of the Federalist principles, was "absolutely odious" to the people throughout the State. "In no part of the Union," says McClung, "were his measures denounced with more bitterness, nor his downfall awaited with more impatience." When, in 1800, another presidential election came before the people, Kentucky cast her electoral vote for Mr. Jefferson, as against Mr. Adams,* thus clearly and conclusively showing her position in national politics.

The question was now being seriously discussed as to the necessity of revising the constitution of the State. In May, 1797, a vote was taken "for and against" the calling of a constitutional convention, and in the following May a second vote was taken, and a majority of 3,049 given in favor of the convention. But as several counties did not return the whole number of their votes, and several others failed to vote on the subject altogether, some question arose as to whether a majority of the people really desired a revision of the constitution. The constitution required that a majority of the votes in the State should be given for the successive annual elections, or a two-thirds majority of the legislature, to call a convention for constitutional revision. The legislature, in the belief that it was the "will of the majority" to revise the constitution, at the session of 1798–99, called a convention for the purpose. The convention accordingly met in 1799, and adopted the second constitution of the State, which, upon being submitted to a vote of the people, was duly ratified. It remained in force until the adoption of the present constitution half a century later. The most important changes in the new document were in the mode of electing the governor, and a part of the legislature, in the jurisdiction of the supreme court, and the appointment of some of the county officers, who had hitherto been elected

*This was the first case in which the choice of a president went to the house of representatives; and by a singular coincidence, the next and only similar case in the history of the government, was in that of John Quincy Adams, a son of John Adams, in 1824, who was elected president by that house of representatives. The proceedings in the first case were as follows: Of 128 electoral votes cast, no candidate received a majority. The entire votes of New York, Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, South Carolina and Georgia, with eight from Pennsylvania, five from Maryland and eight from North Carolina—seventy-three in all—were cast for Mr. Jefferson and Aaron Burr each, making a tie, thus devolving the choice upon the house of representatives. John Adams had sixty-five votes, Charles C. Pinckney, sixty-four, and John Jay, one. On Wednesday, February 11, 1801, the house of representatives began balloting, in secret session, having resolved to attend to no other business and not to adjourn until a choice should be effected. Upon the first ballot, eight States—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky and Tennessee—cast their one vote each for Thomas Jefferson; six States—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Delaware and South Carolina—gave their six votes for Aaron Burr, and the votes of Vermont and Maryland (because their representatives were divided) were given blank. Neither had a majority For seven days the house continued in session, nominally without adjournment, and balloted thirty-five times with the same result. On the afternoon of February 17th, Mr. Jefferson was elected president—receiving the votes of Vermont and Maryland in addition to the eight above named, while those of Delaware and South Carolina were given blank. Mr. Burr became the vice-president. (See Collins, Vol. I, pp. 367, 368.)

by popular vote. The first constitution, "like all first instruments of the kind," was soon found to be, in many respects, very defective. Under its provisions, the governor and the upper house of the legislature were chosen by an electoral college, and sheriffs were elected triennially by the people. The new constitution changed these; the governor and senate were made elective by the vote of the people, and sheriffs were appointed by the governor, but in a somewhat roundabout way. The justices of the peace, or, as more commonly called, the magistrates, were appointed by the executive, and the oldest in the county, or the longest in office, became high sheriff, and when his term expired he was succeeded by the next oldest, and so on ad infinitum. A writer speaking of the second constitution says: "The immediate jurisdiction of the supreme court in land cases was unsatisfactory; the danger of land suits caused by the rude methods of survey in use was being amply justified. As the land was still of relatively slight value, and the means of communication with the seat of the court limited, this method of procedure was troublesome. With action carried on in a local court the owner and witnesses, even in case of appeal, would have no occasion for resort to the State capital." This led to a change in the constitution of 1799, and the supreme court was given only appellate jurisdiction.

The same session of the legislature that called the convention for a revision of the constitution, made itself memorable by the passage of what has since been known in history as the "Resolutions of 1798," and which have already been incidentally alluded to. These famous resolutions are thus commented on in a recent work:*

It is difficult for us to see in this day the way in which people looked on the Federal government during the tenth decade of the last century. The several colonies had fought their war of separation from Britain as separate political units, each with its own motive, and none with any distinct idea of what the future government was to be. Each had fought for its local rights, for its own hand. The essence of their struggle was for local, as distinguished from external government. The long political struggle of Kentucky for separation from Virginia is in itself a capital instance of the feeling of this time. The better known debates in the convention that adopted the constitution of the United States show that at every point the States fought zealously, even furiously, for their separate rights. No candid person can read these debates without rising from his task with the conviction that the delegates of this constitutional convention failed to determine the precise relation between the States and the Federal government. They were driven farther than the people had gone, or were then prepared to go, in the direction of consolidation by the logic of facts that they only could perceive in their full meaning. If there had been an effort to put the sedition act in the constitution, no one can doubt that it would have been overwhelmingly defeated in the convention. The fate of the Adams party in the next coming election shows plainly that even in the States that inclined most strongly to Federalism, these laws were generally disapproved.

Since the one distinct object of the American revolution had been to secure local government, it is not to be wondered at, that a people who more than any other in the United States were by their history devoted to this end, should have revolted against the alien and sedition laws, which clearly were very dangerous advances in the direction of that consolidation against which they had effectively protested in the convention. In the extremity of their conceived need they naturally turned to the patent omissions in the contract by which they were bound to the Federal government. The convention had studiously refrained from providing any means whereby the States should be coerced into submission to the Union—differing in this regard in a very suggestive fashion from similar constitutions in other countries; and this was no accidental omission, but one that resulted from a careful discussion of the problem. That patriotic men felt this doubt about the conditions of the constitution is well shown by the subsequent proceedings in other States—notably in Virginia and Massachusetts—where men, whose character cannot be impugned without casting a shadow on a whole people, took the same view of the relation between the several States and the Federal government.

We must grant that the seeds of nullification and secession were in these resolutions of 1798, but these germs of trouble were sown in the events that led to the independence of the colonies, and were nourished by the intentional omissions of the constitution itself. The constitution, as we know it, an instrument affirmed partly by assent of the greater part of the States, then by the circumstances of the South Carolina nullification in the fourth decade of this century, and finally by the result of the civil war, did not then exist. All that was before the minds of men was a new and very debatable instrument, concerning whose meaning there was naturally a great difference of opinion. The Kentucky resolutions were the first production of the great discussion which was destined to continue for two generations, to be in the end decided, by a third, in the most famous civil struggle of all time.

*American Commonwealths, pp. 142, 143.

That the resolutions were intended only as the expression of a sentiment, and not as the basis for any contemplated action, is shown by the previous and succeeding course of politics within the State. It would be a distortion of history to look upon this action as if it had been taken in 1860. It was, in fact, only a caveat directed against the course of a party disposed to take an even more unconstitutional view of the Union than was held by those who voted for the resolutions.

There has ever been some question in Kentucky, as to the real author of the resolutions of 1798. Many attribute them to the pen of Thomas Jefferson, while others, and with apparent good reasons, claim their authorship for John Breckinridge, the first of that distinguished family to settle in Kentucky. Mr. McClung says: "Early in the session a series of resolutions, which were originally drawn by Mr. Jefferson, were presented to the House by John Breckinridge, the representative from Fayette, and almost unanimously adopted." The biographer of Mr. Breckinridge* says: "Some twenty years after his death, it began to be whispered, and then to be intimated in a few newspapers, that the Kentucky resolutions of 1798–99, which he offered, and which was the first great movement against the alien and sedition laws—and the general principles of the party that passed them—were in fact the production of Mr. Jefferson himself and not of John Breckinridge; and it is painful to reflect that Mr. Jefferson did certainly connive at this mean calumny upon the memory of his friend. The family of Mr. Breckinridge have constantly asserted that their father was the sole and true author of these resolutions, and constantly defied the production of proof to the contrary, and there seems to be no question that they are right." The question of authorship may never be definitely settled in the minds of every one, but the "preponderance of evidence" seems to point to Mr. Breckinridge as the author.

Gen. James Garrard was elected the second governor of the State in 1796, and was re-elected in 1800. Under the first constitution, there was a governor's secretary instead of a lieutenant-governor; the second constitution created the last named office, and in 1800, Alexander S. Bullitt was elected lieutenant-governor on the ticket with Gen. Garrard. He was the first lieutenant-governor of the State.

Kentucky was thrown into great excitement, in 1802, by the suspension of the right of deposit at New Orleans, the treaty with Spain, conceeding the right, as well as that of navigating the Mississippi River, having "expired by limitation." The navigation of the Mississippi and the right of deposit at New Orleans, had been guaranteed by the Spanish treaty for three years, with the provision, that at the end of that time it might be renewed, or should the right of deposit at New Orleans be withheld, some other place in the Spanish territory of Louisiana should be "afforded for the same purpose, near the mouth of the river." While the excitement was at its height, the news was received of the cession of Louisiana back to France. Napoleon Bonaparte was then first consul of France, and upon the eve of war with England. Impressed with the impossibility of retaining so distant a province as Louisiana, while England maintained her supremacy on the seas, Napoleon determined to place it beyond her reach, by selling it to the United States. Accordingly, for the trifling sum of 80,000,000 francs he disposed of this magnificent empire to the United States, thereby assuring, forever, the free navigation of the Mississippi River.

Christopher Greenup was elected governor of Kentucky in 1804, and John Caldwell lieutenant-governor, while Thomas Jefferson was re-elected president of the United States, receiving 162 of the 176 electoral votes cast. During these administrations the Burr conspiracy occurred, an event more intimately connected with the history of Kentucky than with that of any other individual State of the Union. A better sketch of the affair could scarcely be written than that prepared by Mr. McClung, for Collins' History of Kentucky. It is as follows:

Aaron Burr, who had been elected vice-president in 1801, had lost the confidence of his party, and was at variance with the president. In 1805 this extraordinary man first made his appearance in Kentucky, and visited Lexington and Louisville. He then passed on to Nashville, St. Louis, Natchez and New Orleans, and again returned to Lexington, where he remained for some time. Gen. Wilkinson, at this time, commanded the United States troops in Louisiana, and the affairs of the United States with Spain were in an unsatisfactory state. That miserable power resented the purchase of Louisiana by the United States, and assumed a sulkiness of demeanor somewhat resembling Mexico in more modern times. In the spring of 1806 their forces advanced to the Sabine in somewhat hostile array, and Gen. Wilkinson had orders to be upon the alert, and repel them if they should cross that barrier. Such was the aspect of affairs, when, in 1806, Col. Burr again appeared in the West, spending a large portion of his time at Blennerhassett's Island, on the Ohio River, but being seen in Lexington, Nashville and Louisville.

*Collins, Vol. II, p. 99.

This extraordinary man, having quarreled with the president, and lost caste with the Republican party, endeavored to retrieve his political fortunes by becoming a candidate for the office of governor of New York, in opposition to the regular Democratic candidate. He was supported by the mass of the Federalists, and a small section of the Democrats, who still adhered to him. He lost his election chiefly by the influence of Alexander Hamilton, who scrupled not to represent him as unworthy of political trust, and deprived him of the cordial support of the Federalists. Deeply stung by his defeat, Burr turned fiercely upon his illustrious antagonist, and killed him in a duel. Hamilton was idolized by the Federalists, and even his political adversaries were not insensible to his many lofty and noble qualities. Burr found himself abandoned by the mass of the Democrats, regarded with abhorrence by the Federalists, and banished from all the legitimate and honorable walks of ambition. In this desperate state of his political fortunes, he sought the West, and became deeply involved in schemes as desperate and daring as any which the annals of ill-regulated ambition can furnish.

The groundwork of his plan, undoubtedly, was to organize a military force upon the western waters, descend the Mississippi, and wrest from Spain an indefinite portion of her territory adjoining the Gulf of Mexico. The southwestern portion of the United States, embracing New Orleans and the adjacent territory, was, either by force or persuasion, to become a part of the new empire, of which New Orleans was to become the capital and Burr the chief, under some one of the many names which, in modern times, disguise despotic power under a republican form. These were the essential and indispensable features of the plan. But if circumstances were favorable the project was to extend much further, and the whole country west of the Alleghanies was to be wrested from the American Union, and to become a portion of this new and magnificent empire.

Mad and chimerical as this project undoubtedly was, when the orderly and law-respecting character of the American people is considered, yet the age in which it was conceived had witnessed wonders, which had far outstripped the sober calculations of philosophy, and surpassed the limits of probable fiction. When the historian, Gibbon, was closing his great work upon the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, he expressed the opinion that the age of great and startling revolutions had passed away, never to return; that mankind had sobered down, by centuries of experience, to a tame and moderate level, which would not admit of those brilliant materials for history which the past had afforded. Scarcely had this opinion been recorded, when the great drama opened in France, and for twenty-five years the world stood aghast at the series of magnificent and wonderful pageants which moved before them in the wild confusion of a feverish dream. Kings became beggars, and peasants became kings. Ancient kingdoms disappeared, and new and brilliant republics sprang up in their places. Names, boundaries, ranks, titles, religions, all were tossed about like withered leaves before the wind. A lieutenant in a French regiment had mounted to the throne of western Europe, and drummers, corporals and privates had become dukes, princes and kings.

It was not wonderful, then, that a man like Burr, ostracised in the East, and desperate in his fortunes, abounding in talent, energy and courage, should have determined in the New World, like the Corsican in the Old, to stand the hazard of the die, for empire or a grave. The unsettled relations then existing with Spain afforded a specious cloak to his enterprise, and enabled him to give it a character suitable to the temper of the persons whom he addressed. To the daring youth of the West, desirous of military adventure, he could represent it as an irregular expedition, to be undertaken upon private account, against the possessions of a nation with whom the United States would shortly be at war. It was upon land what privateering was upon the ocean. He could hint to them that the United States government would connive at the expedition, but could not openly countenance it until hostilities actually commenced. There is little doubt that many concurred in the enterprise without being aware of its treasonable character, while it is certain that to others the scheme was exposed in its full deformity.

In the prosecution of this object, he applied himself with singular address to any one who could be useful to him in forwarding the great scheme. Blennerhassett's Island lay directly in his path, and he fixed his keen eye upon the proprietor as one who could be useful to him. This unfortunate man was an Irish gentleman, reputed to be of great wealth, married to a beautiful and accomplished woman, secluded and studious in his habits, devoted to natural science, and as unfitted for the turbulent struggle of active, ambitious life as Burr was for those simple and quiet pursuits, in which his victim found enjoyment and happiness. Blennerhassett's wealth, though, could be employed to advantage. Burr opened the correspondence by a flattering request to be permitted to examine Blennerhassett's grounds and garden, which had been improved at great expense. Once admitted, he employed all the address and eloquence of which he was master, in turning the whole current of Blennerhassett's thoughts from the calm, sedentary pursuits in which he had hitherto delighted, to those splendid visions of empire, greatness and wealth with which his own ardent imagination was then so fiercely glowing. No better evidence of Burr's power need be desired than the absolute command which he obtained over the will and fortune of this man. He molded him to his purpose, inspired him with a frantic enthusiasm in his cause, and obtained complete command of all that Blennerhassett had to offer.

The scheme of separation from the Atlantic States had been too much agitated in Kentucky not to have left some material for Burr to work upon, and that he neglected no opportunity of rallying the fragments of the old party may be readily believed. There is no doubt that Gen. Adair concurred in his scheme, so far as an expedition against the Spanish provinces was concerned; and it is certain that Burr himself calculated upon the co-operation of Gen. Wilkinson, and held frequent intercourse with him. During the summer of 1806 the public mind in Kentucky became agitated by rumors of secret expeditions and conspiracies, in which Burr and others were implicated, but all was wrapped in mystery and doubt.

At length a paper, entitled the Western World, published in Frankfort, by Wood & Street, came out with a series of articles, in which the old intrigue of Sebastian with Power, and the present project of Burr, were blended in a somewhat confused manner, and some round assertions of facts were made, and some names implicated which created no small sensation. Sebastian, then a judge of the supreme court, was boldly asserted to be an intriguer with Spain and a pensioner of the Spanish crown. Innes, then a judge of the Federal court; Brown, a senator in congress from Kentucky; Wilkinson, a general in the regular army, were all implicated. Burr was plainly denounced as a traitor, and the whole of his scheme was unfolded. There was a mixture of truth and error in these articles, which no one was then able to separate, and the public mind was completely bewildered at the number of atrocious plots which were exposed, and at the great names implicated. The friends of some of the parties violently resented the articles, and pistols and dirks were resorted to, to silence the accusation. But the paper sturdily adhered to its charges, and an address was prepared and published to the legislature elected in 1806, praying an inquiry into the conduct of Sebastian, which was circulated among the people for signatures, and was signed by a great number, particularly in the county of Woodford.

In the meantime Col. Joseph Hamilton Daviess, the attorney for the United States, appeared in open court before Judge Innes on November 3d, and moved for process to compel the attendance of Burr before the court, to answer to a charge of a high misdemeanor, in organizing a military expedition against a friendly power, from and within the territory of the United States. This motion was grounded upon the oath of the attorney, setting forth with great accuracy the preparations then being made by Burr, and imputing to him designs which subsequent events proved to have been well understood by the attorney. This startling affidavit created immense sensation at the time. Burr was then popular in Kentucky, and was caressed and countenanced by her most eminent citizens. Daviess was greatly admired for those splendid powers of eloquence which he possessed in a degree rarely if ever surpassed, but labored under the odium of being an incurable Federalist, and equally bold and eloquent in expressing his opinions. Nine-tenths of the public at the time were startled at the boldness of the accusation, and seem to have attributed it to the well-known hatred of the Federalists to Col. Burr. Be the cause, however, what it might, the public feeling was strongly in favor of Burr and against the attorney, who was boldly and manfully discharging his duty. Judge Innes took time to consider the application, and after two days overruled the motion.

Col. Burr was in Lexington at the time, and was informed of the motion made by Daviess in an incredibly short space of time after it was made. He entered the court house shortly after Innes had overruled the motion, and addressed the judge with a grave and calm dignity of manner, which increased, if possible, the general prepossession in his favor. He spoke of the late motion as one which had greatly surprised him, insinuated that Daviess had reason to believe that he was absent upon business of a private but pressing nature, which it was well known required his immediate attention, that the judge had treated the application as it deserved, but as it might be renewed by the attorney in his absence, he preferred that the judge should entertain the motion now, and he had voluntarily appeared in order to give the gentleman an opportunity of proving his charge. Nowise disconcerted by the lofty tranquility of Burr's manner, than which nothing could be more imposing, Daviess promptly accepted the challenge and declared himself ready to proceed as soon as he could procure the attendance of his witnesses. After consulting with the marshal, Daviess announced his opinion that his witnesses could attend on the ensuing Wednesday, and with the acquiescence of Burr, that day was fixed upon by the court for the investigation.

Burr awaited the day of trial with an easy tranquillity, which seemed to fear no danger, and on Wednesday the court house was crowded to suffocation. Daviess, upon counting his witnesses, discovered that Davis Floyd, one of the most important, was absent, and with great reluctance asked a postponement of the case. The judge instantly discharged the grand jury. Col. Burr then appeared at the bar, accompained by his counsel, Henry Clay* and Col. Allen. * * * Col. Burr arose in court, expressed his regret that the grand jury had been discharged, and inquired the reason. Col. Daviess replied, and added that Floyd was then in Indiana attending a session of the territorial legislature. Burr calmly desired that the cause of the postponement might be entered upon the record as well as the reason why Floyd did not attend. He then with great self-possession, and with an air of candor difficult to be resisted, addressed the court and crowded audience upon the subject of the accusation. His style was without ornament, passion or fervor; but the spell of a great mind, and daring but calm spirit, was felt with singular power by all who heard him. He hoped that the good people of Kentucky would dismiss their apprehensions of danger from him, if any such really existed. There was really no ground for them, however zealously the attorney might strive to awaken them. He was engaged in no project inimical to the peace or tranquility of the country, as they would certainly learn whenever the attorney should be ready, which he greatly apprehended would never be. In the meantime, although private business urgently demanded his presence elsewhere, he felt compelled to give the attorney one more opportunity of proving his charge, and would patiently await another attack.

Upon the 25th of November, Col. Daviess informed the court that Floyd would attend on the 2d of December following, and another grand jury was summoned to attend on that day. Col. Burr came into court attended by the same counsel as on the former occasion, and cooly awaited the expected attack. Daviess, with evident chagrin, again announced that he was not ready to proceed, that John Adair had been summoned and was not in attendance, and that his testimony was indispensable to the prosecution. He again asked a postponement of the case for a few days, and that the grand jury should be kept impaneled until he could compel the attendance of Adair by attachment.

Burr upon the present occasion remained silent, and entirely unmoved by anything which occurred. Not so his counsel. A most animated and impassioned debate sprung up, intermingled with sharp and flashing personalities between Clay and Daviess. Never did two more illustrious orators encounter each other in debate. The enormous mass which crowded to suffocation the floor, the galleries, the windows, the platform of the judge, remained still and breathless for hours, while these renowned and immortal champions, stimulated by mutual rivalry, and each glowing with the ardent conviction of right, encountered each other in splendid intellectual combat. Clay had the sympathies of the audience on his side, and was the leader of the popular party in Kentucky. Daviess was a Federalist, and was regarded as persecuting an innocent and unfortunate man from motives of political hate. But he was buoyed up by the full conviction of Burr's guilt, and the delusion of the people on the subject and the very infatuation which he beheld around him, and the smiling security of the traitor who sat before him, stirred his great spirit to one of its most brilliant efforts. All, however, was in vain. Judge Innes refused to retain the grand jury unless some business was brought before them; and Daviess, in order to gain time, sent up to them an indictment against John Adair, which was pronounced by the grand jury "not a true bill." The hour being late, Daviess then moved for an attachment to compel the attendance of Adair, which was resisted by Burr's counsel, and refused by the court on the ground that Adair was not in contempt until the day had expired. Upon the motion of Daviess the court then adjourned until the ensuing day.

In the interval Daviess had a private interview with the judge, and obtained from him an expression of the opinion that it would be allowable for him as prosecutor to attend the grand jury in their room and examine witnesses, in order to explain to them the connection of the detached particles of evidence, which his intimate acquaintance with the plot would enable him to do, and without which the grand jury would scarcely be able to comprehend their bearing. When the court resumed its sitting on the following morning, Daviess moved to be permitted to attend the grand jury in their room. This was resisted by Burr's counsel as novel and unprecedented, and refused by the court. The grand jury then retired, witnesses were sworn, and sent up to them, and on the 5th of the month they returned, as Daviess had expected, "not a true bill." In addition to this, the grand jury returned into court a written declaration signed by the whole of them, in which, from all the evidence before them, they completely exonerated Burr from any design inimical to the peace and well-being of the country. Col. Allen instantly moved the court that a copy of the report of the grand jury should be taken and published in the newspapers, which was granted. The popular current ran with great strength in his favor, and the United States' attorney for the time was overwhelmed with obloquy.

*Before Mr. Clay took any active part as the counsel of Burr he required of him an explicit disavowel, upon his honor, that he was engaged in no design contrary to the laws and peace of the country. This pledge was promptly given by Burr, in language the most broad, comprehensive and particular. "He had no design," he said, "to intermeddle with, or disturb the tranquillity of the United States, nor its territories, nor any part of them. He had neither issued nor signed, nor promised a commission to any person for any purpose. He did not own a single musket, nor bayonet, nor any single article of military stores, nor did any other person for him, by his authority or knowledge. His views had been explained to several distinguished members of the administration, were well understood and approved by the government. They were such that every man of honor, and every good citizen, must approve. He considered this declaration proper as well to counteract the chimerical tales circulated by the malevolence of his enemies, as to satisfy Mr. Clay that he had not become the counsel of a man in any way unfriendly to the laws, the government or the well being of his country."—Collins, Vol. I, p. 293.

Thus ended one of the most renowned trials recorded in the annals of the Kentucky courts. When we consider the magnitude of the charges against Burr, and how nearly, at the time, was the culmination of his treasonable plots, the result of the trial seems almost farcical. The majority of the people had become so infatuated with Burr, that they would scarcely have believed in his guilt, "though one arose from the dead" to proclaim it; and to show their disapproval of the "persecution of an innocent man," a grand ball was given in Frankfort in his honor, and to celebrate his "triumph over his enemies." This ball was followed by another, given by the friends of Col. Daviess, who believed in the truth of the charges made against Burr. At one of these balls the editor of the Western World was attacked, and narrowly escaped personal violence. Excitement was aroused to such a height that small cause would have brought on a collision between the parties, disgraceful as it might have proved fatal. These facts show the tone of public feeling at the time.

The treason of Burr, the falsehoods he indulged in to further his ends, and the base treachery with which he treated those who trusted him, have scarcely a parallel in modern history. His declaration to Mr. Clay was made at Frankfort on the 1st of December, 1806. On the 29th of July, preceding, he had written to Wilkinson, one of his associates in treason: "I have obtained funds, and have actually commenced the enterprise. Detachments from different points and on different pretenses will rendezvous on the Ohio on the 1st of November. Everything internal and external favors views ——. Already are orders given to contractors to forward six months' provisions to any point Wilkinson may name. The project is brought to the point so long desired. Burr guarantees the result with his life and honor, with the lives, the fortunes of hundreds—the best blood of the country. Wilkinson shall be second only to Burr. Wilkinson shall dictate the rank of his officers. Burr's plan of operations is to move down rapidly from the Falls by the 15th of November, with the first five or ten hundred men, in light boats now constructing, to be at Natchez between the 5th and 15th of December, there to meet Wilkinson ☞ there to determine whether it will be expedient in the first instance, to SEIZE on, or pass by Baton Rouge!" When we compare this with his solemn declaration to Mr. Clay, nearly six months later, that "he had no design to intermeddle with, or disturb the tranquillity of the United States, nor its territories, nor any part of them;" and that, "he did not own a single musket, nor bayonet, nor any single article of military stores, nor did any other person for him, by his authority or knowledge," etc., etc., the treachery and falsehood of the man stand revealed in the most glaring characters. Before he wrote the above letter to Gen. Wilkinson, he had fully unfolded his treasonable plot to Gen. Eaton. The latter gentleman, on the 24th of July, 1806, wrote to Gen. Wilkinson in cypher: "Are you ready? Are your numerous associates ready? Wealth and glory! Louisiana and Mexico!!"

President Jefferson issued his proclamation on the 25th day of November, 1806 (only a week before Burr's declaration to Clay), denouncing the enterprise, and warning the Western people against it. Mr. McClung thus concludes his sketch of the Burr conspiracy: "On the 1st of December (1806), a messenger from the president arrived at the seat of government of Ohio, and instantly procured the passage of a law by which ten of Col. Burr's boats, laden with provisions and military stores, were seized on the Muskingum, before they could reach the Ohio. At the very moment that he appeared in court, an armed force in his service occupied Blennerhassett's Island, and boats laden with provisions and military stores were commencing their voyage down the river, and passed Louisville on the 16th of December. Scarcely was the grand jury discharged, and the ball which celebrated his acquittal concluded, when the president's proclamation reached Kentucky, and a law was passed in hot haste for seizing the boats which had escaped the militia of Ohio, and were then descending the river. Burr had left Frankfort about the 7th, and had gone to Nashville. The conclusion of this enterprise belongs to the history of the United States. But that portion of the drama which was enacted in Kentucky has been detailed with some minuteness as affording a rich and rare example of cool and calculating impudence, and of truth, loyalty and eloquence most signally baffled and put to shame by the consummate art and self-possession of this daring intriguer." It is only necessary to add, that upon the the failure of his designs on the territory of the United States, Burr continued his intrigue against Mexico, and went to Europe in the furtherance of his scheme. Disappointed at every step, however, he returned disgusted to the United States, and resumed the practice of law in New York. But he never gained his former prestige, and finally died in poverty and neglect.

After the failure of Burr's intrigue, there came a period of peace and tranquillity, in which the material growth and developement of the State were such as it had never before known. Population rapidly increased, manufactories sprang up, and institutions of learning were established in the more thickly settled sections. The political quiet that followed the Burr fiasco was at length broken by the Indian wars of the Northwest, and our second war with Great Britain. These Indian wars, which were carried on for some time, terminated with the battle of Tippecanoe, November 7, 1811, in which a number of Kentucky troops took part. The battle was a severe one, considering the numbers engaged. Kentucky lost Col. Owen and the talented and brave Col. Daviess, who had taken so prominent a part in the prosecution of Burr.

Gen. Charles Scott succeeded Mr. Greenup as governor of Kentucky in 1808, and Gabriel Slaughter became lieutenant-governor. James Madison was elected president, as the successor of Mr. Jefferson, who had served two terms. The relations between the United States and Great Britain were becoming more and more critical, and the storm of war seemed to be rapidly gathering. "The Indian disturbances that led to the Tippecanoe campaign," says a late historian, "were stimulated by the controversies that presaged the war of 1812. It was only after some years of dispute that trouble came to blows, but the British and Canadians doubtless aroused the spirit of depredation in their willing allies, the savages, long before war actually began." The most intense interest was awakened in Kentucky. Public meetings were held, eloquent and fiery speeches were made, and patriotic resolutions were offered in great profusion. When the attack was made upon the Chesapeake, by the British ship Leopard, the outrage "exasperated the American people almost beyond control, and was nowhere more fiercely resented than in Kentucky."

The history of the war of 1812 belongs more properly to the history of the United States than of Kentucky, but a history of the latter would not be complete or satisfactory without a brief glance at the incidents which led to this war, and the part taken in it by Kentuckians. Briefly summed up, the causes of the war were as follows:*

> Being the second maritime power in the world, the United States became the carrier on the ocean of a large portion of the commerce of Europe. Many English seamen, tempted by the high wages given by American merchants, were employed in our commercial marine; and England claimed and exercised the right of impressing her own seamen wherever they might be found. The enormous navy which she maintained, required to be supported by constant impressment; and under color of seizing her own citizens, she was constantly in the habit of stopping American merchantmen and selecting from the crew such men as her subordinate officers chose to consider English, Irish or Scotch, and who were frequently native American citizens. All Americans upon the ocean thus became liable to be seized at the discretion of any British officer, and forced, under the discipline of the lash, to waste their lives in the most unhealthy climates, and in the most degraded stations. This grievance was the subject of protracted and bitter remonstrance, from the administration of Washington to the opening of the war; but Great Britain constantly refused to abandon the right, or rather the exercise of the power. * *
>
> To the embittering grievance of impressment, was added, in 1806 and 1807, a series of paper blockades, by means of which, not only American seamen but American merchandise afloat, became subject to seizure and confiscation upon the high seas, under circumstances which left the American government no choice but to abandon the ocean entirely, or submit to a wholesale plunder upon the seas, destructive to their property and intolerable to national pride. By these orders in council the whole French empire, with its allies and dependencies, then embracing nearly all of Europe, were declared in a state of blockade. Any American vessel bound to or returning from any port in any of these countries, without first stopping at an English port and obtaining a license to prosecute the voyage, was declared a lawful prize. This was in retaliation of Napoleon's Berlin and Milan decrees, wherein he had declared the British Islands, their dependencies and allies, in a state of blockade, and had rendered every vessel liable to confiscation, which either touched at a British port, or was laden in whole, or in part, with British produce. This decree, however, was in retaliation of a previous decree passed by the English government in 1806, whereby the whole imperial coast, from Brest to the Elbe, was declared in a state of blockade.

*Collins, Vol. I, pp. 296, 297.

All these decrees were haughty and high handed violations of [inter]national law, which allows of no mere paper blockades, and requires the presence of a sufficient force to render them legal. Between these haughty belligerents, no American vessel could be free from liability to confiscation. * * Both decrees were equally hostile to American commerce; but the English had set the first example, and the practical operation of their orders in council was far more destructive than Napoleon's decree. One thousand American vessels, richly laden, became the prize of the British cruisers; irritating cases of impressment were constantly occurring; the language of American diplomacy became daily more angry and impatient, that of England daily more cold and haughty, and in June, 1812, the American congress declared war.

The Federalist party, the party to which Washington adhered, and to which Adams belonged, opposed the war of 1812. Its great strength lay in New England, where the principles of the Puritans were strongly engrafted upon the minds of the people. This party, composed at the time of the mass of intelligence and property, and a majority of the religious strength of the country, looked upon France as a power hostile to religion and freedom, and regarded her revolution with horror, and condemned Bonaparte as a usurper and tyrant. The Democratic or Republican party, on the other hand, sympathized with Napoleon, and strongly and zealously advocated and favored the war with England.

When war was declared against England, congress authorized the president to levy 100,000 men. In this levy the quota of Kentucky was 5,500. Fifteen hundred of the number were to be sent to the aid of Hull at Detroit. These were raised without delay, and scarcely had they crossed the Ohio, on their way thither, when news reached them of Hull's surrender. Soon after this Gen. William Henry Harrison, then governor of the Indiana Territory, was commissioned by Gov. Scott, of Kentucky, as major-general, and placed in command of the Kentucky troops. Harrison moved swiftly to the North, receiving additional recruits to his army daily from both sides of the Ohio. The first battle in which the Kentucky troops were engaged, beyond a few unimportant skirmishes with the Indians, was at the River Raisin. Most of the troops engaged in this battle on the American side were from Kentucky, and the sad result of the engagement carried mourning to many a Kentucky family. The Americans were successful in the first battle, but were afterward attacked by a large force of British and Indians, under Gen. Procter, and though they fought valiantly until their amunition was exhausted, they were finally defeated and taken prisoners. Under promise of "honorable conditions" they surrendered; but their wounded, who were left without a sufficient guard, to the shame and disgrace of Proctor be it said, were massacred by the savages of his army. This melancholy event was followed by the more discouraging, and yet more disgraceful, campaign against the Illinois Indians. Two thousand Kentuckians under Gen. Hopkins, in October, crossed the Wabash into the Illinois country and proceeded against the Kickapoo towns. After a long and tedious march, their provisons gave out, and there still being no signs of the Indians, the troops became disgusted, and, in spite of remonstrances of their officers, they returned to Vincennes.

Gen. Harrison's defense of Fort Meigs, and Col. Croghan's* defense of Fort Stephenson retrieved, in some degree, the disaster of *Pronounced Crawn.

Raisin, and the failure of Gen. Hopkins' expedition against the Illinois Indians. The war in the north, so far as it concerned the Kentucky troops, closed with Com. Perry's victory on Lake Erie, and the battle of the Thames. But 150 Kentuckians served under Perry in his battle on Lake Erie, and as volunteers only for the battle. In the battle of the Thames the British and Indians, about 2,000 strong, commanded by Gen. Proctor and Tecumseh, were opposed by Gen. Harrison, with about 3,000 men, by far the larger part of whom were Kentuckians. The British and Indians were overwhelmingly defeated, and Tecumseh, one of the most renowned Indian warriors since the days of King Philip, was killed. Five brigades of Kentucky troops, under Gens. Trotter, Allen, Chiles, Caldwell and King were engaged in the battle. The brigades of Chiles, Trotter and King formed the division of Maj.-Gen. Henry, those of Caldwell and Allen the division of Maj.-Gen. Desha. The venerable Shelby, who had again been elected governor of Kentucky, was present in person, and at the request of Gen. Harrison commanded the Kentucky troops. He remained on the field during the engagement, and directed all their important movements.

The theater of strife was now transferred to another section of the country. The closing scene of the war took place at New Orleans. On January 8, 1815, the most brilliant engagement of the whole war was fought near that city, between the British, under Sir Edward Pakenham, and the Americans, under Gen. Jackson. The British were 12,000 strong, composed chiefly of the veterans of Wellington, who had measured strength with Napoleon on more than one bloody field. Jackson's army was mostly militia, ragged, and but poorly armed, and numbered less than 6,000 men. The British lost, according to their own account, 2,070, including Gens. Pakenham, Gibbs and Keane, and a host of other gallant officers, while the American loss did not exceed a dozen men, killed and wounded. A large proportion of Jackson's troops were Kentuckians, and it is only necessary to say, they fought as Kentuckians were wont to fight, and covered themselves with glory in the unequal struggle with Pakenham's veterans.

This was the last battle of the war. Peace had been agreed on, and a treaty signed at Ghent, some weeks prior to the battle, but the news had not yet reached this country. It came soon after, however, and was hailed with universal joy, and ratified without opposition. The people returned to domestic pursuits, and peace reigned throughout the land.

In August, 1812, Gen. Isaac Shelby was elected governor for the second time, and Richard Hickman, lieutenant-governor. James Madison was re-elected president of the United States. He carried Kentucky, and in the electoral college received 128 of the 217 electoral votes; the other 89 being cast for DeWitt Clinton. The clouds of war that came with the beginning of these administrations, and that soon burst in wrath upon the country, cleared away before their close, and left the country once more to the blessings of peace.

CHAPTER XIII.

POLITICAL ANNALS FROM THE WAR OF 1812 TO 1860.

THE people of Kentucky have always taken an active interest in the political history of the country. They are naturally politicians. A newspaper article contained recently the following caustic paragraph: "Kentuckians are too fond of talking politics to kill off anybody who can talk on the other side—they would rather keep him to argue with. Give a Kentuckian a plug of tobacco and a political antagonist, and he will spend a comfortable day wherever he is." This may be tinged with satire, but is not altogether devoid of truth. Nor is it a reproach to the honesty and intelligence of the masses that it is true. The early citizens were brought up to rely upon their own judgment in many things, and to think and act for themselves, and this trait has been transmitted, undiminished, to their posterity.

Political parties in Kentucky assumed a distinctive form during the administration of Gen. Jackson as president of the United States. The events which led to their organization, however, may be traced back to the war of 1812. The old Federal party, which bitterly opposed President Jefferson and his official acts, became extinct during that war, never more to be revived as a political organization. The war measures of President Madison were generally and even earnestly supported by the people throughout the country, and in no section of the republic with greater zeal than in Kentucky. But the close of the war found the country upon the verge of bankruptcy. Not alone in Kentucky, nor in the United States, but in the whole civilized world, financial depression reigned supreme. The French revolution and the wars which succeeded it, were the direct cause of this "monetary disorder." An inflated paper currency had taken the place of gold and silver as a "circulating medium," and, as is ever the case, greatly increased nominal values. But the restoration of peace to Europe, and a revival of industrial pursuits, together with a resumption of specie payments, caused a great decline in the "nominal value of commodities," and spread ruin, desolation and bankruptcy everywhere. In Kentucky was inaugurated the bitterest political warfare ever known in the history of the State.

George Madison was elected governor in 1816, but died shortly after his election, and before he had been installed into the office. The question now arose whether the lieutenant-governor, under the provisions of the constitution, became governor, or whether the legislature had the legal right to order a new election. After a long and heated discussion, the question was decided against the calling of a new election, and the lieutenant-governor-elect (Gabriel Slaughter) became governor for the full term of four years. Under his administration commenced that great political conflict, which agitated the State for more than a decade, and arrayed men against each other in fierce antagonism scarcely equaled by the late civil war. The long financial pressure had loaded the people with debt, and their universal cry was relief from the heavy burden. In answer to their petition, the legislature at a single session (1817–18) chartered forty independent banks with an aggregate capital of $10,000,000. The act creating these banks, with a painful lack of wisdom, permitted them to redeem their notes with the paper of the bank of Kentucky, which was then in good credit, instead of in specie.

Rev. John A. McClung,* writing upon the subject nearly thirty years later, says: "In the summer of 1818, the State was flooded with the paper of these banks. Their managers were generally without experience or knowledge of finance, and, in some instances, destitute of common honesty. The consequences were such as might have been anticipated. Speculation sprang up in all directions. Large loans were rashly made and rashly expended. Most of these bubbles exploded within a year, and few were alive at the end of two years. In the meantime the pressure of debt became terrible, and the power to replevy judgments was extended by the legislature from three to twelve months, by an act passed at the session of 1819–20.† During the summer of 1820, the cry for further relief became overwhelming, and vast majorities of both houses stood pledged to some measure which should relieve the debtor from the consequences of his rashness. The reign of political quackery was in its glory. The sufferings of the patient were too acute to permit him to listen to the regular physician who prescribed time, industry and economy as the only honest and just remedy. He turned eagerly to the quacks who promised him instantaneous relief, by infallible nostrums and specifics, without pain, without self-denial and without paying the penalty which nature always imposes upon any gross violation of her laws."

Gen. John Adair succeeded Mr. Slaughter, in 1820, as governor of the commonwealth. He was a native of South Carolina, and was born in 1757. He grew to manhood amid the stirring scenes of the revolution, and in 1786 came to Kentucky, where he at once took an active part in the Indian wars of that period. He settled in Mercer County. In the campaign of 1813, he served as an aid to Gov. Shelby, and as such, took part in the battle of the Thames. Gov. Shelby afterward appointed him adjutant-general of the Kentucky troops, and in this position he commanded them in the battle of New Orleans. He served repeatedly in the legislature, and was several times elected its speaker. He died May 19, 1840.

Gov. Adair sympathized with the people in their financial distress, and recommended to the legistature further measures of relief. At the session of 1820–21, that body, with the governor's approval, chartered the Bank of the Commonwealth. This new financial prodigy was a kind of State paper-mill, whose chief and sole business was to grind out money in endless profusion. Its paper, with no guarantee of redemption in specie, was made payable and receivable for public and private debts, and for taxes, and the creditor, who refused to receive it, in liquidation of his claim, was forced to await two years, under the new law replevying debts for that length of time. Its only security was certain lands owned by the State, lying south of the Tennessee River, which were pledged for the final redemption of its notes. The writer already quoted from, further says:

But these were not the only acts of this mad session. They had already one bank, the old Bank of Kentucky, then in good credit, its paper redeemable in specie, and its stock at par, or nearly so. By the terms of its charter, the legislature had the power of electing a number of directors which gave it the control of the board. This power was eagerly exercised during this winter. An experienced conservative president and board were turned out by the legislature, and a president and board elected, who stood pledged before their election to receive the paper of the Bank of the Commonwealth, in payment of debts due the Bank of Kentucky. This was no doubt intended to buoy up their darling bank and sustain the credit of its paper. But the effect was instantly to strike down the stock of the Bank of Kentucky to one-half its nominal value, and to entail upon it eternal suspension of specie payments. The paper of the new bank sank rapidly to one-half its par value, and the creditor had his choice of two evils. One was to receive one-half his debt in payment of the whole, and the other, was to receive nothing at all for two years, and at the end of that time, to do the best he could, running the risk of new delays, and of bankruptcy of his securities. Great was the indignation of the creditor, at this wholesale confiscation of his property, and society rapidly arranged itself into two parties, called "relief" and "anti-relief." With the first party, were the great mass of debtors, and some brilliant members of the bar, such as John Rowan, William T. Barry, Solomon P. Sharp and Rezin Davidge. A great majority of the voting population swelled the ranks, and it was countenanced by the governor, and furnished with plausible arguments by the eminent lawyers already named, to whom may be added the name of George M. Bibb.* With the anti-relief party, were ranged nearly all the mercantile class, and a majority of the bar and bench, and most of the better class of farmers. The mass of property and intelligence was drawn up in array, against the mass of numbers, and an angry conflict commenced in the newspapers, upon the stump, in the taverns and highways, which gradually invaded private and domestic circles. Robert Wickliffe, of Fayette County; George Robertson, since chief-justice of Kentucky, then an eminent lawyer of Garrard County, and Chilton Allan, an eminent lawyer of Clark County, were early engaged in the conflict, and were regarded as leaders of the anti-relief party.

*Collins, Vol. I, p. 318.

†A subsequent act extended the time to two years.

This was the beginning of the relief and anti-relief measures, and the origin of the organization known as the old court and new court parties. No stronger partisan feeling, no bitterer political warfare, ever raged in Kentucky, than was inaugurated and carried on under these spirited battle-cries. The reckless relief act of the legislature was condemned by the more calm and conservative element, as unconstitutional. A test case was soon brought before the circuit court, and Judge Clark, an able jurist of Clark County, in whose court it was presented, decided the act in direct violation of the constitution and so rendered his verdict. This decision brought down upon him the indignation of the relief party, and he was soon summoned to appear before the "judgment bar" of the legislature to answer for the offense. A special session was convened in the spring of 1822, and strenuous efforts were made to remove Judge Clark, but he boldly defended his opinion with reason and firmness, and for once, at least, right prevailed over might. But his triumph was of short duration. A lack of the constitutional majority in the legislature, and suggestions from cooler heads to await the decision of the supreme court, alone saved him from a summary dismissal from his office. Judge Clark, amid all this excitement and pressure, adhered to his decision, and stood firmly upon its merits. Judge Blair, of Fayette County, soon came to his support in an able and learned opinion of similar import. This "refractory spirit of the inferior judiciary" enraged the relief people, and called forth still harsher and severer efforts to carry out their views. A recent writer upon this exciting subject says: "No State has made more serious mistakes in governmental affairs than

*George M. Bibb, one of the leaders in the relief party, was a man noted in the political history of Kentucky. As a lawyer, jurist and statesman, he was equally distinguished. He was a native of Virginia, and was born in Prince Edward County, in 1776. He was a graduate of both Hampden Sydney, and William and Mary Colleges. He studied law with Richard Venable, and was admitted to the bar in Virginia. In 1798, he came to Lexington, where he soon distinguished himself as an able lawyer. He was appointed by Gov. Greenup, a judge of the appelate court in 1808, and by Gov. Scott, its chief justice in 1809, but resigned the next year. He was again appointed by Gov. Desha in 1827, and resigned in 1828. He was twice elected to the United States senate, first in 1811, and again in 1829. From 1835 to 1840, he was chancellor of the Louisville Chancery Court, but resigned it for the secretaryship of the treasury in President Tyler's cabinet. From that time until his death in 1859, he practiced law in the District of Columbia

William T. Barry, the chief-justice of the "new court of appeals" was a Virginian by birth, and came to Lexington in early life, where he soon became a leading member of the bar. In 1820 he was elected lieutenant-governor, under Gen. Adair. While in this position, the old and new court controversy came up, and with all his energies he engaged in the strife. Upon the reorganization of the court of appeals, he was appointed its chief-justice, and although his position proved to be unpopular in the end, he discharged the duties of chief-justice with dignity and honor. He was defeated in 1828 for governor by Gen. Metcalfe. Lexington continued to be his home, until the accession of Gen. Jackson to the presidency, when he removed to Washington City, and became postmaster-general in Jackson's cabinet. In 1835 he was appointed minister to Spain, and on his way there, was seized with a sudden illness at Liverpool, England, which terminated in his death, at the early age of fifty-two years. In November, 1854, his remains were interred in the State Cemetery at Frankfort.

John Rowan, the able coadjutor of Judge Bibb, in the relief measures, was born in Pennsylvania, in 1773. His father came to Louisville in 1783, but the following year removed to Long Falls, on Green River. Young Rowan received his education in a classical school at Bardstown; studied law and was admitted to the bar at Lexington in 1795 He early engaged in politics, and was a member of the constitutional convention of 1799. Gov. Greenup appointed him secretary of state in 1804, and in 1806, he was elected to congress; also served several terms in the State legislature. In 1819, together with Henry Clay, he was appointed by the legislature to defend the "occupying claimant laws" of Kentucky, in the supreme court of the United States. With his characteristic zeal, he threw his great talents into the relief and anti-relief controversy, as the champion of the new court of appeals, and with Bibb, Sharp and others, carried their cause over all opposition He was elected to the United States senate in 1824. He died in Louisville in 1843, in the seventieth year of his age.

Solomon P. Sharp, another of the active supporters of the new court of appeals, was of humble origin, and his family poor and obscure. They settled in Russellville, when he was but a child, and where he grew to manhood Through his own exertions mainly, he received a good education, studied law, and at the age of nineteen, was admitted to the bar. He was elected to the legislature, as soon as his age would permit him to take a seat in that body, and at twenty-four, was considered one of the first public men of the commonwealth. After several terms in the State legislature, he was elected to congress, and re-elected to a second term. He was the intimate friend of John C. Calhoun, and stood side by side with him in support of Mr. Madison's administration. He removed to Frankfort, to practice his profession in the higher courts, and in 1825, while still a young man, fell by the hand of an assassin.

John Trimble, one of the associate judges of the new court of appeals, was a native Kentuckian, and was born December 4, 1783. At the age of nineteen, he was appointed secretary to Robert Evans, governor of the Indiana Territory, and resided two years at Vincennes. He returned home and studied law with George Nicholas, one of the most eminent jurists of Kentucky. He practiced at Paris from 1807 to 1816, when he was appointed to the circuit bench, and removed to Cynthiana. Gov. Desha appointed him the third judge of the new court of appeals, but he soon resigned the position. He was tendered the appointment of United States judge for the district of Kentucky, by President John Quincy Adams, but declined it. He died in 1852, at the age of sixty years.

Judges Haggin and Davidge, the two remaining judges of the new court of appeals, were able lawyers and jurists. They never, however, attained to as high judicial, or political distinction, as some of their colleagues in these exciting times Judge Davidge occupied the circuit bench for many years, and died in Hopkinsville, at an advanced age. Judge Haggin filled no prominent public station, except that of judge of the court of appeals. He died in Lexington in 1835, while still in the prime of life.

Kentucky. We shall see that, one by one, she exhausted the follies that it was possible for a developing community to commit, but we shall also see that they profited by their painful experience." So it was in this case. The relief party persisted in their policy until the State was brought to the brink of ruin, and then came the reaction.

After the failure on the part of the legislature to remove Judge Clark, all parties awaited, with intense interest, the decision of the supreme court. That august body was composed of John Boyle, chief justice, and William Owsley and Benjamin Mills, associate judges. The friends of the relief measures endeavored to frighten them into a decision favorable to their party, but to their credit, be it spoken, without success. At the fall term of the court in 1823, the question came before them in the case of Lapsley vs. Brashear, and disregarding the threats of vengeance hurled at them, should they dare to thwart the "will of a majority of the people," they delivered separate opinions, but all concurring with their brethren in the circuit court, in the conclusion, that "those statutes, so far as they retroacted on contracts depending for their effect on the law of Kentucky, were inconsistent with that clause in the Federal constitution, which prohibits the legislature of the several States in the Union from passing any act 'impairing the obligation of contracts,' and also, of course, with the similar provision in the constitution of Kentucky, inhibiting any such enactment by the legislature of this State. A more grave and eventful question could not have been presented to the court for its umpirage. It subjected to a severe, but decisive ordeal, the personal integrity, firmness and intelligence of the judges, and the value of that degree of judicial independence and stability contemplated by the constitution. The question involved was new and vexed; and a majority of the people of the State had approved, and were, as they seemed to think, vitally interested in maintaining their constitutional power to enact such remedial statutes."* This opinion was received by the relief party with a tempest of rage, and the conflict was renewed with greater fury than before. Efforts were made to remove the judges by act of the legislature, and the issue involved in the election of 1824 was made upon these grounds.

The judges composing the court of appeals, John Boyle, William Owsley and Benjamin Mills, were among the ablest lawyers, and jurists of Kentucky. Of them, the Rev. Mr. McClung remarked: "These gentlemen had passed the meridian of life, and had been drilled for a long series of years to the patient and abstract severity of judicial investigation. In simplicity and purity of character, in profound legal knowledge, and in Roman-like firmness of purpose, the old court of appeals of Kentucky have seldom been surpassed."

John Boyle, the chief justice, was born in Virginia, in 1774, and like many of the great men of the country, he rose to eminence, principally through his own exertions, from the humblest circumstances. His family was poor and obscure, and he was early thrown upon his own resources. In 1779 his father came to Whitley's Station in Kentucky, but soon after removed to Garrard County. Young Boyle's education was good for that early period. He received instruction in the languages from Rev. Samuel Finley, a Presbyterian minister. He studied law with Thomas Davis, and was admitted to the bar in Mercer County. In 1802 he was elected to congress, and twice afterward re-elected, declining the canvass for a fourth term. He was appointed by President Madison the first governor of Illinois after its organization into a territory, but declined the appointment. In 1809 he was placed upon the appellate bench, and in 1810 became the chief justice of the appellate court, which trust he held with honor for sixteen years. Upon the reorganization of the court, and the accession to power of the new court party, Judge Boyle resigned, but was soon after appointed, by the national government, district judge of Kentucky. This position he held until his death, which occurred in 1835. During the last year of his life he was professor of law in the Transylvania University.

*Judge Robertson in Collins' History, Vol. I, p. 495.

William Owsley was a native of Virginia, born in 1782, and the year following, his father emigrated to Lincoln County, Ky. His advantages were limited, but by energy and industry he succeeded in obtaining a good common school education. He taught school, became deputy county surveyor, deputy sheriff, and held other positions of importance. He studied law with Chief Justice Boyle, and commenced practice in Garrard County; was several times sent from that county to the legislature, and at the age of thirty-one was appointed by Gov. Scott, a judge of the court of appeals. He resigned in a short time, but was reappointed by Gov. Shelby in 1813. In 1844 he was elected governor over William O. Butler, after a most exciting campaign, and by the largest vote polled in the State up to that time. He moved to Frankfort for the purpose of practicing his profession in the higher courts of the State, but finally purchased a farm in Boyle County and retired from active life. He died on December 9, 1862, at the age of eighty years.

Benjamin Mills was born in Maryland, 1779, and received a liberal education. While still a mere youth, he was called to the presidency of Washington Academy, at Washington, Penn., which institution soon after became Washington College. He came with his father's family to Bourbon County, and relinquishing the study of medicine, which he had begun sometime before, took up the profession of the law. He was admitted to the bar, and commenced practice at Paris, about the year 1806. He represented Bourbon County several terms in the legislature, and in 1817 was appointed to the circuit bench. In 1820 he was appointed a judge of the appellate court, a position he held until 1828, when he retired. He removed to Frankfort the better to enable him to devote his time to practice in the superior courts, and continued to reside at the capital, until his death, which occurred in 1831, from a stroke of apoplexy.

The great excitement which followed the decision of the court of appeals is very graphically described by Mr. McClung in Collins' History, from which article quotations have already been made. The following extract, not only readable but interesting, is from the same source:

> The great majority had been accustomed to make and unmake, to set up and pull down, at its sovereign will and pleasure. Presidents, governors, senators, representatives, had long been the creatures of its power, and the flatterers of its caprice. James I, had not a more exalted notion of his divine prerogative than the great majority had of its undoubted right to govern. The power of the judiciary had heretofore been so unobtrusive, that its extent and importance had escaped attention, and the masses were startled to find three plain citizens could permanently arrest the action and thwart the wishes of that majority, before which, presidents, governors, and congresses, bowed with implicit submission. Many good, honest citizens looked upon it as monstrous, unnatural, unheard-of, in a Republican government. It shocked all the notions of liberty and democracy which had grown with their growth, and violently wounded that sense of importance allied to arrogance, which always attends a long exercise of unresisted power.
>
> The judiciary, by the constitution, held their offices during good behavior. Nothing less than two-thirds of both houses could remove them. Could they hope to obtain this majority? The canvass of 1824 was conducted with the hope of such result. Gen. Joseph Desha was the candidate of the relief party for governor, and canvassed the State with that energy and partisan vehemence, for which he was remarkable. He was elected by an overwhelming majority.* A vast majority of both houses were of the relief party. The governor and the legislature met in December with passion heated by the fierce canvass through which they had passed, and the unsparing wounds which they had received from their enemies. The sword was fairly drawn, and the scabbard had been thrown away by both parties. So exasperated were the passions, that the minority was as little disposed to ask quarter, as the majority was to give it. The three judges were summoned before the legislative bar, and calmly assigned reasons at length, for their decision. These reasons were replied to with great speciousness and subtlety; for the great talents of Rowan, Bibb and Barry were at the command of the relief party, and their manifestoes were skillfully drawn. A vote was at length taken, and the constitutional majority of two-thirds could not be obtained. The minority exulted in the victory of the judges.
>
> But their adversaries were too much inflamed to be diverted from their purpose by ordinary impedi-

*Gen. Desha received 38,378 votes, and his opponent, Christopher Thompson, 22,499 votes.

ments. The edict "Delenda est Carthago," had gone forth, and the party, rapidly recovering from their first defeat, renewed the assault in a formidable direction, which had not been foreseen, and when success was clearly within their reach. The majority could not remove the judges by impeachment or address, because their majority, though large, was not two-thirds of each house. But they could repeal the act by which the court of appeals had been organized, and could pass an act organizing the court anew. The judges would follow the court, as in the case of the district court and court of quarter sessions, and a bare majority would suffice to pass the act. A bill to this effect was drawn up, and debated with intense excitement, during three days and three protracted night sessions. Wickliffe denounced the party with fierce and passionate invective, as trampling upon the constitution, deliberately, knowingly and wickedly. Rowan replied with cold and stately subtlety, perplexing, when he could not convince, and sedulously confounding the present act with the repeal of the district court, and with the action of congress, in repealing the Federal court system, and displacing its judges by a bare majority. On the last night the debate was protracted until past midnight. The galleries were crowded with spectators as strongly excited as the members. The governor and Lieut.-Gov. McAfee were present upon the floor, and mingled with the members. Both displayed intense excitement, and the governor was heard to urge the calling of the previous question. Great disorder prevailed and an occasional clap and hiss were heard in the galleries. The bill was passed by a large majority in the house of representatives, and by a nearly equal majority in the senate. No time was lost in organizing the new court, which consisted of four judges. William T. Barry was chief justice, and John Trimble, James Haggin and Rezin Davidge were associate justices. Francis P. Blair was appointed clerk, and took forcible possession of the records of Achilles Sneed, the old clerk. The old court, in the meantime, denied the constitutionality of the act, and still continued to sit as a court of appeals and decide such causes as were brought before them. A great majority of the bar of Kentucky recognized them as the true court, and brought their causes by appeal before their tribunal. A great majority of the circuit judges, also, obeyed their mandates as implicitly as if no organizing act had passed. A certain proportion of cases, however, were taken by the new court, and some of the circuit judges obeyed their mandates exclusively, refusing to recognize the old court. A few judges obeyed both, declining to decide which was the true court.

This judicial anarchy could not possibly endure. The people, as the final arbiter, was again appealed to by both parties, and the names of relief and anti-relief became merged in the title of old court and new court. Great activity was exerted in the canvass of 1825, and never were the passions of the people more violently excited. The result was the triumph of the old court party by a large majority in the popular branch of the legislature, while the senate still remained attached to the new court; the new popular impulse not having had time to remove it. In consequence of this difference between the political complexion of the two houses, the reorganizing act still remained unrepealed, and the canvass of 1826 saw both parties again arrayed in a final struggle for the command of the senate. The old court party again triumphed, and at the ensuing session of the legislature, the obnoxious act was repealed, the opinion of the governor to the contrary, notwithstanding,* and the old judges reestablished, de facto as well as de jure. Their salaries were voted to them, during the period of their forcible and illegal removal, and all the acts of the new court have ever been treated as a nullity.

Thus, after a brief season, peace and tranquillity had been restored. For months the State was trembling upon the brink of a heaving volcano, and but for the "considerate prudence" of the old court leaders, there might have been precipitated upon the people a bloody revolution. The struggle between the contending elements had certain very important effects upon the political life of the commonwealth. Upon this exciting and agitating question, Chief Justice Robertson said: "The memorable contest between the constitution and the passions of a popular majority—between the judicial and legislative departments—proves the efficacy of Kentucky's constitutional structure, and illustrates the reason and the importance of that system of judicial independence, which it guarantees. It demonstrates that, if the appellate judges had been dependent on a bare majority of the people, or their representatives, the constitution would have been paralyzed, justice dethroned and property subjected to rapine by tumultuary passions and numerical power. And its incidents and results not only commend to the gratitude of the living and unborn the proscribed judges and the efficient compatriots who dedicated their time and talents for years to the rescue of the constitution, but also impressively illustrate the object and efficacy of the fundamental limitations of the will of the majority—that is, the ultimate prevalence of reason over passion, of truth over error, which, in popular governments, is the sure offspring only of time and sober deliberation, which it is the object of constitutional checks to insure." Another writer upon the subject, nearly forty years later, says: "The question before the court, in its legal aspect, turned upon the clause of the Federal constitution that forbade the impairment of contracts, though the immediate victory was gained on other and more special legal grounds. But there was a nearer and simpler question, one of honesty in the management of public affairs, which was the part debated before the people, and on which they gave their decision in an unmistakable way. This debate may be fairly regarded as a turning point in the politics of the State. The election, which gave the relief party its overwhelming majority in the legislature of 1824, and elected Desha governor by a vote of 38,000 to 22,000 for his opponent, represents the uninformed and rash state of public opinion. The reversal of this vote in the following year shows an extraordinary revolution of sentiment. It shows a moral awakening which was full of promise, and one that time has justified. From this time on, the State has always inclined to conservative ways. In the end the controversy between the old and new courts was very wholesome, since it showed the people the way in which grave dangers lay. That the people of the commonwealth met the emergency in a manly fashion, promptly reconsidering their first steps when they had a chance to see whereto they led, and in the end found a position on firm ground, is a matter of satisfaction to all who hold the name of Kentucky dear."

*The act was passed over Gov. Desha's veto.

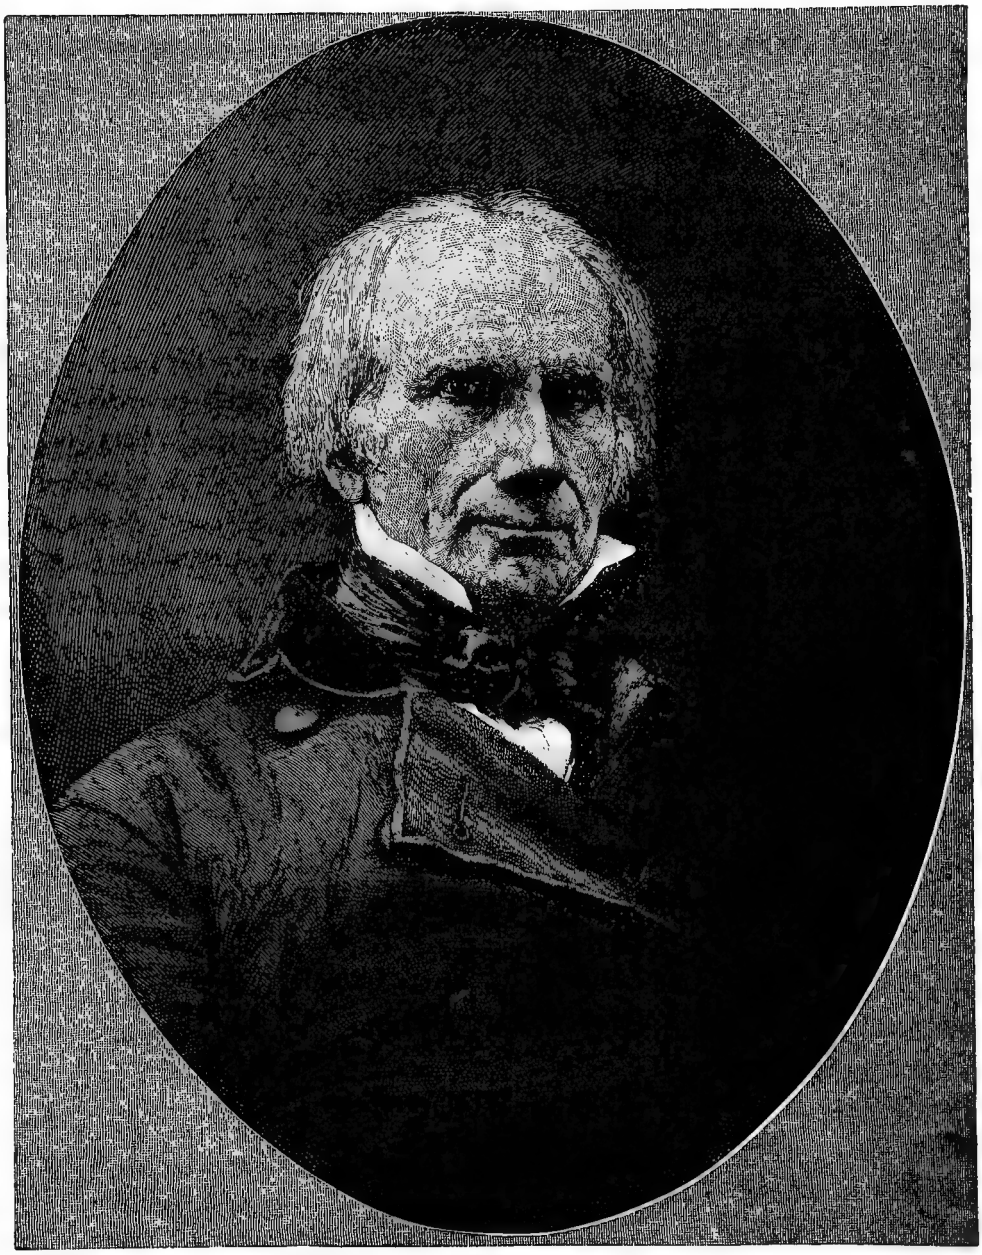
George Robertson and Robert Wickliffe were among the most eminent and zealous advocates of the anti-relief party, and to their exertions was due, in no small degree, its ultimate success. Mr. Robertson was a native of the State, and was born in 1790, in Mercer County. After receiving a liberal education he studied law with Samuel McKee, and in 1809 was licensed to practice by Judges Boyle and Wallace. He served repeatedly in the State legislature, and in the lower house of the Federal congress, and declined many high and important positions, preferring to devote his talents to the practice of his chosen profession, rather than to breast the storms of political life. For fourteen years he was chief justice of the court of appeals, and his judicial decisions are the embodiment of profound learning and research. Says his biographer: "His law lectures and political essays, his legal opinions as contained in the Kentucky Reports, speak for themselves, evincing at once depth of thought, laborious research, accurate discrimination and sound philosophy." He was a member of the legislature during the relief and anti-relief party. Judge Robertson was a great lawyer, a profound jurist and a wise statesman. He died at his home in Lexington, May 16, 1874, in the eighty-fifth year of his age.



Robert Wickliffe belonged to one of the most distinguished families of Kentucky. He was born in 1775 at Redstone, Penn., during the stay of his parents there, on their way from Prince William County, Va., to Kentucky. He studied law with George Nicholas, was admitted to practice, and soon became a leading lawyer at the bar. He, like Judge Robertson, preferred the practice of law to the excitement of political life, and so far as possible shunned its fitful honors. But notwithstanding his distaste for politics, he was elected to the legislature from Fayette County several successive terms, and to the State senate. In the latter body, he served from 1825 to 1833. His legislative service embraced one of the stormiest periods in the political history of the State—the relief and anti-relief warfare. Mr. Wickliffe distinguished himself as a leader and champion of the anti-relief and old court parties, and contributed largely to the overthrow of the new court of appeals. He was an able and successful lawyer, and amassed a handsome fortune. He died in 1859 at an advanced age.

The final triumph of the old court party occasioned a feeling of relief and satisfaction throughout the State. The factions quietly acquiesced in the verdict of the people, and for some time party lines stood near where they had been placed by this spirited conflict. But the people soon turned their attention from local questions to the more extended field of national politics. The presidential campaign of 1824 had been the most exciting since the formation of the republic, excepting perhaps that of 1800, which resulted in the election of Mr. Jefferson over the elder Adams, and to the questions awakened by that campaign they now turned with an interest but little diminished from that they had displayed in the contest between the old and new courts. The candidates for president in the election of 1824 were Henry Clay, Gen. Andrew Jackson, John Quincy Adams and William H. Crawford, of Georgia. Each of these distinguished gentlemen had his friends, who supported their favorite candidate from personal preference and not from party predilection. None of them, however, had a majority of the votes of the electoral college,* and under the constitutional rule, upon the house of representatives devolved the duty of making choice of president, each State, by its delegation in congress, casting one vote. Gen. Jackson led Mr. Adams in the electoral college by a small plurality; Mr. Crawford was third on the list of candidates, and Mr. Clay, who was the hindmost man, was dropped from the canvass. Mr. Adams was chosen president by the casting vote of the State of Kentucky. Mr. Clay was a member of the national house of representatives, and its speaker, and it was at once claimed by many of his political enemies that it was through the influence of the State of Ohio, which, as well as his own State, Mr. Clay had carried in the presidential contest, that the delegation from Kentucky was induced to cast the vote of the State for Mr. Adams, an eastern man, in preference to Gen. Jackson, a southern and western man. By that coup d'etat, Mr. Clay was instrumental in organizing political parties that survived the generation of people to which he belonged, and ruled in turn the destinies of the republic for more than a quarter of a century.

Mr. Clay was not a native of this State, yet he was so long identified with its political history, as to become more warmly endeared to the people than any other citizen of the commonwealth. He was born in Hanover County, Va., April 12, 1777, and was the son of a Baptist clergyman. His early years were marked by poverty and toil, and his educational facilities confined to a limited attendance at the log schoolhouse of the neighborhood. About the age of fifteen he was appointed to a deputy clerkship in the clerk's office of the high court of chancery, where he attracted the attention of the chancellor, Wythe. That gentleman engaged him as an amanuensis, and assisted him in mental culture and improvement. Through his influence, Clay studied law in the office of Robert Brooke, then attorney-general of Virginia, and in due time was admitted to the bar by the Virginia court of appeals. He came to Kentucky in 1797, and at once entered the political arena of the State. An important election was approaching—an election for delegates to a convention to frame a new constitution. One feature or clause of the plan presented to the people was a provision for the final emancipation of the slave population. The measure was vigorously opposed in every part of the State, but Mr. Clay, regardless of his popularity, boldly took ground in its favor, and exerted his influence toward the election of men to the convention who would contend for the eradication of negro slavery. His efforts, however, failed, and the young champion of "liberty and equal rights" became somewhat unpopular on account of the part he had acted. But this partial unpopularity did not last long. His position on the alien and sedition laws of 1798–99, and his zealous advocacy of the rights of the people, restored him to their confidence and affection, and obtained for him the title of the "great commoner." In 1803 Mr. Clay was elected, for the first time, a representative in the legislature, and was re-elected

*The electoral vote stood, Jackson 99; Adams 84; Crawford 41; Clay 37; Delaware gave one vote for Adams and two for Crawford; Maryland divided the vote between Adams and Jackson; Virginia cast her vote for Crawford; Kentucky cast hers for Mr. Clay; Maine gave nine votes to Adams; New Hampshire and Vermont voted the same way; New Jersey and Pennsylvania cast their vote for Jackson; Georgia voted for Crawford; North and South Carolina voted for Jackson; Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut voted for Adams; New York gave Jackson one vote, Adams twenty-six, Crawford five and Clay four; Tennessee, Indiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Louisiana voted for Jackson; Illinois gave two votes to Jackson and one to Adams; Ohio gave sixteen and Missouri three votes to Clay.

HENRY CLAY.

every succeeding term until 1806, when he was chosen United States senator to fill out the unexpired term of Gen. Adair, who had resigned. He was elected to the legislature again in 1807, and chosen speaker; he remained a member of the house until 1809, when he was again elected to the United States senate, this time to fill out the unexpired term of Buckner Thurston.

In 1811, Mr. Clay was elected to the national house of representatives and entered upon the great political period of his life, which commenced with his election as speaker of that body, and terminated with his death forty years later. He had never before been a member of the lower house of congress, and this fact renders it still more remarkable that he should have been elected its speaker, on the day he took his seat, by a majority of nearly two to one over two opposing candidates. This was an honor that body had never before bestowed on any individual, nor has it done so to the present day. He was elected speaker six times, and after occupying the position for about thirteen years, he resigned it, in 1825, to become secretary of State in Mr. Adams' cabinet.

Mr. Clay, as we have seen, had been a presidential candidate in the contest of 1824, and when his own defeat was assured, had been instrumental in the election of Mr. Adams. Accepting, then, the first place in his cabinet gave rise to the charge of "bargain and sale" between the president and his chief secretary, that caused great excitement throughout the country. These aspersions were without foundation in truth, and at this day no one will dare to question Mr. Clay's patriotism or honesty. But so persistent were the charges made by the partisans of Gen. Jackson that they injured Mr. Clay, somewhat, in the public estimation, and contributed largely to the General's success in the next presidential contest. In 1828, party lines were closely drawn between Gen. Jackson and Mr. Adams, and the result of a hot and bitter canvass was the triumphal election of the hero of New Orleans, both by the electoral and popular vote. The defeat of Mr. Adams at this time was a severe blow to the popularity of Mr. Clay, and threatened to end forever his political career. But the personal and moral intrepidity that made him a leader by right soon recovered for him his wonted place in the affections of his people. It has been thought by some of his friends, that, in the presidential contest of 1828, Mr. Clay was by far the strongest candidate in his party, and that in the substitution of John Quincy Adams he lost the most favorable opportunity of his life of becoming the chief magistrate of the nation. The revulsion of sentiment evoked by a mature consideration of the charges brought against him, for his action in the election of Adams in 1824, was at the flood tide, and would more probably have contributed to his success at this time (1828) than four years later, when he again opposed and was defeated by Gen. Jackson. It was the custom—and except in the case of the elder Adams had been observed up to this time—to elect a president to a second term as an "endorsement of his administration," and to this questionable custom may be attributed the substitution of Mr. Adams as a candidate in this campaign.

The old court party had now assumed the name of "National Republicans," and had, at the August election of this year, put forward Gen. Thomas Metcalfe, known throughout the State as "Old Stone Hammer" (from the fact of his being a "stone mason") for governor. The opposition, or new court party, adopted the name of "Democratic Republicans" and selected as their standard-bearer in the gubernatorial contest, against Gen. Metcalfe, William T. Barry, late chief justice of the new court of appeals. Metcalfe had been a representative in congress several terms. He possessed great popularity—having risen from the humblest walks of life—and was a man of more than ordinary ability. He was born in Fauquier County, Va., in 1780, and five years later his parents immigrated to Kentucky. They were poor but highly respectable people, and young Thomas, after a few years' attendance at the neighborhood schools, was apprenticed to an elder brother who was a stone mason. He became a proficient in the trade, and built many of the early court houses, both in Kentucky and Ohio. He was elected to the legislature in 1812, and re-elected five times thereafter. He was a captain in the war of 1812, and served with gallantry. In 1818, he was elected to congress, serving six terms consecutively. He resigned in 1828, before the close of his last term, to make the race for governor, in which he was successful, defeating his opponent, Mr. Barry, by 709 votes. But Joseph R. Underwood, who was associated with him, was defeated by John Breathitt for lieutenant-governor, thus presenting the novel situation of a governor and lieutenant-governor of opposite political principles. The Democratic Republicans secured a majority in the legislature. In November following, Jackson carried the State by a popular majority of 7,934 over Mr. Adams.

The old court party thus drifted into National Republicans, and the new court party into Democratic Republicans. The latter became the zealous supporters of Gen. Jackson, and for several years succeeded in maintaining supremacy in the legislature, and of electing a majority of the representatives to congress from the State. During the period from 1828 to 1832, they were most generally known in Kentucky as the "Jackson party," while the National Republicans were called the "Clay party." Throughout the country at large, they became, during the campaign of 1832, the "Jackson" and "anti-Jackson" parties. In 1831 the Jackson party lost control of the State legislature, but retained a majority of the members of congress from Kentucky. As a result of the success of the Clay party or National Republicans, Mr. Clay was elected to the United States senate in 1831 over Richard M. Johnson, a strong adherent of Gen. Jackson.

The gubernatorial and presidential campaigns of 1832 were spirited, and hotly contested in Kentucky. The Clay, or National party put forward Judge Buckner for governor, while the Jackson or Democratic party nominated John Breathitt, the then lieutenant-governor. He was elected over Buckner by 1,242 majority. The presidential candidates were Mr. Clay and Gen. Jackson. Although the Jackson party was successful in the State election in August, in November following Mr. Clay carried the State over Jackson by a popular majority of 7,324 votes. But in the national contest he was defeated by a large majority, Jackson receiving 219 of the 286 electoral votes. Mr. Clay was defeated for the presidency, but he now held his own commonwealth in the "hollow of his hand," as it were, and he long ruled it wisely and well. Says a recent writer: "In founding and strengthening the conservative spirit that began to come with the greater wealth and culture of the State, he did a great work. From the time of his local victory over Gen. Jackson to the present day, the conservative element of Kentucky has never lost its hold upon the State. Parties have changed names, political issues have come and gone, but the conservative power, that came from the bank question and was affirmed by Clay, still firmly holds the commonwealth." The Clay party for many years, with but one or two exceptions, carried the State in all important political contests, and became, after the election of 1832, the Whig party, while the Jackson became the Democratic party.

But now another dark era in the financial history of Kentucky was at hand, second only to that of the relief and anti-relief period. The repeal of the charter of the United States Bank, without any "provision for its replacement in the system of American commerce," was a blow from which the State did not soon recover. Upon the eve of this crisis the campaign of 1836 opened. James Clark was the Whig candidate for governor. He it was whose decision from the circuit bench created such an intense excitement during the relief and anti-relief war, and whom the relief party strove so hard to displace for that decision. He was a native of Virginia, and came to Kentucky with his father's family in an early day, and located in Clark County. He studied law with his brother, and was admitted to the bar in Virginia, when he returned to Kentucky and began practice. He served several terms in the legislature and in congress, and in 1817 was appointed to the circuit bench. He was elected governor over Matthew Flournoy, the Democratic candidate, by 8,096 majority. Gen. William H. Harrison was the presidential candidate of the Whigs, and carried the State by 3,520 votes over Martin Van Buren, but was defeated in the national election. The financial policy of the administration, inaugurated during President Jackson's last term, had resulted in a return to the worthless paper money of the relief and anti-relief period. Hundreds of banks were started up, and the mania for speculation again ran riot. There was no difficulty in finding banks to lend money to those who desired to borrow, for "the more of their paper they could set afloat, the larger would be their profits." The matter culminated in 1837, and all the banks of the United States were forced into a "suspension of payments." Not only were the people involved in debt, but the State had undertaken a vast system of internal improvement on its own credit, and was as deeply involved as the people themselves. The following extract, from a sketch written upon this gloomy period, shows the critical state of the times: "Nearly every business man of the State and many of the farmers were rendered bankrupt or burdened by debt to the point of virtual insolvency. In this time of trial the people showed the profit of the lessons of the preceding ten years. There was a general effort to mitigate the evils by mutual help, rather than by legislation. The State refused to forfeit the charters of the suspended banks, or to compel them to resume specie payments. The brief breathing-time of 1838, when for a few months the banks tried to resume payment, revived the hopes of the people; but the burden of unliquidated debt rested too heavily on them for an enduring revival of business, so that the banks were compelled again to suspend their proper functions. The years 1840-41-42 were the most hopeless this people ever have known. * * * * It is not surprising that this time of trial led to the revival of the 'relief party,' which grew rapidly to formidable dimensions. But the conservative element was bold, and readily met their scheme. The legislature refused to take any unreasonable steps. The most they did was to modify the system of the courts, so as to give the creditor a little more time in which to meet the actions brought against him. Gradually, through infinite suffering that is recorded in the long dockets of the courts of that time, and the cloud of judgments that fell on all forms of property, the people won their way back to commercial prosperity."

The "hard cider" campaign of 1840 came on in the midst of this financial depression. In the State election, which took place in August, Robert P. Letcher was the Whig candidate for governor, and was elected over Judge Richard French by 15,720 majority. Gen. William Henry Harrison was again at the head of the Whig ticket for president, with John Tyler for vice-president. Martin Van Buren and Richard M. Johnson, president and vice-president, were the Democratic candidates for re-election. The contest was an exciting one, and created intense interest throughout the State, as well as the country at large. Like the first campaign (successful one) of Gen. Jackson, it was decided principally on the memories of the war of 1812. Harrison was a great favorite with the people of Kentucky, and had been called to lead the Kentucky troops—contrary to the law, which required that the militia of the State should be commanded by one of its own citizens—to Detroit, after the disgraceful surrender of Hull, to defend our northern frontier. Col. Johnson, the Democratic candidate for vice-president, was a Kentuckian, a man of great popularity, and the supposed slayer of the renowned Indian chief, Tecumseh, in the battle of the Thames. He was a lawyer, statesman and soldier, and in each profession had won fame. He was born in 1781, educated in Transylvania University, and studied law with the celebrated George Nicholas. He served in the State legislature, in congress, in the national senate and as vice-president, and in all these positions acquitted himself with honor and credit. It was probably owing to these considerations that Gen.

Harrison's majority in the State was not larger. The vote was Harrison and Tyler, 58,489; Van Buren and Johnson, 32,616; majority, 25,873 for the Whig candidates.

No presidential campaign since that of 1824 had so excited the people as the present one. Gen. Harrison had been defeated by Van Buren in 1836, and now they were arrayed against each other a second time. Edward Stanwood, in his history of presidential elections, says: "The Whig party went into the campaign of 1840 without positive principles or definite policy. The platform was opposition to the party in power, without any specific promises of something better, and the appeal for support was based on the theory that they had tired of the long continuance of Democratic rule. Clay was set aside because he was a Free-Mason, and, therefore, objectionable to an element the opposition wanted in the East, and because he favored the protective tariff, which was unpopular in the south Atlantic States. Gen. Harrison was open to neither of these objections, and the convention nominated him by a vote of 148 to 90 for Mr. Clay, and 16 for Gen. Scott. At the end of four days the convention adjourned without formulating any platform. In all the speech-making there was no assertion of distinctive principles, nothing but expressions of hatred and opposition to "Van Buren and the locofocos." Indeed, the "old hero of Tippecanoe" was put forward as the candidate of the "Anti-Van Buren party." The campaign which followed was marked by extraordinary enthusiasm among young men for a candidate who was nearly seventy years old. It was a campaign of noise and demonstrations. There were endless processions, with representations of "Old Tip," log-cabins, coon skins, the candidate drinking mugs of cider, etc. Van Buren was renominated, and a long declaration of principles set forth against assumption of State debts, against a United States bank, against "fostering one branch of industry to the detriment of another," against a policy of general internal improvements, in favor of economy, against interference with slavery, and so on. The Democrats had been in power since the beginning of the century, unless the four years of the second Adams be excepted. Their party was closely organized. They were intrenched in the offices, and used the public patronage without scruple. They affected contempt for the shouting campaign of the Whigs, and met the noise and demonstrations with ridicule, declaring Harrison was so ignorant that the Whigs had to shut him up in a log-cabin, and dare not give him pen and ink. The Whigs, however, kept up their songs:

> Farewell, old Van,
> You're not the man;
> To guide the ship
> We'll try old Tip, etc. etc.

The popular vote stood: Harrison, 1,275,016; Van Buren, 1,129,102; James G. Birney (the Abolition candidate), 7,069. The electoral vote was much more significant. Mr. Van Buren carried only the States of New Hampshire, Virginia, South Carolina, Alabama, Missouri, Arkansas and Illinois—sixty electoral votes. Harrison carried nineteen States, and received 234 electoral votes."

In the gubernatorial contest of 1844, William O. Butler was the Democratic candidate and William Owsley the Whig candidate. Mr. Owsley was elected by a majority of 4,624. Archibald Dixon, his associate, received a majority of 11,081 for lieutenant-governor over William S. Pilcher, the Democratic candidate. In the presidential campaign Mr. Clay was again put forward by the Whigs, while the Democrats nominated James K. Polk, of Tennessee. As soon as the latter nomination was made Mr. Clay predicted his own defeat, and when asked upon what grounds, replied that his opponent was "unknown as a public man." The result of the election in November proved the truth of his prophecy. He carried the State by a majority of 9,267 over Mr. Polk, but was defeated by a majority of sixty-five votes in the electoral college.

The defeat of Mr. Clay in 1844 may be attributed mainly to his opposition to the annexation of Texas, which was the most important question involved in the campaign. Mr. Polk's indorsement of that issue secured to him the presidency. Mr. Clay believed that the annexation of Texas would involve the country in foreign war, and create internal discord by the extension of slavery, and his great energies were aroused to avert such dreaded evils. His defeat was the final blow to the long deferred hopes of his friends of seeing him president. He still remained first in the hearts of his people, but this defeat considerably lessened his influence among them, and when the presidential convention of 1848 was held, Gen. Zachary Taylor, the old "rough and ready" soldier, the hero of Buena Vista, received the nomination of the Whigs. Mr. Clay's political career now seemed closed forever. He was growing old. The storms of political life had battered his "decaying tabernacle," and the twilight shadows were gathering around him. For fifty years he had served the State and nation, and much desired to spend the remainder of his life with his family and friends. But this was to be denied him. Already the low mutterings of the storm that burst upon the country in 1860–61 could be heard in the distance, and all eyes were once more turned to Mr. Clay, the great pacificator. Says his biographer, Conwell: "He had calmed the storm raised by the Missouri question; his wisdom had averted the civil war proffered by the Nullifiers, and it was believed he could again tranquilize and restore peace and harmony to the country. He yielded to the voice of patriotism, and his State returned him to the theater of his past glories."

"ASHLAND"—THE HOME OF HENRY CLAY

Mr. Clay was again elected to the United States senate, and in December, 1849, took his seat in that body. The compromise measures* of 1849–50 were the all-absorbing questions before the senate, and he entered into their discussion heart and soul. He undoubtedly cut his life short by this last mighty and triumphant effort in behalf of his country. After the close of the session he visited his home at Ashland, near Lexington, and returned in 1851 to Washington, "broken with the storms of state and scathed with many a fiery conflict." Early in the next year he commenced to fail rapidly. During the spring he gradually sank, and for weeks lay patiently awaiting the stroke of death, which came June 29, 1852, and the "Sage of Ashland" was no more.

> We tell thy doom without a sigh,
> For thou art Freedom's now and Fame's;
> One of the few immortal names
> That were not born to die.

His funeral obsequies and the honors paid to his memory throughout the country are a part of the nation's history. His remains repose in the cemetery at Lexington, and a lofty monument tells to the passer-by where the great "commoner" sleeps.

In 1848, John J. Crittenden was the Whig candidate for governor, with John L. Helm upon the ticket with him for lieutenant-governor. Next to Henry Clay, no man, living or dead, perhaps, possessed a larger share of the affections of the people of Kentucky than Mr. Crittenden. He was a native of the State, and was born in Woodford County, in 1786. He was educated in the schools of Kentucky, completing his studies in Washington Academy and William and Mary College in Virginia. On his return to Kentucky, he began the study of law with Hon. George M. Bibb, and after being licensed to practice located at Russellville, then the center of the Green River bar. As early as 1811, he was elected to represent Logan County in the legislature, serving six terms from that county, and the last term as speaker. During his last year in the legislature from Logan County, he was elected to the United States senate, and was the youngest member of that august body. He removed to Frankfort in 1819, to practice his profession in the higher courts of the State. He was several times elected to represent Franklin County in the legislature, and was a member during the old and new court controversy, and was an able and zealous champion of the old court. In 1835, he was elected for the second time to the United States senate, which position he held until President Harrison appointed him attorney-general of the United States. Upon the death of Mr. Harrison he resigned, and was soon after elected to fill out the unexpired term of Henry Clay in the Federal senate. In 1843 he was re-elected to a full term, but resigned in 1848 to make the race for governor. He was opposed in this contest by Lazarus W. Powell, an able Democratic statesman, and whom he defeated by 8,521 majority. Upon the death of Gen. Taylor and the reorganization of the cabinet under Mr. Fillmore, Mr. Crittenden was appointed attorney-general, and resigned as governor to accept the position. Mr. Helm, the lieutenant-governor, filled out his unexpired term. At the close of Fillmore's administration, he was again elected to the United States senate, and served until 1861. Upon the dissolution of the Whig party, Mr. Crittenden acted with the Know-nothing or American party, and in opposition to the Democrats. He was elected to the lower house of congress in 1861, and was serving in that body when the war commenced. He opposed the secession of the Southern States, and was one of the stanchest Union men of Kentucky. He made strenuous efforts to effect a compromise whereby the war might be averted, but failed in its accomplishment.

*The admission of California into the Union without the restrictions of slavery, and the extension of the Missouri line of 36° 30′ through the new territories—north of which slavery was interdicted, and south of which the people were permitted, in organizing their State governments, to decide the question for themselves.—Hodge. (See Collins, Vol. I, p. 332.)

He died in Louisville, July 25, 1863, while still a member of congress.

Following the election of Mr. Crittenden as governor in 1848, Gen. Taylor received a majority of 17,524 in the State for president over Gen. Lewis Cass, the Democratic candidate. Gen. Taylor was recognized as a Kentuckian, though really born in Virginia, and brought to Kentucky by his parents when but an infant. With the laurels of Buena Vista —in which battle the Kentucky troops distinguished themselves—blooming upon his brow, he was highly esteemed throughout the commonwealth. Gen. William O. Butler, a gallant soldier of the Mexican war, and an honored citizen of Kentucky, was the Democratic candidate for vice-president, and doubtless to some extent reduced the Whig vote in the State. Gen. Taylor was elected by a majority of thirty-six electoral votes.

A new era was now approaching in the political history of Kentucky. After the lapse of nearly half a century, the question of revising the State constitution began to be seriously agitated by the leading men and politicians. The constitution adopted in 1799 was objectionable in some of its features, and to remedy apparent evils it was proposed to form a new one. Under the law, the question calling a convention for the purpose had to be submitted to the people at two annual elections, and a majority of the legal voters cast their ballots in its favor. The legislature, at its session of 1846–47, authorized the submission of the question to the people, and at the August election, in 1847, out of a total of 137,311 votes, 92,639 were cast in favor of a constitutional convention. In August, 1848, the question was again submitted, and carried by a majority of 39,792 in favor of the convention. In 1849 (at the August election), members to the convention were chosen, and the result was forty-eight Whigs and fifty-two Democrats. They met on the 1st of October following, and continued their deliberation to the 21st of December. On May 7, 1850, the new constitution was submitted to the people for their approval, and was adopted by a majority of 51,351 out of a total of 91,995 votes cast. The convention assembled again on the 3d of June, and adopted some amendments to the newly constructed document, and on the 11th adjourned, after having "proclaimed the present or third constitution."*

The most important changes made in the revision of the constitution regarded the judiciary, the finances, and further changes or amendments to it. It is a matter of grave doubt whether or not all these changes were well advised. The great "underlying cause of dissatisfaction" with the constitution of 1799, was that of filling the most lucrative offices, such as judges and clerks of the courts, justices of the peace, and through them the sheriffs,† etc., etc., by appointment, and not by popular vote of the people. Chancellor Kent said that the great danger to this country is "the too frequent recurrence to popular election." This is made more manifest every passing year. No longer the office seeks the man, but the man the office, and it is often the case, that the man with no qualification for the place he seeks, save his money-bags, is the successful competitor for public position, over men much better qualified to discharge the duties of the office. Should the fabric of this government ever fall, it will require but little wisdom to trace the cause of its wreck to the corruption of popular elections. The appointing power, although anti-Republican in principle, seems to be, judging from the experience of the past, the best calculated to secure efficiency and competency in office. The first constitution (1792) made the office of sheriff elective; the framers of the second abrogated that clause, believing, as Mr. Butler in his History of Kentucky expresses it, "that such elections are almost sure to make the sheriff and his securities the victims of indulgence, inconsistent with private safety and the punctual collection of taxes." Another authority‡ says: "Under that plan (the elective) it was found, in numerous instances, that the public revenue was continually squandered, and thousands of dollars annually lost to the State; and I have heard it said, by men of those days, that there were a greater number of defaulters among sheriffs during that period than there was under the second constitution during the whole time of its existence. I believe with Mr. Butler, when he says 'that the necessary courting of the people for their favor for every public employment, eventuates in corruption.' There are hundreds in Kentucky, at this day, who can bear testimony to the fact in the operations of the present constitution." Under the appointing power (the second constitution) the offices were generally filled by faithful and competent men, and the records of that period show but few changes. Striking instances of this fact are found in the cases of Jo Allen, who held the offices of county and circuit clerks of Breckinridge County successively for over fifty years, and of Judge Benjamin Shackelford, of Christian County, who occupied the circuit bench of the Seventh Judicial District uninterruptedly for thirty-six years.

*See Appendix A, Note 31.

†Every two years the oldest justice of the peace in each county, by right of seniority, became high sheriff.

‡Allen's History of Kentucky, p. 438.

The strongest objection to the elective clause of the present constitution regards the judiciary. Mr. Allen, in his History of Kentucky, published in 1782, upon this subject says: "I was ever opposed to an elective judiciary; and more so since the test which has been made under our present constitution than before. Opinions expressed by me twenty years ago have been fully verified. I then believed, and still believe, that impartial justice will not at all times be administered by those who depend for their stations upon the sycophancy which they breathe toward the wealthy, influential and the powerful; and who, instead of reading their books and qualifying themselves for the stations, are electioneering and swaggering in grog-shops and groceries. The judiciary, as one of the three great departments of the government, deserves as much, if not more, to be preserved than either of the other two. Unlike the legislative or executive department, it possesses neither power nor patronage; neither sword nor purse. Of all the departments it is the feeblest by far; for it neither makes laws nor does it execute them. Its powers are merely to decide and declare what the law is, when proper cases are brought before them by others; and yet feeble as their power is, it is one of the most important stations in our government; and to insure justice, all must admit, should be the most independent. Their independence is the strongest support to our liberty, and the safest guard to our happiness; nay, it is the best armor and ablest tower of protection to any government. The independence of the judiciary alone preserved the liberty of England amidst divers changes; it has preserved our country, and it will ever do so whilst its independence is maintained. My observation and experience within the last twenty years have satisfied my mind that the election of judges by the popular vote is not the surest protection to the poor or to the fallen in fortune; a leaning is often discoverable on the side of wealth and influence. Under the former constitution, though salaries were far lower than at present, the wisest and the best men of the legal profession occupied seats on the bench, especially of the court of appeals. It is not always the case now; nay, it is but seldom the case; and it is to be feared that no better condition can exist in Kentucky as long as the present system continues." Upon the same subject a more recent writer says: "It seems impossible to resist the conviction that the system of appointing the judiciary machinery is, on the whole, the best that can be contrived; yet it is perfectly clear that it does not recommend itself to the mass of American citizens. One by one the States have fallen away from it, until at present there are but two that retain this feature, which they inherited from their British ancestors."

The powers of the legislature under the former constitution, "to raise money on the credit of the State," had led to the accumulation of debt, which, in 1849 (at the time of revising the constitution) amounted to $4,500,000. The greater part of this sum had been squandered on internal improvements of no practical value, which had been inaugurated during the speculative period of the preceding ten or fifteen years. To extinguish this debt and guard against a repetition of it, some very stringent clauses were engrafted in the new constitution, that have proved of great value, and been the means of clearing away the burden placed upon the people by the reckless spirit of internal improvement, so that at the present time there is no actual State debt.

To call a "revising convention" the new constitution provides, that after a resolution to that effect has been adopted by both houses of the general assembly, the question shall be submitted to a vote of the people at two annual elections for representatives to the legislature; and at each of these elections, a majority of the votes cast for representatives at the preceding election shall be required to call "the revising convention into existence." This is a wise provision, as it compels the people to continue in one mind for at least two years regarding the necessity of changes, and hence avoids any risk of hasty action.

With the adoption of the new constitution the State entered upon a short season of prosperity. Indeed, it has been said, that from 1848 to the panic of 1857, it saw its richest years, and the most prosperous period of its existence.

The first election of State officers under the new constitution occurred in August, 1851. There were three tickets for governor and lieutenant-governor placed before the people, viz.: Archibald Dixon and John B. Thompson were the Whig candidates; Lazarus W. Powell and Robert N. Wickliffe, Democratic candidates, Cassius M. Clay and George D. Blakey, "Liberty" or emancipation candidates. Powell, the Democratic candidate, was elected over Dixon by 850 majority, while Thompson, the Whig candidate for lieutenant-governor, was elected over Wickliffe by 6,145 majority—thus giving the State a Democratic governor and a Whig lieutenant-governor.* Clay, the anti-slavery candidate, received 3,621 votes in the State, and in this vote is partially explained the defeat of Dixon. The Whigs as a party opposed the extension of slavery, and favored final emancipation. This led many of the more ultra to vote for Clay, while those who conscientiously supported the institution of slavery, deserted the party and voted with the Democrats. Although the "Liberty" party had been organized in 1840, it cut no figure in Kentucky politics until at this election, when its candidate for governor—Cassius M. Clay—received over 3,000 votes in the State. At this election five Whigs were elected to congress from the State, and five Democrats, while the legislature, on joint ballot, counted 75 Whigs to 63 Democrats. Kentucky, at the presidential election in 1852, again showed her loyalty to the Whig party by giving Gen. Winfield Scott and William A. Graham (Whigs) a majority of 3,262 over Franklin Pierce and William R. King (Democrats). John P. Hale and George W. Julian, the anti-slavery candidates, received 265 votes in the State. Pierce and King were elected, receiving a majority of 212 electoral votes. This was the last national contest in which the Whig party was known. Four years later it appeared under the name of the Know-nothing or American party.

The organization of the Know-nothing party presents an interesting phase in the political history, not only of the State, but of the nation. A late writer† says: "The curious student, who will take the trouble, may easily trace something of a connection from the old Federal party down to the Know-nothingism of half a century later. The former culminated under the elder Adams in disaster and disgrace, by the enactment of the alien and sedition laws and its final overthrow in the election of Mr. Jefferson. From that time, however, nativist organizations existed more or less in the larger cities of the Union, where their contests were

*Lazarus W. Powell was born in Henderson County, October 6, 1812. He graduated with honor from St. Joseph College, Bardstown, a renowned Catholic institution of Kentucky; studied law with John Rowan, and attended a course of law lectures at Transylvania University. In 1836 he was elected to the legislature, and in 1844 was a Democratic elector for Polk and Dallas. He was defeated for governor in 1848 by John J. Crittenden, but in 1851 was elected the first governor under the new constitution of the State. The most eventful episode in his life, was his service in the United States senate. He was elected to that body in 1859, and participated in the most important discussions incident to the late civil war. He was of undoubted loyalty, but his colleague, Garrett Davis, questioned his good faith, and presented a resolution to the senate to expel him. The judiciary committee reported against the resolution, but Mr. Davis strongly advocated it; the resolution was defeated, and Davis afterward retracted the charge. Mr. Powell was defeated for a second term in the senate. He died July 3, 1867, at his home in Henderson.

†Stuve, in History of Illinois, p. 646.

mostly personal and local, meeting with varying success and failure. Later, in State and national elections, they mostly co-operated with the Whig party, and occasionally sought to commit it to their narrow doctrines. Upon the dissolution of the Whig party this element devised a new secret organization more subtle in its operations, and by its mysterious ways enticing the young and unwary (for the human mind loves mystery) with principles proscriptive of foreigners and intolerant of Catholics. The dark ceremonies of the order, conducted with mysterious secrecy, were peculiarly impressive. In this feature of the institution is found the meaning of the name "Know-nothing." It was significant of their obligations. The local organizations were denominated lodges, the meetings of which were usually held under cover of night, as if their deeds were evil, by aid of dark lanterns in lonely and unfrequented places, in the recesses of forests, hollows, deserted, or untenanted buildings, unfinished attics, etc., repairing thither stealthily, though none pursued—conduct most unbecoming patriotic citizens of a free country. Lodges sent delegates to the council, which nominated candidates, designated other delegates to other councils or conventions, issued orders, etc., all of which, the members had solemnly sworn to implicitly support and obey, under penalty of expulsion, proscription, personal indignity, if not outrage. At first their nominations were made from the other political parties, and by their secret and united weight they would generally turn the scale as to them seemed meet. Thus emboldened, the operations of the order were extended, and finally its own distinctive nominations openly announced for either local or other offices. Advancing with clandestine and rapid strides, it attained political supremacy in several States, and cast a large vote in many others. Still aspiring, in 1856 a presidential ticket was put forth. But it may be said that the Know-nothing order lost power so soon as it openly made separate nominations from its own party, and quit secretly espousing the nominations of other parties. While many of the pretensions of all parties are hollow—advanced to make political capital among the masses—the cry of "Americans to rule America" by the ostracism of foreign born citizens and proscription in religion, the two cardinal tenets of the party, was both unrepublican and unconstitutional—unrepublican, because in conflict with the Declaration of Independence; and unconstitutional, because that instrument says: "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office of public trust under the United States." Further, the constitution not only permits, but fosters the freest discussion. With frequent appeals to the people, a tribunal than which none is higher, with the duty of the citizen to arraign and investigate the conduct of government, and scrutinize the operation of the laws, what can justify political organizations which avoid the open day, meet in darkness and seclusion, which offer no ground to open combat, whose principles are a sealed book, and whose adherents, under sworn obligations, "know nothing?" It tended to segregate foreign born and Catholic residents into communities distinct in feeling and in political and religious interests, and to excite in their breasts the animosities and hatreds of race by fastening upon them politically the brand of "Helots."

In no part of the Union was the feeling against the Catholics or the foreign element more pronounced than in Kentucky. This is rather a strange phase in the political history of the State, when it is remembered that the foreign population was few in numbers, and the great majority of native Catholics among the most honorable and respectable citizens of the commonwealth. At the August election, in 1854, which was for county officers only, the Whigs, under the new name of Know-nothings, were victorious throughout the State, with few exceptions. In August, 1855, the election was for State officers, members of congress and of the legislature, and partisan feeling was at fever heat. The Know-nothing, or American party, elected six members of congress, and the Democrats elected four; while the general assembly stood: senate, thirteen Americans and seven Democrats;* representatives, sixty-one Americans and thirty-nine Democrats. Charles S. Morehead was elected governor on the Know-nothing or American ticket, by a majority of 4,403, over Beverly L. Clarke, Democrat. He was a man of wide popularity, and in every position he filled gained honorable distinction. He was a native of Kentucky, and was born in 1802 in Nelson County. He graduated from Transylvania University with the highest honors, studied law and was duly admitted to practice. He served in the legislature and in congress several terms, and in all his public acts a sense of duty guided him above selfish and personal considerations. After the expiration of his term as governor he retired from public service, and declined all further official honors until the war clouds of 1861 began to gather, when he accepted the responsible position of a delegate from Kentucky to the "Peace Conference" at Washington. Mr. Morehead died in 1868 in his sixty sixth year.

On the day of the election (August 6, 1855) the most disgraceful riot took place ever known in the city of Louisville. The day is still "painfully remembered," and quoted in the annals of the city as "Bloody Monday." Twenty-two persons were killed outright, or died of wounds received, many others were injured, while some twenty houses or more were burned, and a great deal of other property destroyed. The riot was precipitated by the rough element of the Know-nothing party, who, laboring under intense political excitement, occasioned by distorted reports that the Catholic people meditated serious disturbances on election day, attacked them in various parts of the city, but more fiercely in the First and Eighth Wards. The most deplorable scenes were enacted, and violence and bloodshed followed the track of the ruffians. They paraded along the streets with a cannon at their head, and set fire indiscriminately to the houses of foreigners. Several persons, who were concealed in the fated buildings, or fled to them for safety from the infuriated mob, were burned to death, while others were shot while attempting to escape from the flames. The riot continued far into the night, and serious fears were entertained of the total destruction of the city. But through the exertions of the mayor, police, and influential citizens, such a catastrophe was prevented. The disgraceful affair brought considerable discredit to the Know-nothing party and contributed in no small degree to its ultimate defeat in Kentucky. In the campaign of 1856 the Whig element was not strong enough in it, or past mistakes had so enfeebled the party, that the Democrats carried the State. The result of a spirited contest was that James Buchanan and John C. Breckinridge, Democratic candidates for president and vice-president, received a majority (in the State) of 6,118 over Millard Fillmore and Andrew J. Donelson, the American candidates.* John C. Fremont and William L. Dayton, Republicans, received 314 votes. At the State election, in 1858, the Democrats were victorious by an overwhelming majority, electing eight Democrats to two Americans to congress; sixty-one Democrats to thirty-nine Americans to the State legislature, and thirteen Democrats to seven Americans to the State senate. The power of the American party, which, under its first organization, carried everything in Kentucky, was now broken. The Democrats were again successful in 1859, and elected Beriah Magoffin governor, over Joshua F. Bell, the American candidate, by 8,904 majority. Linn Boyd, the Democratic candidate for lieutenant-governor, was elected over Alfred Allen (American) by 11,713 majority. The delegation to congress was divided, five of each party being elected.

The dark clouds, that had long been gathering on the political horizon, were soon to overshadow the country and plunge it in civil war. North and south of Mason and Dixon's line the low rumbling of the thunder could be heard. With prophetic knowledge, Prentice had beheld the coming storm long before it broke, and strove to avert it. Clay, bowed in body beneath the weight of years, but as erect in soul as "any spire that ever rose from a temple of God toward heaven," had stepped forward, and by Titanic strength and exertion turned aside, for the time, the fury of the tempest. But with deeper gloom and more portentous threatenings the clouds were again closing over, and there seemed to be none to rise up and command—"Peace, be still." In 1860 the storm came.

*Eighteen senators held over, one-half being elected every four years.

*Buchanan and Breckinridge were elected president and vice-president by 173 electoral votes, to 114 cast for Fremont and Dayton, and 8 for Fillmore and Donelson, the latter carrying only the State of Maryland.

It is not the purpose of this chapter to enter upon a discussion of the issues that led up to the civil war, nor to paint the horrors of its dismal and shifting scenes. These questions are treated at length in their proper places. The presidential election of 1860 from the beginning was contemplated by all men of reflection with the most profound solicitude. The canvass opened with quite a medley of political parties. Four able tickets, any of whom were eminently capable of administering the affairs of the nation, were put forward by the respective parties and factions, viz.: John Bell and Edward Everett, were the American candidates; John C. Breckinridge and Joseph Lane, Southern Democrats; Stephen A. Douglas and Herschel V. Johnson, Western Democrats; Abraham Lincoln and Hannibal Hamlin, Republicans. Owing to the split in the Democratic party, Bell and Everett carried Kentucky, the vote in the State being as follows: Bell and Everett, 66,016; Breckinridge and Lane, 52,836; Douglas and Johnson, 25,644; Lincoln and Hamlin, 1,366. Bell's majority over Breckinridge was 13,180; over Douglas, 40,372. Breckinridge's majority over Douglas was 27,192. Lincoln and Hamlin were elected, receiving in the electoral college, 180 of the 303 votes. Bell received the electoral votes of Tennessee, Kentucky and Virginia, amounting to 39; Breckinridge received those of Delaware, Maryland, the Carolinas, Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas and Arkansas, 72; Douglas, although receiving the largest popular vote next to Lincoln,* carried but one State, Missouri, in the electoral college; Lincoln received the electoral votes of all the other States—eighteen in number.

The Whig party, as we have seen, was the ruling party in Kentucky from its organization to the time of its change of name to the Know-nothing or American party. The "Liberty" or anti-slavery party was organized in 1840, and a presidential ticket placed in the field. The small vote polled by this ticket throughout the country was drawn mainly from the Whigs. The Temperance party, even then quite an element in politics, drew its greater number of adherents also from the Whig party. But, notwithstanding all these drains upon the Whig masses, it continued one of the great ruling parties of the country, as well as the dominant party in this State, until the repeal of the Missouri Compromise in 1854, which led to the formation of the Republican party. The latter, in its organization, absorbed the Whig and Liberty or Abolition parties. With the election of Abraham Lincoln to the presidency in 1860, the national government passed into the control of the Republican party, and so remained until 1884, when the Democrats, after having been out of power for a quarter of a century, again triumphed.

The Democratic party dates its birth back to that of the Whigs. It originated or assumed a distinctive form during the presidency of Gen. Jackson, and is still one of the great ruling parties of the country. Since its triumph over the Know-nothing party, in 1856, it has been the dominant party in Kentucky. For fifty years, or more, it has maintained its organization without change of name, a fact remarkable in the history of political creeds in America. The discord in its ranks, which, in 1860, lost it national control, had well nigh resulted in its total disruption. But after twenty-four years of defeat and disaster it is again restored to power.

*The popular vote of the United States stood: Lincoln, 1,866,452; Douglas, 1,375,157; Breckinridge, 847,953; Bell, 590,631.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE ANNEXATION OF TEXAS, AND WAR WITH MEXICO.

TEXAS, during the Mexican revolution and the civil wars of that period, assumed its independence and set up a government of its own. Its territory extended from the Sabine to the Rio Grande, and was an empire in itself. Situated in the mildest part of the temperate zone, it presented attractions that allured in vast numbers adventurous pioneers to its rich domain. Most of these early colonists had been citizens of the United States, born and bred amid the wild scenes of the western frontier and of the far south mainly, and were dependent on the trusty rifle for their very subsistence. The trapper, the buffalo hunter, the restless, roving backwoodsman, who, like the Indian, moved westward as civilization encroached on his solitudes, and a few master-spirits were there grouped together in one heterogeneous mass. They formed a community that was not perfect in its moral symmetry, but all powerful in its rough strength, as proven in the contest with the veteran soldiers of Santa Anna. There were those of every national prejudice. All the marked characteristics of men met their opposites, and there was no law to restrain or govern either, except that public judgment that was crystallized into a resistless force. This wonderful alembic, where were fused normal and abnormal humanities, thoughts, false educations and prejudices into a molten stream, scorched everything along its way, as the volcanic eruption does the debris over which it flows. It was the untrammeled school of attrition of every variety of mind with mind—the rough diamond that gleams and dazzles with beauty only when rubbed with diamond dust.

The adventurers, who flocked to Texas from the States, increased rapidly, until they became more numerous than the Mexicans, who previously inhabited the country. The difference of race, religion and laws was soon apparent in diversities of sentiment and objects between the old and new inhabitants. "The Texan of the United States brought with him, not only greater energy and industry, but a wild and restless ambition—a more intense and speculative pursuit of future objects. When differences so deep and original as these exist among different classes of people, they will soon become manifested in external action. The new inhabitants soon seized the direction of all public affairs, and Texas became, in fact, the possession of these adventurers from a foreign land, rather than of those ancient citizens, to whose government it had once professed allegiance. The power thus obtained was soon manifested in other acts. It is not in the nature of things, that a country should change its inhabitants and not also change its government. The new possessors will assume the laws and institutions to which their habits have been used and their sentiments assimilated."* So it was with Texas. The American population had increased, in 1831, to about 20,000, and though immigration from the United States had been prohibited by Mexico, it still continued to increase. Steps were taken to separate Texas from Coahuila, which was accomplished in 1833,† and application made to the Mexican government as a distinct State, and for admission as such into the *Mansfield's History of the Mexican War.

†Texas, from 1727 to 1824, was a separate province, and in no wise connected with any other political division of Mexico. But in 1824 it was, as a province, united with Coahuila, neither being sufficiently populous to form a State of itself. From this time to 1833 the combination was known as the "State of Coahuila and Texas."—H. Yoakum.

Mexican Union.* But their petition was unheeded, and their commissioner—Stephen F. Austin—detained at the Mexican capital awaiting the answer of the dilatory government. Austin, wearied with the delay, wrote home to the people, advising them to organize their State government without waiting further consent of the Mexican authorities.† His letter was intercepted, himself seized and thrown into a dungeon, where he remained incarcerated nearly a year without even knowing the cause of his arrest and imprisonment. Austin was among the early immigrants to Texas, a man of more than average ability, and the ablest leader the Texans then had. His father, Moses Austin, had obtained a large grant of land from Mexico, to which, at his death, Stephen succeeded. For the latter's eminent services, and in recognition of his exertions in planting a colony in Texas, his name has been attached both to a county and to the capital of the State. He was finally released by the Mexican government and permitted to return home. Such in general was the condition of Texas, when it knocked for admission at the door of the American Union.

In the meantime, Mexico had been reduced to a military despotism, with Santa Anna at its head. In September, 1835, he sent Gen. Cos into Texas with a large force to coerce the rebellious Texans into submission to his will. A battle was fought on the banks of the Rio Guadalupe, in which a part of the Mexican force was defeated. Soon after the Texans captured Goliad, and with it a large quantity of arms and military stores. Gen. Austin, at the head of the Texan army, in October laid siege to the strong town of Antonio de Bexar. During the progress of the siege Cols. Fannin and Bowie, with less than a hundred men, gained a brilliant victory over 400 Mexicans. Gen. Austin's army was poorly equipped. He was without cannon suitable for the reduction of so strong a place, but he stormed it on the 5th of December, forcing Gen. Cos with his garrison to retire within the fortress of the Alamo, where he was at length obliged to capitulate.*

Santa Anna now determined to proceed against the Texans in person. With an army of 10,000 men and a large train of artillery, he entered their country, early in 1836, and on the 21st of February arrived before the town of Bexar. He surprised the garrison and drove them into the Alamo without provisions. They numbered but 150 men, including a re-enforcement of thirty-two received from Gonzales. The battle which followed is thus described by Frost, in his history of the war between Texas and Mexico: "For ten days the air was darkened by the shot and shells poured into the fort by Santa Anna, yet not a man of the Texans had fallen, while the ground was strewed with hundreds of their enemies, pierced by the ball of the unerring rifle. At length, on the night of the 5th of March, they beheld the enemy advancing to assault the place. With their artillery the gallant defenders beat whole battalions to the earth, yet the Mexican pushed on his men, confident of ultimate success. The scaling-ladders were planted, and the Mexicans poured into the fortress. The men of the garrison, looking more like spectres than men, still dealt death upon the enemy. They sold their lives dearly, but the immense numbers of their assailants made their destruction certain. Seven of them, finding their companions all dead, asked for quarter, but were refused. They retired to a corner of the fortress, placed their backs to the walls and fell, each upon a pile of his fallen foes. Such was the victory of the Alamo, the Thermopylæ of Texas, which cost the victor 1,500 of his bravest men."

Thus the Texan revolution raged. The war continued with varying fortune until the battle of San Jacinto, on the 21st of April, 1836, when the Mexican power was broken, resulting in their authority over the Texans being finally destroyed. This was the most remarkable battle of the war, and the most important in its results. Santa Anna's army numbered more than 1,500 men, and was composed of veterans who had grown gray in the

*This was several years prior to any advances being made by Texas toward the United States government.

†Yoakum's History of Texas.

*History of the Texan Revolution, p. 167.

numerous wars of Mexico. Gen. Houston, who commanded the Texans, had 700 infantry and sixty-one cavalry. But, nothing daunted, "the gallant Texans charged the enemy's lines until within a few yards, when they delivered their fire with dreadful effect, shouted their war-cry, 'Remember the Alamo,' and rushed upon the foe with the bayonet—and the contest was decided."*

The battle was disastrous to the Mexicans, and the destruction of their army was complete. More than 600 were killed in the fight, 280 wounded and 730 captured. Gens. Cos and Almonte were among the prisoners, as well as Santa Anna, who was taken the next day after the battle. A treaty was now effected between the two countries, and Santa Anna as president of Mexico, signed it on the 14th of May, acknowledging "the full, entire and perfect independence of Texas." By this treaty, the boundaries of the new republic were defined as follows: "Beginning at the mouth of the Rio Grande; thence up the principal stream of the said river to its source; thence due north to the forty-second degree of north latitude; thence along the boundary line as defined in the treaty between the United States and Spain (February, 1819) to the beginning."†

It was agreed on the part of the Texans that the lives of their prisoners should be spared, and that Santa Anna should be sent to Vera Cruz, and thence to the United States. He arrived in the latter country in December, 1836, and visited the president at Washington. He returned to Mexico in 1837, and retired in solitude to his hacienda of Magno de Clava.

In violation of every principle of honor, the republic of Mexico disregarded the treaty with Texas, and, as before, continued to treat the Texans as rebels. It was contended that the treaty had been made by Santa Anna while under constraint, and was, therefore, of no effect until ratified by the government of Mexico. Taking advantages of the existing dificulties, Bustamente, who had been banished from Mexico. now returned and placed himself at the head of affairs. Having seized upon the presidency, he repudiated the Texan treaty and recommenced the war. It was continued in predatory incursions on both sides until Texas became one of the United States, and thus engaged the attention of Mexico at home.

Texas, at a very early period of her struggle, expressed a desire to be admitted as a State into the American Union. She had applied for admission into the Mexican confederation in 1833, and on August 4, 1837, made a formal proposition to the United States. Most of the early citizens were from the States, and had imbibed the principles of liberty in their broadest sense; so it is but natural that they should desire to remain politically and socially connected with the land of their birth. They had battled, apparently, not so much for absolute independence, as for emancipation from Mexican tyranny, and, in order to secure this object, they had laid less stress on national sovereignty, than upon a state of dependence, which would insure them safety. Of a government of rigid laws and stern police regulations, they knew nothing, but they were shrewd, active, alert and rich in animal life and energy. Among the denizens of the forest they were irresistible, but to meet in organized convention to form laws for a new nation, were labors utterly above their abilities. With some few allowances for manner of life they could accommodate themselves to almost any old government, but to originate a new one, or to execute it after its origination, was the point at which they failed. This disposition in a people whom past adversities or future hopes had impelled to this new region in pursuit of fortune or adventure, seems a little strange. Most nations, however small, glory in their independence of foreign control, especially if that independence has been achieved by their own efforts. But the burden of self-government, it was thought by the Texans, was too great for a young and irregularly settled country.* The proposition of Texas to become a member of the American Union was declined by President Van Buren, on the ground that it would be "an act of injustice to a sister republic." He declared that so long as we were bound by a treaty of amity and commerce with Mexico, to annex Texas would necessarily involve the question of war, and that a disposition to espouse the quarrel with Mexico was at variance with the spirit of the treaty, and with the policy and welfare of the United States.* The application was not pressed at that time, and Texas still remained exposed to the guerrilla warfare carried on by Mexico. But negotiations were continued with the United States, and with England and France, for loans and troops, the object of which was to force from Mexico an acknowledgement of Texan independence.

*Texan Revolution, p. 169.

†These boundaries constituted one of the grounds of claim against Mexico, on the part of the United States, in the subsequent troubles between those powers.

*Frost's History of the Mexican War.

This unsettled state of affairs—a partial war at one time, and a series of negotiations at another—continued to exist in Texas until the accession of Mr. Tyler to the presidency revived the plan of annexation. The question, though very cautiously handled by the politicians of that day, was a growing one, and did not fail to impress its importance upon a number of leading men, among whom was the president himself. Mr. Tyler had begun his administration with the settled intention of making Texas a part of the United States as soon as circumstances would permit. During the first two years of his term, however, his time was too much taken up with the tariff question, and other important subjects causing acrimonious discussion, to allow him to force the issues of the Texan question. Circumstances continued unfavorable, and Mr. Webster, the secretary of state, was opposed to the policy. In 1842, Texas, having once more applied for admission, the danger became imminent lest, disgusted with her treatment, she might never again propose terms for annexation. From this time it became the leading question in the mind of the president, resulting in the withdrawal of Mr. Webster, in May, 1843, from the cabinet, though on every other question he agreed with the executive.† The position of Mr. Tyler, at this time, attracted the notice of both the great political parties, and drew out the opinions of leading men and the criticisms of the press. As his official term approached its close, it became more and more evident that annexation would be one of the rallying points on which, during the national election, the opposing masses would test their strength. Mr. Upshur, who had succeeded Mr. Webster as secretary of State, was killed on February 28, 1844, by an explosion on board the steamer "Princeton," and the president appointed John C. Calhoun, with whom the annexation of Texas was a favorite project, to succeed him. Together, the president and his secretary labored assiduously to accomplish annexation.

Mexico, in the meantime, had aroused herself to action. Fearful of losing so large a portion of her ancient territory, she awoke to the necessity of protecting her interests and of defending her honor, though it should be at the expense of war. On August 23, 1843, Mr. Bocanegra, the Mexican minister of foreign relations, addressed a note* to Waddy Thompson, our minister to Mexico, from which the following is taken: "If a party in Texas is now endeavoring to effect its incorporation with the United States, it is from a consciousness of their notorious incapability to form and constitute an independent nation without their having changed their situation, or acquired any right to separate themselves from their mother country. His excellency, the provisional president, resting on this deep conviction, is obliged to prevent an agression, unprecedented in the annals of the world, from being consummated, and if it be indispensable for the Mexican nation to seek security for its rights at the expense of the disasters of war, it will call upon God, and rely on its own efforts for the defense of its just cause." As if to prevent any misunderstanding of the meaning of Mexico, Gen. Almonte, Mexican minister at Washington, wrote to the secretary of state, under date of November 3d as follows: "But if, contrary to the hopes and wishes entertained by the government of the undersigned for the preservation of the good understanding and harmony which should reign between the two neighboring and friendly republics, the United States should, in defiance of good faith, and the principles of justice which they have constantly proclaimed, commit the unheard-of act of violence of appropriating to themselves an integrant part of the Mexican territory, the undersigned, in the name of his nation, and now for them, protests in the most solemn manner against such an aggression; and he moreover declares, by express order of his government, that on sanction being given by the executive of the Union to the incorporation of Texas into the United States, he will consider his mission ended, seeing that, as the secretary of state will have learned, the Mexican government is resolved to declare war as soon as it receives intimation of such act."

*State Papers.

†American History, Vol. VIII, p. 380.

*State Papers.

Thus it will be seen that the United States did not enter blindly into negotiations with Texas, nor in ignorance of what the result of annexation would be. Long prior to the admission of Texas, she had been officially informed by the Mexican government that war must inevitably follow such act. Unheeding the solemn protest of Mexico, negotiations were continued and even pressed to an experimental test. Gen. Almonte's letter of remonstrance had been written to the secretary of state in November, 1843. On April 22, 1844, President Tyler submitted to the senate a "treaty of annexation," accompanied by an elaborate message. It was the signal for a violent explosion against the administration, and the result was, after a bitter debate, the rejection of the treaty by a vote of thirty-five to sixteen.* The question was thus left open for discussion, and was one of the leading issues, as predicted, before the people in the presidential contest of 1844. "Polk, Dallas and Texas" was the battle-cry of the Democrats, and their candidates, Polk and Dallas, being elected by a large majority, this was taken as a public declaration on the subject. President Tyler now directed all his efforts to effect another treaty before the close of his official term, and so successfully, that, on March 1, 1845, congress passed the joint resolution annexing Texas to the United States. On the same day the president affixed his official signature to the document, and on the 4th of July following, the treaty was ratified by the Texan government. Thus the signal was given for one of the most unjust and unnecessary wars of modern times—a war that proved but the prelude of another far more dreadful. Had the war with Mexico been avoided, as it well might have been, by a refusal to recognize the "Lone Star" republic, and receive it as a State into the American Union, it is possible that the civil war, which followed a decade and a half later, might not have occurred. Thus one event leads to another, and

> One woe doth tread upon another's heel,
> So fast they follow.

Time has healed the breach made by this national robbery, and years of peace have softened the angry feelings then aroused. The annexation of Texas precipitated the war between Mexico and the United States, but there were more important questions involved, which the unjust act developed. An eminent American statesman has said that, "the commencement of the Mexican war was the opening of a new volume of American history." This is quite true. The contest with Mexico is merely the preface to that volume—the production of the civil war of 1861–65. To protect slavery, and to extend the baleful institution, was the ruling idea with the great majority of those in the United States, and particularly in the South, who favored annexation, and may thus be considered the direct cause of the Mexican war, and which culminated finally in the war between the States. The Whig party in politics opposed annexation on the ground that the acquisition of new territory would but result in the extension of slavery. One of the great exponents of the party thus expressed its general sentiment* on the subject:

If further acquisition of territory is to be the result either of conquest or treaty, then I scarcely know which should be preferred, eternal war with

*Public Documents of 1844.

* Thomas Corwin in a speech in the United States senate opposing the Mexican war.

Mexico, or the hazards of internal commotion at home, which last, I fear, may come if another province is to be added to our territory. There is one topic connected with this subject which I tremble when I approach, and yet I cannot forbear to mention it. It meets you in every step you take. It threatens you which way soever you go in the prosecution of this war. I allude to the question of slavery. Opposition to its further extension, it must be obvious to every one, is a deeply rooted determination with men of all parties in what we call the non-slaveholding States. New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio, three of the most powerful, have already sent their legislative instructions here—so it will be, I doubt not, in all the rest. It is vain now to speculate about the reason of all this. Gentlemen of the South may call it prejudice, passion, hypocrisy, fanaticism. I shall not dispute with them now on that point. The great fact that it is so, and not otherwise, is what it concerns us to know. You nor I cannot change this opinion if we would. These people only say, we will not, cannot consent that you shall carry slavery where it does not already exist. They do not seek to disturb you in that institution, as it exists in your States. Enjoy it if you will and as you will. This is their language, this their determination. How is it in the South? Can it be expected that they will expend in common their blood and their treasure, in the acquisition of immense territory, and then willingly forego the right to carry thither their slaves, and inhabit the conquered country if they please to do so? Nay, I believe they would contend to any extremity for the mere right, had they no wish to exert it. I believe, and I confess I tremble when the conviction presses upon me, that there is equal obstinacy on both sides of this fearful question. If, then, we persist in war, which, if it terminate in anything short of a mere wanton waste of blood as well as money, must end (as this bill proposes) in the acqisition of territory, to which at once this controversy must attach—this bill would seem to be nothing less than a bill to produce internal commotion. Should we prosecute this war another moment, or expend $1 in the purchase of a single acre of Mexican land, the North and the South are brought into collision on a point where neither will yield. Who can foresee or foretell the result?

This was the position, these the sentiments, of one of Ohio's greatest statesmen, and like views were entertained by a majority of his people and his party. Henry Clay, the great "commoner," took the same ground, as did Daniel Webster and most of the leading Whigs of the country. They opposed the extension of slavery as a national evil, and to avert such evil, they opposed the annexation of Texas. Had slavery not become aggressive for territorial expansion, it would doubtless have taken a long time for the slow process of political policy to have accomplished its final extinction.

Upon the passage of the joint act admitting Texas into the sisterhood of States, Mexico immediately broke off all diplomatic intercourse with the American government, called home her minister, and began preparations for war. War soon followed. "The army of occupation, under Gen. Zachary Taylor, was ordered to Corpus Christi, in July, and during the winter following, it was ordered to a point opposite Matamoras, to take possession of the territory in dispute.* * * * * The Mexicans occupied the territory at the time, with a military force stationed at Brazos Santiago, which, on the approach of Gen. Taylor to Point Isabel, withdrew west of the Rio Grande. * * * On the 28th of March, 1846, Taylor, with about 4,000 men, took possession on the left bank of the Rio Grande, opposite Matamoras, and within cannon shot of that place. April 24th, Gen. Arista arrived in Matamoras and assumed command of the Mexican forces. On the same day Gen. Taylor, having learned that a large body of Mexicans had crossed the river twenty miles above, dispatched Capts. Thornton and Hardee with sixty men to reconnoiter their movements. They fell in with what they supposed was a scouting party, but which proved to be the advance guard of a strong force of the enemy posted in the chaparral. The Americans charged and pursued the guard across the clearing, and in an instant their forces were surrounded by the main body of Mexicans, who fired upon them, killing sixteen and taking the remainder prisoners."†

Although it had been more than a year since the passage of the act of annexation, this slight skirmish may be regarded as the commencement of hostilities between Mexico and the United States. The report of the capture of Thornton and Hardee did not reach Washington until the 9th of May, one day after the opening battle of Palo Alto. As the news spread over the country it created the most intense excitement. Public meetings were held, and the indignation of the people gave vent to warlike speeches and resolutions. Governors tendered the services of their militia to the president, and issued proclamations to their people to organize and enroll themselves in readiness for emergencies. The excitement was at fever heat. The president sent in a special message to congress, and two days later that body passed an act authorizing him to accept the services of 50,000 volunteers, and appropriating $10,000,000 to carry on the war. Military organizations began now in earnest. But while these scenes were transpiring in the United States, more thrilling ones were being enacted in Mexico. The battle of Palo Alto, the first actual battle of the war, occurred on the 8th of May, 1846, followed on the next day by the battle of Resaca de la Palma, in both of which the Americans, though confronted by largely superior numbers, were victorious.

*The Texans claimed the whole country east of the Rio Grande Mr. Slidell was appointed an envoy by the United States and sent to the Mexican government to settle all questions of boundary between the two countries, but his mission was unsuccessful.

†Stuve's sketch of the Mexican war in History of Illinois.

A call for volunteers soon followed, and in the apportionment of troops among the States, the South and West came in for the largest quotas. The patriotism of Kentucky blazed out from one end of the commonwealth to the other. The governor, anticipating the call, issued his proclamation for volunteers, and more than 13,000 responded. Under the first requisition for troops, the State was required to furnish 2,400 men—two regiments of infantry and one of cavalry. Notwithstanding the ascendancy of the Whig party in Kentucky, and the general opposition of that party to the war, 10,000 more volunteers reported for duty than could be accepted. The quota was filled, and the surplus companies were disbanded and furnished transportation to their homes at the expense of the State.

The Louisville Legion, a military organization now nearly half a century old, were among the first troops to tender their services to the governor. Composed of the flower of Louisville manhood, the Legion, ten companies strong, commanded by Col. Ormsby, was accepted by the State, and became the First Kentucky Infantry. It was mustered into the United States service, and at once embarked for the seat of war.

The history of the Louisville Legion dates back to 1837. In that year a company was organized, called the "Louisville Guards," Thomas Anderson, captain, and Charles Tilden and John Barbee, lieutenants. The "Washington Blues," under Capt. W. L. Ball; the "Kentucky Riflemen," under Capt. Thomas J. Martin, and the "Louisville Grays," under Capt. J. Birney Marshall, were organized in 1838 and 1839. These four companies, in 1840, were formed into a battalion under the charter of the "Louisville Legion," with Thomas Anderson, colonel; Jason Rogers, lieutenant-colonel; Humphrey Marshall, major, and John Barbee, adjutant.

In 1846, after war had been declared against Mexico, the strength of the Louisville Legion was increased to nine companies of infantry and one of artillery, thus forming a full regiment. Upon the offer of their services to the governor, they were accepted, and in four days were on the way to Mexico. They were mustered into service on the 17th of May, 1846, with the following regimental officers: Stephen Ormsby, colonel; Jason Rogers, lieutenant-colonel; John B. Shepherd, major; William Riddel, adjutant, and T. L. Caldwell and J. J. Matthews, surgeons. The company commanders were: First Company—C. H. Harper, captain; Second Company —— Sanders, captain; Third Company —E. B. Howe, captain; Fourth Company—F. Kern, captain; Fifth Company — Godfrey Pope, captain; Sixth Company—John Fuller, captain; Seventh Company—Conrad Schroeder, captain; Eighth Company—F. F. C. Triplett, captain; Ninth Company—W. L. Ball, captain; Tenth Company — C. W. Bullen, captain.

After the close of the war, the Legion, as an organization, became somewhat lukewarm, if it did not wholly disband, and at the outbreak of the civil war, many of the surviving members entered into the service, some into the Federal and some into the Confederate army. During the labor troubles of 1877, when it became evident to the people, throughout the country, that effective State organization was necessary at times to preserve the civil authorities, the Louisville Legion was reorganized and put on an effective footing. The Mexican veterans of the old Legion turned over their charter to the new organization, and since then its history is familiar to the people of the city and the State. The two regiments additional to the Legion, embraced in the first call for troops, were officered as follows: Second Infantry—William R. McKee, of Lexington, colonel; Henry Clay, Jr., of Louisville, lieutenant-colonel; Cary H. Fry, of Danville, major; First Company—William H. Maxey, of Green County, captain; Second Company—Franklin Chambers, of Franklin County, captain; Third Company—Phil B. Thompson, of Mercer County, captain; Fourth Company — Speed Smith Fry, of Boyle County, captain; Fifth Company—George W. Cutter, of Kenton County, captain; Sixth Company—William T. Willis, of Jessamine County, captain; Seventh Company—William Dougherty, of Lincoln County, captain; Eighth Company—William M. Joiner, of Kenton County, captain; Ninth Company—Wilkerson Turpin, of Montgomery County, captain; Tenth Company—George W. Kavanaugh, of Anderson County, captain.

First Cavalry—Humphrey Marshall, of Louisville, colonel; E. H. Field, of Woodford County, lieutenant-colonel; John P. Gaines, of Boone County, major; and E. M. Vaughn, of Fayette County, adjutant. First Company—William J. Heady, of Jefferson County, captain; Second Company—A. Pennington, of Jefferson County, captain; Third Company—Cassius M. Clay, of Fayette County, captain; Fourth Company—Thomas F. Marshall, of Woodford County, captain; Fifth Company—J. C. Stone, of Madison County, captain; Sixth Company—J. Price, of Garrard County, captain; Seventh Company—G. L. Postlethwaite, of Fayette County, captain; Eighth Company—J. S. Lillard, of Gallatin County, captain; Ninth Company—John Shawhan, of Harrison County, captain; Tenth Company—B. C. Milam, of Franklin County, captain.

A company had been recruited by John S. Williams, in Clark County, but, through some misunderstanding between the governor of Kentucky and the United States secretary of war, it had been excluded from regimental organization. Capt. Williams applied at once to the war department to have it mustered into service as an independent company. While this application was pending, Capt. Williams marched them to the rendezvous at Louisville, and uniformed them, and where an order was soon received by Gen. Wool to muster it in. It was accordingly mustered into the service of the United States, and ordered to report to the colonel of the Sixth United States Regular Infantry, then en route for Mexico. It served with this regiment until its term (one year) expired, and participated in the battle of Cerro Gordo, where it received the highest praise for its bravery. Capt. Williams was soon after appointed colonel of the Fourth Kentucky Infantry, a regiment organized under the second call for troops.

On the 31st of August, 1847, a second requisition was made on Kentucky for troops, and two regiments asked for. They were organized and ready for service by the 20th of September, and were numbered and officered as follows: Third Infantry—Manlius V. Thomson, of Georgetown, colonel; Thomas L. Crittenden, of Frankfort, lieutenant-colonel; John C. Breckinridge, of Lexington, major; ——— Bradly, adjutant. First Company—A. T. Caldwell, of Laurel County, captain; Second Company—W. P. Childs, of Estill County, captain; Third Company—Thomas Todd, of Shelby County, captain; Fourth Company—William E. Simms, of Bourbon County, captain; Fifth Company—John R. Smith, of Scott County, captain; Sixth Company—James Ewing, of Bath County, captain; Seventh Company—Leander M. Cox, of Fleming County, captain;*Eighth Company—Leonidas Metcalfe, of Nicholas County, captain; Ninth Company—J. A. Pritchard, of

*It is reported of Capt. Cox's company, that twenty-five of his men were over six feet high.

Boone County, captain; Tenth Company—L. B. Robinson, of Fayette County, captain.

Fourth Infantry—John S. Williams, of Winchester, colonel; William Preston, of Louisville, lieutenant-colonel; William T. Ward, of Greensburg, major; William E. Woodruff, of Louisville, adjutant. First Company—J. S. Corum, of Caldwell County, captain; Second Company—G. B. Cook, of Livingston County, captain; Third Company—D. McCreery, of Daviess County, captain; Fourth Company—P. H. Gardner, of Hart County, captain; Fifth Company—T. Keating, of Jefferson County, captain; Sixth Company—John C. Squires, of Adair County, captain; Seventh Company—John G. Lair, of Pulaski County, captain; Eighth Company—M. R. Hardin, of Washington County, captain; Ninth Company—B. Rowan Hardin, of Nelson County, captain; Tenth Company—A. W. Bartlett, of Henry County, captain.

Twelve other full companies reported, one from each of the following counties: Mason, Montgomery, Fayette, Madison, Bullitt, Campbell, Hardin, Harrison and Franklin, and three from Louisville, besides several fragmentary companies that were never completed, the filling of the quota rendering further recruiting unnecessary. Prior to the second call being made, four companies for the war were enlisted in Kentucky, and March 1, 1847, mustered into the regular army of the United States.

Gen. Zachary Taylor, commander-in-chief of the army in Mexico, at the commencement of the war, is claimed as a Kentuckian, though really born in Virginia. His father removed to Kentucky, in 1785, when Zachary was but nine months old, and settled in the present county of Jefferson. Born at the close of the revolution, young Taylor grew to manhood amid the Indian wars, which raged for years upon the frontiers, and were particularly severe in Kentucky. As he grew up he developed a fondness for arms, and at the age of twenty-three was commissioned a lieutenant in the United States army. From this subordinate position he rose by regular gradation to the rank of major-general, and second in command in the regular army. He was no "carpet knight," but his promotions were all won by hard service in the field. He was one of the foremost soldiers of the age, and his biographer does him but justice when he says: "No man but Gen. Taylor could have won the victory of Buena Vista." Shortly after Gen. Scott was ordered by the government at Washington to Mexico, to take command of the army, Gen. Taylor resigned and returned to the United States. He was elected president in 1848, by the Whig party, over Gen. Lewis Cass, but died in July, 1850, a little more than a year after his inauguration. He lies buried near Louisville, where recently a handsome monument has been placed at his grave, to mark the spot where the old hero sleeps.

William O. Butler was commissioned a major-general by President Polk, June 29, 1846, for service in the Mexican war. He was born in Jessamine County, Ky., in 1791, and was educated in Transylvania University. He entered the army before he was twenty-one years old, and served in the war of 1812. He was at the battle of the river Raisin, where he was wounded and taken prisoner. Subsequently he was with Gen. Jackson in the battle of New Orleans, and for his gallantry received the commendation of his commanding general. He studied law and was admitted to the bar in Carroll County, Ky. In 1844 he was the Democratic candidate for governor, but was defeated. He served with distinction in the Mexican war and was severely wounded at the siege of Monterey. When the troubles arose between Gen. Scott and his officers, after the capture of the city of Mexico, Gen. Butler was promoted to the chief command of the army, which position he retained until the conclusion of peace. He was a candidate for vice-president of the United States in 1848, on the ticket with Gen. Cass, but they were defeated by Taylor and Fillmore. He was one of the six commissioners from Kentucky, in 1861, to the "Peace Conference" at Washington. He died at his home, in Carroll County, a few years ago.

Of the field and staff officers of the Kentucky regiments many of them attained to the highest distinction, civil and military. They were the very flower of Kentucky chivalry, and those still surviving bore a prominent part (most of them) in the late civil war, both in the Federal and Confederate armies.

Humphrey Marshall was a member of one of the most noted families of Kentucky. He was a lawyer, statesman and soldier, and in each profession he was pre-eminently great. He served in the United States congress, and was a major-general in the Confederate army. William R. McKee and Henry Clay, Jr., the latter the favorite son of the "sage of Ashland," were killed in the battle of Buena Vista. M. V. Thomson was lieutenant-governor of the State under Gov. Letcher, from 1840 to 1844. Thomas L. Crittenden is a son of the Hon. John J. Crittenden—Kentucky's distinguished senator—was a major-general in the Federal army, and is now an officer in the United States army. John C. Breckinridge was vice-president of the United States under James Buchanan, was a candidate for the presidency in 1860, was a major-general in the Confederate army, and later, secretary of war in the Confederate cabinet, and after the close of the war was elected to the senate of the United States. John S. Williams was a major-general in the Confederate army and has since served with distinction in the United States senate—his services terminating March 4, 1885. William Preston has been a member of congress, was a member of the constitutional convention of 1849, minister to Spain under President Buchanan, and was a major-general in the Confederate army. Stephen Ormsby was one of the most prominent and public-spirited men of Jefferson County, but was neither statesman nor politician. He loved the Louisville Legion as his children, and his affection was fully returned by them. William E. Woodruff is a lawyer, still resides in Louisville, was colonel of the Second Kentucky (Federal) Infantry, and was promoted to brigadier-general. He and Gen. Preston, Senator Williams and Gen. Crittenden, are all of the list (the field and staff) known to be now living.

It is impossible to follow the Kentucky troops all through their service in Mexico. The record of both officers and men was such as to cast no reflection upon the high standard of excellence attained by the soldiers of the commonwealth in the early Indian wars and the war of 1812. There were but few battles or even skirmishes of any importance, in the early part of the war, in which Kentucky troops did not participate, but by far their largest representation was in the battle of Buena Vista. Their decimated ranks were an eloquent but mournful tribute to the part they bore in that terrible and unequal struggle.

The Kentucky volunteers, except the Legion, which had already left for the front, rendezvoused at Louisville, and on the 9th of June, 1846, were mustered into the United States service by Col. George Croghan. On the 4th of July following they embarked for Memphis, and from there proceeded overland to Little Rock, thence through Texas to Camargo, on the Rio Grande, where they crossed into Mexico. They did not reach the scene of active operations until several months after the battle of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, and the fall of Matamoras.

The first fighting in which any of the Kentucky troops were engaged was at the siege of Monterey, in September (1846), and but few of them, except the Louisville Legion, were engaged there. The Legion was posted to guard a battery, and for twenty-four hours maintained its position, holding the enemy in check without being able to return their fire, and exhibiting the courage of tried veterans. For the part they took in the protracted fighting around this stronghold of the enemy, the Kentucky legislature passed resolutions complimentary to them, and voted thanks to Gens. Taylor and Butler, and a sword to each of these officers. Maj. Philip N. Barbour of the Third United States Regular Infantry, a gallant Kentuckian, was killed during the siege, thus marring the joy of his victorious comrades in arms. He was a brave officer, and the legislature, on the 23d of February, 1847, ordered his remains brought home, and interred in the State cemetery at Frankfort.

Maj. Gaines and Capt. Clay, of the First Kentucky Cavalry, with thirty men, were surprised on the 22d of January (1847) by a large force of the enemy at Encarnacion, and captured. Five days later Capt. Heady and Lieut. Churchill, of the same regiment, with seventeen men, were captured. The prisoners were marched off to the City of Mexico, where most of them remained in captivity until their comrades had served out their term of enlistment and returned home. About a month after his capture, Maj. Gaines withdrew his parole as a prisoner of war, and succeeded finally in making his escape to the American Army. He gained the lines in time to take a gallant part in the battles of Churubusco, Chapultepec, and in the fighting around the walls of the Mexican capital.

After the fall of Monterey, the next important military operations were at Buena Vista. On the 12th of November (1846) Gen. Worth was ordered from Monterey to Saltillo with two regiments of infantry, a company of volunteers, eight companies of artillery and a field battery. About the 17th of December, Gen. Taylor received a dispatch from Worth, stating that Santa Anna threatened an attack upon Saltillo. Gens. Butler and Wool were ordered to re-enforce Worth, and Gen. Taylor set out a few days later himself for the same point. Saltillo is the capital of the State of Coahuila and an important place, and, once in possession of the Americans, it was highly necessary to hold it. Gen. Taylor had proceeded but a short distance on his march, when he was met by a messenger from Worth announcing that the rumored attack of Santa Anna was unfounded. Deeming his presence there now unnecessary, Taylor returned to Monterey, but soon after, accompanied by Gen. Twiggs' division, moved toward Victoria, where he arrived on the 4th of January.*

It was about this time that Gen. Taylor received a demand from Gen. Scott for a part of his troops to aid him in his operations against Vera Cruz. He immediately returned to Monterey to comply with the request of Gen. Scott, though to do so deprived him of nearly all his regulars, and the volunteer divisions of Worth and Twiggs, and the brigades of Quitman and Patterson. In the latter part of January, Taylor received information from Gen. Wool, encamped in the neighborhood of Saltillo, that rumors were again prevalent of an attack on that place by Santa Anna. Leaving 1,500 men at Monterey, Gen. Taylor, on the 31st of January, marched for Saltillo, determined, if practicable with his small force, to anticipate the attack of Santa Anna. He reached the strong mountain pass of La Angostura, three miles from Buena Vista, and after a short halt proceeded to the camp of Gen. Wool, now at Saltillo. Upon concentrating the troops, Gen. Taylor found he had an effective force of less than 5,000—all volunteers, except about 500. This handful of comparatively raw troops was confronted by Santa Anna with an army of 20,000 veterans. Frost thus describes the field of Buena Vista:

> Buena Vista is a small village or rancho, situated five miles southwest of Saltillo, on the road between that place and San Luis Potosi. The American and supply train were here stationed during the whole battle, and upon the small force left to guard it, a portion of the Mexican cavalry from their right wing charged late on the 23d. On each side of the San Luis Potosi road, precipitous mountains rose to a great height, thus forming a narrow valley very difficult for the movements of a large cavalry force. On the west side of the road, and extending to the foot of the mountains, was a labyrinth of deep and impassable gullies, which rendered all traveling on that part of the valley impossible. Three miles below Buena Vista these gullies approached so near the base of the eastern ridge of the mountains, as to narrow the valley to the width of the road, from which it received the name of the pass La Angostura, or the narrows. A small force placed at this spot would be utterly inaccessible from the west, almost equally so from the mountains of the east, and could hold the road against a direct attack from a vastly superior foe. In this strong defile was placed Washington's battery of three guns, supported by two companies of the First Illinois Volunteers. West of this pass the right wing of the American army was drawn up on the sides of the mountains, their eastern extremity stretching toward the pass. On a broad plateau or table-land formed by extensions of the eastern mountain chain was the left of the army, their east flank covered by cliffs, and their west by Washington's battery. On the extreme east, among the high mountains, were situated, on the evening of the 22d, the

*Frost's Mexican War, p 341.

American light troops, with whom and the Mexican light infantry the skirmish of that day took place.

Two months before the battle of Buena Vista, Gen. Wool, on a trip to Saltillo, pointed out this defile as the spot of all others for a small army to fight a large one. It was upon his suggestion that Gen. Taylor, on the 21st of February, fell back to the cliffs and gorges of Buena Vista, there to measure strength with the greatest general of Mexico. Gen. Taylor had an able and efficient second in Gen. Wool In his report of the battle, he thus recognized the ability of Wool as a commander and his valor as a soldier: "The high state of discipline and instruction of several of the volunteer regiments was attained under his command, and to his vigilance and arduous services before the action, and his gallantry and activity on the field, a large share of our success may justly be attributed." He intrusted the immediate command of the American army to Wool, who planned the action, and stationed the troops in their respective positions, which was somewhat as follows: On a plateau, directly east of Washington's battery, were six companies of Col. Hardin's First Illinois Regiment, flanked on the left by the Second Kentucky Infantry under Col. McKee, and the Second Illinois Infantry, covering Sherman's battery. East of these troops, on another plateau, was the Kentucky and Arkansas cavalry. North of these, on the broad table-land, Col. Davis' Mississippi riflemen were drawn up in battle array, with artillery in the center and on each flank. On the afternoon of the 22d, the enemy attacked the American light troops, stationed on the left, with considerable spirit. Gen. Wool immediately sent information to Gen. Taylor, who was at Saltillo, and ordered the troops stationed in the village of Buena Vista to be brought forward.*

Soon after the arrival of Gen. Taylor upon the field he received a summons from Santa Anna to surrender. The following is the note of the Mexican commander: "You are surrounded by 20,000 men and cannot, in any human probability, avoid suffering a rout and being cut to pieces with your troops; but as you deserve consideration and particular esteem, I wish to save you from a catastrophe, and for that purpose give you this notice, in order that you may surrender at discretion, under the assurance that you will be treated with the consideration belonging to the Mexican character, to which end you will be granted one hour's time to make up your mind, to commence from the moment when my flag of truce arrives in your camp. With this view, I assure you of my consideration." To this imperious summons Gen. Taylor responded: "In reply to your note of this date, summoning me to surrender my forces at discretion, I beg leave to say that I decline acceding to your request." *

The American commander now expected that an attack upon him would immediately begin, and preparations were made to meet it. Changes were ordered in the positions occupied by the Kentucky and Illinois troops, so as to secure the plateau east of Washington's battery, which commanded the road to Saltillo, the key to the position of the American army. Contrary to the general expectation, however, no attack was made beyond light skirmishing, and about sunset Gen. Taylor, with Col. Davis' regiment of Mississippi riflemen and a squadron of dragoons, returned to Saltillo, leaving Gen. Wool in command.

The heaviest fighting on the 22d occurred on the American left, where were stationed the First Kentucky Cavalry, under Col. Marshall, the Arkansas Cavalry, under Col. Yell, and a battalion of Indiana riflemen, all under the immediate command of Col. Marshall. Santa Anna early in the afternoon of the 22d pushed forward a large force of infantry against these troops, while at the same time he made a feint upon the American right. Gen. Wool in his official report thus describes the engagement that ensued: "At 2 o'clock, as the enemy's light infantry were moving up the side of the mountain, and in the ravines, they opened fire on our riflemen from a large howitzer posted on the road, and between 3 and 4 o'clock Col. Marshall engaged the Mexican infantry on the side of the mountain, and the firing continued on both sides at intervals until dark. In this our troops sustained no loss, while that of the enemy is known, by subsequent inspection of the ground, to be considerable." This skirmish closed the battle of February 22. To the greater part of the Americans it was their first experience in actual war. Although the night was cold, they slept on their arms, ready for a renewal of the fight in the morning. Without fires, they bivouacked on the bleak rocks, around which rose tall cliffs almost shutting out the twinkling of the stars. A highly descriptive writer speaks of their situation in the following terms: "Thick darkness gathered around the little army, the air seemed clothed with vapors, and a silence, that pained the ear more than the jarring of cannon, hung around. Now and then a solitary vulture moved heavily through the gloom, making the stillness more awful by his foreboding scream. Many a young soldier, whose heart beat high with the longings of ambition, looked up fearfully that night through the frowning shade, and turned away to dream of home and sleep his last sleep."

*Mansfield's History Mexican War.

*Gen. Taylor's Report.

Few great battles have been won under more unfavorable circumstances than that of Buena Vista. Gen. Taylor's army had been reduced to a few thousand raw troops, and a few hundred regulars, by the requisition made upon him by Gen. Scott. Deprived of the veterans who had stood by him at Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, and at Monterey, he pondered anxiously the chances against him. Says an eloquent writer* on the subject: "Santa Anna, whom he was to meet for the first time, had a world-wide fame for courage and for strategy; he was supported by Ampudia, who had already proved himself determined and crafty; by Arista, who with his magnetic physique and strong personal influence, cemented many conflicting elements in the Mexican army; by Lombardini, his second in command, whom he greatly trusted; by Pacheco and Perez; by Mora y Villamil, whose scornful dispatch to Gen. Taylor some weeks earlier stung the old soldier into an indignant reply; by Ortega, whose division was to be held like a whip with which Santa Anna would scourge the defeated Americans from the soil of Mexico; and Minon, whose cavalry should drive the fugitives back to the lash of Ortega. He had, too, Torrejon, with his brilliant lancers, the pride of the Mexican forces. It was, indeed, a fine army, officers and men treading their own soil, inspired by sentiments of patriotism and religion, while their confidence in the skill and courage of their leader, Santa Anna, gave stability to their enthusiasm. The little army awaiting them may be viewed at a glance:—the commander-in-chief, resolute to obstinacy, careless of life in the heat of action, both for himself and for his soldiers, yet tender-hearted and self-sacrificing; liable to make mistakes, yet cool, ready and invincible in his ability to escape from their effects. Wool, his second in command, an experienced soldier, brave, ambitious and sanguine; Lane, an untried brigadier-general of volunteers; besides these a few colonels, captains and lieutenants. As events proved, each of these minor officers became in turn a commander, and few generals of the line could have excelled them in bravery, skill and discretion. Capts. Bragg and Sherman, and Lieut. O'Brien, with their batteries, seemed ubiquitous during the whole contest, while Washington, with his few guns, held the left wing of the Mexican army in check from the beginning to the end of the battle. Col. May's name became a synonym for dashing bravery; Gen. Lane, wounded, but still fighting, led his heroic Indiana men on; Col. Davis displayed ability that was considered an evidence of military genius; McKee and Clay, in one of the Kentucky regiments, were graduates of West Point, and fulfilled the expectations that their training inspired; Cols. Marshall and Yell led their mounted men with great gallantry. Yell had left his seat in congress for the dangers of the field. Bissell, a former member of congress, was a man of fine attainments and excellent judgment; Hardin had stimulated the pride and interest with which Col. Churchill, inspector general, United States army, had regarded the Illinois regiments. His name had been urged at Washington for brigadier-general of volunteers, but his political antecedents prevented such an appointment. He had seen service in the Black Hawk war, and for several years was general-in-chief of the Illinois militia at a time when it was not merely a nominal position." Such was the personnel of the opposing armies on the eve of the battle of Buena Vista.

*American History, Vol. III, p. 714.

The battle was continued on the morning of the 23d—where it had closed on the previous evening—in front of Col. Marshall's position. During the night a re-enforcement of about 1,500 of the enemy had been thrown forward, and at 2 o'clock in the morning, they drove in Marshall's pickets. At dawn of day the action began in earnest. Hard pressed by the immense masses of the enemy, the intrepid riflemen, animated by their commander, received them with coolness, and poured into them the contents of their unerring rifles, which heaped the hillside with piles of the slain. At an opportune moment Marshall was re-enforced by Maj. Trail, of the Second Illinois Volunteers, with a battalion from that regiment, and with this addition to his force he continued to hold the enemy in check. Covering themselves behind rocks and ridges of the mountain the troops were secure from artillery, and met every charge of the enemy with advantage. No part of the field was more sternly contested. More than 300 Mexican dead strewed the ground in front of Marshall's position, thus showing the deadly aim of his riflemen. From daybreak until 10 o'clock they fought, in the rugged passes of the mountains, often ten times their own force, never quailing before the superior numbers assailing them. When the Second Indiana Infantry gave way, Col. Marshall was compelled to fall back to prevent being cut off from the main army. In the encounter with Torrejon's lancers at the village of Buena Vista, he fought with the same courage and with less than 400 Kentuckians and Arkansians, defeated and routed 1,500 of the enemy.

At 9 o'clock Santa Anna formed his army in three columns of attack, to overwhelm Taylor and his little band of Spartans. The first column under Gen. Mora y Villamil, composed of a number of the finest regiments in the Mexican army, was ordered to move down the road and carry the Angostura Pass. A battery of eighteen guns was placed upon the eminence above to assist in this movement. The second column comprised Lombardini's and Pacheco's heavy infantry, ordered to advance in two divisions; Lombardini's over the base of the southern hill and around the head of the front ravine to gain the plateau, while Pacheco was to push up through the ravine, and unite with Lombardini, when they were to attack in force the left of the American center. The third column, Ampudia's light infantry, was sent to the support of the force already engaged on the mountain with the Kentucky, Illinois, Arkansas and Indiana troops. The reserves, under Ortega, remained in the rear on the road.*

From Frost's history of the Mexican war, one of the best on the subject extant, is taken the remainder of the sketch of this battle. Commencing with the struggle on the American left, it is described as follows:

The position of affairs was most critical, for if the Mexicans succeeded in forcing the American position the day was theirs. There being no artillery opposed to them but O'Brien's section and another piece, it was all important for him to maintain his ground until guns could come round the ravine to join him. He determined, therefore, to hold this position until the enemy reached the muzzles of his guns. The struggle was a terrible one. Each party put forth its utmost strength, and the feelings of the soldier were wound to a pitch of enthusiasm, that made him reckless of death itself. The enemy sunk down by scores, and a body of lancers charging the Illinois troops were compelled to fall back. Still the main body rushed on, shaking the mountain passes with the trampling of their armed thousands, and shouting above the uproar of battle. The wounded and dying were crushed in their furious charge, and soon their horses were within a few yards of O'Brien's pieces. Here they received the last discharge, and as the driving hail smote their columns, a groan of anguish followed and horse and rider sank down and rolled over the rocky surface in the arms of death. It was a dreadful moment, and as the column swayed to and fro beneath the shock, and then sternly united for the headlong leap, companies that were mere spectators grew pale for the result. Although O'Brien was losing men and horses with alarming rapidity, he gave orders to again fire, when suddenly the few recruits who were fit for duty lost their presence of mind, and with all his efforts they could not be kept to the guns. After staying at his post to the last, he retired slowly and sullenly. He lost his pieces, but by his gallant stand he had kept the enemy in check long enough to save the day.

*E. H. Walworth's sketch in American History, Vol. III, p. 726.

About the same time the Second Illinois Infantry, under Col. Bissell, having become completely out-flanked, were compelled to fall back. Col. Marshall's light troops, on the extreme left, came down from the mountainous position, and joined the American main army. Masses of cavalry and infantry were now pouring through the defiles on the American left, in order to gain the rear north of the large plateau. At this moment Gen. Taylor arrived upon the field from Satillo. As the Mexican infantry turned the American flank, they came in contact with Col. Davis' Mississippi riflemen, posted on a plateau, north of the principal one. The Second Kentucky Infantry, under Col. McKee, and a section of artillery, under Capt. Bragg, had previously been ordered to this position from the right, and arrived at a most important crisis. As the masses of the enemy emerged from the defiles, to the table-land above, they opened upon the riflemen, and the battle became deeply interesting. The lancers, meanwhile, were drawing up for a charge. The artillery on each side was in an incessant blaze, and one sheet of sparkling fire flashed from the small arms of both lines. Then the cavalry came dashing down in a dense column, their dress and arms glittering in the sun, seemingly in strange contrast with the work of death. All around was clamor and hurry, drowning the shouts of command, and groans of the dying. Davis gave the order to fire; a report from hundreds of rifles rang along his line, and mangled heaps of the enemy sank to the ground. Struck with dismay, the lacerated host heaved back, while, in mad confusion, horse trod down horse, crushing wounded and dying beneath their hoofs in the reckless rushing of retreat. The day was once more saved.

At the same time Col. McKee's Kentucky regiment, supported by Bragg's artillery, had driven back the enemy's infantry, and recovered a portion of the lost ground. The latter officer then moved his pieces to the main plateau, where, in company with Capt. Sherman, he did much execution, particularly upon the masses that were in the rear. Gen. Taylor placed all the regular cavalry and Capt. Pike's squadron of horse under the orders of Lieut.-Col, May, with directions to hold in check the enemy's column, still advancing to the rear along the base of the mountain. May posted himself north of the ravine, through which the enemy were moving toward Buena Vista, in order to charge them as they approached that place. The enemy, however, still continued to advance, until almost the whole American artillery were playing upon them. At length, unable to stand the fearful slaughter, their ranks fell into confusion, some of the corps attempting to effect a retreat upon their main line of battle. To prevent this, the general ordered the first dragoons, under Lieut. Rucker, to ascend the deep ravine, which these corps were endeavoring to cross, and disperse them. The squadron, however, were unable to accomplish their object, in consequence of a heavy fire from a battery covering the enemy's retreat.

Meanwhile, a large body of lancers assembled on the extreme left of the Americans, for the purpose of charging upon Buena Vista. To support that point, Gen. Taylor ordered forward May, with two pieces of Sherman's battery. The scattered force at the hacienda were collected by Majs. Monroe and Morrison, and uniting with some of the troops of the Indiana regiment they were posted to defend the position. Before May could reach the village, the enemy had begun the attack. They were gallantly opposed by the Kentucky and Arkansas cavalry, under Cols. Marshall and Yell. The shock was a heavy one. Col. Yell fell at the head of his column, and the Kentuckians lost Adjt. Vaughn, a young officer of much promise. The enemy's column was separated into two portions, one sweeping by the American depot under a destructive fire from the Indiana troops, until they gained the mountains opposite, the other portion regaining the base of the mountain to the west. Lieut.-Col. May now reached Buena Vista, and approaching the base of the mountain, held in check the enemy's right flank, upon whose masses, crowded in the narrow gorges, and ravines, the artillery was doing fearful execution. The position of that portion of the Mexican army which had gained the American rear, was now so critical as to induce the belief that it would be forced to surrender. At the moment, however, when the artillery was thinning its ranks and May, after much maneuvering, was about charging their flank, a white flag was observed approaching the American head-quarters, and Gen. Taylor ordered the firing to cease. The message was simply a demand from Santa Anna, requesting to know what the American general wanted. Gen. Wool was sent to have a personal interview with the Mexican general, but on reaching his lines was unable to stop his further advance, and returned to head-quarters. The object of the Mexicans had, however, been accomplished—their extreme right moving along the base of the mountains, and joining the main army.

The roar of artillery, which had lasted from before sunrise, now partially ceased on the principal field, the enemy apparently confining his efforts to the protection of his artillery. Gen. Taylor had just left the main depot, when he was unexpectedly recalled by a heavy fire of musketry. On regaining his position, a stirring scene was presented. The Illinois troops and the Second Kentucky Infantry, had been attacked in a rugged defile by an overwhelming force of both cavalry and infantry, and were now struggling alone against fearful odds. Could the enemy succeed in defeating these troops, they might renew the main attack with great advantage, and perhaps gain the day. To prevent the catastrophe, Capt. Bragg, who had just arrived from the left, was immediately ordered into battery. Feeling how important was every moment, that brave officer abandoned some of his heaviest carriages, and pushed forward with those that could move most rapidly. Gaining a point from which they could be used, he placed them in battery, and loaded with canister. His position was one of imminent peril. The supporting infantry had been routed by the superior numbers hurled against it, the advanced artillery captured, and the enemy, flushed with victory, were throwing their masses toward him. He appealed to the commanding-general for help—none was to be had. Nerving himself for his terrible duties, he returned to the battery, and spoke a few low, hurried words to his men. Silently, but firmly, they gathered around their pieces, and awaited orders. The commanding-general sat on horseback, gazing with thrilling intensity upon that handful of troops. After all the losses and triumphs of the day, victory had eluded their grasp to hang upon the approaching struggle. The cavalry were almost near enough to spring upon his guns, when Bragg gave the order to fire. Suddenly they halted, staggered a few paces, and then closed for the charge. The shouts of their supporting infantry followed the roar of artillery, and they again advanced. The cannoneers had marked the effect with feelings too intense to admit of outward expression, and rapidly reloading, they again poured forth a shower of grape. The effect was fearful; and Gen. Taylor, as he beheld the bleeding columns, felt that the day was his own. A third discharge completed the rout. Discipline gave way among the enemy to the confused flight of terrified hosts, as, pouring through the rugged passes, they trod each other down in their hurried course. One wild shout went up from the American army, broken at short intervals by the thunder of Bragg's artillery.

This final repulse was not accomplished without a melancholy loss. It fell heaviest on the Kentuckians, of whom Cols. McKee and Clay, of the Second Infantry, were both killed. The former fell amid some rocks, pierced with a mortal wound, and was subsequently hacked and mutilated by the enemy's bayonets. Lieut.-Col. Clay was wounded in the leg, and sat down near a rock. But his sorrowing followers rushed from their ranks, amid the enemy's fire, and bore him in their arms. Although the Mexians pressed closely behind, the soldiers carried him until the road became so rugged, that two could scarcely walk together. He then begged them to leave him and take care of themselves, which they were at length compelled to do; two brave fellows remaining with him, and sharing his fate. The Mexicans surrounded them, and as Clay defended himself with his sword, was stabbed to death with bayonets. The brave Col. Hardin, the pride of the Illinois troops, was killed in the same charge with McKee and Clay.

In the retreat of the enemy, a portion of the American infantry pursued them through a ravine so far, that they got out of supporting distance. On seeing this, the Mexicans suddenly wheeled round and attacked them. The infantry were in their turn driven back, taking the course of another ravine, at the end of which a body of the enemy were waiting to intercept them. Fortunately, while the cavalry were pursuing, they came within range of Washington's battery, which opening upon them with grape, drove back their column in confusion, and saved the exhausted fugitives.

This was the last struggle on the well-fought field of Buena Vista. For ten hours the battle had raged with unmitigated fury, and yet, strange to say, each army occupied the ground that it had early in the morning. As night crept among the rocky gorges, the wearied soldiers sank down on their arms upon the field. Although the air was very cold, the American army slept without fires, expecting a renewal of the attack early on the following morning. The night was one of horror. On every rock and in every defile, piles of dead and wounded lay, the latter writhing in torture, their wounds stiff and clotted with the chill air, while their piercing shrieks for aid, and supplications for water, made the night hideous. The whole medical staff were busy until morning, dressing wounds, amputating limbs, and removing the dead to Saltillo. The wolves and jackals stole from the caverns of the mountains, and howled in startling chorus over the banquet prepared for them by man.

The forces engaged in the battle of Buena Vista, according to the official reports, were, to be exact, on the American side, 4,760 men, of whom 344 were officers. The entire regular force was two squadrons of cavalry, and three batteries of light artillery—in all about 450 men. Mexican force, as stated by Santa Anna himself, was 20,000. The Americans lost 267 killed, 456 wounded, and 23 missing. Santa Anna admitted a loss of 1,500, which doubtless was far below the actual number. More than 500 of his dead were left upon the field unburied. A writer, speaking of the loss sustained in the battle by the Americans, said: "The list of the killed and wounded on the American side, is a mournful proof of the ferocity and violence which characterized this severe conflict, and a sad testimonial of the chivalry and fearlessness of the American soldiery. Sixty-five commissioned officers killed and wounded in so small an army exhibits a proportion and result unparalleled in the history of war."

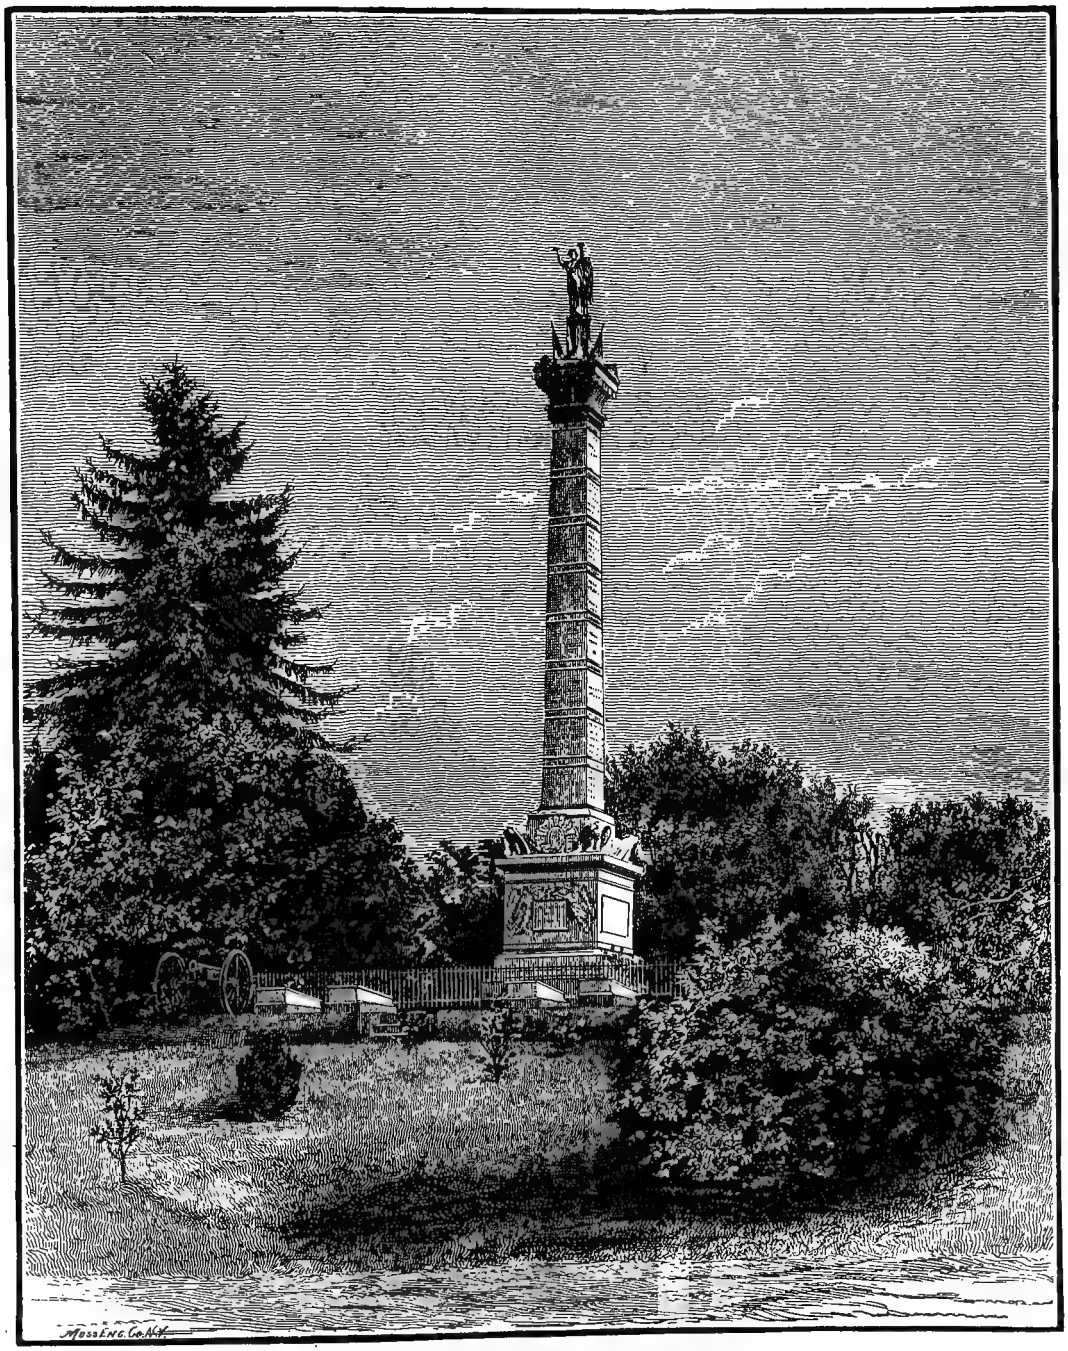
Considerable space has been devoted to the battle of Buena Vista. This is deemed appropriate, and but a simple act of justice to the large number of Kentucky soldiers who participated in it. No troops bore a more prominent and important part in the stubbornly contested struggle, than the First Kentucky Cavalry, and the Second Kentucky Infantry. The first left its brave young adjutant dead on the field, and the latter its first and second officers in command, while the rank and file were piled in slaughtered heaps. The charge in which McKee and Clay fell was the saddest event in results of the battle-fatigued day, and their death was a melancholy blow to their comrades, and a serious loss to their State. Of Col. Marshall's cavalry, Gen. Taylor, in his official report of the battle, said: "The Kentucky cavalry, under Col. Marshall, rendered good service, dismounted, acting as light troops on our left, and afterward, with a portion of the Arkansas regiment, in meeting and dispersing the column of Mexicans at Buena Vista village." Of the same regiment, Gen. Wool in his report said: "Col. Marshall rendered gallant and important service both as commander of the riflemen in the mountain, where he and his men were very effective, and as the commander of his own regiment, in connection with those of the Arkansas regiment, under Col. Yell, after the latter's death under Lieut.-Col. Roane, in their operations against the enemy's lancers." But Kentucky troops need no argument to prove their valor—it has been tested upon too many bloody fields. In Marshall's regiment (330 strong) 27 were killed, and 34 wounded; in Mc Kee's regiment (571 strong) 44 were killed, 57 wounded. This sad record tells the story of their part in the battle.

While the battle of Buena Vista was raging a portion of the Louisville Legion and a portion of Col. Morgan's Second Ohio Infantry was fighting Gen. Urrea at Mier, twenty-five miles from Monterey. The Mexican general had attempted to cut off and destroy a heavy wagon train belonging to the army at Buena Vista, and the Kentucky and Ohio troops had been ordered to its rescue. The Mexicans succeeded in capturing and burning 300 wagons, but the re-enforcements arrived in time to save the balance of the train.

After the battle of Buena Vista, the Kentucky troops took no active part in the Mexican war, except the company of Capt. Williams, which was attached to the Sixth United States Infantry. It participated in the battle of Cerro Gordo, and for its gallant conduct and that of its commander, won the highest praise. He attained and still bears the sobriquet of "old Cerro Gordo" Williams. The term of service of the first regiments expired some time after the battle of Buena Vista, while those recruited under the last call for troops did not arrive in Mexico until the hard fighting was over. Hence the remainder of the war has but little interest in the history of Kentucky. The city of Mexico fell in September, 1847, but the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was not consummated until February 2, 1848, and peace reigned once more between the two countries.



On their return home the soldiers were received with every mark of affection, and tendered, as they well deserved, the enthusiastic welcome of the people. Public dinners, old-fashioned barbecues, flattering eulogiums and patriotic speeches were profusely showered upon them; the press vied with the orators of the period in praises of the heroic deeds of our volunteer soldiery. But the joy of the returned warriors was marred by the absence of many of their comrades who came not back; whose bones they had left to molder into dust on the banks of the Rio Grande, at Monterey, in the gorges of Buena Vista, on the heights of Cerro Gordo, and around the walls of the City of Mexico. Most of the Kentucky dead, however, were afterward brought home for interment, especially those who fell at Buena Vista, under an act of the legislature. In the summer of 1847, they were buried in the State Cemetery at Fankfort, with the honors of war. Included in the proceedings, was the recitation of a poem written especially for the occasion by Theodore O'Hara, and which has since immortalized his name. The first stanza of this poem (which is entitled "The Bivouac of the Dead") is familiar to thousands of people throughout the country, who do not know its origin or author. It is as follows:

The muffled drum's sad roll has beat
The soldier's last tattoo;
No more on life's parade shall meet
The brave and daring few.
On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

A magnificent monument—one of the handsomest soldiers' monuments in the United States—has been erected to their memory and that of other Kentucky heroes, by the State in the public cemetery. Upon the four sides of the stately column are inscribed the names and battles of the heroic dead, whose graves are grouped around its base. The monument stands upon one of the loveliest spots in the cemetery (a high bluff) and overlooks the beautiful river which bears the name of the State. It is a loving tribute to heroic worth.

SOLDIER'S MONUMENT, FRANKFORT.

CHAPTER XV.

FIRST PHASES OF THE CIVIL WAR IN KENTUCKY.

THE "cause" which led to the war of the rebellion has been so elaborately discussed by its friends and opponents as to embalm it in the minds of the whole people. However fallacious may have been the arguments used by the prime movers to bring about the secession of those States which declared themselves free and independent prior to the inauguration of President Lincoln, they proved effective in producing that result. Thenceforth the "cause" was the cause of State sovereignty, and those who favored as well as those who opposed secession as a means for redressing grievances, were united in the attempt to form a confederacy in order that they might the more effectually resist coercion.

Thus the primal evil, slavery, depending upon the principle of State sovereignty and the right of secession, was followed by the organization of the Confederacy, and when, in resistance to the proclamation of the president of the United States commanding them to return to their allegiance, they defied his authority, the "cause" assumed the name and character of a war for independence.

It is worse than folly to ridicule the uprising of a great people to assert their independence, and, if need be, to die in the defense of their homes and firesides. Hallowed in the memories of thousands of hearts by the blood of loved ones sacrificed upon its altar, the "lost cause" is to-day, after the lapse of many years, loved as fondly and enshrined as truly as when its brave and devoted adherents bore its tattered banner through four years of carnage, furling it at last amid the desolation of ruined homes and fair fields laid waste, and embalming it in the tears of a proud though prostrate people.

It is the purpose of the pages which follow to confine the narrative strictly to the relation of events in the order in which they occurred, relying for their accuracy upon contemporaneous records now on file in the war department at Washington. The history of these events cannot be written without bringing into prominence the courage and fidelity of Kentuckians, whose graves billow nearly every battle-field from the Mississippi to the sea; but the object will be to allow their glorious record to speak for itself, confident that the highest praise that can be awarded them will be a faithful chronicle of their heroic achievements. While many will doubtless regret that the lives of the Kentuckians sacrificed in the cause of the Confederacy were not given to the Union, and that the Breckinridges, Marshalls, Johnstons, Clays, Williamses and Buckners, names illustrious in the annals of the State and nation, did not present themselves, a living wall, against the tide of secession, which beat against but never submerged Kentucky, still, in the picture, as it presents itself, they will recognize the well known features of Nelson, Crittenden, Jackson, Harlan, Watkins, Rousseau, Whitaker, Price, Croxton, Kelly and a host of others, who stood in solid phalanx, breasting the assault until the State took its place in line in favor of the Union; while outlined against the sky, at the head of the nation, struggling to establish its authority over a re-united country, is the loved and honored form of that other Kentuckian, Abraham Lincoln.

Fondness for military distinction has always been a characteristic of the American people. Service in her armies at all periods having been voluntarily performed, the uniform of the soldier had come to be regarded as the insignia of heroism, rather than the badge of servitude. The national flag had waved over many a hotly contested field, but had always pointed to ultimate victory, and wars had been sufficiently frequent to secure to the survivors of one, promotion in the one succeeding, and to preserve the traditions of military prowess fresh in the memory of a brave and grateful populace. The commander-in-chief of the United States army was himself the hero of two wars, and many of his comrades in arms were still living, the honored patriarchs of cities and towns that had succeeded the savage wilderness in which many of their deeds of prowess had been performed.

The period which followed the war with Mexico had witnessed the organization of military companies in all parts of the country, fostered by the State, and commanded by the veterans of Buena Vista, Cerro Gordo and Chapultepec which, in point of discipline, drill and martial bearing, were the pride and glory of the people at large. To these organizations the thoughts of the people of both sections now naturally turned, and their confidence was not misplaced, for many a regiment, which gained distinction in either army for efficiency upon the field and good conduct in the camp, owes its success to the faithful drilling it received at the hands of the officers furnished by the militia of the States. Every State was provided with a staff department, appointed by the governor, and an arsenal of military stores.

Notwithstanding the fact that John C. Breckinridge was the favorite son of Kentucky, a member of one of its prominent and influential families, and a man of most winning address and persuasive eloquence, the official record of the votes polled in his native State, when he was a candidate for the presidency, shows that the people had already begun to distrust the wing of the party of which he was the especial champion. The vote stood:

For Bell	65,913
For Douglas	25,442
For Breckinridge	52,936
For Lincoln	1,366
Total	145,657

—a majority of nearly two to one against him. The proclamation of President Lincoln, calling for 75,000 men to suppress the rebellion, had the effect to determine the political bias of every thinking mind in the United States, except in Kentucky. Yet the facts were unmistakable that a rebellion had been inaugurated by the secession of six States; that the flag at Fort Sumter had been fired upon; and that the president of the United States had determined to restore the supremacy of the national government over all the territory of the United States. In response to the call upon the State for its quota of troops, on the 15th of April, 1861, Gov. Magoffin said: "Kentucky will furnish no troops for the wicked purpose of subduing her sister Southern States." This action of the governor was endorsed at an immense meeting held on the 20th, at Louisville, where speeches were made by the Hon. James Guthrie, Hon. Archie Dixon, Hon. John Young Brown, Judge Bullock and Judge Nicholas, and a resolution was unanimously adopted encouraging him to resist the general government. On the 24th, Gov. Magoffin issued a proclamation calling on the State to place herself in a condition of defense, and convening the legislature on the 6th of May following, "to take such action as may be necessary for the general welfare."

A period of intense anxiety intervened between the date of the proclamation of the governor, convening the legislature, and its meeting on the 6th of May. Public meetings were held at Lexington and other places, at which members of the legislature were instructed as to the wishes of their constituents, while the question of union or secession became the all absorbing topic of conversation at every fireside. The position as idle spectators of a conflict in which each had an interest, a position they were compelled to occupy by the action of the apostles of peace, was exceedingly distasteful to the youth of the State, whose martial tastes were inherited from a bold, spirited ancestry. They were the descendants of the pioneers whose inflexible courage in wresting Kentucky from the grasp of the savages had been displayed in deeds of daring, fresh in the memories of men still living. Their sires had borne an honorable part in all the struggles in which their country had engaged, and to be kept at home like women, while their neighbors in other States were winning fame at the cannon's mouth, was a position which they regarded as pusillanimous and unworthy of a Kentuckian.

Fearing that their native State might succeed in maintaining its neutrality, large numbers of young men about this time, instigated by the leaders of the secession movement, left the State under command of Thomas Taylor and Blanton Duncan, and offered their services to the Confederate States. They were, for the most part, sons of slaveholders, whose interest in the institution of slavery prompted in their minds a profound distrust of the party at the north, whose chief design they believed to be to subdue the Southern States, hold them as conquered provinces, and liberate the slaves. In wealth, courtesy of manner, and social standing, they were the peers of any in the land, while in intellectual endowments they ranged from the alumni of Yale and Harvard down to the youngster, whose most noteworthy accomplishments were to read and write and ride a horse. They had many of the attributes of knight-errantry. Brave, even to recklessness, faithful to the cause they espoused, and true to their leaders, they followed the fortunes of the Confederacy, from the opening gun at Fort Donelson to the surrender of Johnston's army, with a steadfastness of purpose never excelled.

Viewed from the standpoint of unconditional loyalty to the national government, it appears incredible that intelligent men should have held, the opinion and openly proclaimed it, that a single State could be able to hold 700 miles of border, lying between two immense contending forces, sacred from the tread of hostile feet. Yet facts warrant the belief that some regarded the position tenable. Encouraged by the attitude assumed alike by friends of the Union and of the Confederacy, united upon a platform of neutrality in the approaching struggle, Gov. Magoffin, on the 20th of May, issued a proclamation forbidding any movement of troops upon Kentucky soil, or the occupation of any part or place therein for any purpose whatever. The Kentucky senate indorsed the position, taken by the governor on the 24th, by resolving that "the State will not sever her connection with the general government, nor take up arms for either belligerent party, but will arm herself for the protection of peace within her borders, and tender her services as a mediator to effect a just and honorable peace." But the advocates of neutrality at the capital "builded wiser than they knew." Time was gained by the Union men to place themselves in a position of defense against any forcible means that might be adopted by the governor and his secession advisers to consummate their designs.

The latter, headed by John C. Breckinridge and other prominent men, were untiring in their efforts to induce the legislature to inaugurate the measures which had proved effectual in other States, confident that if the question could be brought for decision at the polls, the State militia, under command of Gen. S. B. Buckner, would secure favorable action. Meanwhile the people of eastern Kentucky, unlike the masses in the Gulf States, accustomed to think and act for themselves, had ignored the neutral position adopted by the politicians, and had taken sides either with the Union or the Confederacy, and an overwhelming majority were unconditionally in favor of the national government. The eyes of these people had turned with grave apprehension to the position of their neighbors in east Tennessee, whose steadfast loyalty no threats had been able to shake, and, profiting by the experience of that State, determined that Kentucky should not be bound hand and foot before she had had an opportunity to assert herself at the polls.

On the 27th a border State convention, composed of leading men from Kentucky and Missouri, met at Frankfort, Ky., and on the 8th of June issued two addresses: one to the people of the United States, and the other to the people of Kentucky. In the address first mentioned the convention said: "The obligation exists to maintain the constitution of the United States, and to preserve the Union unimpaired," and suggested that something ought to be done to "quiet apprehension in the slave States that already adhere to the Union." The address was signed by Hon. J. J. Crittenden, president, and James Guthrie, R. K. Williams, Archibald Dixon, F. M. Bristow, Joshua F. Bell, C. A. Wickliffe, G. W. Dunlap, J. F. Robinson, John B. Huston, and Robert Richardson, of Kentucky; H. R. Gamble, W. A. Hall, J. B. Henderson and W. G. Pomeroy, of Missouri; and John Caldwell, of Tennessee.

The Kentucky members then united in an address to the people of their own State. After endorsing the action of the governor and the legislature, and denying that the position of neutrality resulted from timidity, for proof of which they appealed to history, the delegates say: "It is a proud and grand thing for Kentucky to say, as she can truthfully in the face of the world—'we had no hand in this thing, our skirts are clear,' and asks: 'Is this not an attitude worthy of a great people, and do not her position and safety require her to maintain it?'" But the people were fast deciding the question otherwise. Families were divided in sentiment, fathers against sons, brothers against brothers, and ties of friendship, which had existed for a life-time, were powerless to restrain the demon of discord that reigned supreme. Self constituted recruiting officers for each side hoisted the banner of their choice, often in the same town, and the strange and unnatural spectacle was presented of brothers enlisting under opposing flags. In fact, there is scarcely a family of prominence in the State that did not contribute soldiers to both armies. It has been well said that "the outposts of an army mark the lines where the sphere of party politics ends." The time for action had come; the people had chosen sides.

The anomalous position of the neutrality party in Kentucky, in 1861, has made it the subject of much unfavorable comment. As a party it never had an existence. The discordant elements that composed it in April and May had produced disintegration in June. Its waxen wings, union and secession, had melted beneath the penetrating sunlight of a heated political contest for control of the legislature, and, while both thereafter used it as a shield, neither had any confidence in the ability of the State to maintain her neutrality by force of arms. The Union portion again divided after the election—which resulted in seating a majority of Union men in the legislature—into active and passive Union men. The former were willing to make any sacrifice to support the national government in the struggle for life, while the latter, preferring the Union to the Confederacy were still anxious to preserve the State from the horrors of civil war. Chief among the former were Hon. Garrett Davis, Dr. Robert J. Breckinridge, Lieut. William Nelson, James S. Jackson, S. G. Burbridge, Hon. John W. Finnell, Thomas L. Crittenden, Joshua F. Speed, Hon. Joseph Holt, Judge Goodloe, Hon. C. C. Burton, W. T. Ward, J. T. Boyle, Alfred Allen, John B. Bruner, John M. Harlan, James Speed, and many others.

Hon. John J. Crittenden, a life long Whig, the cherished friend of Henry Clay, was the acknowledged leader of the peace party. As a man he was loved and honored, and as a statesman he was held in reverence by the people of his State and nation. During a long public career his voice had never sounded an uncertain note when the honor of his country had been involved. Untainted by the political atmosphere of the capitol at Washington, he had preserved his integrity and led a blameless life in the midst of a conspiracy that impatiently bided its time to accomplish its ends. The siren songs of the secessionists, that had ensnared many weaker men from the border States, had no charms for this incorruptible patriot; the dogma of "State rights," which precipitated ten States into rebellion against the authority of the national government, formed no part of his political creed. He loved the Union as only a great-hearted statesman can love his country, recognizing no section as paramount in his affections, and from the first approach of the night of rebellion, which now enveloped the South, his influence had been exerted toward conciliating the men whom he still regarded as his misguided brethren. Animated solely by the lofty purpose of reuniting the North and South, Mr. Crittenden and his coworkers hoped and believed that a general war could be avoided. That they continued to believe so long after the fact was patent to every one else that the war had actually begun must be attributed to the inflexibility of purpose that had always been a characteristic of the courageous leader. The war was deemed so causeless, so wicked, and without the shadow of provocation, that the masses that followed Mr. Crittenden believed, with him, that something might be done to avert the horrible calamities that all felt must follow a general war; but there was a time when these men hesitated as to the duty of Kentucky and her purpose, when the time for action should come, if come it must. The following extract from a recent letter, written by Gen. John. W. Finnell to the author, conveys an intelligent idea of the estimation in which the followers of Mr. Crittenden are still held:

The love for the Union, which filled the hearts of the old Whig or Union and Douglas democrats of Kentucky, was unspeakably ardent and earnest, and at no period was it more intense and abiding than at this time. The position of the Union men in Kentucky was exceptional, the entire military organization of the State was under the control of the rebel interest; and with the exception of 5,000 muskets, furnished by the government, they were without arms, and totally without organization.

They were strangers to war. While their faith in the good sense and patriotism of the great mass of the people had been realized at the polls, the conviction that the war was a struggle for the existence of the nation came upon them but slowly. Besides, it very soon became manifest that, to a vast number of Union men, it meant the sacrifice of nearly every tie of interest and consanguinity. Neutrality, therefore, was an expedient, and deemed of value, in the hope—in the poetic and fervid imagination of that day—that there, "on the bosom of the first born of the Union, unstained by fratricidal blood, the altar might be built upon which the mad passions of both sections might be burned to ashes;" and it is altogether possible that less imaginative patriots regarded it as an exceedingly proper thing, until they could obtain another supply of "Lincoln guns."

There never was in all history a more heroic spirit of self-sacrifice than that which animated the Union people of Kentucky in that struggle, from the attack upon Fort Sumter to the surrender of Fort Donelson. There never was a wiser statesmanship or more masterly diplomacy than was displayed by the Union leaders during the long season of doubt in the summer of 1861. Nothing was clearer, even then, than that, if the war became general, national success meant the sacrifice of an immense property interest; that the position of the State with the national government involved the sacrifice of friends, the separation of families, possibly to the Union people a surrender of their homes, the work of a lifetime of care and labor, and with that, expatriation from the land they dearly loved.

Stigmatized as Abolitionists and Submissionists, and with every epithet made hateful by their education, history and traditions, the Union men worked steadily on, until by their wisdom and courage they were able at last to encircle the commonwealth within the arms of her loyal people, and thus save her to the nation.

Another formidable class of people, by reason of their wealth and influence, was composed of citizens who, while they had no intention of taking up arms for the secession of the State or for the Southern Confederacy, sympathized with the cause for which the South had rebelled, and were styled Southern-rights people. This class comprised a large portion of the slaveholders in central Kentucky, and became more numerous toward the southwest, until in that portion of the State bordering upon Tennessee, and lying between the Tennessee and Mississippi Rivers, known as the "Purchase," almost the entire population were in full sympathy with the rebellion. To this class either government was acceptable, provided their right to hold slaves was guaranteed. The establishment of a southern confederacy, based upon this right, had at first presented the attractive feature of permanent protection to this species of property. The conciliatory measures adopted by State and national legislative assemblies toward the South, followed by the spontaneous uprising of the northern people in response to the call of the president, without regard to the former political alliances, convinced many that, in the event of a general war, self-interest pointed to a passive resistance to the appeals of either party to the contest.

A proclamation of emancipation at that time would have precipitated Kentucky into secession, with no power in the hands of the Union men to avert it. But thus far, the slavery question had been ignored in the measures adopted by Mr. Lincoln for the suppression of the rebellion, and the belief that the ultimate triumph of the national government would leave slavery untouched, at least in those States that had not taken up arms against the government, prompted many slaveholders to remain neutral, and even to discourage enlistments in the Confederate army, while they cordially sympathized with the cause for which the Southern States contended.

This belief, however, was by no means general. The prophetic soul of Mr. Yancey and other southern orators, who from time to time visited Kentucky, aided by native secessionists, scouted the idea that the Republican party of the North, having elected a president by an overwhelming majority, would accept half-way measures in dealing with slavery, if they should in the end find themselves in position to dictate terms of peace to a vanquished enemy. The advocates of secession, appealing to the chivalric impulses of their hearers, urged upon them their duty to stand by their "southern brethren who were engaged in battling for rights that were as dear to Kentuckians as to themselves," and asked if they were indeed degenerated sons of the brave pioneers who had shouldered their trusty rifles and marched through the pathless wilderness northward to the great lakes to avenge the atrocities of the Indians commited upon the infant settlements in Ohio.

It will thus be seen that the people in this portion of the State were divided into discordant factions. The masses, distracted by alternate hopes and fears, doubtful as to their duty, were subjected by the constant harangues of some who pleaded with them to stand by the national government at all hazards, and of others to join the fortunes of the young Confederacy, in whose cause they had an equal interest. They were urged by the secession wing of the neutrality party to maintain an attitude of armed resistance to national authority, but to remain in the Union wing of the same party, to remain true to the Union and to the government, but to abstain from any act that would invite invasion of the State from either side.

It now became the fixed purpose of the general government to protect the loyal citizens of Kentucky and Tennessee in their constitutional rights, and to this end, on the 27th of June, an order was issued at the war department forming the States of Kentucky and Tennessee into a military district, under command of Brig-Gen. Robert Anderson, who was directed to send an officer to east Tennessee to muster into the service of the United States 10,000 men. Arms and accoutrements and an ample supply of ammunition were ordered to Cincinnati, for the use of that number of men; and to transport their equipments to their destination, he was authorized to muster into the service of the United States four regiments in southeast Kentucky. The officer designated for this duty was Lieut. William Nelson, of the United States navy.

After conference with prominent national Union men in the adjoining counties, Nelson determined to locate his camp of instruction in Garrard County, on the farm of Mr. Dick Robinson (a firm adherent to the government), at the junction of the Danville turnpike, with the pike leading from Nicholasville to Crab Orchard, in the direction of Cumberland Gap. A rich and fertile country under a high state of cultivation surrounded the camp. A fair proportion of the inhabitants were friendly to the enterprise, many of whom were ardent supporters of the national government. Nicholasville, eight miles distant, was the southern terminus of the Kentucky Central Railroad, connecting it with Cincinnati, while only twelve miles farther north, on the line of the same road, is the city of Lexington, located in the center of that beautiful portion of Kentucky known as "the Blue Grass Region."

From Lexington, two railroads were in operation—the one to Louisville and the other to Cincinnati—while broad turnpike roads led by various routes to the Ohio River. With these separate routes for the transportation of supplies, communication with the base at Cincinnati was regarded as secure. In case the railroad bridges should be burned by the secessionists, the turnpikes to Maysville and other points afforded access to the north. Between the camp and Nicholasville is the Kentucky River, the precipitous banks and deep gorges of which afforded many good positions for successful resistance in case an attack from a superior force, advancing from the southeast, made it necessary for the recruits to fall back before they were sufficiently well organized to protect themselves in the open country.

Lieut. William Nelson, United States navy, the officer chosen to perform the delicate and difficult task of establishing a camp and organizing a brigade of Union soldiers on Kentucky soil in opposition to the judgment of avowed Union men, was a man eminently fitted for the undertaking. The times were turbulent; murder, unwhipt of justice, stalked through the land. The State guard, 10,000 strong, under the leadership of Gen. Simon Bolivar Buckner, was under a high state of discipline, thoroughly equipped and ably commanded. Many of the companies comprised in the organization would have responded to the call of the commander to disperse the newly organized camp, and this order doubtless would have been issued if troops from the northern States had joined the camp.

By virtue of authority vested in him by the war department, Nelson issued commissions, bearing date July 15, 1861, to William J. Landrum, of Lancaster, Ky., to raise a cavalry regiment, and to Theophilus T. Garrard, Thomas E. Bramlette and Speed S. Fry to raise three regiments of infantry. Messrs. W. A. Hoskins, G. C. Kniffin and George L. Dobbins were subsequently commissioned as staff officers.

Soon after the preliminary meeting at Lancaster, where the above-named gentlemen were empowered to raise regiments for the United States service, Nelson returned to Cincinnati to make arrangements for supplies for his camp, and active preparations for recruiting were immediately begun by the officers named, and the subordinates selected by them to assist in their work.

Not long after the work was commenced, an effort was made, upon the part of several prominent politicians in different parts of the State, to postpone the whole movement upon the ground of its inexpediency, in view of the fact that it might be construed as a menace by the States then in rebellion, and precipitate an invasion of Kentucky by the forces then known to be assembled near the State line in Tennessee. Col. Landrum was notified that, at a meeting of those having authority to act in the matter, it was agreed to postpone the organization of the troops, and he was requested to notify the other officers accordingly. Lieut. Nelson was notified promptly of this movement, and in a letter dated Cincinnati, Ohio, July 28, 1861, he wrote Col. Landrum as follows: "the expedition is neither postponed nor abandoned. So far from suspending operations, I earnestly desire that they may be urged on with the utmost energy. If the idea of postponement or abandonment has been spread among your people, that idea must be corrected. I shall assemble the brigade and muster it into service as soon as possible."

Immediately on receipt of this letter, Col. Landrum communicated its contents to the other officers, the work of recruiting was resumed, and on the day after the August election the troops began to arrive at camp Dick Robinson. Bramlette, Fry and Garrard were on hand to take command of their respective regiments; while Landrum, preferring the infantry to the cavalry, concluded to turn his regiment over to Lieut.-Col. Wolford, and to raise an infantry regiment at Harrodsburg, Ky., in the meantime acting as adjutant-general for Gen. Nelson for several weeks after his arrival.

The officers named, with the assistance of recruiting officers throughout the country in which the camp was located, prosecuted the business intrusted to them with such energy and success that by the middle of August the required number to fill each regiment were in camp ready for muster into the service. The difficulty in obtaining clothing and camp and garrison equipage now began. The equipment of the immense armies of the United States, now numbering 500,000 men, had caused such demands upon the manufacturing establishments of the country, that it was impossible to fill the oft-repeated requisitions made by Nelson upon the quartermaster's department. In the absence of tents, the recruits were assigned quarters under the wide-spreading branches of a grove of maples, where exposure to the elements rendered it necessary to erect a hospital at an early date. The light clothing they had worn to camp in the expectation of exchanging it for the blue uniform of the army soon succumbed to the wear and tear of camp life, and flags of truce were displayed by many a doughty warrior, who would have been the last to exhibit it if confronted by the enemy.

Recruiting in the country southward and eastward from the camp was comparatively easy. The country is mountainous, and the inhabitants were on equal terms with reference to wealth and social standing. There were few slaveholders, and the people, accustomed to independence of thought, word, and deed, had exercised the right to form their own conclusions upon the question of secession. The latent loyalty existing in the breast of every true American, being untrammeled by interest in the institution of slavery, or by the influence of secession orators, who early found themselves confronted by Union men possessing greater power with the people, asserted itself. Ready to engage in an enterprise that promised relief to their loyal neighbors accross the Tennessee border, whose persecution by the State authorities at this time had awakened a thrill of indignation throughout the country, they enrolled their names under the banner of their country. Owing to this fact, it came about that the regiments of Wolford, Garrard and Bramlette were recruited largely from the counties adjacent to the northern line of Tennessee.

The traditional courage of the mountaineers of all countries was exhibited by these splendid regiments in their subsequent career. They participated in nearly all the battles fought by the armies of the Cumberland and the Tennessee, and whether with Rosecrans at Stone River and Chickamauga, with Grant at Black River Bridge and Vicksburg, or with Sherman through 100 days of battle to the capture of Atlanta, they were everywhere complimented for courage and endurance.

In Kentucky, the act of the legislature which united the military companies of the State, many of which had been for years under a high state of drill and military discipline, into a homogeneous whole, became a law in March, 1860, by the approval of the governor. The act was drafted by Samuel Bolivar Buckner, a graduate of West Point, whose military tastes and education eminently qualified him to become the leader of the organization. By the provisions of the act, the citizens of the State, capable of bearing arms, were divided into three classes, entitled, respectively, "The Militia of Reserve," "The Enrolled Militia," and "The Active or Volunteer Militia." The first named embraced all white male persons under eighteen and over forty-five; the second, all able-bodied white men between those ages; and "The Volunteer Militia or State Guard," were organized into companies, battalions, brigades, divisions, and army corps, with uniforms and equipments complete. The organization soon embraced all the independent military companies of the State, regardless of the political opinions of the members. The time had not yet come for any interference with the choice of the companies as to their commanders, and, in some instances, the opening of hostilities found some of the most efficient companies commanded by strong Union men. In Lexington there were three companies, commanded respectively by Capts. S. W. Price, Sanders Bruce and John H. Morgan. The two former became colonels in the Union army, while the latter became renowned as a commander of a division of southern cavalry.

Gen. Buckner, as inspector-general, had power to disband all such companies as failed to conform to his view of military propriety, thus concentrating in him a power of subordinating all officers to his will. Thomas L. Crittenden, a gallant officer in the Mexican war and son of Hon. John J. Crittenden, was elected brigadier-general.

Another military organization, though less imposing in its form, was destined to wield a powerful influence in shaping the destiny of Kentucky in the impending struggle. This was "The Home Guard." Loosely organized military companies sprang into existence in nearly every neighborhood and in many of the large towns. The imminence of revolution induced the city authorities of Louisville to take the initiative in the matter, and an ordinance was passed by the city council, approved by Mayor Delph, based upon a vague provision of the city charter, which authorized the organization of the First Home Guard Battalion, in May, 1861. Lovell H. Rousseau was first appointed brigadier-general, but preferring service in the United States army, he was succeeded by James Speed. The ordinance provided for two regiments, with the necessary compliment of field and staff officers. The regiments soon filled to their maximum strength. The Marion Rifles, a company in the State Guard, joined the Home Guard, and the brigade held the field against all comers.

There was an element of weakness in the State Guard that the Home Guard was not called upon to encounter. In the former there was no settled principal of action. Its ranks were filled with men embracing conflicting opinions upon union and secession. The Home Guard was a unit in favor of the Union, and in its readiness to fight for it. In addition to this, Gen. Buckner had found difficulty in supplying his men with arms. Dr. Blackburn, since governor of the State, purchased a quantity in the south, but they proved to be worthless, and notwithstanding his assertion that, "they were good enough for neutrals," the men refused to receive them. Gen. Speed was supplied by Lieut. Nelson, and the array of bayonets on the streets of Louisville, borne by a brigade of men, whose pluck and willingness to use them was well known, had an exceedingly quieting effect upon the turbulent spirits.

Thus was the position of the Union party in Kentucky strengthened by its adherents to the policy of neutrality, while yet the machinery of the State government was manipulated by men who were inimical to the United States government, and in sympathy with that of the Confederate States. Fallacious and almost ridiculous as that policy was, and as it was admitted to be, even then, by men who only awaited the result of the August elections to declare their allegiance to one flag or the other, it served its purpose in preventing hostilities within the State, and in securing to the Union men time for organization and preparation to resist secession in case the election should result in seating a majority of "southern-rights" men in the legislature.

This view of the situation was plainly stated to President Lincoln, and received his cordial sanction, and, while he made no movement to acquiesce in the views of the timid Union men who urged the removal of the troops in course of enlistment and organization at camp Dick Robinson, he left the management of Kentucky affairs entirely in the hands of the Union men of the State.

On the 4th of June, Gen. Scott telegraphed McClellan that it was "deemed unwise by the government to send to Kentucky a commander of troops, not native or resident of the State," and, probably owing to the physical disability of Gen. Anderson, suggested Col. L. H. Rousseau, commander of the Louisville Home Guard, and to take command of the Kentucky department. To this communication McClellan replied as follows: "In view of the necessity of managing affairs in Kentucky with great delicacy until the election shall have passed and a Union legislature is in power, I would respectfully suggest that for the present, at least, no sucessor be appointed to Gen. Anderson, and that, as I am in quite close communication with the principal men, the matter be left for a time in my hands."

Gen. McClellan had, as early as the 8th of May, met Gen. S. B. Buckner, inspector-general and real commander of the Kentucky State Guards, and entered into an agreement with him to respect the neutrality of Kentucky so far as to agree not to occupy any portion of the State except to respond to the call of the governor to assist in expelling the rebels from the State, in case they should attempt to occupy points within its borders.

Whatever may have been the motives that actuated Gen. Buckner in making the treaty, it is evident from the following correspondence that Gen. McClellan fully intended to abide by it.

McClellan to Townsend, June 11:

* * * * "Gen. Buckner came to see me on Friday last. We sat up all night talking about matters of common interest. Buckner gave me his word that should any Tennessee troops cross the frontier of Kentucky, he would use all the forces at his disposal to drive them out, and, failing in that, would call on me for assistance. He went to Tennessee, after leaving me, to present that view to Gov. Harris." * * * *

Buckner to Magoffin, June 10:

"On the 8th inst., at Cincinnati, Ohio, I entered into an arrangement with Gen. George B. McClellan, commander of all the United States troops north of the Ohio River, to the following effect: The authorities of the State of Kentucky are to protect the United States property within the limits of the State; to enforce the laws of the United States in accordance with the interpretation of the United States courts, as far as those laws may be applicable to Kentucky, and to enforce, with all the power of the State, our obligations of neutrality as against the southern States, as long as the position we have assumed shall be respected by the United States. Gen. McClellan stipulates that the territory of Kentucky shall be respected on the part of the United States, even if the southern States should occupy it; but, in the latter case, he will call upon the authorities of Kentucky to remove the southern forces. I have stipulated in that case to advise him of the inability of Kentucky to comply with her obligations, and to invite him to dislodge the Southern forces. He stipulates that, if successful in so doing, he will withdraw his forces from the territory of the State as soon as the southern forces shall be removed. Should the administration hereafter adopt a different policy, he is to give me timely notice of the fact."

McClellan to Lieut. Nelson, United States navy, June 26:

"My interview with Buckner was personal, not official. It was solicited by him more than once. I made no stipulation on the part of the general government, and regarded his voluntary promise to drive out the Confederate troops as the only result of the interview. His letter gives his own views, not mine."

An opportunity soon occurred to test the sincerity of each of the high contracting parties, as explained in the letters which follow.

McClellan to Buckner, June 11:

"I have information, apparently reliable, that at least two Tennessee regiments had orders to move last night from camp Cheatham to Union City, thence, on being re-enforced, to occupy, at once, Island No. 1, six miles below Cairo. I notify you of this in accordance with our understanding that you would not permit Tennessee troops to cross your frontier. Please reply at once whether you consider the island on the Kentucky side of the channel within the jurisdiction of Kentucky."

The same day he wrote Gov. Magoffin as follows:

"I have received information that Tennessee troops are under orders to occupy Island No. 1, six miles below Cairo. In accordance with my understanding with Gen Buckner, I call upon you to prevent this step."

Magoffin to McClellan, June 11:

"Gen. Buckner has gone to Paducah and Columbus; his orders are to carry out his understanding with you. Am investigating the question of jurisdiction over the island to which you allude."

The following letter indicates that McClellan had determined to respect the neutral position of Kentucky, even before the interview with Buckner. On the 7th of May he wrote Hon. John J. Crittenden as follows:

"The papers this morning state that Gen. Prentiss, commanding the United States forces at Cairo, Ill., has sent troops across the Ohio River into Kentucky. I have no official notice of such a movement, but I at once telegraphed Gen. Prentiss for the facts, and stated to him that if the report were true I disapproved his course, and ordered him to make no more such movements without my sanction previously obtained."

The establishment of a camp of United States soldiers on the soil of Kentucky naturally provoked a vigorous protest on the part of the governor of the State. In his anxiety to prevent hostilities within the State, which would inevitably bring upon it an army of troops from the northwest, he determined upon a simultaneous appeal to the Presidents of the United States and the Confederate States to aid him in averting the catastrophe. On the 19th of August, therefore, Gov. Magoffin accredited Messrs. W. A. Dudley and F. K. Hunt as commissioners on the part of the State of Kentucky to visit Washington and confer with President Lincoln in regard to the removal of the troops at Camp Dick Robinson. They were the bearers of a lengthy communication from Gov. Magoffin, asking that the troops should be removed beyond the limits of the State. To this President Lincoln replied in the following characteristic letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 24, 1861.

TO HIS EXCELLENCY B. MAGOFFIN, GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF KENTUCKY.

Sir:—Your letter of the 19th inst., in which you "urge the removal from the limits of Kentucky of the military force now organized, and in camp within said State," is received.

I may not possess full and precisely accurate knowledge upon this subject, but I believe it is true that there is a military force in camp within Kentucky, acting by authority of the United States, which force is not very large, and is not now being augmented.

I also believe that some arms have been furnished to this force by the United States.

I also believe that this force consists exclusively of Kentuckians, having their camp in the immediate vicinity of their own homes, and not assailing or menacing any of the good people of Kentucky.

In all I have done in the premises, I have acted upon the urgent solicitation of many Kentuckians, and in accordance with what I believed, and still believe, to be the wish of a majority of all the Union-loving people of Kentucky.

While I have conversed on this subject with many eminent men of Kentucky, including a large majority of her members of congress, I do not remember that any one of them, or any other person, except your Excellency and the bearers of your Excellency's letter, has urged me to remove the military force from Kentucky, or to disband it. One other very worthy citizen of Kentucky did solicit me to have the augmenting of the force suspended for a time.

Taking all the means within my reach to form a judgment I do not believe it is the popular wish of Kentucky that this force should be removed beyond her limits, and, with this impression, I must respectfully decline to so remove it.

I most cordially sympathize with your Excellency in the wish to preserve the peace of my own native State, Kentucky, but it is with regret I search, and cannot find, in your not very short letter any declaration or intimation that you entertain any desire for the preservation of the Federal Union.

Your obedient servant,
A. LINCOLN.

Mr. George W. Johnson was at the same time accredited to the government of the Confederate States at Richmond, bearing a lengthy epistle from Gov. Magoffin, in answer to which Mr. Davis sent the following exceedingly diplomatic note:

RICHMOND, August 28, 1861.

TO THE HON. B. MAGOFFIN, GOVERNOR OF KENTUCKY, ETC.

Sir:—I have received your letter informing me that "since the commencement of the unhappy difficulties yet pending in the country, the people of Kentucky have indicated a steadfast desire and purpose to maintain a position of strict neutrality between the belligerent parties." In the same communication you express your desire to elicit "an authoritative assurance that the government of the Confederate States will continue to respect and observe the neutral position of Kentucky."

In reply to this request, I lose no time in assuring you, that the government of the Confederate States of America neither intends nor desires to disturb the neutrality of Kentucky. The assemblage of troops in Tennessee, to which you refer, had no other object than to repel the lawless invasion of that State by the forces of the United States, should their government seek to approach it through Kentucky without respect for its position of neutrality. That such apprehensions were not groundless has been proved by the course of that government in the States of Maryland and Missouri, and more recently in Kentucky itself, in which, as you inform me, "a military force has been enlisted and quartered by the United States authorities."

The government of the Confederate States has not only respected most scrupulously the neutrality of Kentucky, but has continued to maintain the friendly relations of trade and intercourse which it has suspended with the people of the United States generally.

In view of the history of the past, it can scarcely be necessary to assure your Excellency that the government of the Confederate States will continue to respect the neutrality of Kentucky so long as her people will maintain it themselves.

But neutrality, to be entitled to respect, must be strictly maintained between both parties; or if the door be opened on the one side for aggressions of one of the belligerent parties upon the other, it ought not to be shut to the assailed when they seek to enter it for the purpose of self-defense.

I do not, however, for a moment believe that your gallant State will suffer its soil to be used for the purpose of giving an advantage to those who violate its neutrality and disregard its rights, over others who respect them both.

In conclusion, I tender to your Excellency the assurance of my high consideration and regard,

And am, Sir, very respectfully, yours, etc.,

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

During the month of August, recruiting in the States of Ohio and Indiana progressed but slowly in comparison with the needs of the hour. While a force, magnified by rumor into colossal proportions, was gathering on her southern border, the Union men of Kentucky beheld with dismay a feeling of apathy taking the place of the early enthusiasm in the people north of the Ohio. This was the condition of affairs when the Union men of Kentucky threw off the mask and avowed their determination to support the United States government in the impending struggle.

The formation of the first Union camp on Kentucky soil was, as has been before remarked, for the purpose of organizing a force to guard munitions of war to the loyal people of east Tennessee, and any account of the operations of the Union forces in Kentucky, in 1861, would be incomplete without a reference to the uprising of the Unionists in that region.

Early in June, a convention of Union citizens met in Greenville, east Tennessee, the home of Andrew Johnson, to devise ways and means to oppose the schemes of the secessionists. A committee of safety was appointed and resolutions of unalterable fealty to the national government adopted. Lieut. Samuel P. Carter, United States navy, a native of Elizabethtown, in Carter County, east Tennessee, while serving on board the United States ship, "Seminole," on the Brazil station, had, in March preceding, written several letters to prominent citizens of his native State, urging them to stand by the old flag, and had thus, by his expressions of devoted loyalty to his country, brought himself into prominence as a Union man, and increased the respect in which he was already held as a United States officer.

The committee of safety named Lieut. Carter for appointment by the president as brigadier-general, and asked that he be assigned to command in east Tennessee in case United States troops should be organized. In compliance with this request, presented by Hon. Andrew Johnson, Lieut. Carter was immediately, on the arrival of his ship at Philadelphia, in July, ordered by Secretary Wells to report to Secretary Cameron for special duty.

On the 10th of July, orders were issued from the adjutant-general's office, to Lieut. Carter, to proceed to east Tennessee, and organize a camp of instruction of United States volunteers. A sum of money sufficient for temporary expenses was placed to his credit in New York, and on the day following the defeat of the Union army at Bull Run, he took his departure from Washington, for his new field of service. On his arrival at Cincinnati, he met his old friend, Lieut. William Nelson, United States navy; the officer designated by the war department, to organize a force in Kentucky, to convey the munitions of war designed for use by Carter's command, through that State to east Tennessee. In the conference that ensued between these two officers, to whose skill and courage the important enterprise had been intrusted, it was agreed that Lieut. Carter should make his way to east Tennessee, via Cumberland Gap, or through one of the adjacent gaps in the mountains, organize his force, arm them as best he could with rifles and shot guns, take up a strong position in the mountains, and there await the arms and army supplies placed to his order in Cincinnati.

Alike in the requisites of courage and intrepidity, no two men could have been more unlike in other personal characteristics, than Nelson and Carter. While both were distinguished for the possession of that polish and ease of manner, that comes from association with the first society at home and abroad, Nelson was boisterous and impetuous, impatient of restraint and contradiction, and utterly intolerant of the slighest infraction of discipline. He was in the prime of manly beauty. A massive head, covered with a luxuriant growth of black, curly hair, was carried erect, and his herculean frame was firmly knit. Full of tireless energy, he seemed to require neither sleep nor rest. The sentinel, pacing his beat, was often startled long after midnight, by the colossal form of the commander looming up in the darkness, and approaching the camp from a direction whence he was least expected. Always an early riser, he took his bath, followed by a light breakfast, and was ready for the day's duties before the camp was astir.

Toward those of the officers, who displayed a disposition to acquire a knowledge of military tactics and zeal in the performance of their duties, he was the most affable of commanders; but woe betide the careless and inefficient. If there was a good deal of the martinet in his dealing with the embryo colonels and generals who flocked to his standard, it must be confessed that there was ample reason for it. A more patient and forbearing man might have been more popular with the officers, but the efficiency of the command would have suffered in proportion. Always ready to sacrifice his own comfort to the demands of duty, he required a like zealous performance on the part of his subordinates. Many of them were gentleman of high social standing, and unaccustomed to yield their opinions, or sacrifice their ease at the bidding of another, and the full truth, that they were henceforth to have no will of their own that clashed with that of the commanding general, dawned upon them but slowly. Nelson regarded the drilling and disciplining of the regiments as of paramount importance, and had a sailor's horror of political discussions.

The camp soon filled with visiting statesmen from the adjoining counties, each of whom had his own plan for saving the Union without the effusion of blood. Most of them were Union men, and when the time came for action, enlisted unhesitatingly in the Union army. Speech-making was the order of the day, and Kentuckians are natural orators. If it had been possible to talk down the rebellion it would have met its death at camp Dick Robinson. As might be expected, all this found little favor at the hands of the commander. He had been assigned to the performance of a specific duty, and the idea of discussing the wisdom or practicability of the order never entered his mind. Political discussions exasperated him, and it was not uncommon to see them broken up by the use of language more forcible than polite, and the participants set about their business in a very summary manner. Thus it came about that he conceived a violent antipathy toward the officers who preferred talking politics to drilling their detachments, while he trusted more fully and became more strongly attached to those who devoted all their time to military duties.

Lieut. Carter was, in most regards, the opposite of Nelson. He was a tall, graceful and very affable gentleman of the most winning address, coupled with dignity and self-restraint. His appearance at the camp had a soothing effect upon his comrade of the navy, and it was observed that the expletives in which the latter was wont to indulge on the most trivial occasions were more mild in tone and uttered more rarely than formerly. Long service in the navy had imparted to an otherwise pleasing address an expression of sternness and gravity. The habit of command sat easily upon him, and the control which he speedily acquired over the turbulent spirits who flocked to his standard increased to veneration, as events crowding rapidly upon each other brought into requisition the qualities of patience, courage and discipline with which he was eminently endowed.

It was thought at the time he started from Cincinnati that if he could reach the upper counties of east Tennessee he might arm a sufficient force of mountaineers with country rifles to enable him to maintain his position until the promised supply of arms and equipments could reach them. On arriving at London, Ky., on the 1st of August, he fortunately met his brother, James P. T. Carter, who was on his way to Washington. He had just effected his escape from east Tennessee, where he had gone at the instance of the president and Secretary Stanton, for the purpose of consulting with the loyal citizens and making arrangements, if he found it practicable, for Unionists who desired to enter the service of the United States to cross into the borders of Kentucky and receive their arms and equipments.

By the advice of his brother, who represented that his appearance in east Tennessee would inevitably lead to his capture and imprisonment by the Confederate authorities, Lieut. Carter established his headquarters at Barboursville, in Knox County, Ky., thirty miles from Cumberland Gap, and determined there to await events and to receive such refugees as might arrive. A company of Col. Garrard's Kentucky regiment was there in course of organization. By the 3d of August nearly 100 refugees arrived at Boston, Ky., and Barboursville, followed in a few days by a considerable body, who appeared bearing the United States flag at the head of the column. Some were armed with hunting rifles, others with rude knives made by country blacksmiths, and many with stout cudgels. All were foot-sore and half famished. Their tattered garments and lacerated limbs bore unmistakable evidence of the hardships they had endured. But hunger and suffering had not dimmed their enthusiasm, and their only demand was to be armed and led against the enemy, that they might deliver their families from the oppression of Confederate rule.

Lieut. Carter's camp was established two miles east of Barboursville, and there, under the temporary shelter of brush and rude huts, the men were cared for as well as possible. Cooking utensils and provisions were collected from the surrounding country, but the men were shoeless and nearly all poorly clad and without blankets. The work of organization was pushed forward. Companies were formed and mustered into service for three years or during the war, by Lieut. Carter, who, having no assistant, performed the duties of commander as well as those belonging to the field and staff. By the middle of August the First Tennessee Infantry, numbering 800 men, was organized under command of Col. R. K. Byrd; but was, thus far, without arms, clothing, or camp and garrison equipage. As time passed, the necessity for these things became more pressing, and Lieut. Carter visited camp Dick Robinson and obtained the promise from Lieut. Nelson that, if transportation was furnished, the arms and ammunition should be sent to camp Andy Johnson. Lieut. Carter hastened back to his camp and at once dispatched the necessary number of wagons, guarded by two companies of the First Tennessee. After waiting the necessary length of time for the train to return, Lieut. Carter was surprised by the information that Nelson not only declined to send the arms but had kept the men. The hostility of the State authorities to Nelson's camp had deepened to such an extent that military necessity compelled the commandant to retain the two companies and to request Lieut. Carter to bring the remainder of his force to assist in its defense in case it should be attacked. In the last week of August the regiment, then upward of 1,000 strong, broke camp and marched to camp Dick Robinson.

What would have been the effect upon the campaign that followed, if Lieut. Carter had been permitted to carry out his design to move upon Cumberland Gap, capture and fortify it and there establish his camp, within easy distance from the homes of the adherents to the United States government in east Tennessee, cannot be known. It is possible that the removal of Nelson's camp to that point might have resulted in holding that important gateway against the Confederate forces then organized in east Tennessee, who were soon after in possession of the place.

The removal to camp Dick Robinson was a bitter disappointment to the east-Tennesseans, but they were destined to still greater trials before they were permitted to cross the mountains to the rescue of their families. Refugees from east Tennessee continued to pour into the camp, and in a short time the Second Tennessee Infantry was organized and mustered into service under command of Col. J. P. T. Carter. Cols. Wolford, Bramlette, Fry and Garrard completed the organization of their respective regiments, and an artillery company, under command of Capt. Abram Hewitt, was mustered into service.

Whilst these events were transpiring in eastern and central Kentucky, affairs had culminated in the establishment of military camps on Green River, and at a point in Indiana, opposite Louisville, Ky. Lovell H. Rousseau, whose bold advocacy of the sovereignity of the general government, when a member of the legislature, had attracted public attention, after organizing the Home Guard at Louisville set about the organization of a brigade of United States troops.

Conference with leading Union men in the State led to the establishment of his camp on the Indiana shore, opposite Louisville, although recruiting was openly carried on in Kentucky. Col. Rousseau named his camp in honor of that patriotic citizen of Kentucky, Hon. Joseph Holt, who, while a member of President Buchanan's cabinet, stood faithful to the Union after it had been deserted by nearly every one of his colleagues.

From the one end of the State to the other the work went bravely on, and soon twenty-eight regiments of infantry, six regiments of cavalry, and three batteries of artillery were organized, and as soon as possible mustered into the service of the United States. The regiments were numbered arbitrarily, with no reference to the time when they were filled, and, in several cases, none as to the date of their muster, and several of them were engaged in important actions before they were fully organized. Skirmishes with predatory bands of Confederate cavalry were of frequent occurrence, and those whose rendezvous was south of Louisville were in constant danger of surprise and capture from detachments of cavalry sent out from the military encampments south of Green River for the express purpose of breaking up Union camps and capturing military stores and equipments.

One of the earliest and most practical of all the unconditional Union men in the State was William T. Ward. Early in August he visited the counties of Metcalfe, Green, Taylor, Hart and Adair, and sent messages into Cumberland, Clinton and Russell Counties, urging the citizens, many of whom had joined home-guard companies, to disband those organizations, on the ground that it placed them under control of the governor, whom he regarded as disloyal to the national government. He succeeded in inducing twenty-eight companies to promise to enlist in the United States service, as soon as the necessary authority to organize a brigade could be obtained. Mr. Ward then went to Washington, where he was commissioned a brigadier-general on the 18th of September.

Returning to Kentucky, he proceeded at once to the organization of his brigade, commissioning the officers by virtue of authority vested in him by the war department. On the 20th of September he reported for duty to Gen. Anderson, giving him the same information that he had given the war department at Washington. Gen. Anderson directed him to select a suitable place to organize his brigade, but was compelled to retain at Louisville 2,500 out of the 4,000 stands of arms furnished Gen. Ward by the general government. Col. E. H. Hobson and Mr. John A. Ward, a son of the general, and afterward a lieutenant-colonel of the Twenty-seventh Infantry, had, during the absence of Gen. Ward, collected the men together at Greensburg and Sulphur Well, in Barren County. These men, about 1,000 in number, unarmed and unorganized, were dispersed by Buckner when he advanced to Green River bridge, but were reunited at Lebanon, where they remained until arms could be procured.

The proposal of Gov. Morton to send troops to Kentucky, as expressed in his telegram of September 2d, to the assistant secretary of war, seconded by Messrs. Boyle and Speed, of Kentucky, was endorsed by the Union people, but they strenuously opposed any advance into Kentucky by their friends from the north, until after some portion of Kentucky soil had been occupied by southern troops.

Threats had already been made by the latter to occupy Columbus, Ky. This town, located on the Mississippi River, about equal distance from Cairo, Ill., and the northern boundary of Tennessee, was recognized as a point of great strategic importance by both the United States and Confederate States commanders. The former had been deterred from occupying it with troops from other States by the strenuous appeals of the Union men of Kentucky, who felt that an overt act on the part of the national government, in violation of the promise of Gen. McClellan to respect the neutrality of Kentucky, would be construed by the people into a termination of that agreement. The city was practically in the hands of the Confederate authorities, most of the population of the town and the adjacent country being in full sympathy with the rebellion, and its formal occupation was only deferred until a pretext could be found in the movements of the United States forces at Cairo. This was afforded on the 23d of August, by the capture of a little steamer named "W. B. Terry," running in the Confederate service, by the United States gunboat Lexington, at Paducah, Ky., fifty miles above Cairo, on the Ohio River, at the mouth of the Tennessee. Accordingly, Columbus and Hickman, Ky., were occupied on the 3d of September by order of Gen. Leonidas Polk, commanding the Confederate military department No. 2; and on the 6th Brig.-Gen. U. S. Grant, commanding the district of Southwestern Missouri, occupied Paducah with United States troops from Cairo, Gen. Grant commanding the expedition in person.

The occupation of Paducah and Smithland, at the mouth of the Cumberland, gave the national government control of the two important rivers of the State of Tennessee, and effectually closed water communication with the South. The occupation of Columbus gave rise to a spirited correspondence between Gen. Polk and President Jeff. Davis, Gov. Harris and Gov. Magoffin, in which Polk, writing to Magoffin, claimed that he had reliable information that the Federal forces intended to occupy Columbus, referred to the danger of west Tennessee from such a movement, and offered to withdraw from Kentucky if the Federal troops were simultaneously withdrawn. On September 1st he had written that he "regarded it of essential importance that he should be ahead of the 'enemy' in occupying Columbus." Gov. Harris, on hearing that Gen. Pillow had occupied Hickman, had written to Polk, requesting the instant withdrawal of his command, on the ground that he and Mr. Davis were pledged to respect the neutrality of Kentucky. Polk, in reply, regretted the necessity of the movement, but claimed that, under plenary powers delegated to him by the Confederate government, he was authorized to move from his late position at Madrid to Columbus. On the 4th, Secretary Walker, Confederate States army, ordered the prompt withdrawal of Pillow from Hickman. In reply to this, Polk appealed to President Davis, who responded that "the necessity justified the action."

Mr. George C. Taylor, and a number of other citizens of Columbus, welcomed Polk in a long address, in which, after referring to "the tyranny of the general government" in ignoring the neutrality of Kentucky in levying a tax for the purpose of carrying on a cruel war against the South, to which Kentucky would be called upon to contribute, he assured him that the entire community welcomed his army with "the liveliest delight." But the Confederate army was not destined to receive the same cordial welcome at the hands of the State government. On the 9th of September, Hon. John M. Johnston, chairman of the committee, transmitted to Gen. Polk resolutions of the senate, introduced by Hon. Walter C. Whitaker, a member of that body, requesting the prompt withdrawal of his troops from Kentucky soil. Replying to Mr. Johnston, Gen. Polk claimed that cause for the seizure of Columbus had been given by the capture of the "W. B. Terry;" by the vote of members of congress from Kentucky for supplies of men and money to carry on the war, and by the establishment of a United States camp in Garrard County, and concluded by an offer to withdraw his troops when the United States resumed its former attitude toward Kentucky. On the 13th, the senate concurred in the house resolution requiring the governor of Kentucky to issue a proclamation ordering the Confederate troops to withdraw from the State.

On September 7th, Brig.-Gen. R. C. Foster and Messrs. Brown, Bailey and Harding, of Nashville, in the absence of Gov. Harris, telegraphed Mr. Davis that troops from Paducah could reach Bowling Green, Ky., in less than twenty-four hours, and asked what should be done. To which Adjt.-Gen. Cooper intimated that, as the Confederate forces would, in view of the Federal occupation of Paducah, be required for duty at that point, Bowling Green should be occupied by Tennessee troops.

On September 10th, Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston superseded Gen. Polk in command of Department No. 2, the latter retaining command at Columbus, besides being charged with the defenses on the Mississippi River below Cairo.

Three regiments of Kentucky infantry, which had gone south and were stationed at camp Boone, together with 2,500 men at camp Trousdale and a Tennessee regiment, were organized into a force for the occupation of Bowling Green, under command of Brig.-Gen. Simon B. Buckner. With this force, numbering 5,000 men and a battery of artillery, he was ordered, September 15th, to proceed to Bowling Green and secure and hold that "important line of defense." The importance of Bowling Green as a strategic position had occurred to the Union men, who were engaged in recruiting in that section of Kentucky. Col. S. G. Burbridge, who was at Russellville raising a regiment under authority from Nelson, at once proceeded to Louisville to induce Col. Rousseau to move his camp from Jeffersonville to Bowling Green, representing that, with the nucleus thus formed, a brigade of not less than 5,000 men could be organized in a few weeks. Rousseau accepted the invitation at once, and a night was fixed when the telegraph wires were to be cut, and his entire command embarked upon trains on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad for Bowling Green. Unfortunately for the success of the expedition, Col. Burbridge visited Frankfort to obtain the sanction of Mr. Crittenden, who considered the movement premature. There is no doubt that had the movement been promptly made the region of country south of Green River and east of the Cumberland, which for the next five months was given over to the control of the Confederates, would have remained inside of the Federal lines.

The two leading papers of Louisville, the Journal and Democrat, both of which had hitherto advocated neutrality from a Union standpoint, now came out strongly in favor of the national government.

The occupation of Bowling Green, although intended by Gen. Johnston as the northern line of his defense, had the appearance to Gen. Anderson of an advance on Louisville. He immediately dispatched a messenger to Gov. Morton, asking if he could depend upon him for assistance, and on September 18th, Rousseau's brigade and the Sixth Indiana Infantry, Col. T. T. Crittenden; the Thirty-eighth Indiana, Col. Scribner; the Forty-ninth Ohio, Col. Gibson; with the Home Guard companies—the expedition commanded by Gen. W. T. Sherman—advanced and occupied Muldraugh's Hill, on the line of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, in the direction of Elizabethtown, at which place Buckner's advance was reported to be. On reaching the Rolling Fork of Salt River, a deep stream, Gen. Sherman found the railroad bridge burned, which stopped the progress of the trains, and the men were disembarked. Col. Rousseau, in command of a picket of 400 men, was sent forward, but was soon afterward recalled. On Sunday morning, the 22d, Gen. Sherman regarding the position at Muldraugh's Hill of great importance, determined to advance. Col. Rousseau, with his brigade, took the lead, followed by the Thirty-eighth Indiana, the Forty-ninth Ohio, and a detachment of regulars, under Capt. Swain, which had joined the expedition. The command moved through Elizabethtown, and out on the Lebanon Road, whence it proceeded to Muldraugh's Hill, where it was soon after re-enforced by the Thirty-ninth Indiana, under Col. Harrison. The Sixth Indiana was stationed at Elizabethtown, and Col. Hecker's Twenty-fourth Illinois at Colesburg, to guard the railroad.

Muldraugh's Hill is a range of hills separating the waters of Rolling Fork from Green River, but, in a country abounding in turnpike roads, was not a strong position, and of little importance as a defense to Louisville. Gen. Sherman reported to Gen. Anderson that Buckner's force was variously estimated from 7,000 to 20,000 men, and did not doubt that he had 15,000, all actuated by a common purpose to destroy him. In concluding his report, he says:

I am fully alive to the danger of our position and to all its disadvantages especially that of supplies. Our provisions have been hauled up the rugged valley of Cedar Creek by hired wagons and by some which were brought along by the Thirty-ninth Indiana. We can barely supply our wants and are liable at any moment to have those wagons seized. The reason I came to Muldraugh's Hill was for effect. Had it fallen into the hands of our enemies, the cause would have been lost, and even with it in our possession a week, nobody has rallied to our support. I expected, as we had reason to, that the people of Kentucky would rally to our support; but on the contrary, none have joined us, while hundreds, we are told, are going to Bowling Green. The railroad from Bowling Green toward us is broken at Nolin, ten miles miles off, and at another trestle beyond, some seven miles. I doubt if this was done by Buckner's orders, but rather by the small parties of guards left to protect them, and who were scared at our approach. I have from time to time given you telegraphic notice of these events, and must now await the development. We should have here at least 20,000 men; but that has been an impossibility. Truly yours,

W. T. SHERMAN, Brigadier-General.

If the general could have captured the following dispatch on its way to Gen. Johnston's headquarters soon after, it might have allayed his anxiety:

BOWLING GREEN, October 4, 1861.

W. W. MACKALL, A. A. G.:

I have not been able to obtain accurate returns of the strength of the regiments here since my return. My effective strength at all points does not exceed 6,000. The enemy, with their last re-enforcements number not less than 13,000 or 14,000. It is stated that they will advance in a few days on Green River. I need re-enforcements at this place very much. When can I receive them? Please reply.

S. B. BUCKNER, Brigadier-General.

It may as well be stated here, as elsewhere, that Buckner's effective strength, at Bowling Green, Hopkinsville, and including all the cavalry that rendered to him a nominal recognition, as commander of the Central Kentucky Division, including Hardee's division, up to the arrival of Floyd's brigade from West Virginia on Christmas eve, never exceeded 13,000 men. Polk's forces numbered, on September 30th, 20,000 present for duty.

President Lincoln appears to have placed a high estimate upon the ability of the inspector-general of the Kentucky State Guard, as will be seen by the following tender of a commission:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, August 17, 1861.

HON. SECRETARY OF WAR:

My Dear Sir:—Unless there be reason to the contrary not known to me, make out a commission for Simon (B) Buckner, of Kentucky, as a brigadier-general of volunteers. It is to be put into the hands of Gen. Anderson, and delivered to Gen. Buckner or not, at the discretion of Gen. Anderson. Of course it is to remain a secret unless and until the commission is delivered. Yours truly,

A. LINCOLN.

When we reflect upon the sublime audacity of this plucky rebel who, for five months, with his force numbering less than one-half of that opposed to him at Nolin, Elizabethtown and Calhoun, poorly armed and afflicted with measles, not only maintained his line 100 miles in extent, between Polk on his left and Zollicoffer on his right, but rendered efficient aid to the latter in his operations in east Tennessee, it cannot but be regretted that the brigadier-general's commission (which, however, was never offered him) had not saved him to the Union cause.

On the 8th of October Gen. Anderson, finding that continued ill health unfitted him for active duty, in obedience to orders from Gen. Scott, relinquished the command of the "Department of the Cumberland" to Gen. Sherman, who at once assumed its duties. His first act was to direct Brig.-Gen. Thomas L. Crittenden, who had recently been commissioned, by the president, to proceed to Owensboro, in the vicinity of which Cols. Jackson, Burbridge, McHenry, Hawkins, Grider, Shackelford and Hobson were recruiting regiments for the United States service. He subsequently established his camp at Calhoun and organized what was afterward known as the Fifth Division. During the time in which the regiments were perfecting their organization, they had several severe skirmishes with the enemy, the first of which took place at Woodbury, in Butler County. Col. S. G. Burbridge, who had obtained repeating rifles for the use of his men, and Col. Jackson, with his cavalry, were fearless and vigilant in guarding the country lying immediately north of Green River against incursions from the opposite shore.

Col. J. H. McHenry, whose camp was located at Hartford, hearing that a force of Confederate cavalry at Woodbury, twenty-five miles above, on the south side of Green River, meditated an attack upon his camp, notified Col. Burbridge, who, with his force, was encamped thirty miles distant. Col. Burbridge, with 125 of his regiment, 100 of the Third Kentucky Cavalry under Capt. Breathitt, and a section of artillery under Capt. Somebry, proceeded at once to McHenry's camp, and, on Monday, the 28th of October, encamped near Cromwell, thinking to attack next morning. Col. McHenry, with his force and a part of the cavalry, crossed the river and attacked a small picket of the enemy at Morgantown, wounding several and losing one of his own men. Capt. Netter, of Burbridge's regiment, followed McHenry with twenty men, and passed through Morgantown, coming up with the Confederates one mile distant from the town. In the meantime, Col. Burbridge passed up the river twenty miles, and there found the main body of the Confederates occupying an eminence upon the opposite side. The latter immediately formed in line, but were thrown into consternation by a few well directed shots from a six-pound cannon, and a ferry flat upon the opposite side being brought over, Col. Burbridge crossed with Lieut. Ashley, Capts. Belt, Shacklett and Porter, with 135 men and one piece of artillery. Capt. Belt immediately occupied the position from which the Confederates were driven. Their second position, being their encampment, was first shelled, then charged, whereupon they fell back, leaving their dead upon the field. Knowing that a camp of Confederate cavalry was located a few miles above, Col. Burbridge destroyed the abandoned camp and joined Col. McHenry at Morgantown.

On the 31st, Capt. Whittinghill, with one company of the Seventeenth Infantry, and Capt. Porter, commanding a company of 30 Home Guards at Cromwell, repulsed an assault of 200 Confederate cavalry, inflicting heavy loss upon them. Cols. Jackson and Burbridge went to the relief of McHenry from Owensboro, but no further molestation was offered. On the 26th of September, Gen. Buckner destroyed the locks on Green River at the mouth of Muddy River, and on the 29th occupied Hopkinsville, after a skirmish with the Union Home Guard, resulting in a loss to him of one killed and one wounded, and to the Home Guard of several wounded and two taken prisoners.

Brig.-Gen. Alcorn, with his Mississippi brigade was placed in command at Hopkinsville. He soon after became disgusted with the lack of respect exhibited toward him by the Union people of the town, arrested several, and asked permission of Buckner to make examples of them. He was relieved in the course of a few weeks by Brig.-Gen. Tilghman, and with that event his name disappears from these annals. Gen. Tilghman was obliged to spend a greater portion of his time and use a large portion of his force in moving the sick, the measles having done that which the Union forces never did—attacked his camp.

On the 9th of October, Brig.-Gen. Rousseau, who had in the meantime received his commission, pursuant to orders from department-headquarters, removed his camp to the vicinity of Nolin Creek and named it camp Nevin, in compliment to an old friend in Louisville. Brig.-Gen. Alexander McDowell

McCook, having reported at department headquarters, in compliance with a request previously made for him by Gen. Anderson, was assigned by Gen. Sherman to command of all the forces at Nolin Creek. Here he was soon after joined by Brig.-Gens. Thomas J. Wood and R. W. Johnson. Dividing his command into brigades, he assigned these officers to command, which, with the brigade of Pennsylvanians under command of Brig.-Gen. Negley, which arrived on October 22, increased his force to 13,195 effectives.

While these events were transpiring in southern Kentucky, Lieut. Nelson was using his utmost exertions to organize his brigade at camp Dick Robinson. The men were still without sufficient clothing, and, but for the fertility of the country in which the camp was located, would have been equally destitute of subsistence. He even found difficulty in obtaining the arms designated for his use at Cincinnati. The town of Cynthiana, sixty miles from Covington, on the line of the Kentucky Central Railroad, was in possession of a company of Confederate recruits, who were preparing to join their companies at camp Boone, and the Confederate States flag floated from the spire of the court house. Hon. Garrett Davis, whose experience in the distribution of arms to the Union men of central Kentucky encouraged him to anticipate success, undertook to deliver the arms at camp Dick Robinson. Proceeding to Cincinnati, he obtained possession of them, packed in boxes, and loaded them upon a train which he accompanied. On the arrival of the train at Cynthiana, the rebel company before mentioned, who had been notified by telegraph, was seen stationed beyond the depot to stop the train. The engineer, seeing the danger, immediately reversed his engine and returned to Covington.

Col. John M. Harlan, now associate justice of the United States Supreme Court, and Gen. James Speed, of Louisville, hearing of the occurrence, wrote Mr. Davis to send the arms on the mail boat to that city, and they would forward them to that point. Knowing that the boat would arrive at midnight, they at once called upon Mr. Sam Gill, superintendent of the Louisville, Frankfort & Lexington Railroad, a Union man, and made known their plan, which was that they should have an engine and car ready at the depot to which the arms could be transferred immediately upon their arrival at the wharf. Mr. Gill entered heartily into the arrangement. The boxes filled with arms were loaded in wagons, and in the dead of night conveyed to the waiting train, which at once sped with its precious freight into the darkness on its way to Lexington, where it arrived at 5 o'clock in the morning. The arrival of a railroad train at that unusual hour aroused the suspicion of a lounger about the station, who peered into the car and discovered the boxes. He ran at once to the fire-engine room, and rang the bell for the assembly of Capt. John Morgan's company of State Guards.

On the same day in which Messrs. Harlan and Speed had written Mr. Davis, they had dispatched a messenger to Col. Dudley, who was recruiting his regiment, the Twenty-first Kentucky, at Lexington, and to Lieut. Nelson, at camp Dick Robinson, to inform them that the train containing the arms would reach Lexington early on this morning. Immediately on the reception of this welcome intelligence, Gen. Nelson dispatched Col. Bramlette to Lexington, and ordered Lieut.-Col. Letcher, with 300 of Wolford's cavalry, to follow him. Col. Dudley, hearing the alarm sounded from Morgan's arsenal, immediately called out his men and marched to the depot, where Morgan's men had already assembled. No attempt was made on the part of either party to gain possession of the arms, but Morgan, acting under the instructions of Hon. John C. Breckinridge, was determined to prevent the transportation of the arms through Lexington to camp Dick Robinson, while Dudley was equally determined to defend them. They were both brave men, and their forces, well armed, were about equal in numbers, and eager for the fray. Suddenly the head of Letcher's battalion appeared upon the hill approaching the city. They were armed with Sharpe's repeating rifles, and, for effect, had affixed the frightful looking sword bayonets, which, as the column descended the hill, glittered in the rays of the rising sun. Col. Bramlette in the meantime had met Mr. Breckinridge, and had vainly endeavored to convince him of the folly of opposing the removal of the arms to camp Dick Robinson. At the moment the cavalry appeared in view, Col. Bramlette remarked: "Very well, Mr. Breckinridge, the responsibility of a battle rests with you, and it is my opinion that the guns will go to camp Dick Robinson." From this argument there was no appeal. Morgan and his men disappeared from the scene, and the arms were quietly transported to their destination.

On the 15th of September, Brig.-Gen. George H. Thomas reported for duty at Louisville, and was ordered to relieve Lieut. Nelson, in command of the troops at that point. Lieut. Nelson was directed to report at department-headquarters, when he soon received orders to repair to Maysville, Ky., on the Ohio, fifty miles above Cincinnati, and organize a force to meet the enemy, who were advancing under command of Col. John S. Williams, from Virginia into eastern Kentucky.

In the order relieving Nelson, the general commanding commended the "zeal and untiring energy he had displayed in providing and distributing arms to the Union men of Kentucky, and in collecting and organizing troops at camp Dick Robinson." It was, no doubt, owing to the possession of these qualities, as well as his success in organizing a camp in spite of the opposition of the State authorities, that it was deemed expedient to again employ him in the same capacity. Maysville was the home of his boyhood and the residence of a host of his warmest friends, and no officer could have been selected to whom his duty could have been entrusted with greater chances of success. He expressed no word of dissent to an order that separated him from an army whose organization owed its existence to his courage and energy. To a nature as noble as his, jealousy was impossible. Congratulating his men upon the acquisition of an experienced army officer who would perfect the work which he had begun, he bade adieu to his trusty followers, and left the scene of his triumphant vindication of the power of the national government.

Gen. Thomas found, on assuming command at camp Dick Robinson, on the 15th of September, 1861, very little that enters into the formation of a military camp, except men. A few boxes of clothing had arrived and had been distributed promiscuously where the articles were the most needed. A pair of pants here and a blouse there; a hat here, and there a pair of shoes; and, to add to the grotesque appearance of the command, an occasional army overcoat might be seen, whose accommodating skirts, concealed, to some extent, the total absence of pantaloons. Gen. Thomas found ample need of the patience and fortitude with which he was endowed, in forming an army from the crude material at his command. Accustomed to the methods of the regular army, and to the discipline of its soldiery, he had never, until now, had command of a brigade composed exclusively of volunteer troops. The buff-colored shoulder-straps of a colonel of cavalry had not been replaced by the star of the brigadier, to which he was entitled when he arrived at camp Dick Robinson. He was accompanied by Capt. George E. Flynt, the accomplished and efficient adjutant-general, who remained until the close of the war his trusted confidential adviser and friend.

For twenty-five years Gen. Thomas had been accustomed to martial scenes. He had fought the Seminoles in the everglades, and the fierce Comanches on the plains. He had won distinction in the war with Mexico, and at the breaking out of the civil war found himself major of a regiment of cavalry, of which Albert Sidney Johnston was colonel, Robert E. Lee lieutenant-colonel, and W. J. Hardee major. Promoted to a colonelcy on the 3d of May, 1861, he served a few months in the eastern army before being commissioned a brigadier-general in the volunteer army, and sent to report to Gen. Anderson at Louisville. In every position in which he had been placed, throughout his military career, he had borne himself as a man, modest, brave, and incorruptible; and now, at the age of forty-five, the real drama of his life was to begin.

The hitherto insurmountable difficulty in equipping this command, for its expedition in east Tennessee, had been to obtain the necessary supplies. Week after week the impetuous Nelson had been compelled to wait, until hope and patience were alike exhausted. Gen. Thomas lost no time in introducing military system into the camp, and in imparting to it the character of a camp of instruction. Company and battalion drill became a part of the daily duties, and a laudable desire to excel in the discipline of their regiments animated the officers.

The patience, dignity and self-control, which never forsook him in the most trying emergencies, and which afterward gave him the unbounded control of the army, were at no period of his life more manifest than now. Fully alive to the importance of the expedition into east Tennessee, which contemplated the permanent occupation of Knoxville and control of the Virginia & East Tennessee Railroad, he was powerless to obtain even the clothing necessary to preserve the lives of his men. He had no wagons and could not obtain them, while hundreds were being shipped to Rosecrans in western Virginia. The orders of Fremont were on file in all the manufactories at Cincinnati and were being filled as rapidly as possible.

Finding that no assistance could be rendered by the quartermaster's department at Louisville or Cincinnati, and that Gen. Thomas, by the very fact of his military education, was committed to regular army methods for obtaining supplies through the regular channels, the writer, then a member of his staff, conceived the idea of procuring them by the same means that had proved successful in the hands of Gen. Fremont. Making out a requisition upon Capt. Dickerson, assistant-quartermaster at Cincinnati, for a large quantity of clothing, tents and other camp equipage, and having it approved by Gen. Thomas, he proceeded to Cincinnati and presented it to Capt. Dickerson. He was informed that the quartermaster's department was powerless to furnish the articles enumerated, and that, being indebted to the clothing manufacturers over $1,000,000, his credit with them was exhausted. He then applied to Col. Swords, assistant quartermaster-general at Louisville, to know at what time he might expect to receive funds for the equipment of camp Dick Robinson, to which Col. Swords responded, designating the middle of October as the probable date. Knowing that the uncertainty as to the time fixed would debar him from competing in open market for goods with the agents of Gen. Fremont, who were able to pay cash on delivery, and feeling deeply the necessities of the men whom he had left shivering in their rags in camp, he determined to purchase the goods, if possible, and agree to pay, the 15th of October, on delivery at Nicholasville.

He visited several of the largest establishments and found large quantities of clothing. Tempting piles of warm flannel shirts, blankets, blouses and overcoats, pantaloons and woolen hosiery greeted his eyes, while accommodating clerks stood ready to sell them —cheap for cash. Exhibiting the requisition as his credentials, he left copies of it at several places, requesting the proprietors to mark opposite each article the price at which they would sell it for cash on delivery and hand it to him the next day as a sealed proposal.

The plan worked admirably. The clothing was purchased in accordance with the bids, and the officer returned highly elated with his success. But his triumph was of short duration. The next evening a stranger alighted from the stage at the camp, and, inquiring for the acting quartermaster, was shown to his quarters. "I have never visited a camp," he said, "and I came to see one." The officer welcomed him and expressed his willingness to render his stay as agreeable as possible. "When our house heard that I wished to visit your camp," said the stranger, "the proprietors made me supercargo of a little invoice of clothing that comprises a part of the goods you purchased yesterday." The officer glanced at the bill and found that it was from one of the houses with whom he had contracted; he compared it item by item with the proposal and found no variation in prices; he added it and found it correct; he examined the checks of the receiving clerk at Nicholasville and found that the packages had all arrived at the depot. There was no reason why he should not pay the bill, except that he had no money.

He knew, as well as he knew his name, that a draft had been sent with a small quantity of goods to test his ability to meet his engagements. Taking down a check-book on a banking house at Lexington (where he had no account), he deliberately wrote a check for the amount, and, handing it to the stranger, took his receipted bill, excused himself and mounted his horse for a ride to Lexington. It may well be imagined that the emotions of the officer were not of the most pleasurable description during that lonely night ride of twenty miles. For the first time in his life, he had been guilty of a flagrant crime, and one which he feared Gen. Thomas would not condone. Arriving at Lexington, he sought rest at a hotel, but could not sleep. Rising early in the morning, he rang the bell at the residence of the late D. A. Sayre, for it was necessary to arrange if possible for the payment of the check without being seen by the bearer. The banker came down and the officer at once introduced himself. He stated the condition of the camp, and that the half-clad troops stationed there constituted the only defense of Lexington against the enemy, who was reported to be advancing into Kentucky from east Tennessee. He then exhibited the telegram from Col. Swords, and asked him if he (the banker) would advance money upon it, provided Col. Swords verified the dispatch. "Yes," said the old man, "to the extent of my ability." "I am glad to hear it," said the overjoyed officer; "for I have already drawn a check upon your bank." "The check shall be paid," said the banker.

The homeward ride, through the crisp September morning air, was a pleasanter trip than the one of the previous night. The troops were soon better clad and in more comfortable quarters, and the loan was promptly paid by Col. Swords. It is, perhaps, a trivial incident, but it will serve to explain the delay in carrying out the design of the national government to occupy east Tennessee. Having ordered the expedition in July, the war department seemed to have forgotten it, and no means were provided to carry it into execution. On the 20th of September Captain Dickerson telegraphed Gen. Thomas that he had commenced the shipment of wagons to him, but before he had fairly gotten under way he had orders from western Virginia for 400, which took precedence. In fact every army movement seemed to take precedence of that which Gen. Nelson had inaugurated, which Gen. Thomas was straining every means to carry forward, and which the stout hearts and willing hands of 1,500 loyal east Tennesseans were pledged to assist in accomplishing.

Yet it is difficult to conceive of a more important movement than that of the early occupation of east Tennessee by a strong force. The effect would have been to cut off all railroad communications between the eastern and western portions of the Confederacy, except by the long and devious routes south of the Appalachian chain of mountains, and to add to the army of the United States fully 10,000 hardy mountaineers inured to toil and hardship, besides performing a solemn duty in protecting a loyal people against the prosecution of the enemies of the Union. A tithe of the troops, arms and camp equipage lying idle upon the banks of the Potomac, transferred to Gen. Thomas in September, would have enabled him to puncture the shell which the Confederates managed by a show of strength to maintain, far outside of the real bounds of their territory, for nearly a year longer.

East Tennessee is separated from Kentucky by the Cumberland Mountains and from western Virginia by the Iron and Alleghany Mountains. The country is watered by the Holston and Clinch Rivers, which, flowing from the north and east, unite at Kingston and form the Tennessee River. The east Tennessee & Georgia Railroad, 130 miles long, connects Chattanooga at the southern end of the valley with Knoxville on the north, from which place the Virginia & Tennessee Railroad runs to Lynchburg, Va. The population, similar in character to that in eastern Kentucky and western Virginia, earnestly protested against the secession of the State, casting 30,903 votes against it to 5,507 votes in favor thereof. A subsequent election resulted in a vote of 32,923 votes against, to 14,780 in favor of the measure. Encouraged by the prospect of aid from the general government the Union men were actively engaged in organizing themselves into companies and regiments, with which to reenforce the troops that were expected from Kentucky, and were so largely in the majority in most of the counties as to render concealment of their designs unnecessary.

The Knoxville Whig, published by W. G. Brownlow, breathed out threatening and slaughter against the southern Confederacy, and the lack of arms only prevented an open resistance to its measures. Gen. Felix K. Zollicoffer, an ex-member of congress and editor of a Nashville paper, a man of high personal character and an ardent secessionist, was, in accordance with the recommendation of Gen. Polk, selected, July 26th, to command the Confederate forces in east Tennessee—the Tennessee troops having been transferred to the Confederacy.

It is generally conceded that Gen. Zollicoffer, upon assuming command of the district of east Tennessee, really desired to overlook the past offenses of the Union men, and to prevent, by a wise administration of the power with which he had been clothed, the atrocities which were being perpetrated upon them. He granted a ready audience to the persecuted citizens and issued orders against interference with the rights of property, and thus, but for his taking the field against the expected advance of the forces at camp Dick Robinson, and leaving the work of reconciliation that he had commenced to other hands, the annals of this period would not be stained by tales of rapine and murder.

The approach to east Tennessee from the north is guarded by a high range of mountains, through which there are three principal gaps or depressions, viz.: Pound Gap, 100 miles northeast from Knoxville; Jimtown Gap, eighty miles northwest, and Cumberland Gap, sixty-five miles northward. A turnpike extends from Nicholasville, Ky., southeast to Crab Orchard, sixty-five miles from Cumberland Gap, and from that point through the gap there is a dirt road, practicable until late in the fall for heavy wagons, but almost impassable in the winter. Along this road, for many years previous to the building of the Virginia & Tennessee, and the Kentucky Central Railroads, merchandise to supply the people of east Tennessee had been transported from Maysville, Ky., on the Ohio River. Fully alive to the importance of defending these gaps against the approach of the Union forces, Gen. Zollicoffer, early in August, disposed of his available force, thirty-three infantry companies, along the base of the mountains at the various gaps and bridle paths, to intercept communication between Kentucky and Tennessee Union men.

Using six cavalry companies as scouts between the different posts, he placed a section of light artillery in position at Cumberland Gap, and held a battery in reserve at Knoxville. Besides the infantry above referred to, he had one regiment and sixteen companies stationed along the line of the East Tennessee & Georgia Railroad, guarding bridges which had been threatened by the Union men. Notwithstanding the large amount of arms and ammunition which the seceded States had seized in the United States forts and arsenals, and which had been surrendered to them in almost every engagement since the beginning of the war, these important equipments for an army were, even so early as this, deplorably lacking and continued to be the "long-felt want" of the Confederacy until the close of the war. The search for arms ordered by Gov. Harris in Tennessee had resulted in bringing together a vast quantity of firearms, consisting of a heterogeneous mass of squirrel rifles, shot-guns and pistols, useless at long range, and these were supplemented with huge knives, intended to be used in carving the backs of the retreating enemy; for the pleasing illusion that "the Yankees would not fight" was not yet dispelled. August 29, Zollicoffer wrote to Adjt.-Gen. Cooper: "Reliable news just in from Hoskins' Cross Roads (Nelson's camp). Four thousand well-armed men there, and coming in 400 or 500 per day. Plenty arms. One thousand men at Barboursville; 700 at Williamsburg, without arms. East Tennesseans going on to Hoskins' for arms." The next week he received the unwelcome information from the war department at Richmond that no arms could be furnished him.

Early in September, he took military control of the railroads in east Tennessee to facilitate the transportation of supplies to the army in Virginia, and on the 9th announced a forward movement into Kentucky via Cumberland Gap. On the 21st he had taken position at the Gap, and finding himself unable to hold it with the means at his command if he should be attacked, made requisition for more artillery. He complained of the difficulty in obtaining accurate information, owing to the hostility of the country, and was unable to push his scouts but a short distance from camp.

Receiving orders from Gen. Johnston to await further orders, and time his movements by the advance of Buckner on the south, he turned his attention to strengthening his position. He soon found that the subsistence of a large force in a mountainous and hostile region was even a greater obstacle to his advance than the lack of artillery. On the 24th, he was out of bread. At this time his command at Cumberland Ford consisted of the Eleventh, Seventeenth, Nineteenth, and Twentieth Tennessee, and the Fifteenth Mississippi Infantry regiments, and the First, Second and Third Tennessee Cavalry regiments, which, with Rutledge's battery of light artillery, numbered 3,549 present for duty—aggregate present 4,578; besides 3,600 other troops, armed and unarmed, left behind in east Tennessee. On the following day, receiving supplies from his rear, he moved the Eleventh Tennessee Infantry, Col. Raines, and the First Tennessee Cavalry, Col. McNairy, forward, with six days' rations, to dislodge the Union force at Laurel Bridge to cover an expedition to the salt works in Clay County, Ky. This movement was entirely successful. The Union force, a picket of Wolford's cavalry, fell back, and the salt, about 200 barrels, found at the works, was recaptured and conveyed to the camp.

On the 20th of September, Gen. Thomas directed Col. T. T. Garrard to proceed with his regiment, the Seventh Kentucky Infantry, to Rockcastle Hills, beyond Crab Orchard, on the Cumberland Gap road, and take a strong position, fortifying it so as to enable him to defend himself against any force that might be sent against him. He had orders to build huts for his men, keep out intruders, to obtain all the information possible of the enemy's movements, and report the same to headquarters every day; to keep up communication with Col. Sidney M. Barnes at Irvine, whose regiment, the Eighth Kentucky Infantry, had been placed in position to intercept communication with the south via Pound Gap, and to capture any parties trying to escape into the Confederate lines.

Col. Bramlette, with his regiment (Third Kentucky Infantry), was stationed at Lexington, and on the 23d, by request of Mr. Fisk, of the senate, he took 300 of his men to Frankfort to guard the capital against an attack which seemed impending, leaving 350 men, under command of Lieut.-Col. Scott, at Lexington. The movements of the State Guard companies at this time were exceedingly mysterious, and gave rise to startling rumors of intended attack upon State or municipal property.

The event proved, however, that they were only desirous to get away to the Confederate lines with their arms, which necessitated stealthy movements. On the 26th Brig.-Gen. O. M. Mitchell, who had, on the 19th, assumed command of the "Department of the Ohio," which embraced Ohio, Indiana, and fifteen miles into Kentucky opposite Cincinnati, by invitation of Gen. Anderson and the Kentucky legislature took possession of the Kentucky Central Railroad as far south as Lexington. He directed Col. Vandever to station the companies of his regiment (the Thirty fifth Ohio Volunteer Infantry) at the various bridges along the line of the road, and sent Col. J. B. Steedman, with the Fourteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, to take his position on the Louisville, Frankfort and Lexington Railroad.

Gen. Thomas, having been informed by his outpost that the Confederates in heavy force had occupied London, felt that he could no longer risk the safety of his command, which, depleted by the absence of two regiments and Wolford's cavalry, left only the Fourth Kentucky Infantry and the Tennessee regiments at camp Dick Robinson. Col. W. A. Hoskins at Somerset, on the Cumberland River; Col. Barnes at Irvine, and Col. W. J. Landrum at Big Hill, on the road leading from London into Central Kentucky, via Richmond, were all actively engaged in recruiting and at the same time performing services as outposts.

On the 22d of September, he wrote Gen. Anderson, strongly urging that, to enable him to advance upon the enemy with any show of success, he should be supplied with 4,000 well drilled troops, consisting of four infantry regiments and a battery of artillery. He was constantly beset with importunities from citizens on both sides of the border to advance to their relief; but he was far too wise a commander to heed their appeals, no matter how much his heart might have been stirred by the recital of their wrongs. To this requisition, Gen. Anderson replied that Louisville was strongly threatened, and for the present no troops could be spared for the purpose for which they were required. Gen. Anderson wrote, however, to the president, and to the governors of Ohio and Indiana, stating the immediate necessity for compliance with the request of Gen. Thomas. Failing to receive the required re-enforcements from his department commander, Gen. Thomas dispatched the writer to confer with Gen. Mitchell, at Cincinnati, who at once ordered the Thirty-third Indiana, Col. John Coburn; the Thirty-first Ohio, Col. M. B. Walker; the Seventeenth Ohio, Col. Connel; the Thirty-eighth Ohio, Col. Bradley; the Twenty-first Ohio, Col. Norton, and two batteries of artillery, under Maj. Lawrence, to report for duty to Gen. Thomas.

Although greatly hampered in field operations by the lack of wagons, Gen. Thomas now determined upon an active campaign against Gen. Zollicoffer. On the 1st of October, he wrote Gen. Mitchell, thanking him for his prompt response to the call for troops, stating, at the same time, the pressing need for means of transportation, and closed as follows: "If you could send a column of about four regiments up the Big Sandy and move it south through the counties of Floyd, Letcher and Harlan, in co-operation with my advance by Barboursville, I believe that we might easily seize the railroad, and cut off all communication between Virginia and the south through Tennessee, before the enemy will have time to reenforce Zollicoffer sufficiently to prevent it."

This was practically the scheme contemplated in the order directing the organization of troops at camp Dick Robinson in July, and toward the consummation of which both Nelson and Thomas had bent their most strenuous efforts. But the government was yet to learn the ability of Gen. Thomas to conduct great enterprises. His army training rendered him incapable of resorting to the means used by many other commanders to bring himself into prominence. He had no political friend at the national capital to sound his praises in the ear of the president, and he would have regarded it as a breach of discipline to open correspondence with the war department, except through the regular channels. He was almost unknown to the press of the country. With the present knowledge of the weakness of the Confederate lines, and the great administrative ability of Gen. Thomas, there is no doubt, had the departments of the Ohio, and of the Cumberland, been united under his command, that the 15th of October would have found him at the head of a strong force at Knoxville, while the Confederate lines in Kentucky would have been compelled to resume their old position south of the Cumberland River.

Of all the regiments that had been sent to Kentucky, but one, the Thirty-third Indiana, was supplied with wagons, and this regiment was immediately sent to the front. The forward movement was retarded by the lack of transportation for the great quantity of camp equipage necessary for the proper care of men not yet inured to exposure, and for the organization of supply trains to transport subsistence stores from Nicholasville to the front, and to transport arms and army supplies to the unorganized regiments awaiting them in east Tennessee. Five hundred wagons (he had plenty of mules) would have enabled him to move forward at once, via Richmond and Crab Orchard, to London, where the two roads unite, and thence to Knoxville, with an army twice as large as that with which he afterward defeated Zollicoffer at Mill Springs, augmented by the organization of at least ten regiments of troops in east Tennessee. But the golden opportunity was allowed to pass. His repeated requests for means of transportation were unheeded until the winter rains had converted the clay roads into mud, so stiff and sticky that the strength of six mules was required to pull an empty wagon.

The records of the outbreak of the rebellion in Kentucky, as presented in the correspondence between the commanding officers of the Union and Confederate forces and their respective governments, exhibits the unprepared state of both sections of the country to enter upon a civil war of such magnitude as that of 1861. Both armies were in need of everything, except provisions, which, owing to the fertility of the soil, were plentiful. Each was able to keep up a line of defense against the encroachment of the other, but were powerless for offensive operations.

In compliance with the urgent requisitions of Gen. Sherman, a large number of regiments from the northwest arrived in October and November, and took position along the line extending from Nelson's Camp, at Maysville, around the borders of the Blue Grass region at camp Dick Robinson, Lebanon, and camp Nevin, where McCook was stationed with four brigades.

Nearly all these regiments came without camp and garrison equipage or baggage wagons, and the necessity for these increased as the season advanced. The impossibility of making any forward movement in the direction of Cumberland Gap without adequate transportation was again and again urged upon the authorities at Washington, but no heed was paid to the repeated requests. The condition of the Unionists in east Tennessee was growing more unbearable, and the urgent appeals of Johnson, Maynard, Carter and others for an advance, made to the president, induced him to attach blame to the commander of the troops designated from the first for this special movement. The war had not progressed far enough to show the utter helplessness of an army of men when moved from its base with no means of transportation for supplies. This knowledge came later and was gained at frightful cost.

Gen. Thomas had no sooner completed his plans for a forward movement from camp Dick Robinson in the direction of east Tennessee than he found himself superseded by Gen. Mitchell. Even at this early period of the war he was doomed to suffer the penalty that attached to every movement which from any cause was delayed beyond the expectation of the war department—the same penalty paid by McClellan, Buell, Grant, Rosecrans, and nearly every commander of prominence from the beginning to the end of the war, and which, four years later, came near causing him to be relieved on the eve of his last great battle.

Andrew Johnson, of east Tennessee, eager for an advance, and knowing nothing of the imperative needs of the army, before a forward movement could be undertaken with any prospect of success, growing impatient of delay, secured the following order for Gen. Mitchell to command the expedition in person:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, Oct. 10, 1861.

BRIG.-GEN. O. M. MITCHELL,

Commanding Department of the Ohio, Cincinnati, Ohio.

General:—By the direction of the secretary of war you are hereby assigned to duty in the Department of the Cumberland, and will repair to camp Dick Robinson, and there prepare the troops for an outward movement, the object being to take possession of Cumberland Ford and Cumberland Gap, and ultimately seize the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad, and attack and drive the rebels from that region of the country. You will report your instructions to Brig.-Gen. Sherman, in command of this department, and be governed by such further orders as he may give.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant, L. THOMAS, Adjutant-General.

On the reception of this order, Gen. Mitchell wrote Gen. Thomas as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO, CINCINNATI, OHIO, Oct. 10, 1861.

BRIG.-GEN. THOMAS,

Camp Dick Robinson.

General:— Under orders from the secretary of war of this date, I am directed to repair to camp Dick Robinson, and there prepare the troops for an outward movement, the object being to take possession of Cumberland Ford and Cumberland Gap, and ultimately seize the East Tennessee & Virginia Railroad.

In compliance with these orders, I desire you to move the three Ohio regiments now in camp Dick Robinson to some convenient point beyond your camp, in the hope that they may thus escape the epidemic now prevailing among your men. You will order the regiments at Nicholasville to remain there until their transportation shall arrive.

I beg you, General, to make every preparation in your power for this expedition in which we are about to be united.

It is my purpose to leave for the camp as soon as I am assured that supplies, transportation, ammunition and other necessaries are certain to be sent forward.

In the hope of soon greeting you in camp, I have the honor to be, very truly, your obedient servant, O. M. MITCHELL,

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Gen. Thomas replied:

HEADQUARTERS, CAMP DICK ROBINSON, GARRARD COUNTY, KY., October 11, 1861.

BRIG.-GEN. O. M. MITCHELL,

Commanding Department of the Ohio, Cincinnati, Ohio.

General:—Your communication of the 10th inst. was received to-day at the hands of Gov. Johnson, of Tennessee.

I have been doing all in my power to prepare the troops for a move on Cumberland Ford and to seize the Tennessee & Virginia Railroad, and shall continue to do all I can to assist you until your arrival here; but justice to myself requires that I ask to be relieved from duty with these troops, since the secretary has thought it necessary to supersede me in the command, without, as I conceive, any just cause for so doing.

I have already sent one regiment forward, and shall send the others as soon as I can get the transportation. It was my desire to have advanced two regiments and a battery about six miles beyond London, to secure the road to Barboursville and to protect a large tract of country abounding in forage, but up to this time have not been able to get the transportation.

I have also been very much embarrassed in my operations from the want of funds, not having received any since my arrival here, nearly a month ago. I hope the government will be more liberal with you.

I am, General, respectfully, etc.,

your obedient servant,

GEO. H. THOMAS,

Brigadier-General U. S. Vols., Commanding.

The order to supersede Gen. Thomas, however, was never carried out, owing to the protest of Gen. Sherman, whose confidence in the ability and patriotism of Gen. Thomas was unshaken during this trying period, and remained so during the eventful years that were to follow. Gen. Thomas, having written him with reference to the proposed action of Gen. Mitchell, received the following letter:

LOUISVILLE, KY., October 13, 1861.

BRIG.-GEN. GEORGE H. THOMAS,

Commanding Camp Dick Robinson.

Sir:—Your letters of the 11th and 12th of October were received last night. I would start for your camp at once, but am notified by the secretary of war that he will be here to meet me. The paymaster is here with funds. Col. Swords, quartermaster, has just reported, and I am assured that ample funds will be provided for all necessaries. I myself was compelled to endorse a draft to get money in bank. The fact is, the arrangement for the supply of money promised us before leaving Washington has not been promptly kept, but I am certain that very soon we will be supplied, and your loan of the bank shall be paid, if my order will accomplish it. In like manner I authorize you to go and prepare your command for active service.

Gen. Mitchell is subject to my orders, and I will, if possible, give you the opportunity of completing what you have begun. Of course I would do anything in my power to carry out your wishes, but feel that the affairs of Kentucky will call for the united action of all engaged in the cause of preserving our government.

I am, with great respect,

your obedient servant,

W. T. SHERMAN,

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

On the 21st of October Gen. Zollicoffer appeared before Garrard's position and fortified it well toward the front, but it was so located as to be easily turned by a force moving from the valley in his front, out the Winding Blades road, and thence upon his rear. Round Hill, standing between his works and this road, had been occupied by a small squad of Home Guards. The country is rugged and covered with dense underbrush. Col. Garrard's regiment, the Seventh Kentucky Infantry, was 600 strong; Col. John Coburn's regiment, the Thirty-third Indiana, was posted on Round Hill, with 250 of Wolford's calvary as a support. Brig.-Gen. Schoepf, who had reported a few days previously to Gen. Thomas, commanded the brigade. In obedience to Gen. Schoepf's order, Col. Coburn deployed 350 of his men around the hill as skirmishers. Col. Coburn says in his report of the battle:

In less than twenty minutes the rebels, who were concealed in the woods, commenced firing, when at almost the first fire Private McFarren, of Company D, was killed. In ten minutes more the enemy appeared in front of our position at the south, at a distance of half a mile, in the valley. They were in large numbers, and were over half an hour in passing by an open space in the woods, when they formed again in line. They soon came near us under cover of a wood, which entirely concealed their approach until we were apprised of their presence by the firing of musketry. At this time we were re-enforced by a portion of the Kentucky cavalry, dismounted, under Col. Wolford, about 250 strong, who immediately formed and took part in the engagement. The firing at this time was very severe, which caused the cavalry to waver and retreat. They were soon, however, rallied, and formed again in order, and fought with good spirit. The enemy engaged was composed of a portion of Gen. Zollicoffer's command, and consisted of two regiments of Tennesseans, under the command of Cols. Newman and Cummings. They charged up the hill upon us, and were met by a galling and deadly fire, which wounded and killed many of them. The front of their column approached within a few rods of us with their bayonets fixed, declaring themselves "Union men" and "all right," at the next moment leveling their guns at us and firing. After being engaged nearly an hour the enemy retreated, bearing off a portion of their dead and wounded in their arms. Our men have buried their dead left on the field and taken the wounded to the hospitals. Thirty corpses have been found up to this time. A large number of their wounded and dead were carried off in their wagons. It is safe to estimate the loss of the enemy at least 100 killed.

While the regiments above mentioned were engaged in the assault upon Round Hill, the remainder of Zollicoffer's force made a furious attack upon Garrard's position, but were repulsed after a brief engagement. In the following report of Gen. Zollicoffer, it will be observed that he set the example, which was closely followed by commanding officers of both sides during the war, of calling an unsuccessful attack a "reconnaissance:"

CAMP AT FLAT LICK, KNOX CO., KY., via KNOXVILLE, October 26, 1861.

On the 21st I reached the enemy's entrenched camp on Rockcastle Hills, a natural fortification almost inaccessible. Having reconnoitered it in force under heavy fire for several hours from heights on the right, left and in front, I became satisfied that it could not be carried otherwise than by an immense exposure, if at all. The enemy received large re-enforcements.

Our loss was forty-two wounded and eleven killed and missing. We captured twenty-one prisoners, about one hundred guns and four horses. The loss of the enemy in killed and wounded unknown.

The country is so poor we have exhausted the forage along the road for fifteen miles back in twenty-four hours. Our subsistence nearly exhausted. Under these circumstances I deemed it proper the next day to fall back. Enemy's camp said to be 7,000 strong, with large reserves near at hand.

F. K. ZOLLICOFFER.

Adjt.-Gen. Cooper.

The Union loss in the engagement was four killed and eighteen wounded, but Col. Coburn claims to have buried thirty of the enemy.

The Seventeeth and Fourteenth Ohio now appeared, accompanied by Capt. Standart's battery. Four companies of the Seventeenth, under Maj. Durbin Ward, advancing rapidly, arrived in time to deliver a parting shot at the retreating foe.

Gen. Schoepf was anxious to pursue the Confederates, and asked that depots of supplies be established for the use of his command at Crab Orchard and Wild Cat, expressing the opinion that he could scatter Zollicoffer's force and occupy Cumberland Gap. In compliance with this request, Gen. Thomas immediately forwarded to the front supplies of provisions and ammunition; ordered the Tennessee regiments to report to

Gen. Schoepf, and directed him to clear the road of obstructions preparatory to a forward movement. He at the same time moved his headquarters to Crab Orchard, leaving the Thirty-first to guard the stores at camp Dick Robinson. Everything now looked favorable for a forward movement. The troops, elated by an easy victory, were jubilant at the prospect of another engagement, while the time, which had hung heavily upon the hands of the Tennesseans, separated by only a few days' march from their homes, seemed to fly on golden wings.

Although still embarrassed from he lack of transportation, Gen. Thomas had determined if possible to carry forward the campaign, depending upon hiring wagons from the farmers, when, on the 25th of October, he received the following letter from Gen. Sherman, who had succeeded Gen. Anderson in command of the department:

HEADQUARTERS DEPT. OF THE CUMBERLAND,
LOUISVILLE, KY., October 25, 1861.

GEN. GEORGE H. THOMAS,
Camp Dick Robinson.

Sir:—Don't push too far Your line is already long and weak. I cannot now re-enforce you. Nelson has got into difficulty with the militia, and I have no person to send there. An interruption of the railroad, by an incursion from Prestonburg, would cut you off from that source of supply. Call to your assistance the regiment from Irvine. The State board is impressed with the necessity of engaging in the organization of the volunteers, but we are still embarrassed for the want of clothing and arms. Promises are a poor substitute for them, but are all we have.

I will again urge on the department the pressing necessity for more good officers and large re-enforcements of men. Yours, etc.,

W. T. SHERMAN,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

The bugbear of Buckner at Bowling Green, ever present to the vision of the commander of the department, was sufficient to keep twenty-four regiments on duty to prevent him from suddenly pouncing down upon the fair city of Louisville. On the 28th Gen. Thomas, on his return to headquarters from the front, wrote Gen. Sherman that he had moved his advance to the point of junction with the Richmond road, and would make arrangements to supply it from Lexington. He asked for four more regiments as a reserve in case of disaster, and proposed to take two months' supply of sugar and coffee, and other small stores, and thought he could get along without serious difficulty. At the same time, he, with the instinctive obedience of a true soldier, expressed a willingness to fall back if his superior thought he had advanced too far.

On the 9th of November, Sherman wrote Thomas as follows:

I wish I could make your communications perfectly safe, and the cost would be nothing. There should be at least ten good regiments to your rear, capable of sustaining the head of your column at London, but I am unable to provide; and hereabouts the army should be such as to prevent all idea of attack; but Buckner and Hardee have across Green River a very large force, and may advance at their pleasure. In this state of the case I can only repeat my former orders, for you to hold in check the force of Zollicoffer, and await events. The road by Richmond, depending on the ferry, appears to be less safe to you than the one crossing Kentucky River by the bridge.

And again on the 11th:

I have daily and constantly increased evidence of a vast force in our front, and that they are assembling wagons preparing for a move; and it is probable an advance on their part from Cumberland Gap along the line will be concentric and simultaneous. It was my judgment of the case when Secretary Cameron was here, and I begged him to prepare for it, but they never have attached the importance to Kentucky in this struggle that it merits.

My expression of dissatisfaction at the publication of Adjt.-Gen. Thomas' report, and request to be relieved from this charge, has led to the assignment of Gen. Buell, of whom I have not yet heard.

You should have at least 10,000 more men, and could I give them they should be there, but I cannot get them.

The new regiments arrive without notice, and perfectly raw.

All that I can do now is to say that I will approve of your course, let the result be what it may.

If you can hold in check the enemy in that direction, it is all that can be attempted; or if you must fall back, your line is toward Lexington; or if outnumbered, you are not bound to sacrifice the lives of your command.

Zollicoffer's withdrawal from Cumberland Ford seemed to have reference to a movement along the whole of Johnston's line. Gen. Sherman's idea was that Johnston had concentrated a force of 45,000 men at Bowling Green for a forward movement; that Zollicoffer was to act in concert with him by placing his army between Thomas and McCook; and, by gaining Thomas' rear, compel him to fall back from Crab Orchard to protect his base at Nicholasville and Lexington. He believed, with Thomas, that the force of the latter was far too small for offensive operations in the east Tennessee, and had no confidence in his receiving any considerable acquisition to his force from enlistment in that region. On the 22d of November, Col. Hoskins, at Somerset, informed Gen. Thomas that Zollicoffer, with a force estimated at 20,000, was at Monticello, advancing upon him. On the 3d Gen. Schoepf, in command at London, wrote that his forage was nearly exhausted, and that the Rockcastle River, between his camp and the rear, was liable at any moment to rise and cut him off from supplies. The limited transportation with which the army was supplied had rendered it impossible to accumulate a surplus. He corroborated the report that the enemy had withdrawn from the front. Previous to the reception of this intelligence, Gen. Sherman wrote Thomas, but subsequently determined to withdraw the forces under Thomas back to a point within striking distance of either route, through the mountains, that Zollicoffer might select. This retrograde movement met with indignant protests from the east Tennessee regiments, and Andrew Johnson lost no time in informing the authorities at Washington. Mr. Maynard visited Louisville and endeavored to get the order countermanded, but in vain. Gen. Sherman positively refused to advance into east Tennessee until he could supply Thomas with transportation and a reserve of at least 10,000 men. Gen. Thomas still desired to carry out the object of the expedition, and replied that he would give orders for a retrograde move, but was sure that the enemy was not moving between them; all his information indicated that the forces under Johnston were moving south.

Thomas accordingly sent the following order from Crab Orchard to Gen. Schoepf: "Gen. Sherman has just dispatched me that Gen. McCook sends him word that the enemy have disappeared from Green River, and there is a rumor that Buckner is moving in force toward Lexington, between us, and ordered me, if not engaged in front, to withdraw my force back to the Kentucky River, and act according to the state of facts then.

"As soon as you receive this, break up camp at London and join me here or at Nicholasville with all your troops. Hire transportation enough to bring your ammunition, and bring your camp equipage and three days' rations."

The November rains had commenced falling, and the clay roads, kneaded by passing trains of wagons into the consistency suitable for the potter's use, were knee-deep with mud. The Tennesseans, disappointed and chagrined at the failure of the enterprise in which they had staked their lives, mutinied, and refused to return. In vain their officers implored them to obey an order that they had been the first to denounce. They threw themselves upon the ground, and in their rage cursed everybody who had any connection with their misfortunes, from the president down to Gen. Schoepf. At last, yielding to the advice of their beloved commander, Lieut. Samuel P. Carter, they sullenly followed. It was a scene never to be forgotten by those who witnessed it. Strong and brave men cried like children, and with good reason. They were in sight of the mountains that separated them from their dear ones, whose very lives were in jeopardy from the lawless bands of freebooters, whose deeds of violence were rehearsed to them upon the arrival of every refugee; they had nursed their wrath while held like hounds in the leash, planning sweet revenge upon their ruthless enemies, and now, after months of weary waiting, the cup of vengeance was dashed from their lips.

Could the Union commanders have known the facts, as the records now show them to have been, that the Confederate forces under Buckner and Hardee did not exceed 12,500 men, and that Johnston could not, in the face of Grant's force operating on the Mississippi, re-enforce Bowling Green beyond 5,000 additional; that Zollicoffer's brigade did not exceed 6,000 for offensive purposes, and that Humphrey Marshall was so weak as to constitute no factor in the calculation of the Confederate strength, they would have had less reason to expect Johnston to assume the offensive. Nothing indeed was further from his intention. While Sherman was calling for more troops, ammunition and supplies, every day's mail carried to Richmond the same importunities from Johnston, Polk, Harris, and Zollicoffer. Through the innumerable spies that infested the Union camps, Johnston was kept accurately informed of Sherman's strength, while it is more than probable that the same spies, in the guise of Union men, acting in the Confederate interest vastly over-estimated the force of the enemy to Gen. Sherman, who was not alone in overstating the strength of the enemy. Gen. C. F. Smith, in command at Paducah, writing to Adjt.-Gen. Townsend, on the 6th of November, says: "At Columbus and vicinity Gen. Pillow has 10,000 men; on the opposite shore, 2,000; near Mayfield, 2,500; at Memphis, 3,000, and at Bowling Green 40,000. The enemy can concentrate at Columbus at any time 30,000 men." He had received this information from a "northern gentleman who had recently left there."

Thus ended the Tennessee expedition. Projected in wisdom, prosecuted against almost insurmountable obstacles with vigor and courage until success was in view, and then abandoned. Had it succeeded, as it might have done if the hands of Gen. Nelson or Gen. Thomas had been strengthened, the subsequent campaigns of the Army of the Cumberland would have had far different objective points. There would have been no invasion of Kentucky in 1862, with its retreat from Cumberland Gap and more disastrous battle at Perryville, and a mighty wall of partition would have been erected in east Tennessee, separating the Confederate armies and offering protection to the people of a vast territory whose loyalty, by its failure, was subjected to the severest test.

Gen. Sherman never regarded the movement in any other light than as a humanitarian idea which had been urged upon Mr. Lincoln, as both just and feasible, by Andrew Johnson, Horace Maynard, and other loyal men from Tennessee. When he feared that Thomas might be superseded unless a forward movement was made, he immediately ordered it, but after the repulse of Zollicoffer at Wild Cat demonstrated that the object of the expedition could be carried out, he threw obstacles in its way. In justice to Sherman it is but right to take into consideration the vast responsibility resting upon him as a commander of all the United States forces between the Confederate lines and the rich cities of Louisville, Cincinnati, Frankfort and Lexington. To allow Thomas to march into east Tennessee beyond his reach, would seem to invite Buckner to advance, by way of Lebanon, into the "Blue Grass Region" and take possession of the capital; and there was good reason to believe that the same force would, if driven out by Mitchell—for Sherman could not cover Louisville—take the route pursued by Gen. Thomas, thus cutting him off from his base of supplies.

The Confederate forces assembled near Bowling Green, called the "Central Army of Kentucky," under command of Buckner and Hardee, numbered, on November 15, according to the statement made by Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston to the war department, at Richmond, 12,500 effective men. The First Division, Western Department, under command of Gen. Polk, as reported in his returns for November 16, was as follows: Present for duty, 10,235 infantry, 579 artillery, 659 cavalry, total 13,142; aggregate present, 13,866. In addition to these forces, Col. Stanton had a cavalry command consisting of his own regiment and various battalions operating between Buckner and Zollicoffer, about Jamestown, estimated at about 2,000, and an equal force under Humphrey Marshall held possession of the counties of western Virginia, with a base of supplies at Wytheville, on the Virginia & Tennessee Railroad.

Against the latter force an expedition was planned by Gen. Anderson in September, and its execution entrusted to Gen. Nelson. Col. Harris, with the Second Ohio Infantry stationed at Olympian Springs, was ordered by Gen. Anderson to report to Nelson for duty. He had been joined at that place by Col.

Grigsby with 300 men of the Twenty-fourth Kentucky Infantry, whose rendezvous, camp Gill, was near by. In the absence of arms for the Kentucky regiments, it became necessary for Gen. Thomas to detach two more Ohio regiments to re-enforce Nelson, who, on the 18th of October, moved Harris and Grigsby forward, via Hazel Green, to take possession of McCormick's Gap. He had heard that the enemy, 1,500 strong, were at Hazel Green, and that 500 more were at West Liberty, five miles distant. Col. Sill, with the Thirty-third Ohio, pushed forward by forced marches to reach Harris in time to re-enforce him if necessary.

Gen. Nelson marched on the 23d with the Twenty-first Ohio, Col. Norton; the Thirty-ninth Ohio, Col. Fyffe, and Marshall's battalion. The same day Maj. Robinson, with two companies of the Thirty-third Ohio Volunteer Infantry, by a rapid march reached Hazel Green at 4 o'clock in the morning of the 23d. The march of Col. Harris on West Liberty was resisted by Capt. May with a few hundred men, who were easily driven off. Awaiting the arrival of his artillery and baggage train at Hazel Green, Nelson moved forward to Prestonburg, arriving November 5.

The following extract from Gen. Nelson's report gives an account of the engagement at Ivy Mountain:

At 1 P. M. the column had advanced along the narrow defile of the mountain that ends at Ivy Creek. The mountain is highest along the river and very precipitous and thickly covered with timber and undergrowth, and the road, which is but seven feet wide, is cut along the side of it about twenty-five feet above the river, which is close over the road. The ridge descends in a rapid curve, and very sharp, to the creek, or rather gorge, where it makes a complete elbow. Behind this ridge and all along the mountain side, the enemy, 700 strong, lay in ambush, and did not fire until the head of Col. Marshall's battalion, himself leading, was up to the elbow. The skirmish was very sharp. The mountain side was blue with puffs of smoke, and not an enemy to be seen. The first discharge killed four and wounded thirteen of Marshall's men. I ordered the Kentuckians to charge. Col. Harris, whose regiment was immediately behind me, led his men up the mountain side most gallantly, and deployed them along the face of it.

Col. Norton, whose regiment had just reached the defile, anticipating an order from me, led his men up the northern ridge of the mountain and deployed them along the face of it and along the crest, and went at them. Two pieces of artillery were got in position in the road and opened upon them. Owing to the steepness of the mountain all this required time. On the opposite side of the river, which here is narrow, deep and swift, there were also rebels who annoyed us. In an hour and twenty minutes the rebels were beaten and fled, leaving a number of killed and wounded on the ground, and six prisoners unhurt. As I marched immediately in pursuit, I do not report what their loss was. I am told to-day that thirty-two dead were found. Among the wounded in our hands is H. M. Rust, late State senator from Greenup County, Ky. Our loss is six killed and twenty-four wounded. If I had here any cavalry I would have taken or slain the whole of them; as it was, the enemy retreated, cutting down trees across the narrow road, and burning or cutting all the bridges, which are numerous. I bivouacked four miles beyond Ivy Creek. It rained, and the men waded through mud and in a heavy rain all day of the 9th, the march being heavy and slow on account of the trees across the roads, and the necessity of repairing the bridges. Last night we again bivouacked in the November rain, and entered this place this morning at 9 A.M., where I found Col. Sill, who had arrived the night previously, and fired on the enemy as they were retreating.

Meantime Gen. Sherman had exhausted the language in petitioning the war department to equip his army. Gen. Fremont had signalized his advent to the army by the purchase, in Europe, of a large quantity of Belgian rifles, which, with an ingenuity in fraud that would have caused the maker of the original wooden nutmeg to blush for shame, had been altered from flint-locks to percussion by the simple device of driving in a tube. Like Hodges' razors, they were good enough to sell, but in practice, the tubes not being screwed in, had the unpleasant habit of blowing out into the faces of the men who pulled the triggers. Spurned with contempt from one army to another, 10,000 of these hermaphrodite arms found their way to Sherman; the authorities probably considering that the guns were as pronounced in character as the people were in their loyalty.

Of all people in the Union there were none more competent to judge of the value of fire-arms than Kentuckians. Accustomed to field sports, their skill in the use of rifles was proverbial, and they no sooner saw the weapons designed for their use than they indignantly refused to accept them. Gen. Sherman was totally unsupplied with money, and on one occasion was obliged to indorse a note in bank to obtain a small amount to meet minor expenses. He had neither chief quartermaster nor chief commissary, and in point of quartermaster and subsistence stores he would have been as deficient as in ordnance stores but for the richness of the country in which his army was located, and the willingness of the inhabitants to accept government vouchers in exchange for their produce. In a recent interview with Gen. Sherman, he related to the writer the following incident:

"Some time after I had superseded Gen. Anderson in command of the department, I one day confided to Hon. Joshua F. Speed, a true-hearted Union man of Louisville, the embarrassments under which I labored, soundly berating the war department, which had placed me in command, while it withheld the means necessary to make my force effective. 'What do you want?' said Mr. Speed. 'Everything,' said I; 'arms, wagons, tents, bread and meat, money and a competent staff.' 'Name what you want on paper, and give it to me,' said Mr. Speed. I did as requested, and handed it over. Nothing more was seen of Mr. Speed for several days, when he entered my room and handed me copies of orders directing Col. Thomas Swords, assistant quartermaster-general, and Capt. H. C. Symonds, commissary of subsistence, to report to me for duty. The order directed Col. Swords to draw for present needs $100,000. He had also a copy of an order, drawn by President Lincoln himself, upon the ordinance department for 10,000 Springfield rifles of the latest design. 'How is this,' I exclaimed, 'that more attention is paid to the requests of you, a citizen, than of me, a general in the army? You had better take command here.' 'I can explain it,' said Mr. Speed. 'Many years ago I was engaged in business in Springfield, Illinois. I had a little store where I kept a miscellaneous stock of calico, horse-collars, molasses, nails, hair-brushes, quinine, and other articles of daily use in the community. I had a clerk, and had fitted up for our joint occupancy, a room over the store, to be used as a bed-room. Having a stove in the back part of the store, the space around it naturally became a snug lounging place for the young men of the village. Among these were two young lawyers, who were eking out a precarious livelihood at the bar, and who I remember usually chose their position in proximity to the sugar barrel. The names of these two young men were Abraham Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas. One day Mr. Lincoln, sitting with his feet on the stove, asked me the price of a bedstead, mattress, pillow and bed clothing, saying in reply to my inquiry that he thought of fixing up a bed in his office, thereby economizing in his expenses. I figured up the cost, but told him that I had a better plan, that my clerk had lost his health, and gone back to Kentucky to regain it, and that I would be glad to have him for a roommate. He at once went up stairs on a prospecting tour, came down, went over to his office, and returning with a pair of saddlebags he carried them up stairs. Presently he came down and resumed his seat, saying, 'Well, Speed, I've moved.' He lived with me a long time, long enough for me to love and admire him, and to watch his upward course with certainty that it would not stop short of the White House, and I was not surprised when he reached it. I took your memoranda, and went to Washington. I immediately called upon the president and made known our wants in Kentucky. He complied readily with every request I made, and the only mistake you made, General, was in not asking for more.' "

CHAPTER XVI.

MILITARY OPERATIONS IN KENTUCKY, TENNESSEE AND MISSISSIPPI.

THE visit of Secretary Cameron and Adjt.-Gen. Thomas to Louisville, on October 16, 1861, resulted in the removal of Gen. Sherman from the command of the Department of the Cumberland. Of this interview, Gen. Sherman says, in his "Memoirs": "I remember taking a large map of the United States, and, assuming the whole South to be in rebellion, and that our task was to subdue them, showed that McClellan was on the left, having a frontage of less than 100 miles, and Fremont on the right about the same, whereas I, the center, had, from Big Sandy to Paducah, over 300 miles of frontier; that McClellan had 100,000 men, Fremont 60,000, while to me had been allotted only 18,000. I argued that for purpose of defense we should have 60,000 men at once, and for offense would need 200,000 before we were done. Mr. Cameron, who lay on the bed, threw up his hands and exclaimed: 'Great God! where are they to come from.' I asserted that there were plenty of men at the north ready and willing to come if he would only accept their services, for it was notorious that regiments had been formed in all the northwestern States whose services had been refused by the war department, on the ground that they would not be needed. We discussed all these matters fully, in the most friendly spirit, and I thought I had aroused Mr. Cameron to a realization of the great war that was before us, and was, in fact, upon us. I heard him tell Gen. Thomas to make a note of our conversation, that he might attend to my requests on reaching Washington."

After the war was over Gen. Thomas T. Wood, who was present, prepared a statement, addressed to the public, describing this remarkable interview, in which he refers as follows to Gen. Sherman's demand for a sufficient force to enable him to assume the offensive: "Ascending from the consideration of the narrow question of the political and military situation in Kentucky, and the extent of force necessary to redeem the State from rebel thralldom, forecasting in his sagacious intellect the grand and daring operations which three years afterward he realized in a campaign, taken in its entirety, without a parallel in modern times, Gen. Sherman expressed the opinion that, to carry the war to the Gulf of Mexico, and destroy all armed opposition to the government in the entire Mississippi Valley, at least 200,000 troops were absolutely required."

Although, in the light of the records now attainable, it is true that both Gens. Sherman and Smith overestimated the forces under Johnston, it does not follow that the immense re-enforcements demanded by Sherman in his interview with Adjt.-Gen. Thomas were required merely for operations against the enemy in his immediate front. The clamor of the people in the north for our immediate advance along the entire line could not remain long unheeded. They had contributed their best blood to the army of the Union. They had sent their sons, brothers, fathers and husbands to fight the enemy, and had received them back to their homes, or found them in hospitals, not suffering from wounds received in glorious war, but wasted by disease contracted in camp.

Hitherto victory had perched upon the Confederate banners. Gen. Sherman knew that the people were ready with laurels to deck the brow of the first victorious general, and he also knew that the prize of victory could not be gained over Johnston, for whose military character he had the most profound respect, without the sacrifice of many lives in a general engagement. To place a force in east Tennessee sufficient for offensive purposes upon his left, to leave an army of occupation in Kentucky to guard his lines of transportation back to his base of supplies, and still leave him a sufficient force to follow up his victory over Johnston by a bold advance into the heart of the Confederacy, he asked for 200,000 men.

This astounding proposition was met only by ridicule. Transmitted by the adjutant-general to the war department, whence it found its way into the newspapers, it was everywhere received with jeers of contempt, until one, more witty than his fellows, suggested that a man who could be guilty of such stupendous folly must be insane. Instantly the cry was taken up by hundreds, and evidence sufficient to convince a jury was published to the world. He had ordered a newspaper reporter to go back to Louisville as fast as his legs could carry him when he made the advance to Muldraugh's Hill in September, and threatened to have him shot; then, suddenly relenting, had invited him to dinner. He had sworn vociferously at the war department for paying no heed to his requisitions, and had displayed unjustifiable temper on many occasions. He had granted leaves of absence to officers, and before the term was half expired had ordered them back to camp.

These and a thousand other charges were gravely repeated; and, gathering strength as they went, reached the ears of Gen. McClellan, who relieved him of his command and ordered him to report to Gen. Halleck, at St. Louis, where he could do no further harm. The forces asked for by Gen. Sherman, when stripped of its sick after three months' drilling in camp, would probably have diminished one-fourth. Three additional months' exposure to battle, marching and disease would have left him with not more than 100,000 men present for duty. But the people were not yet ready for their Sherman and Thomas and Grant. They had to learn their needs in the school of experience before they were ready to intrust the same officer whom they had ignorantly rejected with the command of an army of equal strength for the performance of the same service.

Gen. Johnston had experienced equal difficulty with Gen. Sherman in obtaining means to take the offensive. His army east of the Mississippi, in round numbers 50,000 strong, had been reduced by sickness and death incident to the formation of an army from a citizen populace to 36,500, occupying a line stretching from western Virginia around the eastern and southern borders of Kentucky to the western borders of Missouri and Arkansas. Relying upon the augmentation of his forces by recruiting from the States in his military department, he had, in compliance with the unwise advice of leading men, issued calls upon the governors for 50,000 men, to serve for only one year. While this force was in process of formation it was arrested by an order from the war department, the authorities at Richmond wisely declining to arm and equip men whose term of service would probably expire at a time when their service would be most needed. Failing to obtain a sufficient number of three years' men, or even arms and equipments for those already recruited, he was compelled to withdraw Hardee's division, 4,000 strong, from Arkansas to re-enforce Buckner at Bowling Green.

Precisely as the authorities at Washington in 1861 turned a deaf ear to the repeated requisitions of Sherman for men and army supplies, using the vast resources of the government for the equipment of an army for the defense of the capital, so the Confederate authorities regarded the operations in the west as of secondary importance as compared with the defense of their capital, which, with Quixotic zeal, to recompense Virginia for joining the fortunes of the Confederacy, they had located at Richmond. In the game of war at which each were playing, the "kings" were placed at the front, and all the smaller pieces were used to defend them.

The vain-glorious boasting of southern newspapers and orators, which had aided in procuring the secession of the States and the early enlistment of volunteers in the Confederate armies, now, coupled with a few Confederate victories, served the unexpected purpose of discouraging enlistments. Ignorant of the requirements of the hour, and lulled by the constant reports of success to their arms, the people of the south allowed the period, that was being utilized by the North in active preparation for war, to pass without lifting a hand to re-enforce the armies in the front. On the 29th of November, Gen. Johnston wrote to the secretary of war, after having called upon the governors for the State militia: "We are making every effort to meet the forces the enemy will soon array against us. Had the exigency for my call of 50,000 men in September been better comprehended and responded to, our preparations for this great emergency would now be complete."

Both Gen. Johnston and Gen. Buckner were disappointed in the number of recruits who joined their standard from Kentucky. A force double that of Buckner had by this time been enrolled in Kentucky under the banner of the Union, and were utilizing every moment in perfecting themselves in drill at the various encampments. Most of the Kentuckians who had accepted service in the southern army, up to this date, were comprised in one brigade at Bowling Green, commanded by Col. Roger Hanson, a brother of Lieut.-Col. Charles S. Hanson, of the Twentieth Kentucky Infantry United States Volunteers. They were the Second, Third, Fourth and Fifth Kentucky Infantry, commanded by Cols. Hanson, Thompson, Trabue, Hunt and Lewis, and the regiment of cavalry, commanded by Col. Helm. Brig.-Gen. John C. Breckinridge was on the 14th of November assigned to the command of this brigade. The First Kentucky, under Col. Thomas Taylor, served in Virginia.

Brig.-Gen. Don Carlos Buell assumed command of the Department of the Ohio, which was made by consolidation of the Departments of the Ohio, Cumberland and the West, on the 15th of November, 1861. The States comprised in the new department were Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, and that portion of Kentucky lying east of the Cumberland River and Tennessee. The southwest corner, in which the towns of Paducah, Mayfield, Columbus and Hickman were located, known as the Jackson Purchase, belonged to the Department of the Missouri, commanded by Maj.-Gen. Halleck. Gen. Buell graduated at West Point in the class of 1841. Assigned to the Third Infantry, he bore his part in the Mexican war with honor, and, remaining in the army, rose by regular promotion to the rank of major and assistant adjutant-general in 1861. At the breaking out of the war he was on the staff of Brevet Brig.-Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, commanding the Department of the Pacific. Appointed brigadier-general of volunteers May 17, 1861, he spent the summer on the heights of Arlington in command of a division in the Army of the Potomac.

Twenty years' constant service in the army, much of which had been spent in the adjutant-general's department, peculiarly fitted him for the duty of organizing an army. His mind, clear and comprehensive in its grasp of the minute details incident to such a task, as well as of planning great campaigns, enabled him to quickly arrive at a just conception of the magnitude of the operations before him, and to note the deficiencies that had plagued his predecessor. In the letter of instructions appointing Buell to the command of the department, written by Gen. McClellan, two points were emphasized, viz.: 1st—the people of Kentucky and Tennessee were to be assured that the institution of slavery was as secure in the Union as it could be in the Confederacy; and, 2d—the objective point of Buell's first campaign was to be Knoxville, in east Tennessee.

Operations in West Virginia having reached a point where a part of the troops could be spared from that department, several well-disciplined regiments were now ordered to report to Gen. Buell for duty. Among these troops were the First and Second Kentucky Infantry. Capt. Simmon's company had been detached from the First Infantry and converted into an artillery company, soon after the arrival of these regiments in West Virginia in July, and still remained there, assigned to the division of Gen. W. S. Rosecrans, and stationed at Gauley Ridge. The Kentucky regiments had participated in several engagements under Gen. Cox, in one of which Col. Woodruff and Lieut.-Col. Neff, of the Second, riding in advance of their regiments, were captured. The two regiments, commanded by Cols. Sedgwick and Enyart, were, on their arrival, stationed at Bardstown, Ky.

On relinquishing command, Gen. Sherman, on the 16th, telegraphed the fact to Gen. Thomas, and directed him to remain at Crab Orchard. In withdrawing the troops of his command from London, Gen. Thomas had left the Tennessee regiments and Seventh Kentucky Infantry under command of Gen. Carter, at that point, and he now telegraphed Gen. Buell, asking if the order to fall back contemplated the withdrawal of that brigade, as it would be difficult to subsist. On the 19th Buell directed him to withdraw his entire force to a point where they could be supplied from Louisville. Carter, therefore, removed to Somerset, and Thomas, with the main force, to Lebanon.

The consolidation of the Departments of the Ohio and Cumberland gave Gen. Buell an advantage which had never been enjoyed by either Gens. Anderson or Sherman. It gave him the control of the new levies being raised in the States north of the Ohio as well as the vast quantity of military stores in that region. Gen. Buell had formed a plan of campaign that he confided to McClellan, which involved the movement upon east Tennessee, via Somerset, near which place Zollicoffer was encamped, to be made simultaneously with an advance upon Nashville, via Gallatin, passing Bowling Green on the east, while, at the same time, a demonstration was to be made against Columbus, and a heavy force ascending the Cumberland was to unite with the land force at Nashville. He proposed that while those active movements were in progress, to hold Buckner in check by a heavy force in his front. This was substantially the same as that carried out three months later by Halleck, in which Buell was allowed only the subordinate part of contributing troops.

His practical eye saw so many deficiencies in the organization of his army, which time alone could remedy; he was so anxious that his movements should bear the stamp of military genius, and that defeat should not mar his fortunes, that he delayed his movement until the plan of a campaign, the success of which would have stamped him as the hero of 1861, was imparted to Gen. Halleck, a rival department commander, whose only title to military renown rests upon carrying it out by the successful ascent of the Cumberland and the capture of Nashville. Buell and Halleck were in command of separate departments, and could neither give nor receive orders from each other; they could only act in concert, and to produce concert of action, orders must be given from the general-in-chief of the United States army, Gen. McClellan, or the war department. Gen. Buell endeavored to procure orders to that effect, and so far succeeded as to divert attention from the east Tennessee campaign, which, although persistently urged, was not positively ordered.

On the 5th of December he received the following dispatch from army headquarters:

WASHINGTON, December 5, 1861.

GEN. BUELL, Louisville:

I have again telegraphed Maj.-Gen. Halleck for information as to his gun-boats and disposable troops. As soon as I receive reply I will arrange details with you. Send me draft of water in Cumberland River to Nashville, and in Tennessee River.

Your letter of the 30th received.

GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN.

Gen. Buell now proceeded to dispose his forces with reference to an advance in conjunction with Halleck. One column was placed at Munfordsville, on Green River, in Buckner's immediate front; one column at Green River on the turnpike leading from Bardstown to Glasgow; one at Columbia and one at Lebanon, and one, guarding the lower Green River, was stationed at Owensboro. He had been promised re-enforcements from Missouri, and everything looked promising for an early advance, when operations were suspended by the illness of Gen. McClellan.

Gen. Halleck had in his command two restless spirits, whose ambition to strike a blow which should redound to their advantage, rendered them impatient of restraint. One was Brig.-Gen. U. S. Grant, in command of the district in which the proposed expedition was to be fitted out, and the other Brig.-Gen. W. T. Sherman, but recently in command of the Department of the Cumberland, and, it may be supposed, not over zealous for the honor and glory of his successor. He had a vivid recollection of the contumely with which he had been treated when he tried to collect a force to break the long truce that had existed along his southern line, and now that there was a prospect for an advance he naturally urged his new department commander to make the most of his opportunities. Gen. Sherman, however, had no command, and could only urge the Tennessee River as the point of attack, leaving the laurels to be gathered by Gen. Grant, who, having tested the fighting qualities of his men at Belmont, was eager to advance. Buell, on the other hand, knew Johnston well. He had had ample opportunity to judge of his prudence and forethought, and doubtless credited the reports made to him of the strength of Johnston's army the more readily because of this. Knowing the general with whom he had to contend, he utilized the delay caused by the sudden illness of Gen. McClellan in brigading his troops and placing them under command of the most efficient officers at his disposal. The time thus occupied was by no means wasted, as the future record of his army amply testifies.

On the 9th of November Gen. Johnston directed Gen. Hardee to send a force of 1,200 men, with a squadron from Terry's command, to Jamestown, Ky., and Tompkinsville, Ky., to attack and destroy Union camps, and to look out for any demonstration on the part of the enemy toward cutting the railroad in the rear of Bowling Green. Col. Pat Cleburne was entrusted with the command of this expedition. The command reached Jamestown on the 11th, from which place Cleburne reported that they "found the inhabitants bitterly hostile; nearly every house has some friend in the Lincoln army." He was informed that there were "3,000 troops at Campbellsville, and an equal number at Columbia and Lebanon." The expedition reached Tompkinsville on the 12th, where an old lady met him with an open Bible in her hand, saying she was prepared and ready to die. Ordering his bands to the front, colors open, bayonets fixed, the march at attention was resumed, for the purpose of making as fine a display as possible. But his play was to empty benches; even the streets of Coventry were not more deserted when the good lady Godiva rode through them clothed only in her shining hair. The inhabitants had probably entertained these Confederate strangers before. After searching the houses of Col. Frame and other Union men for arms, and hearing that Rousseau with 10,000 or 15,000 men was advancing, he returned by the same route he had advanced.

On the 17th Gen. Hindman, in command of 1,100 infantry, 250 cavalry, and four pieces of artillery, was sent to dislodge Col. Willich, with the Thirty-second Indiana Infantry, from Woodsonville (or Rowlett's Station), on the south side of Green River. Advancing through a dense forest Hindman was able to approach unseen to within three-quarters of a mile of the river.

Four companies of the regiment, under Lieut.-Col. Van Trebra, were on duty on the south side of the river, and received the first charge of the cavalry, under Col. Terry. They defended themselves gallantly until reenforced by the remaining companies from the north side. Hindman's infantry now advanced with loud yells, and were received with such a deadly volley of musketry as to cause them to waver and fall back. Terry's cavalry charged again and again, only to be driven back in confusion. At length Terry rallied seventy-five men, and fell upon a body of the Thirty-second, deployed as skirmishers, under command of Capt. Welschbilling. The veteran coolness of the skirmish line enraged him, and, charging too far, followed by only six of his men, he was killed. The enemy now opened with his artillery, but with little effect, and the sudden appearance on his flank of a company of the Thirty-second, hitherto held in reserve, caused the belief that re-enforcements had arrived for the Union forces, when he hastily retired. Col. Willich arrived upon the field during the progress of the engagement, and took charge of the right wing. His entire force present upon the field numbered only 414 officers and men, of which he lost ten killed, twenty-two wounded and five missing. Hindman acknowledged a loss of only four killed and ten wounded, but his estimate of Willich's loss—"seventy-five killed, and wounded unknown"—entitles his report to be received with considerable allowance. Gen. Buell's official report claims the Confederate loss to have been thirty-three killed and about fifty wounded, which sounds better for the courage of Hindman's men.

Col. N. B. Forrest, a citizen of Memphis, who early in the summer had undertaken to organize a cavalry regiment, rendezvoused at Fort Donelson, in October, with eight companies—650 men. At his own request he was assigned to Tilghman's command at Hopkinsville. A remarkable prediction in regard to Forrest appears in a letter from Mr. Sam. Tate to Gen. Johnston, dated November 4th: "Give Forrest a chance, and he will distinguish himself." How well the prophecy of Samuel was verified is prominently set forth in both Union and Confederate histories, and four years later received the sanction of one of the greatest of American generals, George H. Thomas.

Forrest's cavalry was actively employed on picket duty during the month of December. The debatable ground, lying between the front of Tilghman at Hopkinsville and Crittenden at Calhoun, was the scene of almost daily skirmishes between small bodies of cavalry from adjacent camps. Villages were occupied alternately by Union and Confederate troopers, and the inhabitants kept constantly on the alert to change their politics in time to welcome the intruders. On the 26th of December, Gen. Johnston ordered a cavalry reconnaissance toward Crittenden's camp, and Forrest, at the head of 300 men, reached Greenville on the 28th.

Col. James S. Jackson had by this time completed the organization of his regiment (the Third Kentucky Cavalry) at Calhoun, and a young major in command of a battalion, Eli H. Murray, now governor of Utah, burning with patriotic ardor and fearful that the war would end before he could have an opportunity to dint his bright new sword in conflict with the enemy, hearing of Forrest's advance, craved permission to meet him with his battalion, numbering 168 men. The engagement took place at Sacramento, near which place Forrest was met by a young lady equally filled with Confederate enthusiasm, and whose beauty, Forrest reported, caused him to burn with knightly zeal, who galloped down the road to point out Murray's position. Forrest charged immediately with 150 men, but was met by Murray with forty-five of his men with so much spirit that he was compelled to retire. Maj. Murray behaved with great gallantry and would have repulsed the second charge made by Forrest with his entire force had not a dastard of his command shouted, "Retreat to Sacramento!" Most of the men fled at once in defiance of the orders of their commander, and Forrest, seeing the retreat, now charged down upon the fugitives, converting the retreat into a rout. Murray's loss was six killed, among whom was Capt. Albert Bacon, of Frankfort, Ky., whose courage and soldierly conduct was noticed by Forrest in his report, and seven privates wounded and captured. Capt. Davis, whose conspicuous courage led him too far within the Confederate lines, was captured by Forrest in person. Forrest's loss, as stated by himself, was two killed, one of whom was Capt. Meriwether, and three were wounded. Forrest returned at once to Hopkinsville, where he remained until February 7, when he covered the retreat of the Confederate brigade to Clarksville. Jackson, on hearing of the skirmish at Sacramento, immediately started with 500 of his regiment in pursuit of Forrest, but did not overtake him.

The battle of Mill Springs, or Fishing

Creek, as it is termed by Confederate writers, carried a gleam of sunshine into the war department at Washington, and created corresponding gloom in the Confederate camp. It was the first movement against the enemy that had succeeded. Intended merely as a diversion, it demolished an army. The Union army, east and west, had hitherto been engaged in fruitless skirmishes or in inglorious repulses, such as those of Stone, on the Potomac, or Grant, at Belmont. The president, sick at heart by reason of the masterly inactivity displayed by his generals all along the line, from the Mississippi to tide water, held firmly to the helm of the ship of state, hoping, sometimes possibly with the facts against him, that he would outride the storm.

Gen. Thomas had removed his headquarters to Lebanon, Ky., in December, and at once set about the formation of his division, numbering 10,000 men. Gen. Schoepf's brigade, stationed at Somerset, was joined early in January, 1862, by acting Brig.-Gen. S. P. Carter's brigade, consisting of the First and Second Tennessee Regiments, the Seventh Kentucky having been left at camp Calvert, near London, to guard that avenue of approach from Cumberland Gap. The effective strength of these regiments was 1,041. Gen. Buell, full of his plan of operations against the main force of the enemy in his front, which involved the active co-operation of Gen. Halleck, by an attack upon the left flank of the enemy at Forts Henry and Donelson, while he should, by a rapid movement, flank the force at Bowling Green, was still obliged to give attention to the menace upon his rear offered by Humphrey Marshall, and upon his left by Zollicoffer. Against the first he dispatched Garfield; and Gen. Thomas, on the 29th of December, was directed to strike a vigorous and decided blow upon the latter. In his instructions to Thomas, Gen. Buell directed that he should move upon Zollicoffer's left and endeavor to cut him off from his line of retreat across the river, while Schoepf attacked him in front. The result, he said, ought to be at least a severe blow to the enemy or a hasty flight across the river. Having accomplished this object, Thomas was to be ready to move in any direction; but unless circumstances required him to act without delay, he was to await further orders. The command of Gen. Thomas constituted an important portion of the flanking column before referred to, and it was to be kept in condition to move promptly when ordered.

One condition existing at this season of the year, constituted an insurmountable obstacle to celerity of movement. The clay subsoil of Kentucky—an invaluable factor in the fertility of the agricultural regions—when soaked with rains, which drench the ground during the winter months, is of about the consistency of thick mortar. The roads, when not turnpiked and much traveled, become almost impassable. The depth of mud is measured by the length of the horses legs or the spokes in the wheels of passing vehicles. It was over a road of this character that the course of Gen. Thomas' army lay from Columbia to Logan's Cross-Roads. There was a turnpike from Lebanon to Columbia, to which point a supply of subsistence stores was sent a few days previous to the march.

The movements of Gen. Thomas are best given in his own language:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF THE OHIO, CAMP NEAR WEBB'S CROSS-ROADS, KY., January 13, 1862.

BRIG.-GEN. SCHOEPF, Commanding at Somerset:

I received yours of the 11th to-day, by Capt. Hale. When I last wrote to you I was in the hopes of being near Somerset by this time, but the heavy rains have injured the roads so much that it will be impossible to say now when I can be in your vicinity. We have already been three days in making sixteen miles, and our ammunition and provisions are far behind now—probably will not be up by to-morrow night. Should I ever succeed in getting near you, I will send a messenger to let you know. I wrote to Gen. Buell five days since, submitting your proposition of crossing the river, and attacking from the bluffs of Meadow Creek, but have received no reply from him up to this time. As soon as I hear I will write you the result.

I have not had time to converse fully with the men you sent me, but if it be possible to approach the enemy by the way of White Oak Creek I should like to have them as guides.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE H. THOMAS.

Brigadier-General, United States Army, commanding.

Gen. Zollicoffer, having fortified the gaps in the Cumberland range, had, as has been stated, moved southward, and, by direction of Gen. Johnston, taken position at Mill Springs, on the south bank of the Cumberland, five miles below the mouth of Fishing Creek. This stream, flowing southward in a deep ravine, crosses the roads leading from Somerset to the ferry at Mill Springs. On the 9th of December, Zollicoffer crossed the river and erected fortifications on the north bank at a place called Beach Grove, an eminence protected on its rear and flanks by the river, and with only about 1,200 yards of fighting front to defend. The slope ascending from the valley to the intrenchments he covered with an abatis of fallen trees, and communication was kept up with Mill Springs by means of a small steamboat and two flats.

Gen. George B. Crittenden arrived at Mill Springs and assumed command about the 1st of January. Although he did not like Zollicoffer's position, "with an enemy in front and a river behind," he took no measures to recall him to the south bank, and, regardless of the instructions of Gen. Johnston to remain strictly on the defensive, he removed his entire force to Beech Grove. Crittenden's weekly report of the strength of his command, on the 7th of January, shows an aggregate present and absent of 9,417 men; present for duty, 6,444. This force was organized as follows: Four battalions (seven companies) of cavalry, two batteries of artillery, and eight regiments of infantry, amply sufficient to guard the front of the entrenched position, provided the infantry were well armed and well disciplined, and the guns of sufficiently heavy caliber to keep the light artillery of an assaulting force at a distance.

But in these requisites for successful defense, his army was almost as deficient as that of Humphrey Marshall, while his facilities for escape, if hard pressed, were totally inadequate. With the knowledge that he possessed of the forces concentrating in his front, there is no doubt that Crittenden would have lost no time in removing his command to the south bank of the Cumberland, but for the unwise decision of a council of war, held at his headquarters, that the forces of Gen. Thomas should be attacked and defeated in detail before they could concentrate for an assault upon his position. The eloquence of Zollicoffer had imbued his men with some degree of his own impetuous bravery, and had created an ardor to meet the Union forces in the open field, where they were led to believe that a bold and rapid charge would carry everything before it. Gen. Crittenden, who was an utter stranger to the men, found himself in a position where, to obey the dictates of his judgment, he must antagonize the warlike spirit that had been instilled into the minds of his troops, who demanded to be led against the enemy, and, fearing to withdraw without offering battle would jeopardize his standing in the command and demoralize his men, he consented to hazard everything upon the issue of a battle.

He had the following troops at his disposal:

Weekly return of the command of Gen Zollicoffer, Camp Beech Grove, Ky., for the week ending January 7, 1862. Present for duty:

Troops.	Officers.	Men.
Col. W. B. Wood, 16th Alabama	22	356
Col. W. B. Statham, 15th Mississippi	34	820
Col. T. W. Newman, 17th Tennessee	31	307
Col. D. H. Cummings, 19th Tennessee	31	645
Col. J. A. Battle, 20th Tennessee	32	662
Col. S. S. Stanton, 25th Tennessee	30	653
Col. S. Powell, 29th Tennessee	31	462
Col. J. P. Murray, 28th Tennessee	44	704
Lieut.-Col. McNairy, 1st Battalion, Tennessee	15	197
Lieut.-Col. Brazelton, two companies of the 3d Battalion, Tennessee	6	133
Lieut.-Col. Branner, 4th Battalion, Tennessee	22	314
Lieut.-Col. McClellan, five companies of 5th Tennessee	18	297
Capt. T. C. Sanders' Independent Cavalry Company	4	67
Capt. W. S. Bledsoe's Independent Cavalry Company	4	80
Capt. H. M. Rutledge's Artillery Company.	5	135
Capt. H. L. W. McClung's Artillery Company	4	79
Total	333	6,111

The force with which Gen. Thomas met the attack, and drove the Confederate forces from the field, consisted of the following:

Second Battalion, 1st Kentucky Cavalry, Col. Wolford	250
First Ohio Artillery, Capt. Kenny	110
First Ohio Artillery, Capt. Standart	122
First Artillery, Capt. Wetmore	104
Twelfth Brigade, Gen. Carter (not seriously engaged):
First Tennessee, Col. Byrd	610
Second Tennessee, Col. Carter	442
Twelfth Kentucky, Col. Hoskins	478
Second Brigade, Col. Manson:
Tenth Indiana, Lieut.-Col. Kise	710
Fourth Kentucky, Col. S. S. Fry	400
Third Brigade, Col. McCook:
Ninth Ohio, Lieut.-Col. Kammering	628
Second Minnesota, Col. Van Cleve	600
Effective strength present for duty	4,454
Battalion of Michigan Engineers and one company Thirty-eighth Ohio, detached to guard the camp	375
Total	4,829

The following report of the battle by Gen. Thomas is so complete in details that we give it entire:

HDQRS. FIRST DIVISION, DEPT. OF THE OHIO, }
SOMERSET, KY., January 31, 1862. }

Captain:—I have the honor to report that in carrying out the instructions of the general commanding the department, contained in his communication of the 29th of December, I reached Logan's Cross-Roads, about ten miles north of the intrenched camp of the enemy on the Cumberland River, on the 17th inst., with a portion of the Second and Third Brigades, Kenny's battery of artillery, and a battalion of Wolford's cavalry. The Fourth and Tenth Kentucky, Fourteenth Ohio, and the Eighteenth United States Infantry being still in the rear, detained by the almost impassable condition of the roads, I determined to halt at this point to await their arrival and to communicate with Gen. Schoepf.

The Tenth Indiana, Wolford's cavalry, and Kenny's battery took position on the road leading to the enemy's camp. The Ninth Ohio and Second Minnesota (part of Col. McCook's brigade) encamped three-fourths of a mile to the right, on the Robert's post-road. Strong pickets were thrown out in the direction of the enemy beyond where the Somerset and Mill Springs Road comes into the main road from my camp to Mill Springs, and a picket of cavalry some distance in advance of the infantry. Gen. Schoepf visited me on the day of my arrival, and, after consultation, I directed him to send to my camp Standart's battery, the Twentieth Kentucky, and the First and Second Tennessee regiments, to remain until the regiments in the rear should come up.

Having received information, on the evening of the 17th, that a large train of wagons with its escort were encamped on the Robert's post and Danville Road, about six miles from Col. Steedman's camp, I sent an order to him to send his wagons forward under a strong guard, and to march with his regiment (the Fourteenth Ohio) and the Tenth Kentucky (Col. Harlan), with one day's rations in their haversacks, to the point where the enemy were said to be encamped, and either capture or disperse them.

Nothing of importance occurred from the time of our arrival until the morning of the 19th, except a picket skirmish on the night of the 17th. The Fourth Kentucky, the battalion of Michigan engineers, and Wetmore's battery joined us on the 18th.

About 6.30 o'clock on the morning of the 19th, the pickets from Wolford's cavalry encountered the enemy advancing on our camp, retired slowly, and reported their advance to Col. M. D. Manson, commanding the Second Brigade. He immediately formed his regiment (the Tenth Indiana) and took a position on the road to await the attack, ordering the Fourth Kentucky (Col. S. S. Fry) to support him, and then informed me in person that the enemy were advancing in force and what disposition he had made to resist them. I directed him to rejoin his brigade immediately and hold the enemy in check until I could order up the other troops, which were directed to form immediately and were marching to the field in ten minutes afterward. The battalion of Michigan engineers and Company A, Thirty-eighth Ohio (Capt. Greenwood), were ordered to remain as a guard to the camp.

Upon my arrival on the field soon afterward I found the Tenth Indiana formed in front of their encampment, apparently awaiting orders, and ordered them forward to the support of the Fourth Kentucky, which was the only entire regiment then engaged. I then rode forward myself to see the enemy's position, so that I could determine what disposition to make with my troops as they arrived. On reaching the position held by the Fourth Kentucky, Tenth Indiana and Wolford's cavalry, at a point where the roads fork, leading to Somerset, I found the enemy advancing through a corn field and evidently endeavoring to gain the left of the Fourth Kentucky regiment, which was maintaining its position in a most determined manner. I directed one of my aids to ride back and order up a section of artillery and the Tennessee brigade to advance on the enemy's right, and sent orders for Col. McCook to advance with his two regiments (the Ninth Ohio and Second Minnesota) to the support of the Fourth Kentucky and Tenth Indiana.

A section of Capt. Kenny's battery took a position on the edge of the field to the left of the Fourth Kentucky and opened an efficient fire on a regiment of Alabamians, which were advancing on the Fourth Kentucky. Soon afterward the Second Minnesota (Col. H. P. Van Cleve) arrived, the Colonel reporting to me for instructions. I directed him to take the position of the Fourth Kentucky and Tenth Indiana, whose regiments were nearly out of ammunition. The Ninth Ohio, under the immediate command of Maj. Kammerling, came into position on the right of the road at the same time.

Immediately after these regiments had gained their position the enemy opened a most determined and galling fire, which was returned by our troops in the same spirit; and for nearly half an hour the contest was maintained on both sides in the most obstinate manner. At this time the Twelfth Kentucky (Col. W. A. Hoskins) and the Tennessee brigade reached the field to the left of the Minnesota regiments, and opened fire on the right flank of the enemy, who then began to fall back. The Second Minnesota kept up a most galling fire in the front, and the Ninth Ohio charged the enemy on the right with bayonets fixed, turned their flank, and drove them from the field, the whole line giving way and retreating in the utmost disorder and confusion.

As soon as the regiments could be formed and refill their cartridge boxes I ordered the whole force to advance. A few miles in the rear of the battle-field a small force of cavalry was drawn up near the road, but a few shots from our artillery (a section of Standart's battery) dispersed them, and none of the enemy were seen again until we arrived in front of their intrenchments. As we approached, the division was deployed in line of battle and steadily advanced to the summit of the hill at Moulden's. From this point I directed their intrenchments to be cannonaded, which was done until dark by Standart's and Wetmore's batteries. Kenny's battery was placed in position on the extreme left at Russell's house, from which point he was directed to fire on their ferry, to deter them from attempting to cross.

On the following morning Capt. Wetmore's battery was ordered to Russell's house and assisted with his Parrott guns in firing upon the ferry. Col. Manson's brigade took possession on the left near Kenny's battery, and every preparation was made to assault their intrenchments on the following morning. The Fourteenth Ohio (Col. Steedman) and the Tenth Kentucky (Col. Harlan), having joined from detached service soon after the repulse of the enemy, continued with their brigade in the pursuit, although they could not get up in time to join in the fight. These two regiments were placed in front in my advance on the intrenchments the next morning and entered first. Gen. Schoepf also joined me the evening of the 19th with the Seventeenth, Thirty-first and Thirty-eighth Ohio. His entire brigade entered with the other troops.

On reaching the intrenchments we found the enemy had abandoned everything and retired during the night. Twelve pieces of artillery, with their caissons packed with ammunition; one battery wagon and two forges; a large amount of ammunition; a large number of small arms, mostly the old flint-lock muskets; 150 or 160 wagons, and upward of 1,000 horses and mules; a large amount of commissary stores, intrenching tools, and camp and garrison equipage, fell into our hands. A correct list of all the captured property will be forwarded as soon as it can be made up and property secured.

The steam and ferry boats having been burned by the enemy in their retreat, it was found impossible to cross the river and pursue them; besides, their command was completely demoralized, and retreated with great haste and in all directions, making their capture in any numbers quite doubtful, if pursued. There is no doubt but what the moral effect produced by their complete dispersion will have a more decided effect in re-establishing Union sentiments than though they had been captured.

It affords me much pleasure to be able to testify to the uniform steadiness and good conduct of both officers and men during the battle, and I respectfully refer to the accompanying reports of the different commanders for the names of those officers and men, whose good conduct was particularly noticed by them.

The enemy's loss, as far as known, is as follows: Brig.-Gen. Zollicoffer, Lieut. Bailie Peyton, and 190 officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, killed; Lieut.-Col. M. B. Carter, Twentieth Tennessee; Lieut. J. W. Allen, Fifteenth Mississippi; Lieut. Allen Morse, Sixteenth Alabama and five officers of the medical staff, and eighty-one non-commission officers and privates taken prisoners; Lieut. J. E. Patterson, Twentieth Tennessee; and A. J. Knapp, Fifteenth Mississippi, and sixty-nine non-commissioned officers and privates wounded; making 192 killed, eighty-nine prisoners not wounded, and sixty-eight wounded; a total of killed, wounded and prisoners of 349. Our loss was as follows:

	KILLED.		WOUNDED.
	Officers.	Men.	Officers.	Men.
Tenth Indiana.....	–	10	3	72
First Kentucky (Cav)	1	2	–	19
Fourth Kentucky...	–	8	4	48
Second Minnesota..	–	12	2	31
Ninth Ohio.....	–	6	4	24
Total.....	1	38	13	1

A complete list of the names of our killed and wounded and of the prisoners is herewith attached.

I am, Sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, GEORGE H. THOMAS,

Brig.-Gen. United States Volunteers, Commanding.

CAPT. J. B. FRY, A. A. G., chief of staff, headquarters Department Ohio, Louisville, Ky.

The following extract from Gen. Crittenden's official report furnishes, if any were needed, evidence of the disaster to the Confederate troops:

On the evening of the 18th I called in council Brig.-Gens. Zollicoffer and Carroll, and the commanding officers of regiments, and of cavalry and artillery, and there it was determined, without dissent, to march out and attack the enemy under Gen. Thomas on the next morning. Accordingly, Gens. Zollicoffer and Carroll were ordered to remove their brigades at midnight in the following order:

First—The brigade of Gen. Zollicoffer, in the following order: In front, the independent cavalry companies of Capts. Saunders and Bledsoe; then the Fifteenth Mississippi Regiment, commanded by Lieut.-Col. Walthall; then the Nineteenth Tennessee. commanded by Col. D. H. Cummings; then the Twentieth Tennessee, commanded by Col. Battle; then the Twenty-fifth Tennessee, commanued by Col. S. S. Stanton; then four guns of Rutledge's battery, commanded by Capt. Rutledge.

Second—The brigade of Gen. Carroll in this order: In front, the Seventeenth Tennessee, commanded by Lieut.-Col. Miller; then the Twenty-eighth Tennessee, commanded by Col. Murray; then the Twenty-ninth Tennessee, commanded by Col. Powell; then two guns of McClung's battery, commanded by Capt. McClung.

In the rear were the Sixteenth Alabama, as a reserve, commanded by Col. W. B. Wood and the cavalry battalions of Lieut.-Col. Branner and Lieut.-Col. McClellan.

Soon after daylight, on the morning of January 19th, the cavalry advance came in contact with the pickets of the enemy, after a march of near nine miles over a deep and muddy road. With a few shots the enemy's pickets were driven in, retiring about a quarter of a mile to a house on the left of the road. From this house, and woods in the rear of it, quite a brisk firing was opened upon the head of the column. Skirmishers had been thrown forward, Gen. Zollicoffer's brigade was formed in line of battle, and ordered to advance upon the enemy, who, I supposed, would come out from their camp, which we were now approaching, to take position. The road here extended straight in front for near a mile toward the north.

A company of skirmishers from the Mississippi regiment, advancing on the left of the road after sharp firing, drove a body of the enemy from the house and the woods next to it, and then, under orders, crossing the road, fell in with their regiment. Following this company of skirmishers on the left of the road to the point where it crossed to the right, the regiment of Col. Cummings (Nineteeth Tennessee) kept straight on, and, crossing a field about 250 yards wide at a double-quick, charged into the woods where the enemy was sheltered, driving back the Tenth Indiana Regiment until it was re-enforced.

At this time Gen. Zollicoffer rode up to the Nineteenth Tennessee and ordered Col. Cummings to cease firing, under the impression that the fire was upon another regiment of his own brigade. Then the general advanced, as if to give an order to the lines of the enemy within bayonet reach, and was killed just as he discovered his fatal mistake.* Thereupon a conflict ensued, when the Nineteenth Tennessee broke its lines and gave back. Rather in the rear and near to this regiment was the Twenty-fifth Tennessee, commanded by Col. Stanton, which engaged the enemy, when the colonel was wounded at the head of his men; but this regiment, impressed with the same idea which had proved fatal to Gen. Zollicoffer—that it was engaged with friends—soon broke its lines and fell into some disorder.

At this time, the fall of Gen. Zollicoffer having been announced to me, I went forward in the road to the regiments of Col. Cummings and Stanton, and announced to Col. Cummings the death of Gen. Zollicoffer, and that the command of the brigade devolved upon him.

There was a cessation of firing for a few moments, and I ascertained that the regiment of Col. Battle was on the right and the Mississippi regiment in the center, neither as yet having been actively engaged, and the enemy in front of the entire line. I had ordered Gen. Carroll to bring up his brigade, and it was now, in supporting distance, displayed in line of battle.

I now repeated my orders for a general advance, and soon the battle raged from right to left. When I sent my aid to order the Fifteenth Mississippi to charge, I sent by him an order to Gen. Carroll to advance a regiment to sustain it. He ordered up for that purpose Col. Murray's (Twenty-eighth Tennessee) regiment, which engaged the enemy on the left of the Mississippi regiment and on the right of Stanton's (Tennessee) regiment. I ordered Capt. Rutledge, with two of his guns, forward in the road to an advanced and hazardous position, ordering Col. Stanton to support him, where I hoped he might bring them to play effectively upon the enemy; but the position did not permit this, and he soon retired, under my order. At this point the horse of Capt. Rutledge was killed under him.

* Col. Fry in a letter to the writer gives the following account of the death of Gen. Zollicoffer:

"In order to ascertain more certainly the exact state of affairs, the firing having nearly ceased, I rode from the right of my regiment some fifteen or twenty paces down to the fence behind which we had been fighting, and, discovering no enemy in that direction, I turned my horse and rode slowly back to the place I had just left. As I neared the road I saw an officer riding slowly down the road on a white horse and within twenty paces of the right of my regiment. His uniform was concealed, except the extremities of his pantaloons, which I observed were of the color worn by Federal officers, by a long green overcoat. His near approach to my regiment, his calm manner, my close proximity to him, indeed everything I saw led me to believe he was a Federal officer belonging to one of the regiments just arriving. So thoroughly was I convinced that he was one of our men, I did not hesitate to ride up to his side so closely that our knees touched. He was calm, self-possessed and dignified in manner. He said to me "We must not shoot our own men," to which I responded, "Of course not; I would not do so intentionally," then turning his eyes to his left and pointing in the same direction he said," those are our men." I could not see the men from my position, but I now suppose they were there. I immediately moved off to the right of my regiment, perhaps some fifteen or twenty paces from the spot on which I met him. His language convinced me more than ever that he was a Federal officer. How it is that he did not discover that I was one I cannot tell, as my uniform was entirely exposed to view, having on nothing to conceal it. As soon as I reached my regiment, I paused, turning my horse a little to the left, and across the road, looked back to see what was going on, when, to my great surprise, another officer whom I had not seen rode out from behind a large tree near the place of my meeting with the first officer, and, with pistol in hand, leveled it directly at me, fired, and paused for a moment, doubtless to observe the effect of his shot. Instead of striking the object at which it was aimed, the ball struck my horse just above the hip bone making a flesh wound. I immediately drew my Colt's revolver from the holster, and was about to fire, when he retreated behind a tree. Not until this time was I aware that I had been in conversation with an officer of the opposing army. In an instant the thought flashed across my mind that the officer with whom I had met and conversed had attempted to draw me into the snare of death or secure my capture by a false representation of his position, and, feeling thus, I aimed at him and fired."

Gen. Zollicoffer fell pierced by three bullets, for at the same moment several men of the Fourth Kentucky fired upon him.

Very soon the enemy began to gain ground on our left and to use their superior force for flanking in that quarter. I was in person at the right of the line of Stanton's regiment; the battle was still raging, and I did not observe this so soon as it was observed by Gen. Carroll, who moved the regiment of Col. Cummings, then commanded by Lieut.-Col. Walker, to the left, to meet this movement of the enemy, and formed the Seventeenth Tennessee, commanded by Lieut.-Col. Miller, to support the regiments on the left. The regiments of Murray, Stanton and Cummings were driven back by the enemy, and, while reforming in the rear of the Seventeenth Tennessee, that well-disciplined regiment met and held in check for some time the entire right wing of the northern army. These regiments on my left and on the left of the road retired across the field a distance of about 250 yards, and there, for a time, repulsed the advancing enemy. Especially the regiment of Col. Stanton, partially rallied by its gallant field officers, formed behind a fence, and, pouring volleys into the ranks of the enemy coming across the field, repulsed and drove them back for a time with heavy loss.

For an hour now the Fifteenth Mississippi under Lieut.-Col. Walthall, and the Twentieth Tennessee, under Col. Joel A. Battle, of my center and right, had been struggling with the superior force of the enemy.

I cannot omit to mention the heroic valor of these two regiments, officers and men. When the left retired they were flanked and compelled to leave their position. In their rear, on the right of the road, was the regiment of Col. Powell (Twenty-ninth Tennessee) which had been formed in the rear and ordered forward by me some time before. Gen. Carroll ordered this regiment to face the flanking force of the enemy, which was crossing the road from the left side; this it did, checking it with a raking fire at thirty paces. In this conflict Col. Powell, commanding, was badly wounded.

The Sixteenth Alabama, which was the reserve corps of my division, commanded by Col. Wood, did at this critical juncture most eminent service. Having rushed behind the right and center it came to a close engagement with the pursuing enemy, to protect the flanks and rear of the Fifteenth Mississippi and Twentieth Tennessee when they were the last, after long fighting, to leave the front line of the battle, and, well led by its commanding officer, in conjunction with portions of other regiments, it effectually prevented pursuit and protected my return to camp.

Owing to the formation and character of the field of battle I was unable to use my artillery and cavalry to advantage in the action. During much of the time the engagement lasted, rain was falling. Many of the men were armed with flint-lock muskets and they became soon unserviceable.

On the field and during the retreat to camp some of the regiments became confused and broken and great disorder prevailed. This was owing, in some measure, to a want of proper drill and discipline of which the army had been much deprived by reason of the nature of its constant service and of the country in which it had encamped.

During the engagement, or just prior to it, the force under Gen. Thomas was increased by the arrival, on a forced march, of a brigade from his rear, which I had hoped would not arrive until the engagement was over. This made the force of the enemy about 12,000 men. My effective force was 4,000. The engagement lasted three hours.

My loss was 125 killed, 309 wounded, and 95 missing, as follows:

	Killed.	Wounded	Missing.
15th Mississippi Regiment....	44	153	29
20th Tennessee (Battle).....	33	59	18
19th Tennessee (Cummings)...	10	22	2
25th Tennessee (Stanton).....	10	28	17
17th Tennessee (Newman).....	11	25	2
28th Tennessee (Murray).....	3	4	5
29th Tennessee (Powell).....	5	12	10
16th Alabama.....	9	5	12
Capt. Saunder's cavalry.....	—	1	—
Total.....	125	309	95

The loss of the enemy, from the best information I have and statements made by themselves, may be estimated at 700 killed and wounded. It was larger than mine from the fact that my regiments on the left, after first being driven back, fired from the cover of woods and fences upon the large numbers advancing upon them through the open field, inflicting heavy loss and sustaining but little.*

Crittenden's position at Beech Grove was extremely perilous, and as soon as possible he prepared to cross the river with his remaining troops, now reduced to a disorganized mass of panic-stricken men, whose only desire was to secure personal safety. He got them all across to the south bank under cover of darkness, except some who attempted to swim the river on their horses and were drowned. The condition of these fugitives was indeed pitiful. They had marched nine miles on the night of the 18th through rain and mud; had fought a battle and been beaten, and fallen back in utter rout to their position only to leave it, and, without rest or food, take up the line of march to a more secure retreat. Through Monticello and Livingston to Gainesboro they plodded their weary way, subsisting upon the scanty supplies of a wasted country, until starvation caused the wholesale desertion of several regiments and the disintegration of almost the entire command. They had fought well; many had displayed the highest personal courage, and deserved better treatment at the hands of their commanders than to be branded as deserters. Their loss upon the field had been great, but it was not one-tenth of that by desertion on the retreat to Gainesboro.

The loss of Gen. Zollicoffer was a severe blow to the Confederates. Although, owing to his lack of military experience, his repeated attempts to enter Kentucky had cost them an army, they cherished his memory with tenderness for many years after his death. His body was embalmed and sent through the lines under a flag of truce. Crittenden's lot was even worse than that of his dead comrade; he was charged with being a traitor. with drunkenness upon the field, and with incapacity to command. Although the first, he was not the only, Kentuckian destined to feel the serpent tooth of ingratitude from a people from whom he had sacrificed home and country to espouse the cause of the southern people. He was a gentleman, simple, true and brave, whose proper place was with his noble father and heroic brother, fighting for the honor of his State and nation.

Gen. Thomas dispatched Schoepf with his brigade to pursue Crittenden's broken column. They followed him through the deep mud as far as Monticello, but finding that his brigade, cumbered with knapsacks, guns and blankets, were no match for the fleet-footed Tennesseans, who had thrown away everything that would impede their flight, he returned to Gainesville. Col. Manson's brigade took charge of the deserted camp and its abandoned property, buried the dead, and nursed the wounded of both armies.

Thus the first battle fought by the troops of the Army of the Cumberland, like the last one in which that army was engaged in the west, was equally crushing in its effect upon the enemy, and the same calm, wise, courageous commander presided upon both occasions. The Fourth and Twelfth Kentucky participated in both engagements.

The region of country known as eastern Kentucky, bordering upon Virginia and separated from it by the Big Sandy River, is rough and sparsely populated. At the outbreak of the rebellion the inhabitants, like their neighbors in western Virginia and east Tennessee, clung instinctively to the Union. Frugal and industrious, brave and independent, they possessed many of the characteristics of the pioneers of Kentucky, whose deeds of valor in the wilderness have for generations formed the traditionary lore about the firesides of their descendants. Taking little interest in national affairs, they were slow to comprehend the cause of difference between the northern and southern States of the Union. When at last the truth was forced upon them by the presence of the armed troops, that the theater of war was at their very doors, the occasion of hostilities was expounded to them by two men whose exploits in the field had been more than equaled by their eloquence upon the stump. These were Hon. Humphrey Marshall and John S. Williams, familiarly known as "Cerro Gordo," for his courageous conduct exhibited on the occasion of that battle in Mexico. It is not surprising that two orators of this character, backed by the persuasive logic of troops of armed men, should have lured a considerable number of the mountaineers away from their allegiance to the national flag. But the number who joined their standard was ridiculously small in proportion to those who joined Union regiments.

For many months the ark of safety of these people lay in the Confederate camp, and that so few availed themselves of the security of person and property offered by enlisting in the southern army is the strongest possible evidence of the inherent loyalty of the Kentucky mountaineers to the government at Washington. Not one of them had voted for Abraham Lincoln. They still held to the creed of the Whig and Democratic parties as taught by Clay and Jefferson, and represented by John Bell, of Tennessee, on the one side, and Stephen A. Douglas or John C. Breckinridge on the other. They cared little for the institution of slavery, for few of them were slaveholders. By far the greater number were poor and dependent upon their own labor for means with which to support their families; but all were landholders, and, unlike the poor whites in the cotton States, tilled their own soil, and were masters of their own time and opinions. School-houses were scarce, and many could neither read nor write; but if unlearned in the sophistry of politics, they were well grounded in the belief that the United States was the greatest and grandest country on the earth, and every attempt to destroy it met with their unalterable opposition. Such was the country in which Brig.-Gen. Marshall had established his camp in the winter of 1861–62.

Brig-Gen. William Nelson, having driven the Confederate forces out of eastern Kentucky in October, 1861, returned to Louisville in November, sending the Sixteenth Kentucky back to Maysville and the Twenty-fourth to Lexington, to complete their organization. The Ohio regiments were embarked on transports at Louisa on the Big Sandy River, and taken to Louisvile, where they were incorporated into the main army of the Ohio. The abandoned territory was speedily occupied by Gen. Humphrey Marshall, whose base was at Wytheville, Va., on the line of the Virginia & Tennessee Railroad, within easy supporting distance from Knoxville, or the Army of Northern Virginia.

The same troubles that all army commanders both north and south had to encounter assailed Gen. Marshall. He found the troops under Williams half clad and mostly unarmed, and several regiments that had joined him in western Virginia were in the same condition. The undisciplined and destitute condition of his command rendered it better qualified to be sent to a camp of instruction than for active operations against an organized force, but its zealous commander determined to advance into his native State, even if he was only permitted to remain long enough to issue a proclamation to the inhabitants.

On December 14th, Col. James A. Garfield, commanding the Forty-second Ohio Infantry, stationed at camp Chase, Ohio, received orders from Gen. Buell to proceed with all possible dispatch to Prestonburg, which was reported to be occupied by Gen. Marshall. Sending his regiment by steamer from Cincinnati to Catlettsburg, at the mouth of Big Sandy River, in obedience to orders, he reported at department headquarters for further instructions. Gen. Buell probably desired a personal interview with an inspection of the man whom he was about to intrust with the command of a brigade, as deficiency in the number of brigadier-generals assigned him (in which regard the war department had treated him with marked clemency), rendered it necessary for him to place his brigades under command of the ranking colonels. Care had to be used in brigading regiments to see that the colonel whose commission antedated all the others in the brigade was fit to command it. It was owing to this necessity that nearly all the general officers who afterward distinguished themselves in the Army of the Cumberland won their promotion by meritorious service in the field, and it is no slight evidence of Gen. Buell's insight into the character and ability of men, that most of them were started in the line of promotion by their appointments as brigade commanders at this period.

By Special Order, No. 35, issued December 17th, the Eighteenth Brigade was organized, consisting of the Forty-second Ohio Infantry, Col. J. A. Garfield; Fortieth Ohio Infantry, Col. J. Cranor; Fourteenth Kentucky Infantry, Col. L. T. Moore; Twenty-second Kentucky Infantry, Col. D. W. Lindsey; two companies of Ohio Cavalry, Maj. McLaughlin, and six companies of the First Kentucky Cavalry, Lieut.-Col. Letcher. This brigade was placed under command of Col. J. A. Garfield, who was ordered to proceed at once by steamers to Catlettsburg, thence up the Big Sandy with three regiments, and drive the enemy back, leaving the Fortieth Ohio at Lexington and Paris to give moral support to his movements in eastern Kentucky. As artillery would be of little use in the rugged country through which his course lay, it was believed it would only embarrass his operations.

As Piketon, on the Big Sandy, was the objective point of his campaign, supplies for his brigade could be transported by steamer, thus saving the necessity of cumbersome wagon trains. It will be observed that times had changed vastly for the better, since Thomas had only a few weeks before asked in vain for a reserve of only four regiments to enable him to move forward from London to the occupation of Knoxville. Now a thoroughly organized brigade could be put in motion for a distant expedition at the will of the department commander. In addition to his brigade, as organized, the Sixteenth Ohio Infantry at Lexington was, in case of necessity, ordered to co-operate. Col. Garfield ordered the Fortieth Ohio and Letcher's cavalry to move eastward via Mount Sterling and McCormick's Gap to Prestonburg.

Col. Garfield arrived at Catlettsburg December 21st, and found the Forty-second Ohio, Fourteenth Kentucky and McLaughlin's squadron of Ohio Cavalry awaiting his arrival, with which he moved at once up the river to Louisa. The Twenty-second Kentucky, not being fully equipped, was ordered to join the column on the march. Leaving two companies to guard his supplies and hospital at Louisa, he continued up the river, and on the 25th reached George's Creek, where he remained two days, receiving supplies from below, when he continued his march over Tom's Mountain to the forks of Tom's Creek. Here he learned that Gen. Humphrey Marshall had fortified himself two miles south of Paint Creek, occupying Paintsville and a line extending along Paint Creek for two miles from its junction with the Big Sandy, and that his outposts were established two miles in front.

From Garfield's camp there were three routes leading to Paintsville, one leading along the left bank of the Sandy to the mouth of Paint Creek, thence up the creek to Paintsville; another directly southward, thence by a very rugged road over the hills, and the third southward along a branch of Tom's Creek, and over a heavy ridge, striking Paint Creek at the mouth of Jennie's Creek, a mile above Paintsville. On the morning of January 5th Col. Garfield sent a small force of infantry and cavalry to advance along the first of these routes to reconnoiter the enemy's position. Two hours later he sent another force with similar orders along the middle route, and two hours later still another with the same directions along the third route. The second and third of these detachments were ordered to return and join the main force, with which Garfield moved rapidly along the first-named route. As he had calculated, Marshall considered the first and second advances as feints, and withdrawing the forces near the mouth, concentrated them higher up the stream against a force that he supposed to be advancing via Jennie's Creek. This left the way clear for the Union troops to secure possession of the mouth of Paint Creek, where they were joined by Lieut.-Col. Bolles with 300 of the Second Virginia Cavalry, which had been sent to Garfield by Gen. Cox in West Virginia. On the afternoon of the 6th of January Paintsville was occupied by the Union forces. Col. Garfield now sent Bolles with his cavalry to attack the enemy's cavalry at the mouth of Jennie's Creek, and, throwing a temporary bridge across Paint Creek at Paintsville, Garfield crossed with 1,000 men, and at 9 o'clock at night entered the entrenched camp of Marshall, which he had just deserted. In the meantime Bolles had driven the cavalry from the mouth of Jennie's Creek and pursued them five miles, killing and wounding a considerable number.

Gen. Marshall moved eastward to Prestonburg, and Col. Cranor, who, with the Fortieth Ohio and Letcher's detachment of the First Kentucky Cavalry, was moving on that place, hearing that he was there, turned their course northward and joined Garfield at Paintsville on the 7th.

On the 9th Garfield advanced with 1,500 of his command toward Prestonburg, leaving orders for the remainder to follow immediately upon the arrival of supplies from the depot at Louisa. He reached the mouth of Abbott's Creek, near Prestonburg, at 8 o'clock the same evening, and found Marshall encamped on the same creek three miles above him. He immediately ordered all his available force at Paintsville to join him as soon as possible. The rain and sleet poured down on the advancing column struggling through the mud in the pitchy darkness, while their comrades on the banks of Abbott's Creek bivouacked upon the soaked earth, awaiting their arrival. At 4 o'clock on the morning of the 10th the command moved forward, crossing Abbott's Creek a mile from its mouth, and soon after attacked and drove the Confederate rear guard. At 8 o'clock Garfield had crossed the ridge that separated Abbott's Creek from Middle Creek, when his advance again encountered Marshall's rear.

Advancing about two miles up the stream, the tired troops reached the forks about noon, where they found Marshall's men occupying a strong position on a steep wooded hill between the forks of the stream. Meanwhile, Gen. Marshall had intercepted a letter from Garfield to Cranor, and, in hope of cutting off the Fortieth at Prestonburg, had fallen back to Abbott's Creek. Finding that Cranor had effected a junction with the main force, he then sought and found a secure position in which to await the attack. Sending his wagon train ahead, he halted at the summit of the wooded hill before mentioned. His brigade consisted of the following organizations: Col. Trigg's Fifty-fourth Virginia regiment, effectives, 578; Col. Williams' Kentucky regiment, 594; Col. Moore's Twenty ninth Virginia regiment, 317; Col. Simm's mounted battalion, 360; Capt. Jeffries' battery of light artillery, 58; Capt. Worsham's company of cavalry, 50; total, 1,967. Beside the above, Marshall doubtless had a militia force, as he claimed after his defeat by Garfield that the prisoners taken from his force were "not soldiers, but citizens, who have been running like frightened hares ever since the war began, and if pressed to it would submit to have their ears cropped to show they had a master."

The regiments of Cols. Williams and Moore and a part of the mounted battalion occupied the spurs and heights upon the right. Trigg's regiment occupied a height covering his battery, behind which were stationed Witcher's and Holliday's companies as support. Capts. Thomas' and Clay's companies, dismounted and armed with Belgian rifles, were thrown forward to the heights commanding the plain of Middle Creek. A day or two previous Garfield had received from Gen. Buell an intercepted letter from Marshall to Gen. Johnston, stating his effective strength as between 4,000 and 5,000 men.

Col. Garfield drew up his force of 900 infantry on the sloping point of a semi-circular hill, and at 12 o'clock sent forward twenty mounted men to make a dash across the plain. This drew Marshall's fire, and in part disclosed his position. Trigg's Virginia regiment was placed behind the further point of the same ridge which Garfield occupied. Capt. Williams, with four companies of Ohio and Kentucky troops, crossed the creek nearly waist deep, and took position on the high, rocky ridge in front and to the left of the main force.

The enemy now opened fire with two guns of six and twelve-pound caliber; a shell from one of them fell among Garfield's skirmishers, but did not explode. Capt. Williams' detachment engaged Trigg's regiment, and Maj. Burke, of the Fourteenth Kentucky, with two companies, and Maj. Pardee, of the Forty-second Ohio, with ninety men, were sent to re-enforce him, which caused Marshall to withdraw the Virginians across the creek, and to send strong re-enforcements to the hills on the left. About 2 o'clock Col. Cranor, with 150 men from the Fortieth and Forty-second Ohio and Twenty-second Kentucky, was sent to re-enforce Maj. Pardee. Meanwhile Marshall had occupied the ridge to a point nearly opposite to Garfield's right, and opened a heavy fire on his reserve. Lieut.-Col. Monroe, at the head of 120 of the Twenty-second and Fourteenth Kentucky, now crossed the creek, and gallantly drove the Confederates from their position; the latter, resisting stubbornly, lost several of their number killed at this point, whom they left upon the field. Retiring slowly, and contesting every foot of ground, the Confederate troops were driven up the steep ridge, nearest the creek, by the troops under Cranor and Pardee. At 4 o'clock, Lieut.-Col. Sheldon, with his re-enforcements, arrived upon the field, increasing Garfield's force to 2,300, enabling him to send forward the remainder of his reserve under Lieut.-Col. Brown.

During the fight, the Confederate gunners had worked their pieces industriously, firing over thirty rounds, but they were utterly useless. But one of their shells exploded, and none of their shots, not even canister, took effect. Their small arms were equally ineffectual at long range. Brown, with his reserves, passed around to the right, and endeavored to capture the artillery, but Marshall ordered a retreat, and by 5 o'clock had completely evacuated his position, and fallen back to his camp in the rear. Soon afterward a brilliant light streamed upward from the valley. He was burning his stores preparatory to retreat. Twenty-five of his dead left upon the field told how bravely his men had contended with shot-guns and squirrel rifles against the inevitable logic of "Lincoln's muskets." In the entire action they had killed only one, and wounded twenty of their assailants.

Letcher with his cavalry, having been detached on special service, did not reach the field in time to participate in the action, but he started next morning in pursuit. They followed the trail six miles and took a few prisoners, but were obliged to return through lack of provisions. The total number of prisoners taken was twenty-five, among whom was one officer. The Union troops bivouacked upon the field, and the next day crossed the river and occupied Prestonburg. Garfield found the place almost deserted and stripped of everything like supplies for an army. He was obliged to send his cavalry at once to Paintsville for forage, to which place he returned soon after with his entire force, finding that he could not take proper care of his command in the region about Prestonburg. In less than twenty days he had driven Marshall with his command from two chosen positions, and returned to his depot of supplies with a loss of only three killed and twenty-eight wounded, for which he was rewarded by the government with a brigadier-general's commission, and by the legislature of Kentucky with a vote of thanks.

The wretched condition of the roads compelled Garfield to establish his camp at Paintsville, and Marshall's exhausted supplies made it necessary for him to continue his retreat toward Pound Gap, whence measles, mumps and starvation soon drove him to Virginia. The events of the campaign had taught him that his undisciplined, and almost unfed and unarmed troops, however well endowed with the quality of courage, were no match for Garfield's brigade of well-equipped soldiers, and a further stay in Kentucky could, as he asserted, only result in the disintegration and demoralization of his command.

On the 22d of February, Gen. Garfield moved his brigade twenty-five miles further up the Big Sandy to Piketon. Col. Marshall's Sixteenth Kentucky Infantry had been assigned to Garfield's command on the 20th of January, and Gen. Cox had sent two of his companies of the Fourth Virginia to Louisa to protect the stores at that point On the 15th of March, Gen. Garfield left Piketon with 600 infantry and 100 cavalry, for Pound Gap, reaching the foot of the mountains late at night. Sending his cavalry by the plain road into the gap to attract attention, he led his infantry by an unfrequented route to the crest of the mountain, whence he surprised the camp, which was occupied by a regiment commanded by Maj. J. B. Thompson, which, after a few minutes' resistance, retreated down the Virginia slope with the cavalry in hot pursuit. They lost seven in killed and wounded, and abandoned everything that would impede their flight. After destroying the camp and burning the buildings that had been erected for the storage of military supplies, the command returned to Piketon without the loss of a man.

In the meantime, the east Tennessee campaign, which Buell had so persistently urged on assuming command of the Department of the Ohio, had been opened. Fort Henry, on the Tennessee River, had been captured by the gun-boats on the 6th of February, 1862, and the week following was devoted to reconnoitering the approaches and moving the land forces to the next point of attack.

The army concentrated by Gen. Grant on the ground in front of Fort Donelson, on the Cumberland River, was permitted, on the morning of the 13th of February, to move into position without hindrance from the Confederates, who, confident of their strength, did not venture from behind the cover of their intrenchments. The garrison allowed its position to be invested by a force but little larger than itself, but on the arrival of re-enforcements from Cumberland City, the innocent-looking log piles became a line of artillery fire. Gen. C. F. Smith made an attempt to carry the works in his front, but was repulsed by Hanson's Confederate Kentucky regiment and the Thirteenth Tennessee with considerable loss. McClernand moved against Heiman's elevated position, but after two bold attempts to carry it was compelled to fall back, while the batteries upon the crest of the hills blazed away at each other with noisy zeal. Gen. McClernand's division took position on the right of the line of investment, and Gen. Smith's brigades as they came occupied the left, in front of Buckner's line. The division of Gen. Lew Wallace was assigned to the center of the line only 500 yards in front of the Confederate works.

The Confederate forces, under command of Maj.-Gen. John B. Floyd, consisted of Gen. Pillow's division, 1,000 cavalry under Col. Forrest, Buckner's division, and two water batteries on the hillside, commanding the river. The strength of the contending forces was: Grant's, 24,400; Floyd's, 16,970. The Seventeenth and Twenty-fifth Kentucky Infantry, commanded by Cols. John H. McHenry and James M. Shackelford, and the Thirty-first and Forty-fourth Indiana formed the first brigade of Wallace's division, which, under command of Col. Charles Cruft, Thirty-first Indiana, was detached from Crittenden's division of the Army of the Ohio by order of Gen. Buell, and sent by boat to re-enforce Grant in his operations against Fort Donelson.

The day following the battle of the Trenches, so called by Gen. Floyd, the gunboats which had proved effective in the reduction of Fort Henry, appeared in front of Fort Donelson, but their stay was brief. The elevation of the batteries overcame the advantage of the gunboats in weight of guns, and sent their bolts crushing through the fleet with resistless force, carrying destruction in their course. But a few moments sufficed to send the disabled boats drifting down the stream, while inside the works not a gun was disabled nor a man hurt. Thus the first two days of the siege ended in repulses by land and water, while the unsheltered troops of both armies lay down upon the ground, in the midst of a storm of rain and sleet that raged with unwonted fury.

Notwithstanding the success of the Confederates in maintaining their position, a feeling of insecurity pervaded the minds of both Pillow and Floyd. Gen. Buckner, more practical than either, devised a plan of escape by the Winn's Ferry road, in the direction of Nashville, which, provided he could have had the execution of it, would doubtless have succeeded. This was to make a vigorous assault upon McClernand, drive him back upon the center, and hold him there while the main portion of the Confederates marched out of the trenches and pursued their way toward Nashville. The first part of the programme was carried out, but in the nick of time when everything should have been in readiness to move promptly to the rear, Floyd grew irresolute and concluded to wait. Delays are proverbially dangerous, and in this instance proved fatal to the Confederates.

McClernand was not driven back without a stubborn fight, and withdrew only after having exhausted his ammunition. Even then pursuit by the Confederates was checked by the prompt action of Gen. Wallace, who threw his division in front of McClernand and took up the battle where it had fallen from his hands. In this emergency Col. Cruft was ordered to the front. The brigade moved at double quick over the rugged road, the Twenty-fifth Kentucky in advance, pressing onward to engage the Confederates. A staff officer of Gen. McClernand led the head of the column too far to the right, when suddenly, before a line of battle could be formed, the Twenty-fifth found itself confronted by a superior force of the Confederates, which formed a flanking column, moving around by a ravine to capture Taylor's battery. Shackelford immediately formed his line under a murderous fire, supported on the left by the Thirty-first Indiana. The Seventeenth Kentucky and Forty-fourth Indiana hurriedly formed a line against which the Confederates again and again hurled heavy masses of troops in a vain attempt to break it. Not a man left the ranks. Knowing the terrible responsibilities resting upon them, animated by a common impulse to stem the tide of disaster, they poured volley after volley into the ranks of the Confederates.

At this juncture one of those blunders which sometimes neutralize the effect of the most heroic courage was committed by an unknown officer, who, approaching the right of Shackelford's regiment, ordered it to take position further to the right. The order was immediately obeyed under heavy fire. The first volley from the new position took effect in the ranks of the Eighth and Twenty-ninth Illinois in their front, but concealed from view by the thick underbrush. The latter, supposing themselves attacked from the rear, immediately fell back through Cruft's ranks, threatening for a moment the integrity of his command. In the meantime Shackelford and Osborne, of the Thirty-first Indiana, at the right of the line, were cut off with a small portion of the Twenty-fifth Kentucky and Thirty-first Indiana, and were compelled to carry on an unequal combat against great odds before they finally succeeded in rejoining the command.

The retreat of McClernand's entire division now left Cruft's brigade "in the air," without support on the right or left, with the exception of the Eleventh Illinois, which occupied a position in support of Taylor's battery vacated by Logan's regiment. The Forty-fourth Indiana, on the left, could not fire without imperiling this regiment, and was obliged to remain in line and receive the Confederates fire without responding. The brigade was in good fighting trim, and by order of its intrepid commander fell back in good order to the top of the next ridge. A heavy fire was poured into it by the advancing foe, who, pushing forward, made a determined attack upon the whole line. This was no sooner repulsed than it was repeated with the same result. Following the second repulse, Cruft ordered his brigade to charge, which it did with such effect as to drive the Confederates back some distance. In this charge the Seventeenth Kentucky, led by its gallant officers, Col. McHenry and Lieut. Col. A. M. Stout, greatly distinguished itself. At this juncture a flank movement was detected upon his right, beyond which he had no support. Directing a company of the Thirty-first Indiana to be deployed as skirmishers in that direction, Col. Cruft was obliged to give his attention to the movements upon his left, where heavy columns of the Confederates could be seen moving in pursuit of McClernand.

The Eleventh Illinois, out of ammunition, was slowly falling back, exposing his left flank to a constant fire from the Confederates, advancing in force against him. The position of the plucky little brigade was now indeed perilous, but being new to the business of war the men were not aware of the full extent of their danger. It was soon attacked by a superior force of cavalry and infantry on its left, menaced by a flank movement against its right, the object of which was evidently to compel its surrender, but the brigade remained intact, turning its fire upon the nearest enemy, at the same time moving slowly to the right and rear, when it soon came upon a commanding ridge fronting the Confederates, where it planted its colors and prepared for the final assault, which came at once.

The advancing troops, flushed with success, rushed up the hill with the light of victory upon their faces to meet a force of equal courage and determination. Out of reach of support, with none to witness their heroic defense, they prepared to meet their assailants. The front of their line speedily became a sheet of flame from which the leaden missiles flew into the ranks of the Confederates, who wavered before the shock, and at length fell back, leaving their dead upon the hillside. The brigade, now greatly reduced by losses in killed and wounded, drew off toward the right of Thayer's brigade, with which communication was soon opened through the medium of a line of skirmishers. After a three hours' engagement, during much of which time the brigade had been isolated, it had saved McClernand's division from the effect of a strong flank movement upon his right wing, then defending itself against a continuous and determined attack, which, but for the courage and discipline of officers and men, would have demolished it.

The beleagured garrison had thus, after six hours' fighting, driven the investing force away from their left and rolled it back upon the center, uncovering three roads that led southward to liberty. Having thus accomplished the first move in the plan of escape agreed upon, and in momentary expectation of being called upon to act as rear guard to the retreating army, Buckner was astonished by the reception of an order to march back to his old position in the intrenchments. There should have been nothing in the way of a rapid retreat by every practicable route. But no preparations for this last act in the tragic performance of the day had been made. The troops, to whom had been assigned the brave work of clearing away the right wing of the Union army, had very properly been left unfettered in their movements, by burdensome haversacks and knapsacks, and when the door of escape was open they were unable to avail themselves of it through lack of any provision for the march. Eight regiments had been allowed to remain idle spectators of the scene within the intrenchments, where every moment should have been utilized in removing provisions to the rear. Night closed upon the scene. The Union lines, pressing forward closely upon the heels of the garrison, withdrawn within the intrenchments, formed their lines across the Winn's Ferry Road and closed the only avenue by which the Confederates could escape.

The two commanding generals, through whose inefficiency the withdrawal from Fort Donelson had been rendered impossible, made their escape, leaving the task of surrender to Gen. Buckner, who, with what grace he could command, accepted the only terms offered—unconditional surrender. This occurred on the 16th of February; on the 4th of March, Gen. Grant was temporarily relieved from duty, and the troops, under the direction of Gen. Halleck, the department commander, were placed under the command of Gen. C. F. Smith, who, proceeding to the Tennessee, ascended that river to Savannah, where a part of the army was stationed. The rest was advanced to Pittsburg Landing, about nine miles above, and placed on the west side of the river. On the 13th of March, Gen. Grant was restored to his command, and, before any marked changes were made in the position of the army, was attacked by Gens. Johnston and Beauregard.

The battle of Shiloh, fought on April 6th and 7th, 1862, was the apprenticeship of a large majority of the regiments, on both sides, to the art of war. With more courage than discipline, and more zeal than knowledge, they were brought into the conflict by commanders as inexperienced as themselves, where they offered a soldier's last sacrifice in defense of their country.

The Union forces under command of Gen. Grant, present upon the field, consisted of five divisions commanded by Gens. McClernand, W. H. L. Wallace, Hurlbut, Sherman and Prentiss. The total effective strength of these organizations by the returns of the 4th of April was 37,330. On the morning of the attack by the Confederate army, under

Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, numbering 37,589, infantry and artillery, the several divisions were encamped at will, with no reference to a line of battle, upon the hills above the Tennessee River at Pittsburg Landing; not a spadeful of earth was thrown up as a defense, and the divisions were without a common commander. Of course defeat was the inevitable result, and that it was not final and crushing in its effect was owing to the arrival of Maj.-Gen. Don Carlos Buell, with the Army of the Ohio.

The Army of the Tennessee, however, fought with the same desperate courage that later on led it to victory on many hotly contested fields; the fault lay not with the troops, but with the lack of generalship which allowed them to be taken at cruel disadvantage. A year later not a subaltern in the army would have permitted his command to rest, even for a day, in the presence of a superior force of the enemy without erecting a barricade of some sort behind which to fight at advantage.

Like those youthful surgeons whose knowledge of the art was derived from books, and who finally became perfect through the suffering of others, the lesson had to be learned by our generals, and it was as well that it should be given by the grim instructors at Shiloh as elsewhere. The value of earthworks was taught the Army of the Tennessee at Shiloh. It was the dying gift of Albert Sidney Johnston, but it remained for Bragg to impart the lesson to the Army of the Ohio, when eight months later McCook's veterans fled in panic from the battle-field of Stone River.

The Kentucky Infantry regiments engaged on the Union side on the second day of the battle were the following: First, Col. D. A. Enyart; Second, Col. T. D. Sedgewick; Fifth, Col. H. M. Buckley; Sixth, Col. W. C. Whitaker; Ninth, Col. B. C. Grider; Eleventh, Col. P. B. Hawkins; Thirteenth, Col. E. H. Hobson; Twentieth, Lieut.-Col. Charles S. Hanson; Twenty-sixth, Lieut.-Col. Cicero Maxwell: Seventeenth, Col. J. H. McHenry; Twenty-fifth, Lieut.-Col. B. H. Bristow.

The last two mentioned were the only Kentucky regiments engaged in the battle of the 6th of April.

Gen. Lauman, having reported for duty the previous day, was assigned to the command of the brigade, which, under the gallant leadership of Col. Charles Cruft, received its seasoning in the heat of battle at Fort Donelson, where its heroic defense in front of Lew Wallace's division had withstood the onset of Pillow's corps, while McClernand reformed his shattered brigades in its rear. It consisted of the Seventeenth and Twenty-fifth Kentucky, reduced by battle and disease to less than 600 men; the Thirty-first and Forty-fourth Indiana, 1,100 more—making an aggregate strength of 1,717 effectives. This brigade belonged to the Army of the Ohio, and had been dispatched by Gen. Thomas L. Crittenden, at the order of Gen. Buell, to Fort Henry on the the 1st of February. It had joined Grant's army with over 2,500 men, and was returned to Buell after participating in the battles of Fort Donelson and Shiloh, with an effective strength of little over 1,200. Nearly 700 men had been killed and wounded when it rejoined the Army of the Ohio.

The first assault fell upon this brigade at about 10:30 o'clock. Prentiss and Stuart having fallen back, all that portion of the battle-field for which they had so stubbornly contended was in possession of the enemy.

The skirmishers were driven in and the gleam of bayonets beyond showed the advance of a long line of Confederate troops. Gen. Lauman says, in his report: "I waited until I could distinctly see them advancing, by the gleam of their bayonets, about 100 yards distant, when I gave the order to fire. The first volley checked their advance. They held their ground for some time, however, when they moved off to the right, where they had planted a battery, and under cover of which they attempted to cross the open field. I immediately ordered the left wing to move up to the fence, and as soon as they came within short range opened fire on them, which soon caused them to fall back. Their loss here and in the front was very heavy; the ground was literally covered with their dead and wounded. The rebels continuing to move to the left, I received your orders to move the brigade to the left, so as to check their movements in that direction. The movement was executed in fine order, and here we held our position until 4 o'clock, fighting against vastly superior numbers, until the batteries to right and left of us had retired."

Col. J. M. Shackelford having resigned in March, Lieut.-Col. Benjamin H. Bristow and Maj. Wall, each successively in command of the Twenty-fifth Kentucky, were wounded, and Col. McHenry, of the Seventeenth, assumed command of both regiments, Lieut.-Col. A. M. Stout, in command of the latter. The consolidation was made permanent by the military board of Kentucky, after the close of the battle. Col. McHenry says:

Many of my best men fell, killed and wounded, and the gallant Capt. Morton, of Company A, received at this place a fatal wound, whilst he was in front of his company, setting them a daring example, which he was ever ready to manifest in the presence of the enemy. We had been constantly engaged for five hours. All of the ammunition in the cartridge-boxes of my men was exhausted to the second round, and the enemy made a renewed attack upon our whole line, which was met with determined resistance on the part of our troops at this place. We were ordered to draw back, and did so, under your eye, slowly and without confusion. My regiment was again ordered into line, in the rear of the heavy and light artillery, which opened fire upon the Confederates, severely and unexpectedly, and which was kept up unceasingly until night closed the struggle of the day, in which your whole brigade had acted a conspicuous and gallant part.

We were moved to the front of the line of artillery, above alluded to, and bivouacked during the night in the rain, weary and worn, and without food or protection from the heavy rain that fell upon us. Without sleep, we arose with the dawn, and I found that my regiment, in killed, wounded, sick and disabled, had been reduced to less than half of the small number of men who had occupied the ranks on the day and night of the 6th.

About 10 o'clock on the 7th, we were led near the extreme right of our forces, and participated in a desperate charge of our column upon the Confederates, which resulted in driving them back, and gave the victory, glorious and dearly bought, once more to the beloved flag of our country. Lieut.-Col. Stout, on account of an extremely painful wound in the arm, received in the gallant devotion to his duty on the 6th, at my urgent request, did not go with the regiment on the second day. Maj. Isaac Calhoon was during both of these two eventful days to be found at all times where his duty called him, fearless and bold in the discharge of it. Both of these officers' horses, as well as that of my own, were wounded by musket-balls from the Confederates on the 6th. Capt. Robert Vaughan, Company I, after having fought bravely during the whole day was severely wounded on the evening of the 6th. Capt. Davison, Company B, behaved with his usual coolness and courage, with his excellent Lieut. Byers executing all orders upon the field with zeal and devotion to the cause.

Lieut. Keith, in command of Company G; Lieut. Nall, Company F; Sergt. Landrum, Company H; Lieut. Brown, Company K; Capt. Beckham, Company C; Capt. Hudson, Company D; Lieuts. Campbell, Bratcher, Ferguson, Little, Heston and Adjt. Starling, were to be found constantly at their posts on the 6th, with their respective commands, cheering, encouraging, and sustaining the gallant soldiers of the Seventeenth Kentucky Regiment, who now mourn the loss in killed and wounded out of their reduced ranks of eighty-eight of their comrades.

The First and Second Infantry Regiments returned to Kentucky from western Virginia in January, 1862, and were assigned to the 4th division, Army of the Ohio, commanded by Brig.-Gen. William Nelson. They had participated in the several minor engagements in West Virginia. Col. Bruce refers as follows to the part taken by the First, Second and Twentieth Kentucky Regiments in the battle of Shiloh on the 7th of April:

After the engagement became general, the colonel commanding the brigade was ordered to assist the Nineteenth Brigade, Col. Hazen. He ordered the First Kentucky Regiment to change direction to the right and advance to the support of Col. Hazen's left. This regiment sustained a galling fire of grape and canister while carrying out these orders. The Twentieth Kentucky was ordered up to support the First Kentucky in this movement, which it did under a very severe fire. Both these regiments deserve the highest commendations for the manner in which they executed their orders.

Between 9 and 10 o'clock, A. M., the Second Kentucky Regiment was ordered to charge a battery on our right, which was playing on our left flank. The fight of the regiment in executing this order became almost hand to hand, and was of the most terrific character. Capt. Spellmeyer was instantly killed. Capts. Bodine and Smith, Adjt. Weinedel, Lieuts Miller and Alms, were carried to the rear, all seriously wounded. Lieut. Miller died on the field. Within a very small compass, where this regiment charged, could be counted over 200 of the enemy lying dead upon the field. This regiment succeeded in taking one of the enemy's guns, but was able to hold it for only a few minutes, being overpowered by much greater numbers. During the entire day the Twenty-second Brigade rendered the most effecient service in repelling the desperate assaults on the left flank of our army.

In the afternoon, the First, Second and Twentieth Kentucky Regiments steadily maintained the positions assigned them, and did their part toward securing the imperishable glory reflected upon the general commanding his division. The Second Kentucky at one time during the afternoon charged a battery, took it, spiked one of the guns, and turned another upon the Confederates, but were unable to hold it, being fiercely charged in return by their regiments. The Twentieth Kentucky, acting in reserve, placed in position for the purpose of supporting the First Kentucky, was in full range of the Confederates' fire, and at all times maintained their formation with the steadiness and tenacity becoming veterans. Where every officer and soldier displayed such distinguished courage, it seems almost invidious to particularize. The colonel commanding the brigade desires to make particular mention of the following gentlemen:

Lieutenant-Colonel Leiper, Maj. Cahill (who was wounded), and Adjutant Wright deserve great praise for the manner in which they discharged their duties. Col. Sedgewick, Lieutenant- Colonel Spencer and Maj. Hurd displayed the greatest courage, and daring, Col. Sedgewick was stricken down by a spent round shot while discharging the duties of his position. Late in the afternoon, when the Confederates made their last desperate attempt upon our left flank, the First and Twentieth Kentucky regiments moved up to the support of Terriil's battery, repulsed the attack and held the position, while the assailants retired from the contest. Lieutenant-Colonel Hanson, commanding the Twentieth, deserves very high commendation for the manner in which he managed his regiment at this crisis. Lieutenant Bachus, of the same regiment, while fighting bravely in the lead of his company, received a very severe wound. Lieutenant Cooper, aid-de-camp to the colonel commanding, deserves high praise for the brilliant manner in which he rallied the Forty-first Ohio regiment (Col. Hazen's brigade) when badly disordered. Through the entire duration of this terrible battle the Twenty-second brigade deported themselves in a manner of which their government and the State may well be proud.

The Fifth Kentucky was one of the gallant regiments led by Gen. Rousseau at Shiloh, which drew from Gen. Sherman the high commendation of Kentucky troops found in his official report:

The Confederates had one battery close by Shiloh and another near the Hamburg road, both pouring grape and canister upon any column of troops that advanced toward the green point of water-oaks. Willich's regiment had been repulsed, but a whole brigade of McCook's division advanced beautifully, deployed, and entered this dreaded woods. I ordered my Second brigade, then commanded by Col. T. Kilby Smith, (Col. Stuart being wounded) to form on its right, and my Fourth brigade, Col. Buckland, on its right, all to advance abreast with this Kentucky brigade before mentioned, which I afterward found to be Rousseau's brigade of McCook's division. I gave personal direction to the 24, pounder guns, whose well-directed fire silenced the enemy's guns to the left, and afterward at the Shiloh Meeting-House. Rousseau's brigade moved in splendid order steadily to the front, sweeping everything before it, and at 4 P. M. we stood upon the ground of our original line and the enemy were in full retreat.

Gen. Rousseau says:

I at once decided to move forward the whole brigade to the open ground, except the Sixth Indiana which held a most important position on our left flank, which position the enemy had menaced in strong force for several hours. I ordered Col. Buckley, with the Louisville Legion, to move up to the right and front and engage the enemy, who had rallied all their available forces and were moving down upon us. At the same time Majs. King and Carpenter and Col. Smith were ordered to advance in line with Col. Buckley.

The advance was admirably made, and with alacrity the brigade steadily, briskly, and in excellent order, moved forward. We advanced about 200 yards to the front, when we came in collision with the enemy. They were stronger at this point than in either of the previous encounters. I afterward learned from wounded prisoners that the force at this time opposed to us consisted of the Third, Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Kentucky (Confederate) and several others from various States. The fire of musketry was the heaviest I ever heard. My line when fired on halted of itself and went to work.

The issue was important, as my brigade was directly in the road of the enemy to the Landing, and they were evidently pressing for that point. I was the more fully impressed with the importance of driving them from this position by your words to me when you ordered a change to the front of your original line of battle, which were, in substance, that my position was in the center, and must be held at every hazard, and that you would support me with the balance of your division as it arrived on the field.

The fight lasted about forty minutes, when the enemy gave way and were at once pursued by the whole line up to the open ground in front, my brigade capturing several cannon, retaking a battery of ours captured the previous day, and retaking the headquarters of Gen. McClernand. We also took three flags from the enemy. At this time the 40 rounds of cartridges in the boxes of the men were exhausted and the line was halted.

The Sixth Kentucky served in Hazen's brigade of Nelson's division, at Shiloh, and bore a conspicuous part in that engagement. Gen. Whitaker in his report refers as follows to the courage of his officers and men:

At 10 o'clock Mendenhall's battery, which had rendered efficient service, was assailed by a large fource of the enemy. It was supported by three companies of the Sixth Kentucky, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Cotton. They were severely pressed, and a charge was made by the remainder of the Sixth regiment at the point of the bayonet, headed by Col. Whitaker and Adjt. Shackelford. The acting brigader-general, Col. Hazen, most gallantly accompanied them in the charge. The enemy were routed from their cover behind logs and trees with terrific slaughter. The pursuit and fight were continued by Col. Hazen's brigade until the enemy were driven beyond their batteries, Whilst the entire regiment, with some miserable exceptions, behaved most gallantly, sustaining the reputation of Kentucky, and in conjunction with the Ninth Indiana and Forty-first Ohio boldly maintaining the credit of the Nineteenth brigade and Gen. Nelson's division, it is only justice to refer especially to the gallant conduct of Adjt. Shackelford, Lieutenants McGraw and Rockingham, Sergeant-Major Danks, Company A, and Private Floyd, of Company D. The regimental color-bearer, Richard T. Thornton, was shot down, and, true to his duty, died with the flag of his country on his breast. It was taken by the colonel, who carried it some distance and gave it to Sergeant Schmidt, of Company C, who bore it through the balance of the fight. Private Irving, of Company A (wounded and since dead), killed five of the enemy. Lieutenant Chilton was taken prisoner by six rebels. Two or three friends rallied to his aid. The enemy were all killed and he rescued, the lieutenant killing one of his captors with his pistol.

Brig.-Gen. J. T. Boyle, commanding the Eleventh Brigade of Gen. T. L. Crittenden's division, in his report to that officer refers as follows to the conduct of the Ninth and Thirteenth Regiments:

The Nineteenth Ohio, Col. Beatty, formed the right of my brigade; the Thirteenth Regiment, Col. Hobson, the center, and the Ninth Kentucky, Col. Grider, on the left, with the Fifty-ninth Ohio, Col. Fyffe, in the rear, as a supporting reserve. In pursuance of orders, we marched steadily forward upon the center, the Fourteenth brigade being still in advance on the left. I halted my command in sight of the open field in front of the right wing of my brigade, and, by order of Gen. Buell, given in person, I threw forward four flanking companies of the Nineteenth Ohio and Thirteenth Kentucky as skirmishers, to advance to the open field, or to where the skirmishers could find and engage the enemy, or await the advance of our line. After capturing a prisoner and sending him in, the skirmishing companies of the Nineteenth Ohio were fired upon and driven back, and I ordered up Col. Beatty, of the Nineteenth Ohio, to take position along the edge of the open field to repel the advance of the enemy in that direction. At this juncture the enemy turned their forces in the direction of the position occupied by you with the Fourteenth brigade, evidently with the view of driving back our forces and capturing our guns. The Fourteenth brigade, encouraged and led on by you in person at their head, made an impetuous attack upon the enemy, driving them back with great loss, saving our guns, and advancing our lines. As the regiments of that brigade were withdrawn, I ordered up the Thirteenth Kentucky to their position, and ordered the Ninth Kentucky and Forty-ninth Ohio to my left, where they were placed in position by you. The Thirteenth Kentucky, led on by Col. Hobson in a gallant charge upon the enemy, drove them back with great slaughter, forcing them to desert their guns, to which they had rallied after having been driven back by the Fourteenth brigade, under your command. In this charge Col. Hobson, Maj. Hobson, acting lieutenant-colonel, Capt. Towles, acting major, and Acting Adjt. Stewart, of the Thirteenth Kentucky, behaved with great coolness and courage, and, with the exception of a recoil, caused by a portion of the Wisconsin troops breaking through their lines, creating some disorder, they steadily led their brave men forward, driving the enemy before them. Maj. Hobson had his horse shot dead under him in this charge. Lieut.-Col. Edmunds, of the rebel army, was killed in the attack.

* * * * * *

The enemy seemed to be deflecting their forces and making their attack upon the left of the center, in the direction of Capt. Mendenhall's battery, which had shelled them with fearful destruction, when Gen. Buell, in person, ordered the Ninth Kentucky, Col. Grider, and Fifty-ninth Ohio, Col. Fyffe, to advance rapidly, and engage and drive back the enemy. Col. Grider led his men gallantly in the attack, well supported by most of his officers and men. The youthful Lieut. Underwood, of that regiment, behaved with the gallantry of a veteran soldier, going in advance of his men, and was shot through the sword-arm, and lost his sword. In his attack Col. Grider had three of his commissioned officers killed, and ten wounded.

Col. Hobson says:

A heavy firing commenced on our left. Gen. Crittenden ordered me to hold my regiment in readiness to charge the enemy's battery, which I did, in connection with Col. Hawkin's Eleventh Kentucky, both regiments advancing in order and occasionally meeting the enemy, driving them before us until we arrived at a section of battery in our front, which had been abandoned by the Confederates, they falling back in confusion. A section of battery on our left was captured about the same time by Col. Fyffe's Fifty-ninth Ohio, and Col. B. C. Grider's Ninth Kentucky, they moving on the left, and my regiment and Eleventh Kentucky, Col. Hawkins, on the right, supporting Capt. Bartlett's battery.

The Fourteenth brigade entered the fight on the right of Nelson's division, and became at once engaged. Col. William S. Smith, Thirteenth Ohio, commanding the brigade, thus alludes to the part taken by the Eleventh and Twenty-sixth Infantry:

The Fourteenth Wisconsin Volunteers, temporarily attached to my brigade, was drawn up in line of battle on the right, the Thirteenth Ohio on the left, and the Twenty-sixth Kentucky in the center. The Eleventh Kentucky was held in reserve, and placed 200 yards in the rear of the center of our line of battle, in a position covered by the crest of a hill, along which our line of battle extended. Two companies of skirmishers, one from the Eleventh and one from the Twenty-sixth Kentucky, were then deployed to the front. The skirmishers on our right soon charged those of the enemy in an open field in front of the right of our line. The enemy's skirmishers retired, and all was quiet in front of our line for nearly one hour, when our skirmishers again engaged those of the enemy, and this was soon followed by a furious attack upon our whole front. The right recoiled, while the left and center stood firm. The Twenty-sixth Kentucky was then sent forward to support our right, and a heavy cross fire to our front was opened from Bartlett's battery, which was in position on our right. The enemy soon yielded, when a running fight commenced, which extended for about one mile to our front, where we captured a battery and shot the horses, and many of the cannoneers. Owing to the obstructed nature of the ground, the enthusiastic courage of the majority of our men, the laggard discharge of their duty by many, our line had been transformed into a column of attack, representing the various grades of courage, from reckless daring to ignominous fear.

At the head of this column stood a few heroic men, not adequately supported, when the enemy returned to the attack with three fresh regiments in good order. We were driven back by these nearly to the first position occupied by our line, when we again rallied and moved forward toward the battery. Reaching a ravine to the right, and about 600 paces from the battery, we halted and awaited the assistance of Mendenhall's battery, which was brought into action on a knoll within a half mile of the enemy's battery, which it immediately silenced. We then advanced and captured it the second time, and succeeded in holding it, despite the efforts of the enemy to repulse us. One of the guns was at once turned upon the enemy, and Mendenhall's battery was advanced to nearly the same position, and opened fire upon the flank of the Confederate column, then retiring before Gen. McCook's division on our right. This occurred at about half past 3 o'clock, P. M., and up to this time, from 8 o'clock in the morning, my brigade had been almost constantly engaged.

The Thirteenth Ohio and Eleventh and Twenty-sixth Kentucky regiments seemed to vie with each other in determined valor, and while they each have cause to regret and detest the conduct of a few of their officers and men, they may proudly exult over the glorious part which they took as regiments in the bloody engagements of Shiloh fields.

I beg leave to make a special mention of the gallant conduct of the field and staff officers of the Thirteenth Ohio, and Eleventh and Twenty-sixth Kentucky Regiments, who, without exception, bore themselves as true soldiers and efficient officers through the dangers of the day, and Lieut. R. E. Hackett, of the Twenty-sixth Kentucky, acting aid-de-camp, whose conduct throughout the day was marked by great coolness and courage.

In the subsequent operations of the Army of the Ohio before Corinth these regiments bore a conspicuous part, performing with coolness and courage every duty assigned them. The Confederate army having advanced through eastern and middle Tennessee into Kentucky, Gen. Buell moved his army to Louisville and thence to Perryville.

Gen. George W. Morgan who was assigned to the command of the Seventh Division of the Army of the Ohio assumed command of the forces in eastern Kentucky early in April, 1862. Collecting the military commands at his disposal he formed them into four brigades, under Gens. S. P. Carter, A. Baird, J. G. Spears and Col. De Coursey, in which the Seventh, Fourteenth, Nineteenth and Twenty-second Kentucky Infantries were incorporated. Maj. Munday's battalion of the Sixth Kentucky Cavalry and Capt. Patterson's company of Engineers and Mechanics reported directly to headquarters.

Gen. Morgan determined at once upon the capture of Cumberland Gap. By bold strategical movements, crossing the mountains by unfrequented roads south of the gap, he moved through Powell's Valley and was informed that the Confederates had not awaited his arrival, but had evacuated the stronghold, leaving Morgan to take peaceable possession. Maj.-Gen. E. Kirby Smith was in command of the Confederate department of east Tennessee and his small force was kept busy along his extensive front from the gap to Chattanooga.

Cumberland Gap was held until the advance of the Confederate forces under Bragg and Smith rendered it necessary for the latter to turn it by the same route taken by Morgan in gaining possession, thus proving its uselessness as a strategic position. Finding his communications with his base of supplies at Lexington, Ky., cut off, and his supplies running short, Morgan determined to withdraw. This was successfully accomplished in the presence of the Confederates. After a weary march of 200 miles through mountain passes, harassed by Confederate cavalry and suffering from lack of provisions, the division reached the Ohio River. Previous to leaving the gap Gen. Morgan was obliged to dispense with cavalry and artillery horses for want of forage. Maj. Munday, with his cavalry and 400 of the Seventh Kentucky Infantry mounted upon artillery horses, was sent under command of Col. Garrard to report to Gen. Nelson, where they took part in the battles of Richmond and Perryville.

The first of these battles, fought against orders given by Gen. Nelson to his subordinate, Gen. M. D. Manson, resulted in defeat to the Union troops. Gen. William Nelson, to whom the command of all the troops in Kentucky was entrusted by Gen. Buell, had two brigades of the new levy stationed in the vicinity of Richmond and two more near Stanford. Gen. James E. Jackson, in command of two regiments of cavalry thrown well forward on the Crab Orchard Road, reported the advance of a heavy force from the direction of Cumberland Gap. Gen. Nelson at once issued orders for the concentration of his command at Stanford, believing that Gen. Smith would not attempt to cross the Kentucky River while so large a force was on his flank. Gen. Smith was, in the meantime, pushing forward toward Lexington by the Richmond Road, and on August 30th, came upon Manson's brigade three miles in advance of Richmond.

The Seventh Kentucky Cavalry and a detachment of the Third Tennessee Infantry had been brushed away from Big Hill by Smith's cavalry several days previously. In the first encounter with Smith's advance the Union troops were victorious, which emboldened Manson to advance a mile farther, to Rogersville, where he formed line of battle and bivouacked for the night. Early on the following morning Smith attacked and drove Manson's line back in confusion. Gen. Cruft, commanding a brigade consisting of the Eighteenth Kentucky, Ninety-fifth Ohio, and the Twelfth and Sixty-sixth Indiana, hearing the roar of battle, moved forward from Richmond and soon met a courier from Manson with orders to re-enforce him at once. The Eighteenth Kentucky pushed forward and formed under a heavy fire on the right of the line, the Ninety-fifth Ohio on the left, leaving the two Indiana regiments in reserve. In the second attack the center gave way in confusion, followed by the left, but the Eighteenth Kentucky held its ground. Col. Warner's horse was shot, but procuring another he continued to cheer on his men, until, struck down by a musket-ball, he was borne from the field. Lieut.-Col. Landrum had no sooner assumed command than he too received a fearful wound in his face, and the command devolved upon Maj. Bracht.

Referring to the conduct of his brigade at this time, Gen. Cruft says in his report:

> The Eighteenth Kentucky made a gallant fight, and by its brave stand broke the force of the enemy's attack and prevented the retreat at this time from becoming a rout.

The men and officers of most of the regiments, however, fled in confusion through the fields to the rear. This was at 10:30, in the morning. No appeals availed to stop the panic-stricken men until the reserve was reached, when, a considerable number having been rallied, a new line was formed and the two brigade commanders determined to risk another fight. The attack came in due time; Gen. Smith waiting long enough to allow the cavalry which he had sent by a detour to the rear of Richmond to get well on its way, before scattering the force in his front.

The retreat which followed the third attack was soon converted into a rout. Gen. Nelson arrived on the field at this juncture, and by strenuous exertions succeeded in getting some 2,000 men in line, hoping to form of them a rear guard to cover the retreat of the command. A few moments sufficed to show the utter uselessness of this undertaking. The line broke at the first fire, when, with one impulse of disgraceful cowardice, officers and men, mules and wagons, crowded the road toward Lexington. It was a fair field for a cavalry charge, and the Confederates made the most of it. Men were killed, wounded or taken prisoners. Gen. Nelson, severely wounded, barely made his escape. Maj. Bracht collected about 300 of his regiment, together with stragglers from other commands, and, being well acquainted with the country, left the main road, and by hard marching reached Lexington by way of Boonesboro. The loss of the Eighteenth Kentucky, in this its first engagement, was three officers and forty-seven men killed, six officers and sixty-four men wounded, and nine officers and 230 men missing. Gen. Kirby Smith was soon after joined in Kentucky by Gen. Bragg, and foraging and recruiting commenced on a large scale.

The possibility that Gen. Bragg would be able to make good his promise to hold possession of the State induced several hundred men to join the Confederate standard. Meanwhile Gen. Buell had reached Louisville, and as soon as his army was reorganized by the incorporation of a large number of new regiments into it, he moved at once upon Bragg. While the main army, divided into three grand divisions under Gens. Thomas L. Crittenden, Alex. McD. McCook and C. C. Gilbert, moved by parallel routes in the direction of Perryville—in the vicinity of which place Bragg's army was reported to be—two divisions under Gens. Sill and Dumont were sent toward Frankfort. By a singular mistake Smith was led to believe that the force advancing on the Frankfort road was Buell's main army, and so impressed Bragg with his view of the matter as to induce him not only to allow Smith to retain all his own forces, but to re-enforce him with two divisions of his own. By this means it came about that the main Union army encountered but about one-third of the Confederate army at Perryville, while that portion under Sill and Dumont was permitted to march unmolested into the capital of the State, where they interrupted the interesting ceremony of the inauguration of a governor by the Confederates. Had the two armies met in a general engagement, their respective strength being so nearly equal, a decisive battle must have ensued.

The Fifteenth Kentucky received its baptism of fire at Perryville. Lytle's brigade of Rousseau's division occupied the right of McCook's line of battle, where for several hours it held its position in the face of an attack, which for courage and endurance has few parallels in history. Late in the afternoon the Confederates determined upon a last and overwhelming assault. Moving around where they could easily be concealed by the undulations of the ground, they fell upon the right and rear of Lytle's brigade and forced it to retire. Col. Lytle was severely wounded, and, refusing to be taken from the field, was captured. Hearing of this, Gen. Rousseau rode rapidly to that part of the field where the right of the brigade, the Fifteenth Kentucky, under command of the gallant Col. Pope, was resting upon a hill immediately in front of Loomis' battery.

Gen. Rousseau says: "While near the Fifteenth Kentucky, I saw a heavy force of the enemy advancing upon our right, the same that had turned Lytle's right flank. It was moving steadily up, in full view of where Gen. Gilbert's army corps had been during the day, the left flank of which was not more than 400 yards from it. On approaching the Fifteenth Kentucky, though broken and shattered, the regiment rose to their feet and cheered, and, as one man, moved to the top of the hill where they could see the enemy; I ordered them to lie down, at the same time ordering Loomis' battery to open upon the advancing enemy." At this moment re-enforcements, tardily sent, appeared upon the field from Gilbert's corps, and the Confederates were forced to retire from the field. The loss of the Fifteenth Kentucky in this engagement was sixty-six killed, and 130 wounded, and four taken prisoners. Col. Pope received a mortal wound, from which he died a month later. Lieut.-Col. Jouett and Maj. Campbell were killed, and three other officers were wounded.*

The Army of the Ohio, under Gen. Buell, comprised all Kentucky regiments. After the Confederate forces retired from the State, and Buell, returning from their pursuit, turned the head of his columns toward Nashville, he was relieved of command by Maj.-Gen. William S. Rosecrans. The Department of the Cumberland was to be carved out of the southern Confederacy, and that portion of the State of Kentucky lying east of the Cumberland River was embraced in the Department of the Ohio under Maj.-Gen. H. G. Wright. Several regiments which had participated in the campaigns of Buell were retained by Gen. Wright. These were the Twelfth, Thirteenth, Twentieth, Twenty-fourth and Twenty-sixth Infantry. The Seventh, Fourteenth, Sixteenth, Nineteenth, Twenty-second, Twenty-seventh and Thirty-fourth also remained in the Department of the Ohio, leaving the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Eighth, Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh, Fifteenth, Seventeenth, Eighteenth, Twenty-first, Twenty-third and Twenty-eighth Infantries in the Army of the Cumberland. The cavalry regiments were also divided between the two departments, the First, Eighth, Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh, Twelfth, Thirteenth, Fifteenth and Seventeenth, all but the first newly raised regiments, remained in Kentucky, while the Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth and Seventh were assigned to Gen. Rosecrans, and thenceforth shared the fortunes of the Army of the Cumberland. The Seventh, Nineteenth and Twenty-second Infantries and Patterson's engineers represented the Kentucky troops in the Army of the Tennessee, where, under their old commander, Gen. George W. Morgan, they participated in the assault upon Chickasaw Bluffs, near Vicksburg, in December, 1862.

The movement by Maj.-Gen. William S. Rosecrans with the Army of the Cumberland against the Confederate Army of the Tennessee, under Gen. Bragg, commenced on Christmas day, 1862.

The following Kentucky organizations were engaged in the battle that ensued December 31st, at Stone River.

Second Cavalry, Maj. T. F. Nicholas, on detached duty at headquarters; Third Cavalry, Col. Eli H. Murray, First Cavalry Brigade; Battery A, Light Artillery; Third Brigade, First Division, center; First Infantry, Col. D. A. Enyart, First Brigade, Second Division, left wing; Second Infantry, Col. T. G. Sedgewick, First Brigade, Second Division, left wing; Third Infantry, Lieut.-Col. Samuel McKee, First Brigade, First Division, left wing Fifth Infantry, Lieut.-Col. W. W. Berry, Third Brigade, Second Division, right wing; Sixth Infantry, Col. W. C. Whitaker, Second Brigade, Second Division, left wing; Eighth Infantry, Lieut.-Col. R. May, Third Brigade, Third Division, left wing; Ninth Infantry, Col. B. C. Grider, First Brigade, Third Division, left wing; Eleventh Infantry, Lieut.-Col. E. L. Mottley, First Brigade, Third Division, left wing; Fifteenth Infantry, Col. J. B. Foreman, Second Brigade, First Division, center; Twenty-First Infantry, Lieut.-Col. J. C. Evans, Third Brigade, Third Division, left wing; Twenty-Third Infantry, Maj. T. H. Hamrick, Third Brigade, Second Division, left wing; Maj.-Gen. George H. Thomas, commanding the center; Maj.-Gen. A. McD. McCook, commanding the right wing; Maj.-Gen. Thomas L. Crittenden, commanding the left wing; Brig.-Gen. David S. Stanley, commanding the cavalry.

Gen. Palmer's division occupied the right of Crittenden's corps and Cruft's brigade held the right of the line, adjoining Negley's division of Thomas' corps. The attack made at dawn by the Confederates, commencing on the right, swept the right of McCook's corps from the field, and swelling toward the left was met sturdily by Sheridan and Negley who were at length compelled to fall back, when the force of the assault fell upon Palmer. Gen. Cruft's brigade was formed in two lines, the Second Kentucky and Thirty-first Indiana under charge of Col. Sedgewick in front, and the First Kentucky and Ninetieth Ohio commanded by Col. Enyart in the rear support. Gen. Cruft says in his report of the battle of Stone River: "My troops fought with heroism; every officer and soldier acted well and seemed to me to accomplish more than could be expected of him. For sturdy endurance, stalwart bravery and manly courage, it does not seem to me that the conduct of these two regiments here could be surpassed. The enemy was driven back, although superior in numbers. His charge was made in two lines with the appearance of a four rank formation and in most admirable order and discipline. After the first repulse and before my line could be advanced, the enemy made a second charge more furious than before. The Second Kentucky and Thirty-first Indiana nobly held their ground, and after some thirty minutes' well directed fire drove him back for a short distance." The rear line consisting of the Second Kentucky and Ninetieth Ohio was now advanced to the front, and became immediately engaged. Gen. Cruft continues: "I attempted with it to assail the enemy and ordered an advance. The First Kentucky, Col. Enyart, on the right of the line, made a gallant charge and drove the enemy before it, rushing forward to the crest of the hill, clear beyond and to the right of the burnt house. The fire was so severe from the enemy's force at the burnt house on the left that the order to move up the Ninetieth Ohio was countermanded, not, however, until many of the officers and men of this gallant regiment had pressed forward over the fence in line with the old First Kentucky." The sad list of killed and wounded, in the First and Second Kentucky, attest the courage with which these regiments held their ground on this eventful day. At length forced to fall back, the Second Kentucky brought off three pieces of artillery abandoned by Negley's division just as they were being seized by the Confederates. The loss in the First and Second Kentucky Regiments in this engagement was 173 in killed, and wounded and missing.

*See Appendix B, Battle of Perryville, page 630.

Although on constant duty during the first year of its service, the Third Kentucky Infantry had no opportunity to test its metal in a general engagement until the 31st of December, 1862, when the Army of the Cumberland met the Confederate Army under Gen. Bragg on the field of Stone River. The regiment under Col. Samuel McKee served in Hascall's brigade of Wood's division in the left wing, and its opportunity came when the Confederates, under Donelson, attacked Palmer's division in front of the Cowan House. Col. A. F. Stevenson, of Sheridan's staff, in his history of Stone River, refers as follows to the splendid conduct of the Third Kentucky and its lamented commander: "Suddenly an aid sent by Gen. Palmer dashed across the open space toward Gen. Hascall, whose command was a short distance in the rear, and informed him that Gen. Palmer's division needed help immediately. After a moment's consulation with Gen. Wood, Hascall sent the grand old Third Kentucky, and in double quick time this regiment rushed to the rescue and took its position on the west side of the Nashville pike. A terrible fight took place. Scarcely had the Third Kentucky been in its position ten minutes when a minié ball struck its brave commander, Lieut.-Col. Samuel McKee, above the eye, and he fell from his horse, while the regiment lost one-fourth its number in killed and wounded. The courageous Maj. Collier, though wounded in the leg and breast, refused to leave the field and stayed with his men to the end. Seeing that the Third Kentucky had suffered so severely, Gen. Hascall ordered the Fifty-eighth Indiana and Twenty-sixth Ohio to their relief as a second line; then placing Estepp's battery between them a little way to the rear, he kept the One Hundredth Illinois further back in the rear." The slaughter was frightful, and Gen. Donelson, after losing fifty per cent of his effective strength, finding himself unable to break the line in his front, ordered his men to move into the cedars west of the Cowan House, and finally retired toward the Wilkinson pike. The loss of the Third Kentucky in killed, wounded and missing in the engagement was 133, out of a total of 313 taken into action.

In the disaster which befel the right wing at Stone River the Fifth Kentucky was involved, but all that heroic courage on the part of officers and men could do to compensate for the blunders of superior officers, was most gallantly done. Col. Berry took into the action 320 men, and of this number lost nineteen killed and eighty wounded, Capt. Ferguson among the former, and Lieut.-Col. Berry, Maj. Forman, Capts. Speed and Lovett, and Lieuts. Dissell, Sheppard and Powell among the latter; twenty-six were missing. During the engagement the color-bearer was shot, and down went the flag, but in a moment it gleamed aloft again in the hands of three men struggling who should have it. Sergt. Baker bore it throughout the remainder of the day.

The old Nelson division was commanded by Maj.-Gen. John M. Palmer, and Hazen's brigade, formed in two lines with the Sixth Kentucky and Forty-first Ohio in front, formed the center of the division. Gen. Hazen, referring to the assault made by the Confederates upon Cruft's brigade, mentioned, says: "The Sixth Kentucky was not immediately under my observation from the first assault until late in the day, but the portion of time it was with me, and I have reason to believe at all other times, it fought unflinchingly, and is deserving of all praise. It repelled three assaults of a rebel brigade from the Cowan House endeavoring to reach the wood, and only retired when its ammunition was exhausted. The loss of the regiment in the engagement was, in killed, two officers and eleven enlisted men; in wounded, six officers and eighty-eight enlisted men. Among the killed was Lieut.-Col. George T. Cotton, a brave and efficient officer, and Capt. Charles S. Todd, who fell while pressing his men on to victory. Among the wounded officers were Lieuts. Bates, Dawkins, Armstrong and Frank."

On the march of the army northward in September, Col. Stanley Matthews' brigade, in which the Eighth and Twenty-first Kentucky were serving, moved to Louisville, where, in October, it was assigned to the old Crittenden division, then under command of Gen. Van Cleve. In the battle of Perryville the right wing, under Maj.-Gen. Thomas L. Crittenden, had no opportunity to participate, and the first battle of importance in which these regiments took part was Stone River. Van Cleve's division, consisting in part of the Eighth, Ninth, Eleventh and Twenty-first Kentucky Infantry, was ordered to move at 7 A. M. on the morning of the 31st of December, to attack Breckinridge's division on the right of the Confederate army. Before this movement could be carried out, the Confederate attack came with the force of a cyclone upon the right of the Union line. Van Cleve was at once recalled, and the Third Brigade, commanded by Col. S. W. Price, Twenty-first Kentucky, assigned to the defense of the ford. "Who commands this brigade?" asked Gen. Rosecrans, appearing suddenly upon the scene. "I do," replied Col. Price. "Will you hold this ford?" "I will try," was the modest response. "Will you hold this ford?" "I will die here, sir." "Will you hold this ford?" "Yes, sir." "That will do," said the general, as he plunged the spurs into his horse, and dashed into the thick of the fray.

The Eighth and Twenty-first remained at the ford, which was held according to promise, while the Ninth and Eleventh Kentucky, commanded by Cols. Grider and Mottley, accompanied the First Brigade to the rescue of the right wing. The tide of battle had set in with disaster to the Union arms. The line of battle suddenly improvised by Gen. Rosecrans from the reserve and the left wing lined the turnpike, waiting for the cloud of stragglers from McCook's command to emerge from the cedars and pass through the line. Rarely had greater responsibility rested upon a single line of battle. Defeat meant the rout of the Union army and the undisputed march of the Confederates through Kentucky, from which they had just been driven. It was a thrilling moment when the order was given to advance. Steadily as if on parade the line moved forward in irresistible strength. The Confederates fell back, and the shock of battle came after the Confederate skirmish line, retiring upon the main body, rallied to defend the ground they had won. Col. Beatty formed his brigade with the Ninth Kentucky and Nineteenth Ohio in the first line, and the Eleventh and Seventy-ninth Indiana in support. In the engagement which ensued, the Second Brigade was driven back, leaving the First Brigade to bear the brunt of the fight. It was in a dangerous position, and a charge was necessary to save it from terrible loss. This was effected with the skill and precision characteristic of this model brigade, and the battle raged with redoubled fury, resulting in the triumph of the Union arms. During the fight the men of the Ninth and Eleventh Kentucky bore themselves like heroes. Gen. Van Cleve having been wounded while the battle was in progress, Col. Beatty assumed command of the division, and the command of the brigade devolved upon Col. Ben C. Grider, Ninth Kentucky. New Year's day was occupied by both armies in caring for the wounded and moving into new positions. The division was advanced across Stone River, where its commander was directed to take position on the elevated ground beyond the ford, with the tacit understanding that his post was more one of observation of the Confederates' movements than that of an army on the defensive.

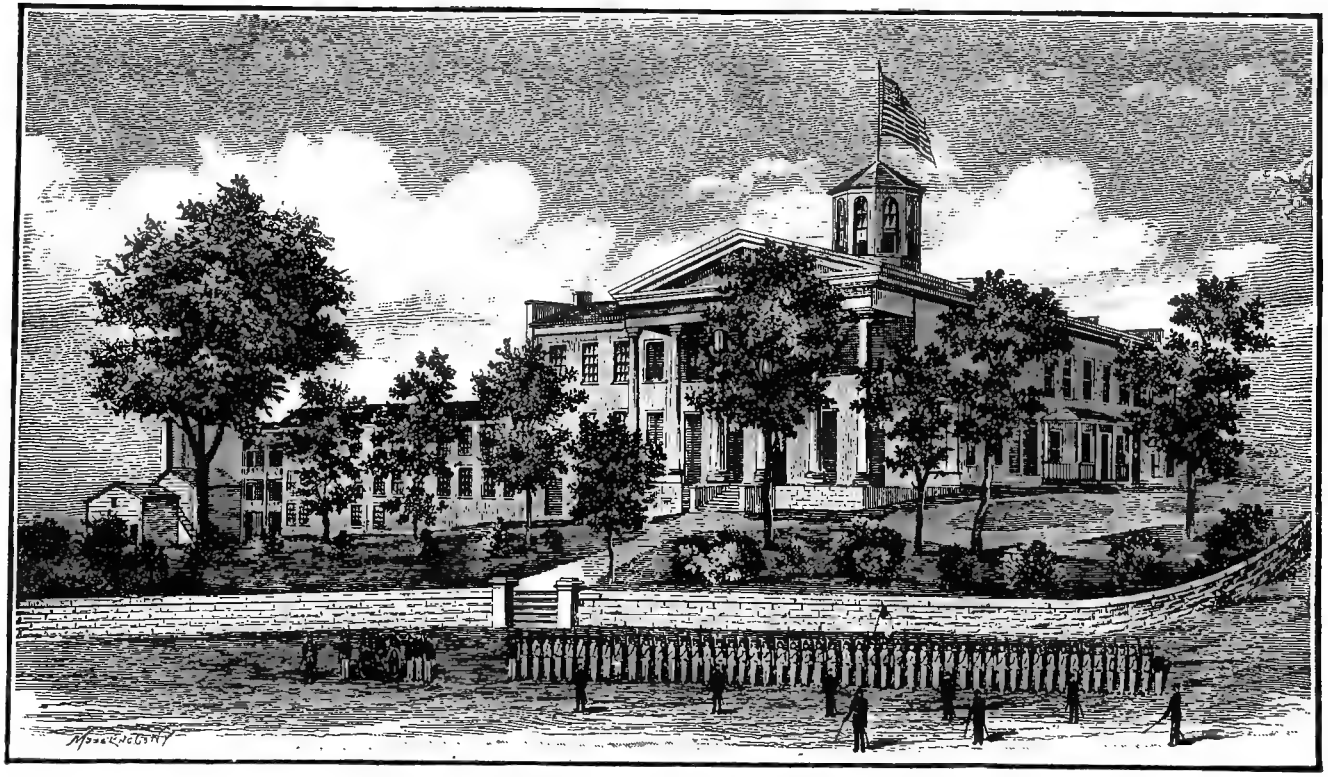
The assault of Breckinridge's division on the 2d of January is more fully described in the sketch of the Confederate Kentucky brigade. Beatty's entire division, sadly decimated by the fight of the 31st of December, numbered little over 2,000 bayonets. To attempt to hold the position was folly, but receiving no orders to fall back, the sturdy commander held his position as long as possible, when, finding that to remain longer must result in the loss of his command, the order was reluctantly given to retreat. It was delayed too long and a hand-to-hand fight ensued. The Ninth and Eleventh retired in as good order as possible, the Eighth and Twenty-first after a desperate battle were forced back and all reformed on the west bank of the river. The success of the Confederates was short lived. Fifty-four pieces of artillery sent a shower of iron among them. Volleys of musketry plowed through their ranks and they were compelled to retire.

Gen. Rousseau refers to Col. Forman, who fell at Stone River while bravely leading his men in action, as "My brave boy-colonel of the Fifteenth Kentucky." Col. John Beatty commanding the brigade says: "Col. Forman, Fifteenth Kentucky, was killed in the cedar woods on the morning of the 31st. He was a brave man and an excellent officer. Capt. Bayne of the same regiment fell at the same time while urging his men forward."

In the desperate struggle between Rousseau and Cleburne for the possession of the cedars, Beatty's brigade moved up in line with the regular brigade, Scribner's brigade following as support. Filled with exultation by their victory over Johnston on the extreme right the Confederates rushed forward upon the solid columns of Rousseau and VanCleve, only to be hurled back torn and bleeding in the conflict. Brigade after brigade was brought up only to share the fate of the first. The Union line was never broken after the first assault, for the heroic men who composed it realized the immense responsibility of the situation.

The officers killed and mortally wounded at the battle of Stone River, in Kentucky regiments, were:

Capt. Miller R. McCullock, Second Cavalry; Col. Samuel McKee, Lieut. Daniel Severance, Lieut. Mathew Cullen, Third Infantry; Capt. Alexander B. Ferguson, Lieut. Frank Dissell, Fifth Infantry; Lieut.-Col. George T. Cotton, Capt. Charles S. Todd, Sixth Infantry; Capt. Robert B. Hickman, Eighth Infantry; Capt. John B. Benton, Eighth Infantry; Capt. Landon C. Minter, Eighth Infantry; Lieut. Wade B. Cox, Eighth Infantry; Capt. William T. Bryan, Ninth Infantry; Capt. Demetrius B. Coyle, Ninth Infantry; Lieut. Algernon S. Leggett, Ninth Infantry; Lieut. Frederick F. Carpenter, Ninth Infantry; Col. James B. Forman, Fifteenth Infantry; Capt. Aaron S. Bayne, Fifteenth Infantry; Lieut. L. Frank Todd, Fifteenth Infantry; Lieut. Sebastian Stone, Twenty-first Infantry; Lieut. John H. Bevill, Twenty-first Infantry.



The stupendous preparations for the capture of Vicksburg drew toward Memphis, in November and the early part of December, 1862, the two divisions commanded by Gens. Morgan and A. J. Smith, largely re-enforced by regiments of the new levy, together with a large number of regiments not brigaded. To this force was added the division of Morgan L. Smith, and Gen. William T.

Sherman was assigned to command. That portion of Gen. Curtiss' troops stationed on the east bank of the Mississippi was directed to join him. Admiral Porter's gun-boat fleet was directed to co-operate, and when the expedition sailed from Memphis, on the 25th of December, its effective strength was estimated at 40,000 men. The flotilla entered the mouth of the Yazoo and the troops disembarked on the 27th.

Gen. Steele's division of Curtiss' army had been taken on at Helena, Ark., and two brigades under Hovey and Thayer were landed above the mouth of Chickasaw bayou with orders to feel their way along its eastern bank. Blair's brigade of this division was assigned to Morgan who, with his three brigades commanded by De Coursey, Lindsay and Sheldon, landed below the bayou. Morgan L. Smith was on his left—his two brigades under Gens. A. J. Smith and Stuart on the main road from Johnston's plantation to Vicksburg, with orders to bear to the left and cross the bayou about one mile south of where Morgan struck it. The division of A. J. Smith was delayed one day at Milikin's Bend awaiting the return of Gen. Stephen G. Burbridge's brigade, which was detached at that point on an expedition to destroy the Vicksburg & Shreveport Railroad. On their arrival, the two brigades of this division under Gen. Burbridge and Col. W. J. Landrum, formed the extreme right of the line of battle, and during the night of the 27th the ground in front was strongly reconnoitered.

Gen. Martin L. Smith, the commander of the defenses at Vicksburg, whose successful repulse of the gun-boats the previous summer had entitled him to the confidence of the Confederate government, surmising that the next attack would be made from the northern side to gain access to his rear, had applied himself to strengthening his position along the Chickasaw Bluffs for a distance of thirteen miles. A line of works extended to Haine's Bluffs, manned by about 1,200 men, with abundant artillery planted along the sinuosities of the ridge, so as to gain a cross fire upon every available point of attack. Gen. Pemberton, confronted by Grant at Grenada, was unable to spare a man to re-enforce Vicksburg until the opportune arrival of Stevenson's division from east Tennessee, when Vaughn's brigade was at once detached and placed by Smith in the trenches on the left. Having aligned his troops Gen. Sherman announced that the signal for a simultaneous rush upon the works would be a volley of artillery in Morgan's front. Struggling through the water and mud of the sluggish bayou, Blair's and De Coursey's brigades plunged forward. The water was too deep for the main portion of the line to cross and the position was stormed by a portion of these two brigades. Reaching the opposite bank the Forty-second Ohio was detained under cover by Col. De Coursey, but the Twenty-second Kentucky, led by the brave Monroe, rushed forward with a cheer to join their comrades in the charge. Their leader fell, but they pressed on through a tangled abatis, over dead and wounded men, under a storm of grape and canister shot raining down upon them from the works above their heads. Of the whole force, but eight regiments reached the second line of works. They had struggled over ground, to enter upon which was to encounter death.

Lieut.-Col. Dustin led his Fifty-eighth Ohio to the foot of the last line of works and fell dead upon the parapet. Near him lay the brave major of the Thirty-first Missouri, dying of a mortal wound. For a few minutes the situation was such as to appeal to the stoutest heart, but the line stood firm, rapidly melting away under an enfilading fire that swept every square yard of the ground in front of the works. No support was anywhere in sight; of 40,000 men but this handful was sent into the jaws of death. The works above their heads were manned by a disciplined force, thrice their number, whose well-aimed rifles dealt death at every discharge. If there is a limit to human endurance the men of Blair's and De Coursey's brigades showed no signs of having reached it. With courage undaunted they still strove to reach the summit of the works, where as many as succeeded were received upon the points of bayonets and thrust back. All along the base their bodies lay in ghastly heaps, the life-blood welling from gaping wounds. Each man fought for his life, officers and men intermingled in the strife, and recognized no rank but that which valor gives. The brief carnival of death was closed only by the order to retreat, but to retire was as hazardous as to go forward; to hesitate was to be lost. They finally withdrew, however, leaving behind them a trail of dead and wounded to be cared for by the victorious Confederates.

KENTUCKY MILITARY INSTITUTE, NEAR FRANKFORT.—SEE PAGE 507.

The following regiments were in this assault, which must remain in history as one of the bloodiest on record: The Twenty-ninth and Thirty-first Missouri, Thirteenth Illinois, Fifty-eighth, Sixteenth and Fifty-fourth, Ohio, and the Twenty-second Kentucky. Landrum and Burbridge on the right of the line performed the duty assigned them, which was to engage the troops in their front, and by a vigorous fusilade they prevented Vaughn from adding his force to that already in front of Blair and De Coursey.

The attempt upon Vicksburg having failed, Gen. McClernand, who assumed command of the corps on its arrival at the mouth of the Yazoo, determined upon the capture of Arkansas Post, on the left bank of the Arkansas River, fifty miles above its mouth. It was garrisoned by a division of infantry, 3,000 strong, under command of Gen. Churchill; and the fort, a full bastioned earthwork, was manned by three nine-inch columbiads in the casemates commanding the river, and smaller guns facing landward. An earthwork extending inland 700 yards to a bayou was defended by infantry and light artillery. Above the fort the river was open to navigation, and into it the "Blue Wing," a steamer laden with arms and ammunition for Sherman's army, after its capture by Confederate gun-boats, was taken. On his way down the river to assume command of the corps, Gen. McClernand had heard of this exploit, and on reaching his command, finding that nothing further could be accomplished in that direction, turned the prows of his boats up stream in search of game more easily bagged. His first duty was to organize the army into two corps. Gen. Morgan was assigned to command of the Thirteenth Corps, consisting of A. J. Smith's division and his own now under Gen. Osterhaus. Steele's division and that of Morgan L. Smith, now commanded by Gen. Stuart (Smith, having been wounded), constituted the Fifteenth Corps, under command of Gen. W. T. Sherman.

By passing the mouth of the Arkansas and ascending the White River as far as the canal connecting the two rivers, the Confederates were thrown off their guard, and the fleet appeared within a few miles of the fort before its presence was known to the garrison. Gen. Churchill was informed by his pickets that a powerful fleet had entered the Arkansas from White River on the 9th of January, and rightly surmising that the fort was the objective point, he disposed his troops to meet the attack. Of his three brigades, he sent Deshler's and Dunnington's into the trenches below the fort, retaining Garland's in reserve.

The forenoon of the 10th was spent in debarking from the boats, three miles below, whence Gen. Sherman moved rapidly toward the rear of the fort, with orders to move forward until his right rested on the river above it. Morgan followed, taking position on Sherman's left, completing the line of investment, while Col. Lindsay was sent with his three regiments, the Seventh Kentucky, Forty-ninth Indiana, and One Hundred and Fourteenth Ohio, and a battery of artillery, across the river to take position opposite to and above the fort, to cut off escape in that direction. These movements were as nearly executed as circumstances would permit, when night set in and the shivering troops bivouacked without shelter, and with no food but that found in their haversacks.

While the troops were moving to their allotted positions in the line of investment, the gun-boats opened upon the troops within the works below the fort, which caused their withdrawal under cover of the heavy guns, when Adm. Porter at once advanced to test the metal of the guns within the fort. During the night Churchill received a telegram from Gen. Holmes, his department commander, directing him to hold out until re-enforcements arrived, or until all were dead, "which order," says Churchill, "I communicated to my brigade commanders with orders to carry it out in spirit and in letter."

Gen. Steele's division resting on the bayou in rear of the fort formed the extreme right of the line of battle and Osterhaus the left, De Coursey in reserve and Stuart and A. J. Smith in the center. Eight batteries of artillery were stationed at intervals along the line and a section of twenty-pounder Parrotts was posted on the river bank concealed from the fort by fallen trees to dismount the gun in the lower casemate. The cavalry was disposed in the rear with orders to force stragglers to the front, a vocation peculiarly agreeable to the men on horseback. Lindsay's battery had an enfilading fire across the river upon the Confederate line which carried away a battle flag and killed several men. "Eager to do still more," says McClernand, "the Seventh Kentucky Infantry embarked on one of the gun-boats, that had passed the fort, to cross the river, but before the regiment could get over the enemy had surrendered."

In the fight that ensued the entire line moved forward gallantly and gained the cover of a belt of woods. The twenty-pounder Parrotts demolished the casemate and silenced a nine-inch columbiad, and by 4 P. M. every gun except a six-pounder Parrott on the land side had yielded to Porter's artillery. Two boats passed up the river and joined Lindsay in enfilading the Confederate line, which still held out in obedience to Holmes' ironclad order. Two attacks made on the right were repulsed and on the left every charge made was driven back with heavy loss. A. J. Smith now deployed nine regiments of Burbridge's and Landrum's brigades, supported by three regiments in reserve, and moving steadily forward drove the Confederates toward the open ground in front of the right of the rifle pits. Sheldon's brigade dashed forward upon the fort, but was halted by the deep ravine on the lower side. De Coursey advanced against a galling fire. The Nineteenth Kentucky and two other regiments were sent to re-enforce Sherman. Burbridge's brigade went forward, following its gallant leader, who, mounted upon a swift and powerful steed, calling upon his escort to follow him, dashed forward and came suddenly upon the fosse surrounding the fort. Behind him were his troops hotly engaged. There was not time to rein up, and, leaping the ditch, the general found himself alone in presence of the enemy.

The men took aim at his head, but the address of the officer saved his life. "Recover arms," he shouted, and with instinctive obedience the soldiers brought their guns to a perpendicular. Before they had time to recover their senses, the general had dismounted and was about to surrender, when he caught sight of a white flag floating from a bastion of the fort. Calling the attention of the guard to it, he passed within the fort; drawing a small United States flag from his pocket he mounted to the top of the fort, and, securing a ramrod for a flag staff, gave it to the breeze. The sight of a white flag floating from the fort brought Churchill in hot haste to the spot. It had not been raised by his order, and the irate commander, encountering a Federal officer within the fort, hardly knew what to make of the situation. Gen. Burbridge immediately called upon him to surrender, but remarked jocularly "I do not know whether I am your prisoner or you mine." Outside the fort the storm of battle that had raged unceasingly for four hours had nearly ceased and the entrance of several of Burbridge's staff, led by the faithful Lieut. John Throckmorton, decided the question. Col. Dunnington now appeared upon the scene from an angle of the fort opposite the entrance. Both officers offered their swords but were referred to Gen. McClernand, who entering at this moment received their surrender. The loss in the Union troops was 129 killed, 831 wounded and seventeen missing; total 977. That of the Confederates, sixty killed, eighty wounded and nearly 6,000 prisoners. The spoils consisted of seventeen pieces of artillery, 5,000 stand of arms, 130 swords and a large quantity of ammunition.

In the Vicksburg campaign, the Seventh Kentucky Infantry, under command of Lieut.-Col. J. Lucas and Col. R. B. May, served in the First Brigade of Osterhaus, Ninth Division, Thirteenth Corps. The brigade was commanded by Brig. Gen. T. T. Garrard, the former colonel of the regiment, until June, when Col. Keigwin was assigned to command. The Nineteenth Kentucky Infantry, under Lieut.-Col. J. Cowan, was in Col. Landrum's (Second) brigade of A. J. Smith's (Tenth) division, Thirteenth corps, and the Twenty-second Kentucky, under Lieut.-Col. Monroe, was in Col. Lindsay's (Second) brigade of Osterhaus' division. Col. Sheldon relieved Col. Lindsay in command of the brigade in June, when the latter assumed command of the division, retaining it until after the fall of Vicksburg. The First Brigade of the Tenth Division was commanded by Gen. S. G. Burbridge, formerly colonel of the Twenty-sixth Kentucky Infantry. Thus four brigades of the Army of the Tennessee were commanded by Kentuckians. They took part in all the battles of Gen. Grant's movement to the rear of Vicksburg, and won the following glowing tribute from the corps commander.

HEADQUARTERS THIRTEENTH ARMY CORPS,
NEAR VICKSBURG, June 5, 1863.

Governor:—I have the honor to inform you that there are two general officers and three regiments, the Seventh, Nineteenth and Twenty-second Kentucky, in the Thirteenth Army Corps, Department of the Tennessee, under my command, who crossed the Mississippi River with me at Bruinsburg, below Grand Gulf, on the 30th day of April, and who took part in the battles of Thompson's Hill on the 1st of May; Champion Hills on the 16th; Big Black Bridge on the 17th of May; and at Vicksburg, beginning on the 19th of May and continuing up to the present time.

I am most happy, sir, to congratulate you, and, through you, your noble State for the victories won by the common effort of her brave sons with those of sister States, and to bear testimony to the gallantry, bravery and good conduct of her officers and men in all these bloody struggles. They bore themselves with the unflinching steadiness of veterans, both under galling fires of artillery and musketry, and in making charges upon fortifications.

They have shown themselves compeers and fit companions in arms with brave men of sister States in a series of battles, in which it has become impossible to make particular mention of those who distinguished themselves, without mentioning, individually, both officers and men.

Your obedient servant,

(Signed) JOHN A. MCCLERNAND,
Major-General, Commanding Thirteenth Army Corps, Department of the Tennessee.

His Excellency,
JAMES F. ROBINSON, Governor of Kentucky.

The limits of this work will not permit more than the merest outline of Gen. Grant's operations in rear of Vicksburg. By a series of bold movements his army, under skillful corps, division and brigade commanders, often acting independently, succeeded in separating the army under Gen. Pemberton from that commanded by Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, and confining it to the works at Vicksburg.

Both Gens. Bragg in Tennessee and Pemberton in Mississippi were nominally under command of Gen. Johnston, but in the exercise of their discretion disobeyed his orders whenever in their judgment occasion demanded. If implicit obedience had been yielded to him the Vicksburg campaign would, beyond doubt, have had a different result. Bragg, resting quietly behind his works at Tullahoma, was repeatedly urged to send strong re-enforcements to Johnston to enable him to attack Grant's investing line from the rear and compel him to abandon the siege. With the railroad communications at his command this movement need not have occupied but a few days, and the increase of Johnston's army by 30,000 men would have been sufficient to crush Grant between the forces in his front and rear.

After an ineffectual attempt to cut a channel for the gun-boats across the peninsula, formed by a bend in the Mississippi River opposite Vicksburg, the problem was solved by Adm. Porter on the night of the 16th of April, when with his fleet and three transports he ran the blockade, followed a week later by six more transports, each towing two barges laden with forage and rations. After five hours' bombardment of the works at Grand Gulf, it became evident that they could not be carried, when the blockade at this point was run, and the troops, marching to Hard Times Landing, were ferried across the river to Bruinsburg.

As soon as the Thirteenth Corps was landed and could draw three days' rations in haversacks, the troops were started on the road to Port Gibson, near which place, on the 1st of May, the advance of the Confederates was met, and after a hard fight defeated and pursued toward Port Gibson. Col. S. A. Sheldon, commanding the Second Brigade at the time, says: "The Sixteenth Ohio and the Twenty-second Kentucky obliquing to the left entered the ravine on the front and left of the enemy's position, and advanced under cover very near the enemy, and maintained their position until near night, doing considerable damage to the enemy by a continuous and well directed fire." He mentions among other officers Maj. Worthington, commanding the Twenty-second Kentucky, as behaving ably and gallantly.

The next two weeks were occupied in bringing up supplies and advancing into the interior as far as Raymond, which was garrisoned by Osterhaus' division, but in obedience to orders from Gen. Grant the division moved north, and on the 15th, captured Bolton's Station with several prisoners. Smith's division bivouacked north of Raymond; Hovey's, Carr's and Blair's divisions were near at hand, all fronting toward Edward's Station, where the Confederate army was supposed to be in force. Early on the morning of the 15th, Smith advanced supported by Blair on the southern road. Osterhaus moved on the middle road followed by Carr, while Hovey marched by the northern road. Thus McClernand's corps moving on parallel roads encountered Pemberton's advance about 7.30 A. M. and the battle of Champion Hill ensued. Gen. McPherson was in support of Hovey's division with his entire corps; a line of skirmishers connected with Smith's and Osterhaus' divisions; Blair moved a brigade to the support of the right, while Ransom's brigade performed a like service upon the left. At 10 A. M. Gen. Hovey advanced upon the Confederates, who were posted on a wooded hill some sixty or seventy feet in height, midway between Vicksburg and Jackson, known as Champion Hill. The appearance of Hovey's division at the base of the hill was the signal for opening a galling fire of artillery and musketry, but the brave fellows pressed forward and by 11 o'clock the engagement was general along the entire line, which continued with increasing fury until noon, when the Confederates fell back, leaving 300 prisoners in the hands of the Union troops.

Quickly rallying, however, the Confederates, re-enforced by fresh troops, poured down the road and renewed the conflict, directing their attack upon Hovey, who was borne back until the ground taken by desperate fighting was lost. The advance of the Confederates, however, was checked by a heavy enfilading fire of artillery, under which they were driven back to the cover of the woods, followed by Hovey's and Crocker's divisions, which pushing forward reached the crest of the hill, and the day was won. In little over four hours nearly one-third of Hovey's division were killed or wounded. Meanwhile, Osterhaus' division had advanced against the right of the Confederate line, Garrard's brigade on the right and Lindsay's on the left, and soon both brigades were hotly engaged, and the reserves were brought up. Lindsay's brigade charged a battery, shooting down men and horses and capturing two pieces of artillery. Garrard, in the meantime, was pushing his lines forward on the right. The Seventh Kentucky, the Forty-ninth Indiana, and one section of Lanphere's battery, formed the advance, and, driving the Confederate skirmishers from one ravine to another, they pushed forward toward the main position in a fierce charge that brought them under the fire of the guns upon the hill, where they were obliged to halt.

Finding that a further stay at Champion Hill would place the army in jeopardy, Gen. Pemberton now determined to fall back upon Vicksburg, which he did, followed by Osterhaus and Smith. "Thousands of the enemy," says Osterhaus in his report, "were found scattered everywhere and fell into our hands as prisoners. In one instance Col. Lindsay with the Sixteenth Ohio and Twenty-second Kentucky Infantry alone took more prisoners than the whole number of his brigade combined." The pursuit was kept up as far as Edward's Station, where McClernand's corps bivouacked for the night. The lines were pushed forward, however, at other points and especially by Gen. Lawler, whose division dashed forward under a severe fire, and with fixed bayonets drove the Confederates from their works, but not until they had succeeded in burning the bridge across Big Black River. During the following night and morning, the bridge was rebuilt by Patterson's Engineers, and the army crossed and took up the line of march for Vicksburg.

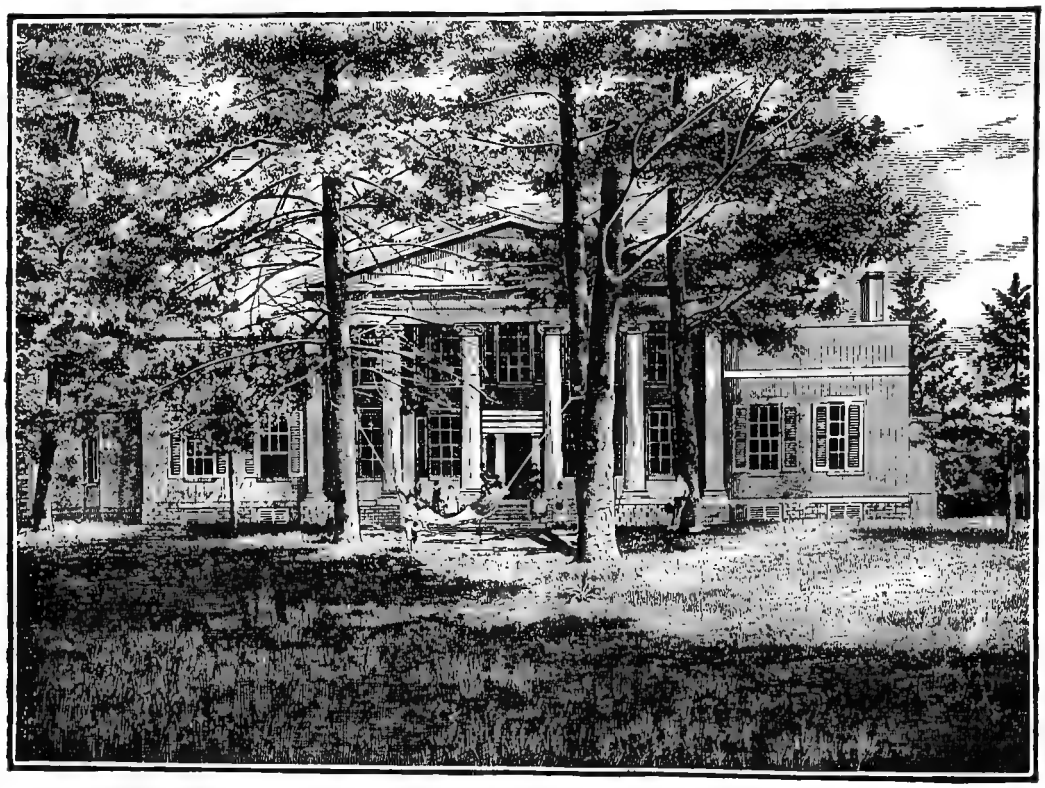
In the alignment of his troops before Vicksburg Gen. Grant assigned McClernand's corps to the left. The right of the corps stretched across the railroad, and the left, reaching southward, closed the roads leading into city.

On the 22d of May, an attempt was made to carry the works by storm, the three corps acting simultaneously. In this movement the divisions of Gens. Osterhaus and Smith bore a prominent part. Gen. Osterhaus formed the column with the Twenty-second Kentucky and Forty-second Ohio on the right, the One Hundred and Fourteenth Ohio, Forty-ninth and Sixty-ninth Indiana in the center, and the Seventh Kentucky and One Hundred and Eighteenth Illinois on the left, the Sixteenth and One Hundred and Twentieth Ohio deployed as skirmishers. Gen. Osterhaus says: "precisely at 10 o'clock the column advanced against a terrific fire from the rifle-pits and forts. The Seventh Kentucky, leading the left column, advanced to the top of the hill and marched over the naked brow of it through a murderous fire from the great redoubt on the left; they suffered heroically. All the columns reached the top of the hill, and came within so short a distance from the works that all orders and commands given on the enemy's side could be distinctly understood by our men."

Here the division remained during the day, unable to advance or retreat until nightfall, when it was withdrawn. They kept up a rattling fire, however, and aided materially in the success of their comrades on the left. McClernand gives a graphic account of the charge made by Landrum's brigade.

> Five minutes before 10 o'clock the bugle sounded the charge; at 10 o'clock my columns of attack moved forward, and within fifteen minutes Lawler's and Landrum's brigades had carried the ditch, slope and bastion of a fort. Some of the men, emulous of each other, rushed into the fort, finding a piece of artillery, and in time to see the men who had been serving and supporting it escape behind another defense commanding the interior of that they were in. All of this daring and heroic party were shot down except one, who recovering from the stunning effect of a shot seized his musket and captured and brought in thirteen rebels who had returned and fired their guns. The captor was Sergt. Joseph Griffin, who I am happy to say has since been promoted. Within fifteen minutes after Lawler's and Landrum's success, Benton's and Burbridge's brigades, fired by their example, rushed forward and carried the ditch and slope of another heavy earthwork and planted their colors upon the latter.

There is no doubt but that if McClernand had been promptly supported at this juncture the works could have been carried and the day won. His troops were the only troops who gained a momentary foothold within the intrenchments, and a heavy column pushed forward in support would doubtless have forced its way to the rear of the Confederate lines. It was not done, however, and the many valuable lives lost in the useless slaughter were wasted to no purpose. The loss in McClernand's corps alone was 1,487 in killed, wounded and missing.



In the siege that followed, the Kentucky regiments and Patterson's Engineers were constantly on duty, winning by their courage and constancy the highest encomiums from their commanding officers. After the surrender of Pemberton on the 4th of July, they were sent to Louisiana, where they remained on duty during the continuance of the war. The men of these splendid regiments have good reason to be proud of their record, undimmed as it is by a single act of cowardice or insubordination.

The names of officers of Kentucky regiments who were killed in battle or died of wounds, received them in the two campaigns against Vicksburg, are as follows:

Seventh Infantry.—Capt. Levi Pennington, in action at Chickasaw Bluffs, December 28, 1862; Capt. Thomas Wilson, in battle of Chaplin Hills; Lieut. Thomas Buchannan, Chaplin Hills, May 16, 1863.

Nineteenth Infantry.—Maj. Morgan V. Evans, in action before Vicksburg, May 22, 1863.

Twenty-Second Infantry.—Capt. Daniel Garrard, Capt. William B. Hogan and Lieut. Jabez Truitt, in action at Chickasaw Bluffs, December 29, 1862.

COLORED DEPARTMENT DEAF AND DUMB ASYLUM—DANVILLE.

CHAPTER XVII.

KENTUCKY TROOPS IN TENNESSEE AND GEORGIA CAMPAIGNS.

THE four days' struggle in front of Murfreesboro (December 31, 1862—January 3, 1863), known as the battle of Stone River, was succeeded by a period of inactivity in middle Tennessee. Rosecrans had immediately taken possession of the town, while Bragg had retired to Tullahoma, strongly fortifying his position there, as well as an advanced position at Shelbyville. Here the two armies closely watched each other; the Federal general, by his threatening attitude, preventing his antagonist from sending needed re-enforcements to Johnston, who was vainly striving to raise Grant's siege of Vicksburg. Early in June, however, the Army of the Cumberland moved from its position, and in August found its way over the mountains to Stevenson and Bridgeport, necessitating the withdrawal of Bragg, first to Chattanooga, and in the early part of September to Lafayette, Georgia. On the 10th instant the national troops entered Chattanooga.

This brilliant campaign, which resulted in wresting middle Tennessee from the Confederates, was obscured by the more bloody, but not more successful, capture of Vicksburg, and battle of Gettysburg, and in comparison with these events attracted less attention than its real importance merited. The movement would have been made much earlier but for the certainty that in case of success, which was never doubted by the brave commander, the defeated army of Gen. Bragg would have joined Gen. Johnston at Jackson, Miss., and enabled him by the augmentation of his strength to imperil the operations before Vicksburg.

But the campaign was not to close without a savage struggle. The Confederate general, receiving re-enforcements from the army in Virginia, determined to contest the possession of Chattanooga in a pitched battle in the valley of the Chickamauga, and having attempted on the 17th and 18th to fall upon detatched corps of Rosecrans' army, without securing any advantage, he prepared for a grand attack on the next day.

The Fourth, Tenth and Eighteenth Kentucky Infantry Regiments, although among the first mustered into the service, missed the opportunity of distinguishing themselves in the battles of Shiloh, Perryville and Stone River.

The Fourth, Lieut.-Col. P. B. Hunt, and the Tenth, Col. William H. Hays, formed a portion of the second brigade of Brannan's division commanded by that superb soldier, Col. John T. Croxton, which had the honor of opening the battle of Chickamauga. A Confederate brigade was reported to have crossed Chickamauga Creek and to be cut off from the main body by the Union cavalry. Croxton's brigade was ordered forward to attack it. Advancing about one mile on the Ringgold Road, the brigade halted and formed in line of battle, the Fourth Kentucky on the left, Seventy-fourth Indiana on the right, the Tenth Indiana on the center, and the Tenth Kentucky and Fourteenth Ohio in reserve. The skirmish line was at once attacked by Forrest's cavalry and fell back to their place in line, which opened fire and caused a hasty retreat by the venturesome cavalry. Resuming the march in line of battle the brigade soon came upon the Confederate infantry, which developed into an overwhelming force. Finding that the force in his front far exceeded a brigade and was in fact an army corps, Croxton at once ordered a retreat, which was successfully effected. In this fight the brave commander of the Fourth Kentucky was severely wounded, and Maj. R. M. Kelly, of the regiment, inspector-general of Brannan's division, assumed command. Having taken position on a ridge, the brigade held its position until relieved by King's brigade, when it fell back, replenished its cartridge-boxes and returned to the right of King's, now severely pressed.

The Confederates, three lines deep, were advancing in force, when, a charge being ordered, the two brigades sprang forward drove them back and captured five pieces of artillery which they brought from the field. After a desperate struggle, in which the Fourth and Tenth fought with courage and determination, the Union troops were flanked and driven back. They fell back, however, slowly, and in good order, and seizing the first favorable position held it until relieved by Johnson's division. On the morning of the 20th, the brigade crossed the Chattanooga Road toward the front and took position near Kelly's house. Rude fortifications were thrown up, and every preparation made to resist the attack that all knew to be impending. In the terrible battle that ensued, Col. Croxton was seriously wounded, and was compelled to relinquish the command to Col. C. M. Chapman, Seventy-fourth Indiana. The brigade became separated when the charge of Longstreet fell upon the right center of the main line, but the organizations clung together and rendered good service in repulsing the assault upon the ridge. Gen. Turchin's brigade of Reynold's division, to which the Eighteenth Kentucky was attached, took part in the engagement of the 19th, at the point where Cruft's and Hazen's brigades being heavily pressed called for assistance. Gen. Cruft refers to the timely aid rendered by the Eighteenth Kentucky, Col. Milward, and the Ninety-second Ohio.

Gen. Turchin was in the rear of his column at the time when these two advance regiments of his brigade were ordered by Gen. Reynolds to re-enforce Palmer, and coming up soon after brought up the remaining portion of his command and took position between Palmer and Johnson, where, about 4:30, P. M., he met a charge by Law's brigade of Hood's division with a counter charge which drove them back. In this he was joined by Cruft's brigade, after which, as related by both brigade commanders, they withdrew to their original position.

In the fight of the 20th, the Eighteenth Kentucky was in reserve most of the day, but joined in the timely charge made by the brigade, when, flushed with success, Longstreet's troops were driving the dissevered fragments of Brannan's division. It was a forlorn hope, but the intrepid brigade was equal to it. Turchin says: "The command 'Forward!' was given, and with a yell the brigade rushed forward and broke to pieces the confronting columns of the rebels. They fled pell-mell, and notwithstanding the fire of artillery on front and flank they pushed forward and took the guns." Col. Milward, of the Eighteenth Kentucky, being wounded, Maj. Hall took command. The loss in the Kentucky regiments was as follows:

	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.	Total.
Fourth Kentucky	25	153	12	190
Tenth Kentucky	21	134	10	165
Eighteenth Kentucky.	7	45	33	85

The Third Kentucky, under Col. H. C. Dunlap, was in Harker's brigade of Wood's division, Twenty-first Army Corps, and formed a portion of the command of Col. Harker, which made a bold reconnaissance from Chattanooga to Gordon's Mills in the wake of the retreating army of Gen. Bragg on September 11th. On this march the brave Lieut.-Col. Bullitt, with eight companies of the Third Kentucky, formed the skirmish line which drove the straggling cavalry and infantry through the defile in the mountains and across the Chickamauga Creek, where, the Confederates making a stand, Col. Dunlap was ordered to re-enforce them with the remainder of the regiment. So promptly was this done, that the regiment was dubbed "Harker's cavalry." On the morning of the 12th, Hazen's brigade, advancing from Peavine Valley, formed a junction with Harker. The two brigades remained at Gordon's Mills until the arrival of the corps, the main body of which marched via Ringgold from Chattanooga. In the battles of the 19th and 20th, the Third Kentucky won the especial commendation of the brigade and division commanders for soldierly conduct and steadiness under the most trying circumstances. Col. Dunlap refers as follows to the action of his regiment at the moment of Longstreet's attack upon the right center of the Union line of battle: "Lieut.-Col. Bullitt and Adjt. Hunt behaved gallantly in gathering from the retreating mass some 400 stragglers, which they rallied upon the hill, that developed itself as part of the important key to the safety of the army."

The loss of the Third Kentucky in the battle was 113 killed, wounded, and missing.

The Seventeenth Kentucky replaced the Eleventh in Col. Samuel Beatty's brigade, after the battle of Stone River, and at Chickamauga the Kentucky regiments engaged in Van Cleve's division were the Eighth, Lieut.-Col. James D. Mayhew; the Ninth, Col. George H. Cram, and the Seventeenth, Col. Alex. M. Stout; the first named in Barnes' and the two latter in Beatty's brigades. The Twenty-first under its intrepid commander was left at Shell Mound to look after the rear and protect communications with Bridgeport when Crittenden's corps marched into Chattanooga, and so it came about that one of the best fighting regiments in the army took no part in the battle of Chickamauga, other than as anxious listeners to the cannonading on the other side of Lookout Mountain. "Left behind and forgotten," was the angry comment of Col. S. W. Price, as he returned from his perch on a spur of Raccoon Mountain, where he had gone to gain from the roar of the battle some idea of how it fared with his comrades in the fight.

While Harker and Hazen were feeling for the Confederates in the direction of Lafayette, Beatty, who had moved with the main portion of the Twenty-first Corps to Ringgold, was sent with his brigade on a reconnaissance in the direction of Dalton, the object of Gen. Rosecrans being to ascertain beyond doubt the position of Bragg's main army. The result was to locate him at Lafayette, a belief which subsequently developed into a certainty. On the 13th, the corps having moved to Gordon's Mills, Van Cleve's division advanced on a reconnaissance toward Lafayette, Beatty in advance. The Confederates, consisting of three regiments of Wheeler's cavalry and a section of artillery, were driven some three miles, when, no considerable force appearing, the division returned to camp. At 10 A. M., the 19th instant, Palmer's division being heavily engaged, Van Cleve was ordered with the First and Second brigades to his support. In this movement the Ninth and Seventeenth Kentucky were in the second line of Beatty's brigade. In the charge that ensued, the brigade captured a battery. The Confederate line overlapping the division to the right and continuing to advance, made it necessary for Van Cleve to fall back to a new position in the rear. On the morning of the 20th, the two brigades moved by order of Gen. Rosecrans, in response to Gen. Thomas' request for re-enforcements, to the left. Barnes' brigade had been detached on the previous day, and was engaged near the extreme left of the line.

The First Brigade, followed by the Second, marched by the left flank, in the rear of Brannan's division, with the general order to fill any vacant place in the line, but finding none, the men were ordered to lie down to avoid the effects of a fire they could not return. While in this position the attack by Gen. Longstreet came with the force of an avalanche, sweeping through a gap in the line, made by the withdrawal of Wood's division from its position in line, on the right of Brannan, and left of Sheridan. In response to the repeated calls of Gen. Thomas for reenforcements to the left, which was greatly imperiled, and which it was agreed must be held at all hazards, Brannan's division was ordered to move in rear of Reynolds, and report to Gen. Thomas. Gen. Wood, next in line, was ordered to move to the left, and connect with Reynolds, while Davis and Sheridan, of McCook's corps, were directed to move to the left, and close the gap formed by this movement. When the order was given, there was no appearance of danger in the front of the center and right, but there was heavy fighting on the left. When Brannan and Wood received the order the advance of the Confederates from the woods was plainly visible. Brannan, who was near Reynolds, turned to him, and said: "I have an order to withdraw my division; shall I do so in the face of this attack?" Gen. Reynolds' reply, as stated to the writer, was: "Remain where you are, and I will assume the responsibility of countermanding the order." Gen. Wood obeyed the order, as to moving to the left, but finding Brannan still on his left, moved in rear of his division, and was caught in flank by the assault. Wood had but two brigades, George P. Buell's and Harker's; his second brigade, Wagner's, being at Chattanooga.

The military reader will readily imagine the scene of confusion which followed. Wood's veteran brigades were scattered like chaff before the wind. The right of Brannan's division, being without support, crumbled away. The head of Sheridan's column, moving rapidly to carry out the order to close up on Wood, was caught in the flank, and Gen. Lytle, the brave commander of the leading brigade, fell with a mortal wound. The line was rent in twain, and each side of the gap recoiling before the storm of musketry fell back in disorder. There was no panic, however, such as was witnessed at Stone River, when the right wing melted away as if by magic. Detached companies and regiments clung together, and at the first appearance of a nucleus, rallied around the flag. The Seventeeth Kentucky, under the masterly leadership of Col. A. M. Stout, remained nearly intact, and formed on the ridge, which formed one side of the ravine through which Longstreet's victorious army marched after passing through the line. It was the wish of Gen. Longstreet, as expressed years later, to the writer, to move on without halting upon Chattanooga, and it was so evidently the right thing to do, that Gen. Rosecrans believed he would do it, and made his dispositions to meet the changed condition of affairs. This involved the necessity of looking after his rear; hurrying the army trains to Chattanooga ahead of Longstreet, placing the reserve artillery, supported by Wagner's Posts and Spear's brigades, in position to defend the place, and thus forming a rallying point for the broken columns of his army. It was easy to give the orders for these things to be done, but everything depended upon their prompt execution, and turning to Gen. Garfield he rapidly enumerated the various movements necessary to insure the defense of Chattanooga, until the main army could be brought off the field. Gen. Garfield replied that he could much easier be the bearer of the general's orders to Gen. Thomas, which was agreed to, and under these circumstances Rosecrans rode rapidly away, to make arrangements for the safety of his army.

Meantime, a strong line was formed at right angles with Brannan's, facing toward the right, along the crest of the ridge, composed of troops of Wood's, Van Cleve's and Brannan's divisions, strengthened by such troops as could be spared from the main line, which defeated the flank movement of Longstreet. His intention to move upon Chattanooga was frustrated by Bragg, who, anticipating danger from the detachment of so large a portion of his army, ordered him to move upon the flank. In the defense of the right flank, as now formed, the Third, Sixth, Ninth and Seventeeth Kentucky Regiments took a prominent part. Eighty officers and enlisted men of the Third Kentucky were wounded, within fifteen minutes, in the angle formed by Brannan's division and the new line. A portion of the reserve corps, under Gens. Granger, Steedman and Whitaker, appeared in the nick of time upon the right, and went into action with a fury that nothing could withstand, and the day was saved. At the same time the Eighth Kentucky was actively engaged on the right, and, though flanked and compelled to fall back, maintained its organization, and fought bravely during both days of battle, and was the last to leave the field.

The loss in the Kentucky regiments of Van Cleve's division was as follows:

	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.	Total.
Eighth Kentucky.....	3	31	2	36
Ninth Kentucky.....	2	45	13	60
Seventeenth Kentucky.	6	105	15	126

Baldwin's brigade of Johnson's division, Twentieth Army Corps, with the division, moved on the morning of the 19th from the corps, and took position on the extreme left of the general line of battle, three miles east of Crawfish Springs. The Fifth Kentucky, Col. W. W. Berry, was posted on the left of the front line of Baldwin's brigade. A charge being ordered, the line advanced rapidly against a galling fire of musketry and artillery, driving the Confederates over a mile. Half an hour later, being heavily re-enforced, they returned the attack. The Ninty-third Ohio formed on the left of the Fifth Kentucky, but, the Confederate lines extending beyond the left of the brigade, the Ninety-third staggered under the blow. Col. Baldwin, with heroic courage, seized the colors and shouting "Rally round the flag, boys," the regiment sprang forward with such impetuosity as to repulse the charge and capture two guns. The Fifth Kentucky, standing in line, swept its front with continuous volleys of musketry.

Quiet then reigned for an hour and a half when the storm again burst with renewed fury. Baldwin's brigade withstood the shock, but a regiment on its right broke, and the Confederates rushing into the gap commenced a furious assault upon Baldwin's right. Here Col. Baldwin was shot, leaving the brigade without a commander. The Fifth Kentucky and the Ninety-third Ohio were completely cut off, the Confederate line being between them and the reserve. But darkness came to their relief, and silently, on double quick, the two regiments passed the Confederate flank, joined the reserve, faced about and for half an hour the most terrific fighting of the day took place. The two lines were but a few yards apart and a hand to hand fight followed. It was a desperate struggle, but the Confederates were drawn back and the line was held. At this moment Col. Berry, as ranking officer, assumed the command of the brigade, and Gen. Baird's division, coming up, formed on the extreme left of the main line of battle.

The divisions were now aligned as follows: —counting from left to right—Baird, Johnson, Palmer, Reynolds, Brannan, Negley, Sheridan and Davis; Wood and Van Cleve in reserve. During the night Gen. Rosecrans called his corps commanders together, and in the conference which took place it was agreed that the left must be held, as it guarded the main Lafayette and Chattanooga Road. To this end, Negley was withdrawn from the line, Wood ordered to take his place, and Van Cleve was ordered to the rear of Brannan in reserve. This formation remained until the withdrawal of Wood caused the disaster of the afternoon. The Fifth Kentucky occupied a position in the second line.

The Confederate line, formed in echelon, attacked first on the left and followed with successive strokes along the Union front. This attack was well adapted to produce the result which followed, as the troops on the left of the Confederate line, concealed from view, awaited the weakening of the Union right before advancing. When the attack fell upon Berry, he at once moved up his rear line, but some of Baird's troops giving away, necessitated a half wheel and charge upon the Confederates. The Fifth Kentucky, now led by Capt. Huston, rapidly cleared the fields in their front, and, as Col. Berry expressed it, "with an impetuousity never excelled," struck the Confederates in flank, and drove them pell-mell a mile and a half, capturing many prisoners, among them Gen. Adams. Lieut. Huston, a promising young officer, was killed in this charge.

The loss of the Fifth Kentucky in this engagement was 15 killed, and 110 wounded. Total, 125.

Gen. Cruft's brigade went into action on the 19th of September, with an effective strength of seventy-six officers and 1,300 enlisted men, of which 128 were artillery. The Second Division of the Twenty-first Army Corps, commanded by Gen. Palmer, was detatched from the corps and ordered to report to Gen. Thomas. Line of battle was formed to the right of McNamar's house on the Rossville Road, in echelon, Hazen's brigade on the left, Cruft's brigade in the center, and Grose's brigade on the right. The First and Second Kentucky, Cols. Enyart and Sedgewick were in the latter; the Sixth Kentucky, Col. Shackelford, in Hazen's brigade, and the Twenty-third Kentucky, Lieut.-Col. J. C. Foy, in Grose's brigade.

The battle opened in this part of the field with a successful charge by the Confederates, which drove the division back from its first position, but no rout ensued, and on the arrival of re-enforcements under Gen. Turchin, a counter charge was made which resulted in regaining the lost ground. In this charge the Kentucky regiments displayed their usual gallantry. During the night, rapid firing in front of Johnson's division indicated a night attack, and Cruft's brigade moved up on the right and Grose followed soon after. The night was far spent when the new line was formed, and the remaining hours were utilized in the erection of rude breastworks along the bank of a stream. The morning of the 20th found the division in good position for withstanding an attack. The men wearied by hard fighting and loss of rest were yet in good spirits, and the steadiness with which they fought and held their line is the best evidence of their courage.

The loss in the Kentucky regiments of Palmer's division was as follows:

	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.	Total.
First Kentucky	5	61	17	83
Second Kentucky	2	26	3	31
Sixth Kentucky	15	93	11	118
Twenty-third Kentucky	11	52	6	69
Total	33	232	37	301

Gen. John Beatty's brigade of Negley's division of the Fourteenth Corps moved early on the morning of the 20th to a position on the left, and formed his line by direction of Gen. Thomas perpendicularly to the left of Gen Baird's division. This strong support to the extreme left of the line was imperatively needed to secure it from a flank attack, but was subsequently changed by an order to Beatty to advance to a ridge in his front. Gen. Beatty represented to the officer bringing the order that the movement would leave a wide interval between him and Baird, but after hearing that the order was imperative, and that the interval would be filled by Negley, he advanced against heavy opposition. The Fifteenth Kentucky, Col. Taylor, became immediately engaged, but pushed steadily forward. The gap between the brigade and Baird's troops on its right gradually widened, and Beatty called upon Baird to send some of his troops to cover it. This movement had been observed by the Confederates, who, pressing forward, filled the interval, and turned with the evident intention of capturing the brigade, or at least one regiment, the Forty-second Indiana, then busily engaged in its front. This design was frustrated by Gen. Beatty's battery, which opened with grape and canister, and the Confederates fell back. The force in front proving too heavy for further advance, Beatty withdrew his brigade. The Confederates, following briskly, captured two guns of Beatty's battery. The Fifteenth Kentucky and the One Hundred and Fourth Illinois, with their accustomed steadiness, succeeded in checking the further advance of the Confederates, but the Eighty-eighth and Forty-second Indiana were compelled to make a wide detour to escape capure and did not regain the brigade.

Col. Stanley came up soon after with the Second Brigade of Negley's division, and, relieving the two regiments, they took position in rear as support. In the hard fight that followed, the Fifteenth Kentucky was especially distinguished. Being ordered to haul off by hand two pieces of artillery which had been abandoned by the gunners, they enlarged upon their instructions and gathered up five pieces, and attaching them to limbers that they found upon the field, succeeded in saving them all. The loss in the Fifteenth Kentucky was five killed, forty-three wounded and fifteen missing; total, sixty three.

Among the surgeons who bravely remained at their post of duty at the field hospital, and were captured by the Confederates, was Surgeon Joseph Fithian of the Eighteenth Kentucky.

The officers of Kentucky regiments killed or mortally wounded at the battle of Chickamauga were:

Lieut. Frank N. Sheets, Fourth Cavalry; Capt. James M. Bodine, Second Infantry; Capt. Henry S. Taylor, Third Infantry; Lieut. Alban D. Bradshaw, Third Infantry; Maj. Charles L. Thomasson, Fifth Infantry; Lieut. John W. Huston, Fifth Infantry; Lieut. John Ryan, Fifth Infantry; Capt. Peter Marker, Sixth Infantry; Capt. John McGraw, Sixth Infantry; Lieut. Richard Rockingham, Lieut. Thomas Eubanks, Sixth Infantry; Lieut. Frederick V. Lockman, Sixth Infantry; Capt. Seth P. Bevill, Tenth Infantry; Lieut. John H. Myers, Tenth Infantry; Lieut. Joseph L. McClure, Fifteenth Infantry; Lieut. John D. Millman, Seventeenth Infantry; Capt. James W. Anthony, Seventeenth Infantry; Lieut. Joseph C. Hoffman, Twenty-third Infantry.

The result of this battle was the retirement of the Federal army to the defenses of Chattanooga, where it was closely followed by the victorious foe. Bragg at once seized the natural fortresses of Lookout Mountain and Missionary Ridge, and placed the bulk of his forces in an almost impregnable position overlooking the city. The withdrawal of the Federal forces from the passes of Lookout Mountain, left the way open for the attack upon Rosecrans' natural line of communication with his base of supplies at Bridgeport, and the enemy's pickets soon held the river from that point to Chickamauga Creek. Railroad communications in his rear were cut off by a successful cavalry raid, and the Army of the Cumberland, cooped up within the fortifications of Chattanooga was forced to subsist upon the meager supplies which could be wagoned over Waldron's Ridge by a circuitous and mule-killing route.

This predicament caused the early dispatch of re-enforcements from the Army of the Potomac, and the removal of Sherman's forces from Memphis to this point. But in the meantime, the situation grew more serious, although the evacuation of the city was at no time contemplated.

Gen. Grant arrived on the 23d of October, and at once set about recovering the possession of the river. Operations against the main position of the enemy, however, were delayed until the arrival of Sherman in November.

In reorganizing the Army of the Cumberland, after the battle of Chickamauga, the Kentucky regiments were assigned as follows:

	Brigade.	Division.	Army Corps.
First Infantry, Col. D. A. Enyart	1st	1st	4th
Second Infantry, Col. T. D. Sedgewick	1st	1st	4th
Third Infantry, Col. H. C. Dunlap	3d	2d	4th
Fourth Infantry, Maj. R. M. Kelly	3d	3d	14th
Fifth Infantry, Col. W. W. Berry	2d	3d	4th
Sixth Infantry, Maj. R. T. Whitaker	2d	3d	4th
Eighth Infantry, Col. S. M. Barnes	2d	1st	4th
Ninth Infantry, Col. G. H. Cram	3d	3d	4th
Tenth Infantry, Col. W. H. Hays	3d	3d	14th
Fifteenth Infantry, Maj. W. G. Halpin	1st	1st	14th
Seventeenth Infantry, Col. A. M. Stout	3d	3d	4th
Eighteenth Infantry, Lieut.-Col. H. K. Milward	3d	3d	14th
Twenty-first Infantry, Col. S. W. Price	2d	1st	4th
Twenty-third Infantry, Lieut.-Col. J. C. Foy	2d	3d	4th

By this arrangement the First and Second Regiments were in Cruft's brigade, and the Eighth and Twenty-first in Whitaker's brigade, of Stanley's division; the Third Kentucky in Harker's brigade, of Sheridan's division; the Fifth, Sixth and Twenty-third in Hazen's brigade, and the Ninth and Seventeenth in Beatty's brigade, of Wood's division, Fourth Army Corps. The Fourth, Tenth and Eighteenth were in Phelps' brigade, of Baird's division; and the Fifteenth in Moore's brigade, of Carlin's division, Fourteenth Army Corps. All the regiments above mentioned participated in the battles about Chattanooga, November 23d to 25th, except the First, Second and Fifteenth.

A preliminary movement of considerable importance was the capture of Moccasin Point by Hazen's brigade on the night of October 27th. The Tennessee River, in its tortuous course after leaving Chattanooga, runs southward a short distance, then turning abruptly northward forms a tongue of land, called Moccasin Point. After reaching a distance of seven or eight miles in this direction, it sweeps gracefully around a curve and resumes its southern course, when bearing westward it flows past Bridgeport, the base of supplies for the army. The possession by the Confederates of the tongue of land formed by the latter curve, compelled a wide detour northward via Anderson's Cross Roads to supply the suffering army. Gen. Rosecrans, with a view to the possession of the direct road to Bridgeport, formed the plan, subsequently carried out by Gen. Thomas, of landing a force under cover of night at Brown's Ferry and seizing the upper end of Lookout Valley simultaneously with the advance of the troops, then on their way from the Army of the Potomac. The river being commanded by batteries at the base of Lookout Mountain rendered the undertaking both difficult and dangerous.

Hazen's brigade was selected for the enterprise and the result proved that its execution was confided to competent hands. With a picked force of 1,200 men, divided into squads of twenty-five each, of which the Fifth, Sixth and Twenty-third Kentucky Regiments furnished eleven squads of twenty-five men, and one of seventy-five, under competent officers, Gen. Hazen embarked upon pontoon boats; the squad of seventy-five from the Twenty-third under Lieut.-Col. Foy was in advance, and silently floated down the river under the Confederate batteries. Many a heart stood still as the noiseless procession glided phantom-like under the shadow of Lookout Mountain and out into the light beyond. For full two miles the route lay under the muzzles of Longstreet's artillery, which had full sweep of the river. The oars were not used; not a word was spoken; the slightest noise would open the brazen throats of a dozen cannon. Three miles down the river, the flotilla came under the guns of the Confederate pickets, but by keeping well under the shadow of the opposite shore the boats were unobserved until the first boat was within ten feet of the landing at Brown's Ferry, when the men of the Twenty-third leaped ashore, and, with the brave Lieut.-Col. Foy at their head, pushed down the road, driving the Confederates before them. As the boats came up, the men disembarked, and soon forming a line of battle, were prepared for the attack that was anticipated. The assault fell first upon Col. Foy, who repulsed it, driving the Confederates to the right where they were met by Col. Wiley, who, re-enforced by Col. Langdon, pursued them across the valley. Entrenchments were rapidly thrown up, the pontoons were formed in a bridge, artillery was brought over, and when morning dawned the astonished Confederates were dispossessed of the coveted peninsula. Gen. Hooker, advancing in the meantime from the western end of the valley, encamped on the following night near Wauhatchie, where a battle was fought, resulting in the defeat of the Confederates, and permanent occupation of the valley.

The next exploit of Hazen's brigade was, in connection with the division, the capture of Orchard Knob, an eminence between the Union and Confederate lines in front of Chattanooga, on the 23d of November. In this daring movement Col. Berry, of the Fifth Kentucky, was wounded. During the last half mile after meeting the Confederate pickets, Hazen's brigade was constantly under fire, from which it suffered severely, but pushing forward the position was captured, and with it the greater part of the Twenty-eighth Alabama Infantry.

Stanley's division, stationed at Whiteside, near Bridgeport, was at this time under command of Gen. Cruft, ranking brigade commander. With two brigades of his division under Whitaker and Grose, he took part in the capture of Lookout Mountain.

The departure of Longstreet's corps and Buckner's division from the line of investment at Chattanooga to attack Burnside in the vicinity of Knoxville left Bragg but 32,700 infantry and artillery, divided into two corps, commanded by Hardee and Breckinridge. The Confederate line extended from the northern extremity of Missionary Ridge around to the western base of Lookout Mountain. Stevenson's division occupied Lookout Mountain and Chattanooga Valley at its base. On the 24th of November the troops on the mountain consisted of three brigades under Gens. Walthall, Moore and Pettus.

In the assault made by Geary's division of Hooker's corps and Whitaker's brigade, the latter was in support, but in the advance up the rugged mountain side, owing to irregularities in the ground it gradually pushed itself to the front and took part in the fight even before the summit was reached. Drifting clouds enveloped the lofty crest of the mountain, and the precipitous sides were involved in an impenetrable mist. In this "battle above the clouds" the Eighth Kentucky Infantry bore a prominent part. The Twenty-first Kentucky not having joined the brigade at this time was temporarily assigned to Davis' division of the Fourteenth Corps.

At noon, when Walthall's main line was reached, Whitaker's brigade had by hard climbing and desperate hand-to-hand fighting found its way around to the right, and was exactly in the right place. Hastily deploying their lines, the brigade commanders gave the order to charge, and never was the command, that carries with it death to the brave, obeyed with a heartier will. The men of Gettysburg and Chickamauga stood shoulder to shoulder, and, with a courage that nothing could withstand, rushed forward to the attack. A few minutes of desperate fighting ensued, when half of Walthall's men threw down their arms and were sent to the rear as prisoners. Pushing forward, the plucky little army found itself in possession of the plateau beneath the crest of the mountain. Whitaker refers in his graphic style to the assault upon the lines at the Craven House:

> Steadily and firmly advancing, my brigade reached the base of Lookout's bold, projecting point. Its profile is delineated from beneath against the sky. In good order my bold command, now become one line, swung round the crest, the right wing being the pivot, with the flags of the Fortieth Ohio on the left and the Eighth Kentucky floating free and triumphant on the right. With beating hearts we heard the soul stirring vivas of our country's friends, and responding boldly we charged upon the rallying columns of the enemy. A portion of Gen. Geary's division meeting overwhelming opposition from the rifle pits in the orchard before reaching the Craven House, and having no cover, were falling back. The Confederates were sending re-enforcements from the summit of the mountain over a depression in the cliff some hundreds of yards to our rear, on the west side of the mountain. The Eighth Kentucky, Col. Barnes, was halted on the crest of the ridge with orders to deploy skirmishers to drive the Confederates back and to hold the crest at all hazards. This was well and gallantly done.

While Geary and Whitaker were steadily fighting their way to the summit of the mountain, Osterhaus' division of Sherman's army and Grose's brigade were pressing forward from below, and at about 3 P. M. the latter joined Whitaker's brigade on the plateau near the Craven House. Osterhaus came up on the left followed by Carlin's division, the Fifteenth Kentucky in advance.

The storming of Lookout Mountain will always rank as one of the boldest achievements of the war. Gen. Geary footed up the assault as follows: "1,940 prisoners, 125 of the Confederates killed and 300 wounded and left on the field, 2,800 stand of arms, 2 cannon, 5 battle flags, 50 officers' swords and 1,000 intrenching tools captured, at a loss of 150 men killed and wounded, 52 of whom were in Whitaker's brigade." Early in the morning of the 25th, Gen. Whitaker called for volunteers from the Eighth Kentucky to scale the cliff that overhung the plateau and take possession of Lookout Point. It was not known what force was there. Capt. Wilson of Company C, Sergts. Davis, Wager and Wood and privates Witt and Bradley at once stepped forward. It was a hazardous undertaking, but these brave men were equal to it, regardless of the result. The regiment soon followed and their flag, the gift of the loyal women of Estill County, was given to the breeze amid the wild cheers of the dauntless men whose valor had driven 4,000 men from the summit of Lookout Mountain, and cheered by the exulting shouts of the main army hundreds of feet below.

The smoke of battle was still hovering over the lofty crest of Lookout, from which the flag of the Eighth Kentucky floated in triumph, when Gen. Bragg ordered the concentration of his entire army on Missionary Ridge. On the right was Hardee with four divisions, under Cleburne, Stevenson, Cheatham and Gist, numbering over 20,000 men. Breckinridge on the left commanded three divisions under Bate, Hindman and Steward, 15,000 strong. In the battle which ensued Cleburne on the right was charged with the defense of that wing, and so well did he perform this service that Sherman's army failed to dislodge him. On the left Breckinridge with Stewart and Hindman's division confronted Hooker, who, with Geary's division of the Twelfth Corps, Cruft's division of the Fourth Corps, and Osterhaus' division of the Fifteenth Corps, advanced across Chattanooga to assault the left of Bragg's line of battle. The attack was brief and decisive. The Confederates fell back along the ridge toward the center of their line, followed by Hooker's infantry on the ridge and his artillery in the valley.

The sun shone brightly down upon a scene of surpassing grandeur. Every movement of the troops in the valley was distinctly visible from the headquarters of Gens. Thomas and Grant at Fort Wood and Gen. Bragg on Missionary Ridge, where "the enemy," says Bate, "like a huge serpent uncoiled his massive folds into shapely lines in our immediate front."

The Army of the Cumberland, now commanded by Maj.-Gen. George H. Thomas, was aligned in the center as follows: Johnson on the right, then Sheridan, Wood, Baird and Davis, with their divisions in line awaiting the signal of attack. The Eleventh Corps, under Gen. Howard, was in position in rear of Thomas' left, ready to move to any portion of the field where it might be needed. The same regiments which had fought at Chickamauga, diminished in numbers, by re-enforcing the right and left now prepared for the magnificent charge which will go down in history as one of the grandest in military annals. Noon had arrived, but, thus far, Sherman's sledge-hammer strokes had produced no apparent effect. Between his advance and Hardee's front there was a deep ravine and a steep ascent, a second Chickasaw Bluffs, and beyond it—death.

The headquarter flags of the contending armies floated defiantly in the breeze, and there was not a soldier in the ranks who did not know that a great and decisive battle was to be fought that day. That Missionary Ridge would be carried, when the signal was given for the advance, was confidently believed by every Federal soldier, and to be the first upon the summit was the goal of each one's ambition. The Third Kentucky in Harker's brigade, the Fifth, Sixth and Twenty-Third in Hazen's brigade and the Ninth and Seventeeth in Beatty's brigade were near together, and contested the honor of first reaching the summit. The Fifteenth in Carlin's brigade was on the right, and the Fourth, Tenth and Eighteenth in Phelps' brigade of Baird's division were near the left of the line.

While Gen. Sherman, with the pluck and persistence that formed his prominent characteristic, was sustaining the shock of battle on the northern extremity of Missionary Ridge, and Hooker's victorious columns were advancing along the ridge from the south in the wake of the retreating Confederates, the order came for the Army of the Cumberland to advance and carry the rifle pits at the base of the ridge. Only this and nothing more. The assault is tersely described by Gen. Grant as follows:

> These troops moved forward, drove the enemy from the rifle pits at the base of the ridge like bees from a hive, stopped but a moment until the whole were in line, and commenced the assault of the mountain from right to left almost simultaneously, following closely the retreating enemy without further orders. They encountered a fearful volley of grape and canister from nearly thirty pieces of artillery, and musketry from still well filled rifle pits on the summit of the ridge. Not a waver was seen in all that long line of brave men. Their progress was steadily onward until the summit was in their possession. In the charge the casualties were remarkably few for the fire encountered. I can account for this only on the theory that the enemy's surprise at the audacity of such a charge caused confusion and purposeless aiming of their pieces.

Gen. Thomas says:

> Our troops advanced steadily in a continuous line. The enemy, seized with panic, abandoned the works at the foot of the hill and retreated precipitately to the crest, pursued closely by our troops, who, apparently inspired by the impulse of victory, carried the hill simultaneously at six different points, and so closely upon the heels of the enemy that many of them were taken prisoners in the trenches. We captured nearly all their cannon and ammunition before they could be removed or destroyed. After halting for a few moments to reorganize the troops, who had become somewhat scattered in the assault of the hill, Gen. Sheridan pushed forward in pursuit and drove those in his front, who escaped capture, across Chickamauga Creek. Gens. Wood and Baird, being obstinately resisted by re-enforcements from the enemy's extreme right, continued fighting until darkness set in, slowly but steadily driving the enemy before them. The alacrity displayed by officers in executing their orders, and the enthusiasm and spirit displayed by the men who did the work, cannot be too highly appreciated by the nation for the defense of which they have on so many memorable occasions nobly and patiently exposed their lives in battle.

An army officer, who witnessed this magnificent pageant from Orchard Knob, is accustomed to say, when referring to it, "the grandest sights I ever witnessed were, sunrise on the ocean, Niagara Falls, and the charge of the Army of the Cumberland at Missionary Ridge." In this engagement the Kentucky regiments maintained their reputation for courage and discipline, and were among the first to plant their colors upon the summit of the ridge.

It was evident to every general officer that the troops were disobeying orders in advancing beyond the rifle pits at the base of the ridge. Grant inquired of Thomas by whose orders they were ascending the ridge. "By their own, I think," said the philosopher. "It is all right, if it turns out right," was the response. As it turned out right, all were willing to excuse this breach of discipline. A contest ensued between Gens. Hazen and Sheridan as to which first gained the crest, the latter claiming the honor for Harker's brigade, the former stoutly claiming it for his own, but as these brigades were largely composed of Kentucky troops it is probable that but little if any difference in time elapsed between their arrival.

The Twenty-first Kentucky took a hand in the fray, simultaneously with Sheridan's advance at midnight across Chickamauga Creek. The division of Gen. Davis, which had during the day acted as reserve to Gen. Sherman, moved around the nose of the ridge along the river bank, and, crossing the creek, moved upon Chickamauga Station, near which it bivouacked for the night. At 8 o'clock, on the following morning, the division advanced, preceded by the Twenty-first Kentucky, deployed as skirmishers. Gen. Davis says: "The Twenty-first Kentucky moved forward in a beautiful skirmish line, and, when nearing the suburbs of the town, encountered the enemy in a very sharp skirmish." The flames which now streamed upward from the burning station indicated the destruction of stores, and the regiment pushed forward and compelled the Confederates to abandon a considerable quantity of supplies undestroyed. The Twenty-first made a gallant fight against a portion of the Confederate Kentucky Brigade, and, re-enforced by the Eighteenth Illinois, got the better of their opponents, compelling them to retreat in the direction of Graysville.

While the Army of the Cumberland, under Gen. Rosecrans, was advancing its lines and closing the gateway to east Tennessee and Virginia, by seizing and holding possession of Chattanooga, the Army of the Ohio under Gen. Burnside was pushing eastward from Kentucky to the capture of Knoxville and the valley of the Tennessee. Knoxville was occupied on the 3d of September, and Cumberland Gap, defended by a garrison of 2,000 men under Gen. Frazier, was captured on the 10th near the date of the occupation of Chattanooga by the Twenty-first Army Corps.

Gen. Simon B. Buckner, in command of the Department of East Tennessee, had, in obedience to the order of Gen. Bragg, evacuated the valley, and ordered his command of 7,000 men to the Confederate Army of the Tennessee, leaving Burnside an undisputed march to Knoxville. With few Confederates in his front, the obvious duty of Gen. Burnside was to re-enforce Gen. Rosecrans with at least so much of his infantry as would compensate for the increased force added by Buckner to the army of Gen. Bragg. His army of 25,000 men was composed of two corps, the Ninth and Twenty-third. The latter, consisting of cavalry and infantry, marching over the mountains, reached Kingston in ample time to join Rosecrans, and render much needed assistance at the battle of Chickamauga.

The Kentucky regiments participating in the campaign culminating in the siege of Knoxville, were:

Eleventh Infantry, mounted, Col. S. P. Love, Pennebaker's Brigade.

Twenty-seventh Infantry, mounted, Lieut.-Col. J. H. Ward, Pennebaker's Brigade.

	Brigade.	Division.	Army Corps.
Twelfth Infantry, Maj. J. M. Owens	1st	3d	23d
Thirteenth Infantry, Col. W. E. Hobson	2d	2d	23d
Sixteenth Infantry, Col. J. W. Gault	1st	2d	23d
Twenty-fourth Infantry, Col. J. S. Hurt	2d	3d	23d
First Cavalry, Col. S. Adams	1st	4th	23d
Eleventh Cavalry, Maj. M. Graham	1st	4th	23d
Twelfth Cavalry, Maj. J. B. Harrison	1st	4th	23d

The Eleventh and Twenty-seventh, mounted infantry, under Col. C. D. Pennebaker, formed an independent brigade during the months of September and October, after which they were assigned to the cavalry corps and formed the Third Brigade of Col. Wolford's division.

Gen. Burnside, having obtained almost undisputed possession of east Tennessee, concluded, about the 1st of November, to place his army in winter quarters. Col. Chapin's Brigade of White's Division, of which the Thirteenth Kentucky formed a part, was stationed midway between the main army at Lenoirs and Loudon, with pickets on the Holston River. Mott's brigade of the same division, in which the Sixteenth Kentucky served, was stationed at Kingston, on the extreme right of the line. The Third Division (Hascall's), in which the Twelfth and Twenty-fourth Kentucky were brigaded, occupied the intrenchments at Knoxville. The Eleventh and Twenty-seventh, mounted infantry, with the cavalry regiments, were stationed at points on the flanks of the army.

Gen. Wheeler's cavalry, detached from Bragg's army to co-operate with Longstreet in his operations against Burnside, arrived at Sweetwater on the 11th of November, 1863, and on the following morning moved forward toward Maryville with orders to capture whatever Federal force could be found there. This force was Col. Wolford's cavalry brigade, consisting of the First, Eleventh and Twelfth Kentucky Cavalry, numbering 1,126 officers and enlisted men. Wheeler's force was vastly superior, comprising two divisions.

Dibrell's brigade, pushing forward in advance, came upon the Eleventh Kentucky, which fell back, after a sharp fight, upon the main body, which in turn was compelled to retreat across Little River with a loss of 200 killed, wounded and prisoners. Emboldened by his success, Wheeler pushed forward in pursuit and on the following morning came upon Wolford, who, re-enforced by Pennebaker's brigade, had made arrangements to meet him at Stock Creek.

Wolford had partially torn up the bridge, and his forces, 1,500 strong, were posted in a strong and elevated position behind a fence inclosing a thick wood. In their front were open fields descending toward the wood upon which Wheeler was advancing; on their right was the Holston River, while their left rested upon the steep side of a high ridge. It was afternoon when the head of Wheeler's column appeared, and it at once encountered a brisk artillery fire, wounding, among others, Maj. Buford of Wheeler's staff. Wheeler at once dismounted Martin's division, and crossing the river under a heavy fire attacked the left of Wolford's line, driving it back. While this was in progress a force had been busily engaged repairing the bridge, and soon Armstrong's division crossed it and charged on the right, which resulted in driving the entire force back under cover of the guns in the fortifications on the heights south of Knoxville.

Information of the movements of Longstreet reached Col. Chapin on the night of the 13th, and a reconnaissance to Huff's Ferry, demonstrated that a large force was there preparing to cross the Holston. Chapin's brigade was at once withdrawn to Lenoirs. Returning on the following day, reenforced by Ferrero's division of the Ninth Corps, Chapin's brigade encountered Longstreet's pickets about two miles north of the Holston. The Thirteenth Kentucky, under command of Col. William E. Hobson, advanced gallantly, in connection with the One Hundred and Seventh Illinois, and drove the Confederate pickets nearly to the landing. "Up to this time," says Chapin in his report, "the two regiments had been about equally engaged, but now the enemy seemed to concentrate in front of the Thirteenth Kentucky. The summit of the hill being wooded made good cover for the rebels, and the side toward the Thirteenth Kentucky being bare, offered no cover for our men who were still in the woods at the foot." Gen. White now came upon the ground and ordered the two regiments to charge. "This was done," says Chapin, "in most gallant style by both regiments, the Thirteenth Kentucky charging up the bare hill in the face of a galling fire, driving the Confederates off the hill, and holding it until the next morning. In falling back to Lenoirs, Chapin's brigade acted as rear guard.

The escape from Lenoirs with all the baggage of a large army required the utmost activity, as the road to Knoxville led by Campbell's Station, a point on the road from Huff's Ferry about equidistant from both points. The baggage trains were pushed forward and Hartranft's division sent to guard them to Campbell's Station, then to take positions to protect their passage. Here a fight ensued in which the indomitable courage of the Ninth and Twenty-third Corps saved the train from destruction. The troops did their full duty and under cover of darkness fell back upon Knoxville. Chapin closes his report with a glowing tribute to the Thirteenth Kentucky and its gallant commander.

The dawn of day found the infantry safely behind the entrenchments at Knoxville, while the cavalry, under its heroic commander, Gen. William P. Sanders, held back the advance of Longstreet's column during the entire day. Alluding to the death of this splendid soldier, Gen. Burnside says: "The troops worked all day and night and by daylight, on the morning of the 15th, were tolerably well under cover. Still the work was continued, the enemy being held at bay on the Kingston Road by the cavalry under Gen. Sanders, and on the Clinton Road by Col. Pennebaker's mounted regiments. The hours in which to work that were secured to us by the gallant conduct of our cavalry were worth to us a thousand men each. It is sad that they were bought at such a price as the life of that most gallant and chivalric soldier and noble gentleman, Brig.-Gen. William Pitt Sanders. I hope I may be pardoned this allusion to the only classmate I had at the siege of Knoxville. Gen. Sanders falling in front of the work occupied by Benjamin's battery, it seemed appropriate that the fort should be named for him." Thus the principal fort in front of Knoxville was named in honor of this noble Kentuckian. Before it raged for hours one of the fiercest conflicts of the war, but, as if the soldier whose name it bore had imparted a portion of his daring spirit to its defenders, the flag upon its crest was never lowered to the enemy.

In assigning the troops to their positions in the works around Knoxville, Chapin's and Reilly's brigades were placed on the ridge adjacent to Temperance Hill, which was heavily manned with artillery, while Hoskin's and Casement's brigades continued the line from Bell's house to the Holston River. This arrangement brought the Kentucky regiments nearly in line on the north side of the town, where an attack was anticipated. The event proved that the assault was determined upon where it could be most readily repulsed, and when it came the garrison of Fort Sanders proved equal to the emergency.

On the 18th Gen. Wheeler joined the main army with his cavalry, whence he was sent with three brigades to capture Mott's brigade at Kingston. Col. Mott gives the following brief account of the repulse of the Confederate attack: "The attack was made at daybreak on the 24th of November, and after a brisk engagement of seven hours' duration the enemy was handsomely whipped and driven back, with a loss of 250 killed, wounded and prisoners; among the killed was Col. Russell of the Third Alabama. Too much cannot be said in praise of the cool and determined bravery of the officers and men under my command. As an instance, I may mention the case of Capt. Murphy of the Sixteenth Kentucky, who, with a single company, charged a rebel regiment and demanded its surrender. There were many instances in which officers and men performed prodigies of valor."

After his repulse at Knoxville, Longstreet retired up the valley to Rogersville in time to avoid a battle with Sherman, who, immediately after the battle of Missionary Ridge, set out with a well equipped army, consisting of Blair's, Howard's and Granger's corps, to the relief of Gen. Burnside at Knoxville. The cavalry followed closely, and took position at Bean's Station. Longstreet had no sooner reached Rogersville than he was informed of the isolated position of the cavalry, and determined to capture it. Gen. Martin, who had superseded Wheeler in command of the cavalry, was ordered to march down the south bank of the Holston, and cross opposite to Bean's Station. Gen. W. E. Jones, with two brigades of cavalry, was to pass down along the north side of Clinch Mountain, and prevent the escape of the Union forces by the gap in that direction, while a heavy force of infantry, Bushrod Johnson's two brigades in advance, moved by the direct road from Rogersville to Bean's Station.

About 2 o'clock on the afternoon of the 13th of December, after a toilsome march, the infantry reached the Union pickets, drove them in, and attacked with vigor. Wolford's brigade fell back, skirmishing and twice halting, disputed the way with great spirit to protect the retreat of the main body from the station. The Confederates continued to advance in the face of a destructive fire, when, finding the force overwhelming, the rear guard was ordered to withdraw, which, under the cover of darkness, it successfully did.

Gathering his forces together, Gen. Longstreet fell back to Rogersville, and went into winter quarters, thus ending the east Tennessee campaign.

When Longstreet laid siege to Knoxville, Gen. Burnside ordered the Thirty-fourth Kentucky Infantry to Cumberland Gap from Morristown. After the siege was raised by Gen. Sherman, the Thirty-fourth was ordered to Tazewell, Tenn., the colonel of the same being placed in command of a brigade composed of the Thirty-fourth Kentucky, One Hundred and Sixteenth and One Hundred and Eighteenth Indiana Infantry, Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry and Eleventh Michigan Battery. Here, on the 24th of January, 1864, the brigade was attacked by Col. Carter with about 1,800 men. In this fight the Thirty-fourth again distinguished itself for undaunted bravery under severe fire. In the engagement, which lasted about three-quarters of an hour, the Confederates were repulsed with a loss of thirty-one killed and many more wounded.

On the 26th of January, the regiment was again ordered to the gap under command of Gen. T. T. Garrard, where it remained on one third rations for nearly three months. News having been received by the general commanding that a simultaneous attack would be made on the gap by Gens. Jones and Vaughn approaching in different directions, he ordered fifty-five men of the Thirty-fourth Kentucky Infantry to proceed to Powell River bridge to prevent Vaughn's forces from crossing and forming a junction with Jones. The detachment of the Thirty-fourth arrived at the bridge just as Vaughn's advance guard was entering it, and repulsed them after a short fight. Being armed with Colt's five-shooters, their small numbers were enabled, by undaunted bravery and their efficient arms, to contend with this large force and compel them to retire.

On the 17th of April, 1864, Gen. Garrard was relieved of the command of the gap, and Col. W. Y. Dillard, of the Thirty-fourth Kentucky Infantry, remained in command until the 8th of November, 1864, when the Thirty-fourth was ordered to Knoxville, which place was threatened by Gen. Breckinridge from the direction of Strawberry Plains. The regiment, reduced to 304 men, was ordered to proceed to Knoxville via Tazewell and Walker's Ford, a road much infested with guerrillas. On arriving at Walker's Ford, on Clinch River, it was unable to cross, owing to the high water and want of a ferry-boat, and was consequently compelled to return to the gap and take the Jacksboro Road. The regiment arrived at Knoxville on the 18th of November, and remained there on provost duty until February 2, 1865, when it was ordered back to the gap.

On the 20th of April, the Thirty-fourth proceeded up the Virginia Valley in the direction of Gibson's Mills, where a force of the Confederates was reported. On the 22d, it was met by a flag of truce, and a proposition from Cols. Pridmore, Slemp, Richmond and Wicher to surrender their forces, which was at once done, their commands numbering 2,713 men. On the 24th of April, the Thirty-fourth was again ordered to Knoxville, and thence to Loudon, Tenn.; remained here on garrison duty until the 20th of June, and then returned to Knoxville for muster-out, which occurred June 24, 1865.

The promotion of Grant to the rank of major-general in the regular army, and his assignment to the command of the military department of the Mississippi on the 16th of October, 1863, was followed on the 12th of March, 1864, by his promotion to the rank of lieutenant-general and his assignment to the general command of all the armies. His new duties requiring his presence in the east, Grant departed for Virginia, leaving Maj.-Gen. W. T. Sherman in command of the Military Division of the Mississippi.

The forces, in command of which Sherman was thus placed, consisted of the Army of the Cumberland, under Gen. George H. Thomas; the Army of the Tennessee, under Gen. McPherson, and the Army of the Ohio, under Gen. Schofield, and a cavalry corps under Gen. Wilson. The total effective strength of the combined armies on the 20th of April, 1864, was as follows: Infantry, 4,228 officers, 87,838 enlisted men; cavalry, 612 officers, 12,062 enlisted men; artillery, 185 officers, 63,322 enlisted men. Total, 5,025 officers, 163,222 enlisted men.

The preservation of a line of communications over 300 miles in extent by the Union commander, however, involved the necessity of making heavy details to guard bridges, garrison important points and bring forward supplies for the army.

The Confederate army, after its defeat on Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain, had retired to Dalton and Resaca, where it passed the winter. Longstreet's corps had retired from the siege of Knoxville to Virginia; Gen. J. E. Johnston had been transferred from the Mississippi in December, 1863, and had superseded Bragg in command, and in May Polk's army was moved from the Mississippi to swell its ranks. The forces thus opposed to Sherman, under command of Gen. Johnston, consisted of two corps under Gens. Hood and Hardee, and a cavalry corps under Gen. Wheeler. Its effective strength at the same date was as follows:

Infantry, 3,446 officers, 35,646 enlisted men; cavalry, 1,209 officers, 10,239 enlisted men; artillery, 203 officers, 3,775 enlisted men. Total, 4,858 officers; 49,660 enlisted men.

To this should be added Polk's command of 19,330 effectives.

The Kentucky infantry regiments which served in the Atlanta campaign were:

First.—Col. D. A. Enyart, Cruft's (First) Brigade, Stanley's (First) Division, Howard's (Fourth) Corps.

Second.—Col. T. D. Sedgewick, Cruft's (First) Brigade, Stanley's (First) Division, Howard's (Fourth) Corps.

Third.—Col. H. C. Dunlap, Harker's (Third) Brigade, Newton's (Second) Division, Howard's (Fourth) Corps.

Fifth.—Col. W. W. Berry, Hazen's (Second) Brigade, Wood's (Third) Division, Howard's (Fourth) Corps.

Sixth.—Capt. I. N. Johnston, Hazen's (Second) Brigade, Wood's (Third) Division, Howard's (Fourth) Corps.

Ninth.—Col. G. H. Cram, Kneffler's (Third) Brigade, Wood's (Third) Division (Fourth Corps).

Tenth.—Col. W. H. Hays, Este's (Third) Brigade, Baird's (Third) Division (Fourteenth Corps).

Eleventh.—Col. S. P. Love, Byrd's (Third) Brigade, Cox's (Third) Division (Twenty-third Corps).

Twelfth.—Col. L. H. Rousseau, Reilly's (First) Brigade, Cox's (Third) Division (Twenty-third corps)

Thirteenth.—Col. W. E. Hobson, Bond's (Second) Brigade, Hascall's (Second) Division (Twenty-third Corps).

Fourteenth.—Col. G. W. Gallup, Strickland's (Third) Brigade, Hascall's (Second) Division (Twenty-third Corps).

Fifteenth.—Col. M. C. Taylor, Carlin's (First) Brigade, Johnston's (First) Division (Fourteenth Corps).

Sixteenth.—Maj. J. S. White, Reilly's (First) Brigade, Cox's (Third) Division (Twenty-third Corps).

Seventeenth.—Col. A. M. Stout, Kneffler's (Third) Brigade, Wood's (Third) Division (Fourth Corps).

Eighteenth.—Col. H. K. Milward, Este's (Third) Brigade, Baird's (Third) Division (Fourteenth Corps).

Twentieth*.—Lieut.-Col. T. B. Waller, Strickland's (Third) Brigade, Hascall's (Second) Division (Twenty-third Corps).

Twenty-first.—Col. S. W. Price, Whitaker's (Second) Brigade, Stanley's (First) Division (Fourth Corps).

Twenty-third.—Lieut.-Col. James C. Foy, Hazen's (Second) Brigade, Wood's (Third) Division (Fourth Corps).

Twenty-fourth.—Col. J. S. Hurt, Casement's (Second) Brigade, Cox's (Third) Division (Twenty-third Corps).

Twenty-seventh.—Col. J. H. Ward, Strickland's (Third) Brigade, Hascall's (Second) Division (Twenty-third Corps).

Twenty-eighth.—Lieut.-Col. J. R. Boone, Wagner's (Second) Brigade, Newton's (Second) Division (Fourth Corps).

The cavalry regiments were brigaded as follows:

The Fourth Kentucky Mounted Infantry, acting as cavalry, under command of Col. R. M. Kelly, served in Croxton's (First) Brigade, McCook's (First) Division, cavalry corps.

First.—Col. S. Adams, Adams' (Third) Brigade, Stoneman's (First) Division, cavalry corps.

Second.—Lieut.-Col. E. S. Watts, Long's (Second) Brigade, Garrard's (Second) Division, cavalry corps.

Third.—Lieut.-Col. R. H. King, Murray's (Third) Brigade, Kilpatrick's (Third) Division, cavalry corps.

Fourth.—Maj. L. Groynne, Watkin's (Third) Brigade, McCook's (First) Division, cavalry corps.

Fifth.—Col. O. L. Baldwin, Murray's (Third) Brigade, Kilpatrick's (Third) Division, cavalry corps.

Sixth.—Maj. W. H. Fidler, Watkin's (Third) Brigade, McCook's (First) Division, cavalry corps.

Seventh.—Col. J. K. Faulkner, Watkin's (Third) Brigade, McCook's (First) Division, cavalry corps.

Eleventh.—Lieut.-Col. Alexander, Adams' (Third) Brigade, Stoneman's (First) Division, cavalry corps.

Twelfth.—Lieut.-Col. Bramlette, Adams' (Third) Brigade, Stoneman's (First) Division, cavalry corps.

Various changes were made in commanders and brigades during the progress of the campaign. The Eighth Infantry did not participate in the active duties of the campaign, the regiment being stationed at Chattanooga as part of the garrison until November 17, 1864, when it was mustered out of service. The Eighteenth Infantry was stationed at Ringgold, Ga., until September, when it rejoined the brigade, and marched with the Fourteenth Army Corps through Georgia to the sea.

Both commanders had been actively preparing for offensive movements, but Sherman being soonest ready took the initiative in what is known as the Atlanta campaign. His army moved forward on converging roads toward Tunnel Hill and Snake Creek Gap on the 5th of May, 1864. Johnston, expecting to be attacked at Dalton, had fortified Buzzard Roost Gap on the direct road, but had neglected to guard the gap through which the Snake Creek road led direct to Resaca in his rear, and but for the indecision of the Army of the Tennessee in moving forward and seizing Resaca, this campaign would have had a far different history. Gen. McPherson did advance to the vicinity of Resaca, which was then held by only two brigades, but subsequently retired and fortified at the gap. This action gave Johnston time to send Hood with three divisions to Resaca, who, finding that McPherson had retired, left one division there, another at Tilton, halfway between Resaca and Dalton, and brought the third back to camp.

On the 12th, leaving Howard's corps and the cavalry to confront the enemy at Dalton, Sherman's entire army, with this exception, passed the left flank of the Confederate army by the Snake Creek Gap, but too late to get in the rear of Johnston. That watchful general, not to be caught napping after the intimation he had had, observed this movement from an overlooking ridge, and quietly withdrew his army to Resaca, where he faced about and gave battle on the 15th instant. He reached this point on the morning of the 14th; sent Loring's division to observe Snake Creek Gap, and formed a line of battle with Polk on the left, Hardee in the center, and Hood on the right.

*The advent of Gen. Bragg into Kentucky, in 1862, was preceded by an extensive raid, made by Gen. John H. Morgan, with a brigade of cavalry. At this time the Twentieth Kentucky Infantry was stationed at Lebanon, where, after a stout resistance, it was captured by the raiders. This misadventure, for a time, removed this fine regiment from the effective force of the army. The officers and men were paroled, and soon after exchanged. The regiment was then stationed at Bowling Green, but was removed a little later to Louisville, where it remained until the opening of the Atlanta campaign. It was then ordered to the front.

Early on the morning of the 13th, Howard discovered that Johnston had withdrawn his army, and moving through Dalton, pushed on eight miles toward Resaca, where he encamped for the night. On the next day he pushed up to the vicinity of the enemy and formed a line of battle. The rest of the Union army advanced through the Snake Creek Gap and formed on Howard's corps. Kilpatrick, moving in advance of McPherson through the gap, encountered Wheeler's cavalry, when a brisk fight ensued. Kilpatrick was severely wounded, and turned the command over to Col. Eli H. Murray, who continued the fight with such success as to drive his opponents back upon their infantry support.

The fight was opened by Carlin's brigade. This brigade, the Fifteenth Kentucky, in advance, crossed Camp Creek and advanced some distance over the open ground in front of the enemy's position under a severe fire of artillery and musketry, where it gained a position which it held during the day. Meantime the lines of investment were slowly closing around the Confederate army, to prevent which Johnston determined to assume the offensive, and, if possible, turn Sherman's left flank. Stevenson's and Stewart's divisions and two brigades of Walker's were formed in column, and, moving to the right under cover of the Oostanaula Hills, fell like an avalanche upon Cruft's brigade. This splendid brigade never fought better, but were driven slowly back across the open fields toward the rear of Wood's division.

Simonson's battery, planted on an eminence, had full sweep of the ground, but could not open fire until Cruft had fallen back far enough to give him range upon the Confederates. Then his guns opened with terrific effect at short range. There were no reserves in this part of the field, and for a quarter of an hour the firing from this noble battery, supported on either flank by Cruft's brigade, was incessant, when on the road in his rear a heavy column of troops was seen approaching at double-quick. This was Williams' division of the Twentieth Corps under the personal command of Gen. Hooker. Moving down the road on the flank of the Confederates, the long line of troops halted only when its rear had passed the battery, which was still working with the rapidity of a steam fire engine. Facing to the right, the line now moved forward, a blaze of fire pouring from their muskets. It was nearly dark, and the Confederates, struck suddenly in flank, fell back down the Resaca road, and all along the line the Union troops had gained ground which they occupied during the night.*

The attempt to turn the right of the Union army was repeated by Gen. Johnston on the following day, and resulted in a desperate fight between Stewart's and Stevenson's divisions, and Williams' and Geary's divisions. On both sides artillery charged with canister and schrapnel was freely used. The fight closed with the repulse of the Confederate troops, but not until the leading regiments were nearly annihilated. During the night of the 15th Gen. Johnston abandoned Resaca, and the campaign for the possession of Atlanta was fairly begun.

Resaca was occupied by the Army of the Cumberland on the morning of May 16th, and Gen. Sherman determined upon immediate pursuit. But a heavy rear guard, seeking every available point at which to offer resistance, rendered pursuit, if such it could be called, exceedingly slow. The cavalry, thrown well to the flanks, the Armies of the Tennessee on the right, Cumberland in the center and Ohio on the left, moved forward on parallel roads when practicable, or through forests when necessary, but always in position to be formed in line of battle. The pioneer brigade of the Army of the Cumberland, formed by Gen. Rosecrans of picked men from each regiment, under command of Gen. George P. Buell, together with the First Michigan regiment of Engineers and Mechanics, fully equipped for the service, with a pontoon train and an ample supply of implements, opened roads, built railroad bridges, and brought forward trains of cars laden with supplies as fast as they were needed by the army.

*This was the last battle for the First and Second Kentucky Infantry. Having enlisted in June, 1861, they had served faithfully for three years, and were honorably mustered out of service at Covington, Ky., on the 19th of June, 1864.

At Cassville Gen. McCook's division of cavalry had a brilliant passage of arms with Stevenson's division of infantry, where it was Johnston's intention to again give battle, in which he was upheld by Hardee, but was finally dissuaded by Polk and Hood. Accordingly, during the night Johnston crossed the Etowah with all his trains and moved to the stronger position of Allatoona Pass.

It was no part of Gen. Sherman's purpose to waste life hurling his men upon Johnston's works at Allatoona when the position could be turned, and by the same movement threaten Johnston's communications. Moving divisions, to these masterly tacticians, was a work that never confused them. Their orders were obeyed without question, and such was the discipline of both armies that, having once ordered a division or corps to be at a certain point at a given time the commander was at liberty to make all his combinations in the magnificent game with certainty that when wanted the men would be at the place indicated. Covering the Alabama road toward Allatoona with Geary's division, the balance of Hooker's corps was moved to Burnt Hickory, preceded by McCook's cavalry, skirmishing all the way. A Confederate courier was captured, whose dispatches showed that Johnston had divined Sherman's purpose to move upon Dallas, and that he was taking steps to meet him there.

On the morning of the 25th, as the Union army was advancing by parallel roads, Geary's division, the central one of the Twentieth Corps, came upon a division of Hood's corps. In the fight that ensued Geary was winner, and from prisoners he learned that Hood's entire corps was not far distant in the direction of Dallas. The next point of convergence of the roads upon which the various corps of the army were moving was New Hope Church, and Hooker was directed to drive the force in his front beyond that point, and made a vigorous effort to comply, but was arrested by Johnston's artillery, well supported by infantry, at the church, and was obliged to await re-enforcements. Johnston had thrown his whole army directly across Sherman's line of advance, and was ready for defensive battle in a strong position. Reconnoissance to the front and both flanks of Johnston's line were made to ascertain his real position, in which a good deal of heavy fighting was done. McPherson and Davis passed through Dallas on Johnston's left flank and deployed on the east of the Marietta road.

Hardee's corps was on Johnston's left, Hood on his right, and Polk in the center. Sherman's line was formed with Schofield on the left and McPherson on the right, each with one corps, while the center, under Gen. Thomas, was composed of the Fourth, Fourteenth and Twentieth Corps. Doubtful whether Johnston would maintain his position, Sherman disposed of his troops so as, by a movement to the right, to place a strong force between Johnston and the railroad, while an attack was being made upon his right flank. Wood's division of the Fourth Corps was designated as the assaulting column, to be supported on the left by R. W. Johnsons's division, of the Fourteenth Corps, and on the right by McLean's brigade, of the Twenty-third Corps. Gen. Wood formed his division in column six lines deep, Johnson on the left, with a brigade front. After feeling the line in various places, a point of attack was selected, and at 5 P. M. the entire column marched briskly forward, Hazen's brigade leading, and having driven in the Confederate skirmishers, made a gallant assault upon the main line, but met with a bloody repulse. The column fell back slowly under the hammering strokes of Cleburne's division, but brought away their wounded.

Gen. Wood's loss in the brief engagement was over 1,400 in killed, wounded and missing. Though no other assault was made upon the Confederate works near Dallas, there was constant fighting from the 24th of May till the 5th of June, at which time Gen. Johnston fell back to Pine Mountain. The Kentucky regiments in Wood's division, the Fifth, Sixth, Ninth, Seventeenth and Twenty-third, displayed their usual courage and fortitude on this trying occasion. To fly before the enemy may be the act of a coward, but to remain under fire until the order is given to fall back, and in doing so to preserve the line, giving shot for shot while the wounded are borne to the rear, requires equal courage in victor and vanquished.

Col. W. E. Hobson, Thirteenth Kentucky Infantry, assumed command of the Second Brigade of Hascall's division in June, Col. Bond being wounded, and was probably the youngest brigade commander in the army. On the 9th of June, Gen. McCook made a cavalry reconnoissance in front, where he found the Confederate army in force on Pine Mountain, with its left resting on Lost Mountain, its center at Gilgall Church and its right extended across the railroad. The advance of Sherman's infantry developed Johnston's position more accurately, when it was found that his lines extended over a series of hills from Kenesaw Mountain to Lost Mountain, with Pine Mountain fortified in front.

On the 14th of June active operations recommenced. The Fourteenth Corps and the left of the Fourth advanced a mile. The right of the Fourth closed up on the Twentieth, was formed in front of Pine Mountain, which caused Johnston to withdraw to his works between Kenesaw and Lost Mountain. During the day a shell thrown from Simonson's battery, aimed at a party of horsemen, who appeared on an eminence overlooking the field, killed Gen. Polk.

An advance along the Union line was ordered the next day. Gen. Schofield carried a line of works that had been left exposed by the abandonment of Pine Mountain. Gen. McPherson gained a hill on his left front, and Gen. Thomas advanced a mile and a half in the center, but this movement resulted only in contracting the Confederate lines within its intrenchments. An assaulting column, composed of Newton's and Geary's divisions strongly supported, carried an intrenched skirmish line and advanced nearly to the main line. This proved to Gen. Johnston that an assault could be made with strong probabilities of success, and he fell back to an intrenched position on the south side of Mud Creek. Here the contending armies fought with varying success until the 27th, when Gen. Sherman determined upon an attack upon the Confederate center. Davis' and Newton's divisions were designated as the assaulting column. Newton's division was formed with Harker's and Wagner's brigades in line slightly separated for better cover, and Kimball's in echelon with Wagner's. For fifteen minutes all the artillery available poured a concentrated fire upon the points of attack, then the columns moved forward.

The distance to the works was about 600 yards, and from the moment that the troops left the cover of their own intrenchments they were subject to a galling fire of artillery and musketry. A tangled abatis encumbered their way, the air was filled with death-dealing missiles, but the brave fellows pressed forward, and the brigades of Cols. Daniel McCook and J. G. Mitchell reached the works, but such was their exhaustion they were compelled to halt. McCook ordered his men to lie down; a soldier begged the brave colonel to do likewise; "Oh, no," said McCook in a bantering tone, "I am paid more than you are for being shot at;" the next moment he fell with a mortal wound. The formidable obstructions in front of Harker's and Wagner's brigades proved absolutely insurmountable in the face of the terrific fire to which the troops were subjected. Gen. Harker, the gallant young commander of Newton's Third Brigade, was killed. Some of his men, infuriated at the loss of their beloved general, rushed forward, struggled through the abatis, and fell dead upon the parapet.

The aggregate loss in Newton's and Davis' divisions in this assault, in nearly equal proportion, was 1,580 killed, wounded and missing. This terrible sacrifice brought no adequate reward. Gen. Sherman now determined to do what might well have been done earlier, to turn Johnston's position by moving to the right, which movement, observed by the latter, caused him to abandon his position at Kenesaw and fall back across the Chattahoochee.

In the two months since the campaign opened the loss in the Army of the Cumberland alone was 133 officers and 1,972 enlisted men killed, 510 officers and 10,798 enlisted men missing. Total, 13,413.

While the infantry of both armies had been engaged in daily passages of arms, the cavalry had been equally active. Gen. Steedman, commanding the district of the Etowah, which was organized on the 10th of June, sent Col. Louis Watkins, commanding the Third Brigade of McCook's cavalry division, with the Fourth, Sixth and Seventh Kentucky Cavalry, to Lafayette, where he was attacked by Gen. Pillow with 2,000 men. Col. Watkins refused to surrender, and with 400 men held the place until re-enforced by the Fourth Kentucky, mounted infantry, whose vigorous attack repulsed, and finally routed the Confederates. Pillow's loss was about 300 men, including eighty captured. The loss of the Kentuckians was sixty.

The folly of the Confederate war department was in nothing more strongly exemplified than in detaching Gen. Forrest from Johnston's army, at a period when the only hope of preventing Sherman's advance was to destroy his communications with Nashville and Chattanooga. This bold cavalryman, raiding in western Tennessee, accomplished nothing in comparison with the work he might have performed along the extensive railroad lines required for the transportation of supplies to Sherman's army. Johnston's infantry and artillery, numbering less than one-half of the same arms in Sherman's army, often necessitated the use of Wheeler's cavalry in the rifle-pits along his front, thus affording it no opportunity to demonstrate upon Sherman's rear.

Johnston's next line of defense was selected on high ground on the south bank of Peachtree Creek and the Chattahoochee, below the mouth of the creek. In the defense of his fortifications he had an auxiliary army of militia.

On the 16th of July Gen. Sherman gave orders for an advance toward Atlanta, the objective point of the campaign. Early on the morning of the 19th the Fourth Corps reached Peachtree Creek, and finding the bridge destroyed, Wood's division constructed another, and forcing a passage drove the Confederates from their defenses, while Stanley crossed the north fork of the creek some distance north against strong opposition. To the right Davis' and Geary's divisions fought their way over the stream. Early the next morning the remaining divisions of the Army of the Cumberland crossed the stream, and two divisions of the Fourth Corps moved to the left to connect with Gen. Schofield. This movement left a wide interval in Gen. Thomas' line, and but for the determined valor of this magnificent army would have resulted in its defeat.

At 3 P. M. the Confederates rushed from their concealments in the woods. A division attacked Newton in front, another passed his left flank altogether and thrust itself between Peavine and Peachtree Creeks, and a third attacked his right flank. Gen. Newton first repulsed the column on his left and drove it to the woods with Bradley's brigade and the reserve artillery. Wagner's and Blake's brigades repulsed the attack in front, then turning upon the column on his left he threw his whole command against it with such force as to drive it back into the woods.

Meantime Gen. Ward's division of the Twentieth Corps advanced from cover, and after a spirited fight drove the Confederates back far enough to connect his right with Geary, and his left with Newton, where he fortified against immediate attack. Gen. Williams came forward with his division on the right of Geary.

In the furious contest that ensued, the Confederate line attacked with courage and determination, but the most daring assaults were repulsed again and again, until exhausted and bleeding at 6 P. M. the troops were withdrawn by Gen. Hood, whose loss in the engagement was nearly 3,000 men. The loss in the Army of the Cumberland was about one-half that of the Confederates, but it comprised some of the bravest and best of the rank and file of the army. Newton, Stanley and Wood, though heavily engaged, lost very few men in proportion to the Twentieth Corps.

During the following night, Gen. Hood, who had by direction of the Confederate government superseded Gen. Johnston in command of the army, on the 18th, withdrew his forces within the fortifications of Atlanta.

On the 22d, while the Army of the Tennessee was moving into position on the left of the line of investment, Gen. Hood again attacked with such vigor as to gain a temporary advantage. Gen. McPherson was killed in the opening of the engagement, and the command devolved upon Gen. Logan. After a bloody engagement, Hood again withdrew into the city. On the same day, Gen. Rousseau arrived at Marietta with his cavalry, from a most successful raid upon the railroads southwest of Atlanta.

The garrison of Atlanta, although vastly inferior in point of numbers to the investing army, by fighting on interior lines was able to present a solid front at any point where it might be assailed; and finding that the occupation of Atlanta by Gen. Hood's army could be prolonged indefinitely, so long as he retained possession of the railroad leading southward to Macon, Gen. Sherman determined to destroy it.

To accomplish this object a cavalry expedition was fitted out, after the return of Gen. Rousseau, under command of Stoneman with 4,000, and McCook with 5,000, which by its strength gave promise of success. The expedition marched from Marietta on the 27th of July. McCook crossed the Chattahoochee at Riverton and moved at once upon Palmetto Station, where he destroyed two miles of the railroad track. At Fayetteville he burned 100 bales of cotton, burned a supply train of 400 wagons, killed 800 mules, saving a large number, and captured several hundred quartermaster's employees and train guards.

Gen. Stoneman marched through Covington, detaching Garrard's division to go to Flat Rock, between his line of march and Atlanta; thence moved down the Ocmulgee to Macon. Lieut. Davidson, with a battalion of the Fourteenth Illinois Cavalry, was sent eastward on the Augusta Road, where he captured and destroyed a large number of cars laden with army supplies, and burned a depot and several bridges.

The two forces were ordered to concentrate at Lovejoy's Station on the Macon Railroad, and McCook obeyed the order, arriving at the place and time agreed upon. Stoneman appears to have paid no heed to his instructions, but marched at once upon Macon, where, his approach having been announced, the bridges were burned, and he was obliged to content himself with shelling the city. Meantime Gen. Hood, having been informed of the movement, dispatched all his cavalry in pursuit of the raiders, and McCook found himself surrounded by a superior force. Falling back from Lovejoy's he made a rapid march to Newnan's, where he came in contact with an infantry column cut off from railroad communication with Atlanta, and on the march to join Hood's army. The Confederate cavalry, close upon his heels, compelled him to fight and suffer great loss. The Fourth Kentucky, mounted infantry, under Col. R. M. Kelly, acting as a rear guard, was cut off from the main column and several hundred of the regiment captured. McCook finally reached the Union lines with about two-thirds of his command.

Gen. Stoneman fared even worse. In attempting to retrace his steps from Macon he took the road toward Hillsboro, and early on the morning of the 30th found himself in presence of a heavy force of cavalry, infantry and artillery. His three brigades, under command of Cols. Biddle, Capron and Adams, were deployed in line of battle, but before the action had fairly commenced Gen. Stoneman received a flag of truce demanding his surrender. He sent a message to his brigade commanders that he was about to surrender, but giving them permission to cut their way out if they chose to attempt it. Col. Silas Adams, in command of the First, Eleventh and Twelfth Kentucky Cavalry, on receipt of the message at once mounted his men, who rode away, reaching Marietta in safety.

Col. Capron whose brigade was stationed on the extreme right failed to receive the message until too late to act upon it with the same success. The falling back of the Kentucky regiments left a wide gap in the line, through which poured a strong column of the Confederates, and a running fight took place for the possession of the horses of Capron's brigade, in which the cavalry were beaten by the more fleet-footed infantry men. Gathering together a few hundred of his command, Col. Capron set out for Marietta, marching day and night for three days. Making a wide detour to the eastward to avoid the enemy, he encamped for the night near Mulberry's Creek, where he was surprised and most of his force captured. Gen. Stoneman was taken prisoner, together with most of Biddle's brigade. The failure in execution of Gen. Sherman's plans for cutting Hood's communications with Macon, convinced him of the necessity for a flank movement in force, which he soon after put in execution.

In the month of July the loss in the Army of the Cumberland was 40 officers and 547 enlisted men killed, 160 officers and 2,592 enlisted men wounded, and 17 officers and 344 enlisted men missing; total, 3,700.

Though Hood's army had been roughly handled during the month, his losses were much less, and his army as much out of reach of his antagonist as at any period of the campaign. His fortifications extended along the railroad to East Point, a distance of fifteen miles, and were so strongly manned as to resist any effort made by Gen. Sherman to carry them. Several attacks were made upon them by the Fourteenth Corps supported by Schofield's corps between the 1st and 10th of August, but without success.

Hoping to force Sherman to fall back, Hood about this time dispatched Wheeler, with all the cavalry of his command, northward, to cut the Nashville & Chattanooga Railroad, but the activity of Gens. Steedman at Chattanooga, Rousseau at Nashville and Granger at Decatur, prevented him from inflicting any serious damage, and he was soon forced to seek shelter south of the Tennessee. Taking advantage of the absence of Wheeler's cavalry, Gen. Sherman determined upon another effort to break Hood's communications. Gen. Kilpatrick, on the 18th, dashed out of his entrenchments at Sandtown, striking the West Point Railroad near Fairburn, and moving thence to Jonesboro met and defeated Ross' cavalry, and commenced the destruction of the road, but, being attacked by Jackson's cavalry and a force of infantry, was compelled to fall back. He then made a circuit to Lovejoy's Station, and while breaking the road was again attacked. Finding his force nearly surrounded he formed his column, and saber in hand cut his way through the investing line, making his way back to his camp.

In all these movements the Kentucky regiments before mentioned bore an honorable part. Wherever duty called them, these brave men bore their colors into the thick of every important engagement from Resaca to Atlanta, and whether fighting with Stanley at Resaca, Wood at Cassville, Hooker at Kenesaw, or Newton at Peachtree Creek, their conduct was characterized by the most exalted courage and patriotism.

The time had now come when Gen. Sherman determined to cut loose from his communications and place his army south of Atlanta. On the 28th of July, the Twentieth Army Corps under command of Gen. H. W. Slocum took position on the north bank of the Chattahoochee, while the entire investing line moved by the left flank to West Point, where the railroad was thoroughly destroyed. The work went on during the night of the 29th, and on the 30th the army moved forward to the Macon Road.

Immediately on reception of information of Sherman's movements, Hood sent Hardee's and Lee's corps to Jonesboro and prepared to follow with Stewart's. Gen. Hardee took position on the summit of a wooded ridge and at once commenced fortifying. The Fourteenth Corps, being nearest the position, moved forward at once to attack him. The Fourth Corps, commanded by Gen. Stanley, and the Twenty-third Corps having farther to march and being hindered by having to break up the road came up later. The troops of the Fourteenth Corps which participated in the assault were Carlin's and Morgan's divisions and Este's brigade of Baird's division. Morgan's division carried its entire front; Carlin's division pressing forward leaped the works, and bayonet in hand held captive the troops set for their defense, while Este's brigade was equally successful. The Tenth Kentucky and Seventy-fourth Indiana gained the intrenchments in their front, but the remaining regiments met with obstructions that compelled them to halt. The unlooked-for success of this brilliant attack caused the Confederates to fall back, losing over 1,500 prisoners.

The next position selected by Hardee was at Lovejoy's Station, where, after a slight attack made by Wood's division, he was left in his works, while most of Sherman's army returned to Atlanta. The objective point of the movement had been gained, and on the 3d of September, Gen. Sherman announced the close of the campaign. During the remaining part of the month, the national forces devoted themselves to recuperation and repairs, and on the 29th Gen. Thomas was sent to Nashville to assume command of the Military District of the Mississippi, although the order to that effect was not issued until later.

On the 30th, Hood crossed the Chattahoochee and threw Stewart's corps upon the railroad north of Marietta, and with the remainder of his army moved upon Allatoona, where Sherman had a large depot of supplies. Gen. French attacked the garrison stationed there on the 4th of October, but experienced a bloody repulse by Gen. Corse. Gen. Hood then moved rapidly toward Resaca, destroying the railroad at various points, followed closely by Sherman, who in doubt as to the real object of Hood's movement, and unable to overtake him, was compelled to attack constantly at disadvantage.

While Hood was pursuing his course toward middle Tennessee, keeping well in advance of Sherman's main army but capturing any small garrison that came in his way, Gen. Forrest had entered the State with the evident intention of destroying the Nashville & Chattanooga Railroad. His raid, though more successful at the start than Wheeler's, ended very soon after it began with no permanent injury to the main line of railroad or benefit to the Confederate army. Thus, with an army vastly inferior in numbers to that of his antagonist, Gen. Hood had compelled Sherman to retreat from Atlanta, although the place was still garrisoned by Union troops.

Moving in total disregard to a base of supplies, his erratic course was so difficult to conjecture that Gen. Sherman, in despair of capturing him by a stern chase, sat down at Gaylesville with the Army of the Cumberland, sending Howard with the Army of the Tennessee to Little River, and the Twenty-third Corps to Cedar Bluffs, regardless of Hood's final destination, hoping rather that his course might lead northward, where his capture might be attempted with some hope of success. Gen. Hood's expectations of obtaining supplies for his famishing troops having been blasted by the successful defense of Allatoona and Decatur, but one course was left him by which to save his army, and that was an immediate movement westward (via Gadsden and Tuscumbia, Ala.), where he could obtain supplies for his troops.

Gen. Sherman now determined upon the "march to the sea," and, detaching the Fourth and Twenty-third Corps to report to Gen. Thomas, together with all the cavalry except Kilpatrick's division, he moved from Gaylesville with the Fourteenth, Fifteenth, Seventeeth and Twentieth Corps—60,000 infantry and artillery, and 4,500 cavalry.

The Kentucky regiments that participated in the grand march were the Eighteenth Infantry, and the Second, Third and Fifth Cavalry. Of those in the Fourth, Fourteenth and Twenty-third Army Corps at the beginning of the Atlanta campaign, the Twelfth, Sixteenth, Seventeenth, Twenty-first, Twenty third and Twenty-eighth remained for the closing scenes in Tennessee. After the battle of Franklin, the Seventeenth, whose term of service had expired, was replaced by the Twenty-sixth. Twelve regiments were sent back to Kentucky after long and faithful service to await the expiration of the third year of their enlistment.

On the 29th of October, Brig.-Gen. John T. Croxton, to whose vigilance the task of watching the movements of Gen. Hood had been entrusted by Gen. Thomas, reported that the Confederates were crossing the Tennessee at the mouth of Cypress Creek, two miles below Florence, Ala. Gen. Stanley was ordered to concentrate the Fourth Corps at Pulaski and await instructions; Gen. Schofield was ordered from Resaca, Ga., to Columbia; Gen. Hatch, commanding a division of cavalry, en route from Memphis, was directed to place his troops south of Columbia, and in conjunction with Croxton and Capron keep a sharp lookout for any forces that might make their appearance north of the Tennessee.

Gen. Schofield, who as a commander of the Department of the Ohio, was the ranking corps-commander under Thomas, had orders to hold the enemy in check until the arrival of re-enforcements at Nashville would enable the commanding general to take the field with an army of sufficient numerical strength to offer some prospect of success in a general engagement. Gen. A. J. Smith, commanding the right wing of the Sixteenth Corps, two divisions, having completed the expulsion of Price's army from the State of Missouri, was directed to report to Gen. Thomas at Nashville. Gen. Steedman had orders to furnish a contingent of colored troops from Chattanooga; Gen. Cruft was placed in command of all soldiers and detachments found at Nashville, who, being en route to their regiments in Sherman's army, were cut off from joining it, and Gen. John F. Miller, in command of the post of Nashville, was instructed to arm the employes of the quartermaster's department for service in the fortifications.

With this heterogeneous command, Gen. Thomas was compelled to cope with the same army that Sherman had been fighting all summer, without once defeating it in a general engagement. He had turned away from it when it was drawn up in order of battle at Lovejoy's Station; had followed it when his communications were threatened north of Atlanta, and now, marching away with two-thirds of his army, he left the remainder to fight a decisive battle. But he left Thomas and Stanley, and A. J. Smith.

Gen. Thomas was handicapped at the outset by a difficulty which no foresight seemed able to prevent. His cavalry with the exception of the few brigades above mentioned were without horses. They had been dismounted to furnish horses for Kilpatrick's division, and sent to Louisville to be remounted. Agents were sent through the State in every direction to purchase horses, but for once in its history the supply was exhausted. Its pastures had supplied Union and Confederates with an equally lavish hand. Those which Morgan had spared Burbridge had pressed into the service, and the horseless troops of the Army of the Cumberland wandered aimlessly through the streets of Louisville when their services were imperatively demanded to confront Forrest on the banks of the Tennessee.

As fast as regiments were remounted they were sent to the front, and in a few weeks the cavalry corps was ready for service. The delay in paying its respects to that ubiquitous raider was solely owing to the lack of horseflesh, and to no unwillingness on their part to engage him in mortal combat; but the delay caused Gen. Thomas serious embarrassment, and came near causing his removal from command by the wiseacres at the head of the army, who at a distance of a thousand miles presumed to direct his movements.

To add to the difficulties of the situation, troops did not arrive as fast as the veterans, whose term of service had expired, left the army. Nothing saved the little force of 30,000 men from annihilation but the vigilance of Gen. Canby in patrolling the Mississippi, and preventing Kirby Smith from uniting his forces with those of Gen. Hood. Early in October he had intercepted a dispatch from President Davis to Gen. E. Kirby Smith ordering him to cross the Mississippi with his entire force. Gen. Magruder had doubtlessly received a copy of the dispatch, as he suddenly retired with his corps of 30,000 men from Gen. Steele's front and moved toward Gaine's Landing. Gen. Canby's vigilance prevented the order from being carried out, and enabled Gen. Thomas to prepare for action. Having established a base of supplies at Cherokee Station, on the Mobile & Ohio Raiload, Gen. Hood proceeded to cross the Tennessee and move to Florence, but did not begin his forward movement until the 21st of November. The Confederate general's object was to place his army between Columbia and Nashville, and then having gained the rear of the Fourth and Twenty-third Corps to turn upon them in overwhelming force. Leaving two divisions of Lee's Corps to make a show of strength in Schofield's front, Hood, at dawn of day of the 29th of November, led Cheatham's and Stewart's corps and one division of Lee's across Duck River on pontoon bridges, and advanced on the road to Spring Hill.

Gen. Wilson, in command of the Union cavalry, immediately notified Gen. Schofield of this movement, and, supposing that the latter would at once put his troops in motion for Spring Hill, which is on the direct road to Nashville, he fell back slowly on the Lewisburg Road, retarding Hood's advance to the extent of his ability. Forrest's cavalry, in Hood's advance, followed Wilson until abreast of Spring Hill, when turning sharply to the left it advanced rapidly to take possession of the place. Meantime Gen. Stanley, marching with Wagner's division, reached a point within two miles of Spring Hill, where he was informed that the Confederate cavalry was approaching the town from the east. He ordered a double quick, and the gallant troops, moving rapidly forward, drove Forrest back.

Believing that he had the two corps now within his grasp Hood left two corps at the crossing of Rutherford's Creek to prevent Schofield from escaping to the defenses of Murfreesboro, and advanced with Cheatham's corps to attack Stanley, who had formed Wagner's division in readiness to receive him. Bradley's brigade was thrown forward to a wooded knoll about three-fourths of a mile east of the town, while Opdycke's and Lane's brigades were stretched out in as long a line as possible east of the Columbia Road to guard the supply and baggage trains which covered the road for miles in the rear.

The blunder of Schofield in permitting Hood to flank him was now apparent even to the most stupid soldier. The command was so widely separated as to bar any possibility of concentration in case of an attack in force, and, but for the equal blunder of Hood in attempting to bag the entire command by separating his forces, he might have got possession of Spring Hill, and then fought Schofield on ground of his own choosing. Cox's division was on the bank of Duck River, opposite Columbia; Kimball's and Wood's divisions confronted Stewart's at Rutherford's Creek. One-half of Rogers' division was far below Columbia on Duck River, where it had been forgotten, and the other half was in the rear of Stanley on the road to Spring Hill. With all this evidence bearing on the subject it was not until 3 P. M. that Gen. Schofield became convinced that Hood had done precisely what he would be expected to do—turned his left flank and gained the road to Nashville.

At the same hour Gen. Hood, with the prospect of brilliant success in view, gave the order to Cheatham to attack, promising support from his nearest division. After a short fight Bradley was compelled to fall back upon Lane, and, being severely wounded, relinquished the command to Col. Conrad; but Cleburne, who followed him closely, met a sharp artillery fire and galling musketry volleys from Lane's brigade, before which his troops recoiled, and finally retired. The short November day was nearing its close when the attack failed, and Hood's golden opportunity was lost. With ten divisions of infantry well in hand, a general assault upon three divisions and a half could hardly have failed.

The danger increased with every hour at Spring Hill, where a narrow bridge had to be crossed by 500 wagons. At 10 P. M., Schofield joined his own corps at Thompson's Station, and moved on toward Nashville, leaving Stanley to extricate his corps and the immense baggage-train as best he might. But Stanley was equal to the emergency. With characteristic skill and energy he sent his train over the narrow bridge, and covering it with a line of troops, snatched his corps and all his supplies from Hood's enclosing grasp.

The march of Stanley's corps from Spring Hill to Franklin, on the night of the 29th and part of the 30th of November, reads like a romance. With an overwhelming army pressing upon his rear, and a heavy force of cavalry hovering upon his flanks, the corps marched steadily forward, its rear guarded by Opdycke's splendid brigade, which, before the night closed on the last day of November, was destined to furnish one of the most brilliant pages in the annals of military warfare.

On approaching the town, Stanley found the Twenty-third Corps formed in a line, with the flanks resting upon the Harpeth River to cover the crossing of the Fourth Corps, and the trains of the army. Wood's division, by the direction of Schofield, crossed and took position on the north side of the river, in position to contest the crossings above or below the town, should Hood attempt a flank movement, and by the same authority, Lane's and Conrad's brigades of Wagner's division were left a third of a mile in advance of Cox's line, to retard Hood's advance. Opdycke, protesting against this needless exposure of his men, was permitted to pass in the rear of Cox's line, and take position on Carter's Hill.

Reversing the positions, it was Missionary Ridge repeated. As in that memorable charge, the attacking forces became mingled with the attacked, and rushing forward, came in a body upon the main line. It was impossible to direct a musketry fire upon them without destroying more friends than foes, and it was not until the Union brigades had gotten well over the works that the orders were given to open fire. The leading Confederate troops had gained the interior of the works at the key point. Two batteries of artillery were captured and turned to enfilade the Union line, while Hood's entire army poured in ever-increasing volume, toward the breach. Schofield had crossed the river, and at this supreme moment was two miles away. One of the divisions was unoccupied near his headquarters, and one of Stanley's was too far away to render assistance.

Gen. Stanley had ridden to Schofield's headquarters to report his arrival, and was with him when the opening roar of artillery announced the impending battle. Mounting his horse he was quickly upon the scene, but not quick enough to anticipate the gallant Opdycke in ordering his brigade forward to the charge. His men had unslung their knapsacks, stacked their arms, and were busy getting their suppers when the attack fell upon their comrades at the front.

In a moment all was changed. Some new troops sent down by Gen. Thomas to swell the volume if not to increase the strength of Schofield's army, rushing in wild flight from the line of battle, threw away their arms, and ran past Opdycke's position. A colonel of one of his regiments, anticipating his order to move to the front, had thrown his regiment into the road, and thereby gained the advance. Then came the order. As if by magic the entire brigade, a self-constituted reserve, sprang forward into the "imminent deadly breach," supported on the right by Reilley's brigade, those gallant regiments, the Twelfth and Sixteenth Kentucky, in advance. A charge was made that sent the Confederates staggering over the works. Volleys of musketry poured upon them, but with rapidly thinning ranks the heroic soldiers of these two brigades held their ground, giving shot for shot.

Meantime the entire line of works were blazing with artillery full in the faces of the Confederates crowded into a narrow space in the vain hope of carrying the works by overwhelming numbers. Thirteen Confederate brigadier-generals were killed or wounded, 1,700 officers and men were killed, and 4,000 wounded. More than half the losses in the Union army were from Wagner's division, which suffered heavily by the blunder in leaving the two brigades in front of the Union line, and by the heroic charge of Opdycke's brigade. Forrest fared no better in his attempt to cross the Harpeth, where he was met and driven back by Wilson's cavalry. A. J. Smith's first division arrived at Nashville on the 30th, and Gen. Thomas found that he could not move the corps to Schofield's support until the 2d of December. He therefore wrote Gen. Schofield asking if he could hold Hood in check at Franklin three days. The reply came that he could not, and unwilling to risk the possibility of Hood's thrusting his army between the two wings of his army, he ordered Schofield to Nashville. The movement was successfully effected on the night of the 30th, and the 1st of December saw the army united in front of the city. Gen. Stanley having been severely wounded at Franklin, Gen. Wood assumed command of the Fourth Army Corps.

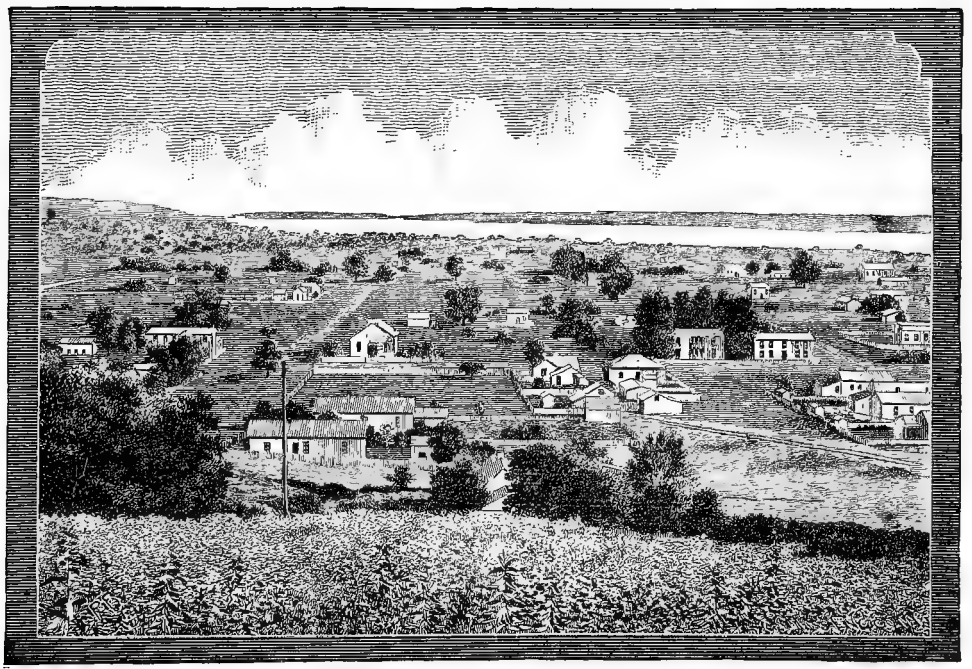
Seven days of unremitting toil were used in forming, from the heterogeneous troops thrown together, an army of infantry and cavalry such as Gen. Thomas believed would be sufficient not only to defeat but destroy his antagonist; but the anxiety of preparation for a decisive battle was not the only perplexity that annoyed him. Daily messages were received from Grant ordering him peremptorily to attack. He explained the reasons for delay, reasons which were regarded as potent by every one of his corps and division commanders, but to no effect. Grant caused an order to be issued placing Schofield in command, but subsequently suspended it. At the end of seven days Thomas announced himself nearly ready for the attack, when a terrible storm of rain and sleet was followed by freezing weather, which covered the ground with ice. Knowing that Hood could not move during this time, he delayed his attack until the ice should melt, telegraphing daily his position and prospects. On the 13th an order was issued by Grant to Gen. Logan to proceed to Nashville and assume command. Gen. Logan reached Louisville on the 15th, where he received news of the battle of Nashville, and with the instinct of a true soldier knew that there was no occasion for him to continue his journey. Grant reached Washington from City Point, Va., bound for the same place, and there heard news from Nashville that changed his destination.

Chaplain Van Horn in his life of Thomas says: "Gen. Hood's first blunder was in not attacking Sherman at Gaylesville, where he had only 60,000 men; his second was in waiting so long at Florence without effort to help his promised re-enforcements across the Mississippi; the third was his failure to crush Schofield at Spring Hill, and the fourth was in offering himself to Thomas to be crushed."

Although Hood's army was intrenched upon a commanding ridge and supplies were furnished by the country, his forces grew weaker day by day. In constant hope of receiving large accessions to his army by the arrival of Smith from Texas, he held his position tenaciously, believing that an attack by Thomas would result in giving him possession of Nashville, and eventually of Kentucky and Tennessee. He had not offered himself to Thomas to be crushed, but chose the best, in fact the only, means of defeating the Union army. This he would undoubtedly have done, had that army been commanded by a weaker general—one who, in blind obedience to an imperative order to advance, would have put his troops in motion up the icy slopes of Overton's Hill.

The morning of the 15th of December was foggy, and in the dense mist the cavalry moved to the right of the army where in conjunction with Smith's Corps they were to "turn" the left of the Confederate line, while Gen. Steedman made an attack with his colored troops upon the right. Both movements were successfully accomplished; Morgan, with his brigade of colored troops, executed his part of the programme so well as to cause Hood to re-enforce his right from his center and left, while Croxton and Hatch, with their brigades dismounted, advanced in conjunction with A. J. Smith's Infantry, and carried several advanced positions with their armament of guns and infantry supports.

The Fourth Corps was formed with Elliott's Second Division on the right, Kimball's First in the center, and Beatty's Third on the left, each division providing its own reserve. Montgomery Hill was carried by Post's brigade, supported by Streight's. Schofield was moved to the right of Smith, where he advanced and drove the Confederates from the hills overlooking the Granny White Turnpike. Steedman advancing, carried the right of Hood's fortifications on the Nolensville Turnpike, and the day closed with decided success to the Union arms. Hood lost 17 guns and 1,200 men by capture. It was believed by many that Hood had commenced his retreat, but no thought of this kind seems to have been entertained by him, as he spent the night in fortifying his second line, where, with his forces more compact, he hoped to repulse every attack made upon him. His line was two and a half miles shorter on the morning of the 16th than on the preceding day, and coursed over the hills constituting the main Brentwood range through which the Franklin Road passes. The right rested on Overton's Hill; his left, driven back, was well refuged, and the apex strongly fortified.



The Union line stretching around Hood's position, the opposite flanks faced each other, with the Confederate force between them, while the cavalry, feeling its way farther and farther to the right, by noon on the 16th had gained the rear of Hood's left flank. This was to be the signal for a general advance along the entire line, but at this moment Schofield requested re-enforcements. Wood and Steedman, weary of delay, attacked Hood's right flank, on Overton's Hill, with Post's and Thompson's brigades supported by Streight's, but were repulsed. Wilson moved in conjunction with McArthur, of Smith's corps, and carried the works in their front. The shout of victory rang out, and, carried along the line, fell upon the ears of the Fourth Corps, who, rushing forward in an impetuous charge, supported by the colored troops on their left, carried the strongest position along the line, and victory was won.

In a few minutes Hood's army was in retreat toward Franklin, followed by the Fourth Corps, which bivouacked near Brentwood, and early on the morning of the 17th continued its march to Franklin, where, finding the Harpeth swollen by rains, Gen. Wood encamped for the night. While the infantry was following in the wake of Hood's retreating army, the cavalry was hanging upon his flanks, charging upon his rear guard, capturing prisoners, artillery and camp equipage. Wood crossed the Harpeth on the morning of the 18th, and continued his march through Franklin and Spring Hill to Rutherford's Creek by the same road over which the corps had marched less than three weeks before, with the conditions reversed. A running fight ensued, but a stern chase is proverbially a long chase, and on the 26th Hood, crossing the Tennessee with the remnant of his command, continued his march to Tupelo, Miss., where, on January 20th, he called the roll of his army, and but 18,934 answered to their names. He had lost one-half of his army in little over a month.

The events thus briefly narrated form a thrilling chapter in the history of the war in the west. The power of the Confederacy, so long upheld by the strong hearts and willing hands of its devoted adherents, was broken, and it only remained for the Union forces to move forward and occupy the land. But even from a Union standpoint, it is impossible to withhold admiration for the zeal and courage, which, under the most adverse circumstances, animated the Confederate Army of the Tennessee. The best blood of the south was in its ranks. Its officers had no superiors in any land for chivalrous bearing upon the field of battle, and, animated by their example, their men followed where they led into the thickest of the fray. At Mill Springs, Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Perryville, Stone River, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge and Knoxville, they fought as only brave men can fight. At Resaca, and through 100 days of battle to Atlanta, the soldiers of this army withstood the blows of twice their number, and when at last dispossessed of the city which formed the objective point of the campaign, when they were supposed to be nursing their wounds, they turned northward, and fell upon the rear of the invading army with unabated energy. The wonderful recuperative power which characterized the Confederate army; their constant submission to privations, such as were rarely experienced by their antagonists; their courage and discipline under the most trying circumstances, form a theme for the historian of the civil war, which to ignore must mark him blindly partisan.

To the possession of these soldierly qualities by the Confederates may be ascribed the long continuance of the war, and that they were cultivated until they came to be regarded as manly attributes, even by men bred in luxurious homes, is due, in a great degree, to the influence and example of the women of the south.

COLUMBUS, AND THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, LOOKING SOUTHWEST.

CHAPTER XVIII.

MORGAN'S CAVALRY—FIRST KENTUCKY BRIGADE, ETC.

THE Lexington Rifles, a militia company organized in 1857, commanded by Capt. John H. Morgan, was the nucleus of the famous organization known in the annals of the civil war as Morgan's Cavalry.

The organization of a military camp in Garrard County, Ky., in uncomfortable proximity to Lexington, hastened the departure of the "Rifles" for a more congenial climate. On the 20th of September, 1861, Capt. Morgan conceived the idea of removing his guns from the armory, and taking up the line of march for the southern Confederacy. With characteristic skill, the guns were loaded into wagons and started out the Versailles Turnpike under a small guard. After two days' and nights' hard marching, Capt. Morgan, at the head of some 200 men, entered the Confederate camp on the south bank of Green River, where most of the men attached themselves to the various regiments then being organized. Capt. Morgan, with some twenty men of his own company, together with daring spirits from other regiments, tiring of the monotony of camp life here, commenced the series of daring raids that subsequently rendered his name famous. Scouting to the front he obtained the earliest information of the movements of the Union forces under Gen. McCook, then stationed at Nolin Creek.

An order was finally given to mount Morgan's company on condemned artillery horses, which, by the system of exchange then in vogue, soon presented a very respectable appearance.

After the fall of Fort Donelson and the evacuation of Nashville, Morgan, in command of a squadron of cavalry, remained in the vicinity of La Vergne, a small town between Murfreesboro and Nashville, where he formed the acquaintance of the Fourth Ohio Cavalry, an acquaintance that ripened into unpleasant intimacy before the close of the war.

At the battle of Shiloh, Morgan's squadron was attached to Breckinridge's division, after which, at his solicitation, he was permitted to make a dash into Tennessee with a force numbering 325 men, composed of his own battalion, and detachments from Col. Wirt Adams' regiment, and McNairy's battalion. The expedition started on the 26th of April, crossing the Tennessee on a small horse ferry-boat, and reached Lawrenceburg, Tenn., on the 30th, where the troops encamped for the night. The next day he attacked and routed about 400 convalescents employed in putting up a line of telegraph, capturing and paroling many prisoners. Continuing his course toward Lebanon, the column reached that place on the night of the 4th of May, and encamped for the night.

The news of Morgan's operations had, in the meantime, reached Gen. Dumont, at Nashville, who started out with the First Kentucky Cavalry, and Twenty-first Kentucky Infantry, to capture him. The night was dark and rainy, Morgan's pickets were in a house, and before the alarm could be given, Wolford's cavalry came at full charge upon the camp. In the confusion that ensued the command came near being all captured. Morgan escaped with 15 men, and on the 6th reached Sparta, Tenn., where, during the next three days 50 of his men rejoined him. 120 were captured by the Union troops, and six were killed. On the 9th, he left Sparta with 150 men, mostly recruits, and directed his course toward Bowling Green, where, near Cave City, he captured two trains of cars and paroled a number of prisoners. Morgan returned to Corinth about the middle of May, to obtain equipments for his command and permission to revisit Kentucky.

Capts. R. M. Gano and John Hoffman here joined him with two companies of Texas cavalry; Capt. Basil W. Duke, from whose interesting history of Morgan's cavalry this sketch is in part compiled, having been wounded at Corinth, had collected about thirty of Morgan's men who had been left behind, and accompanied Morgan to Chattanooga, where the remainder of the command was encamped. The three companies to which the squadron was now reduced were soon filled to the maximum by recruits.

The term of service of the First Kentucky Infantry having expired in Virginia, 300 of the men were on their way home, and arrived at Chattanooga at this time. They eagerly embraced the opportunity to enlist under Morgan, and three more companies were formed. Capt. Jacob Cassel was appointed to command Company A, Capt. John Allen to Company B, Capt. Bowles to Company C, Capt. John B. Castleman to Company D, Capt. John Hutchinson to Company E, Capt. Thomas B. Webber to Company F, and Capt. McFarland commenced the organization of Company G. These six companies, and a fragment of the seventh, numbered not quite 400 men. Basil W. Duke was lieutenant-colonel; G. W. Morgan, major; Gordon E. Niles, adjutant; Thomas Allen, surgeon; Dr. Edelin, assistant surgeon; D. H. Llewellyn, quartermaster; and Hiram Reese, commissary. The regiment seems to have had no chaplain. Ten days later the regiment, now known as the Second Kentucky Cavalry, set out for Knoxville. "Some were mounted," says Duke, "and the remainder had great hopes." In the latter part of June, Col. Hunt arrived from Georgia with a "partisan ranger" regiment, and accompanied Morgan on his first Kentucky raid. This increased the force to 870, fifty or sixty of whom were not mounted, and 250 unarmed.

The expedition started on the 4th of July, 1862, and on the 8th, reached Tompkinsville, Ky., where Maj. Jordan, with 350 of the Ninth Pennsylvania Cavalry, was captured after a brief resistance. Morgan's loss was insignificant in numbers, but included Col. Hunt, who was mortally wounded. Lebanon, Ky., was captured on the following day, and among the military stores were found a sufficient quantity of excellent guns to arm every man in the command. Abundant ammunition was also secured. Supplying his command with everything needful, the remaining stores were destroyed, and Morgan moved toward Harrodsburg, which place he reached the next morning, and found himself among friends. After two days' rest, the column was again in motion, in the direction of Versailles, with the intention of turning sharply to the right on reaching there and attempting the capture of Lexington. Maj. Gano was detached at Harrodsburg to burn the railroad bridges north of Lexington, and Capt. Allen was sent to destroy the bridges on the Louisville railroad. to prevent re-enforcements from being sent to Lexington from Louisville or Cincinnati, after which they rejoined the command at Georgetown. From Versailles, Morgan marched toward Georgetown, passing Midway, a small town on the Louisville & Lexington Railroad, where Capt. Ellsworth, an expert telegraph operator, taking possession of the office, dispatched Gen. Ward, at Frankfort, that Morgan, with 1,000 men, was moving on that place. After a halt of a few hours the column moved forward and reached Georgetown at night, where Morgan made a halt of two days. He was now in the "blue grass country," the garden of Kentucky, where fine horses, fat cattle, and good rations were abundant. The people of the country were strongly in sympathy with the southern Confederacy, and welcomed their guests with true Southern hospitality.

Here another company was organized under command of W. C. P. Breckinridge, a talented young lawyer of Lexington and a son of Dr. Robert J. Breckinridge. A younger brother, John, was at the time a captain on the staff of Gen. George H. Thomas (Federal), in the Army of the Cumberland, while his cousin John C.

Breckinridge was in command of a division in the Confederate army. This was a fair specimen of the division which took place in the prominent families of the State during the war. On the morning of the 18th, Morgan left Georgetown and moved toward Cynthiana, twenty-two miles distant, where Col. Metcalfe was organizing the Seventh Kentucky (Union) Cavalry. He had about 400 recruits, and they were within a few hours' march of about an equal number of "Home Guards," all under command of Lieut.-Col. Landrum, of the Eighteenth Kentucky Infantry. A brass twelve-pound howitzer had been sent up from Cincinnati, manned by a company of firemen and commanded by Capt. Glass. There were sufficient men and ample courage to defend the place, but lack of discipline and ignorance of the simplest maneuvers neutralized every effort of Col. Landrum to concentrate his forces at the various points where their presence was needed, and after a brief, though under all circumstances a gallant resistance, the place was captured. Col. Landrum behaved with conspicuous courage and was one of the last to leave the town. From Cynthiana, Morgan marched to Paris, where he encamped for the night, and on the following morning, finding that a force of 2,500 cavalry under command of Gen. Green Clay Smith was near the town, he left in hot haste for Winchester, where he was joined by a company of recruits under Capt. Jennings.

While Morgan was thus marching at easy stages through the richest portion of the State, augmenting his forces and remounting his men with little loss and at trifling expense, a condition of the most perfect bewilderment seems to have taken possession of the military authorities at Lexington and Frankfort. With troops sufficient to have surrounded him at any of the points above mentioned, they were marching hither and thither, but always returning to their camps at night, and it was not until after the capture of Cynthiana that a well organized movement was set on foot to capture him. Hearing of this, Morgan met it in the most sensible manner possible. He ran away from it. At Crab Orchard and Somerset 130 government wagons were captured and burned, and several wagons loaded with blankets, shoes and other stores, much needed in the south, were taken along with the column to Sparta, Tenn. Enough of spare horses, guns and saddles were captured to supply all the men who had been left behind. In twenty-seven days Morgan had traveled over 1,000 miles, added 300 men to his force, and paroled 1,200 volunteer troops, at a loss of about 90 of his men.

Gens. Bragg and Smith were at this time making arrangements to invade Kentucky, and Morgan was directed to precede them and inflict as much damage as possible upon the Louisville & Nashville Railroad. Selecting Gallatin, Tenn., as the first point to strike, he set out for that point on the 10th of August, and on his way was joined by Capt. Joseph Desha with a company of men. The Twenty-eighth Kentucky Infantry was encamped two miles distant from the town, but the commander, Col. Boone, slept in Gallatin. Capt. Desha was sent forward, when the column had passed Hartsville, to capture the colonel, who, acting upon the advice of Morgan, wrote the commanding officer of the regiment to surrender without resistance. This was done, and 200 officers and men were paroled and sent northward. A railroad bridge between Gallatin and Nashville was destroyed, and a tunnel 800 feet long was rendered impassable for months. Two stockades were captured and 100 soldiers paroled, but the attack upon a third was repulsed with considerable loss.

A battle that took place on the following day with a detachment of cavalry under Gen. R. W. Johnson was more successful. The respective forces were about equal, with the advantage of experience largely in favor of the Confederates. Gen. Johnson complained that but few of his men would fight, in which opinion Duke differs. He says: "They attacked with spirit and without hesitation, and were unable to close with us on account of their heavy loss in men and horses. They returned two or three times to the attack until they found their efforts unavailing. They could not use their sabers, and they found their breech-loading carbines only "incumbrances." Johnson's entire command was swept away. He was captured, and 200 of his men taken prisoners, 64 were killed and 100 wounded, with a loss to the Confederates of but 7 killed and 18 wounded. Morgan made his camp at Hartsville, where, on the 22d, he was joined by Forrest with a portion of his command. Col. Duke's regiment received its twelfth company at this point, commanded by Capt. W. H. Jones, and Gano's squadron was increased by the addition of a company under command of Capt. Steele.

After a week's rest at Hartsville, the brigade set out for the interior of Kentucky to meet the advance of Kirby Smith's column, then about entering the State from east Tennessee, and reached Lexington on the 4th of September, then in possession of the Confederate forces. Here Gano recruited three companies, which raised his squadron to a regiment. Duke's regiment, the Second Kentucky, now numbered 1,100 men. Cols. Cluke and Chenault were given authority to raise regiments for Morgan's brigade and were actively engaged in recruiting when Bragg was driven out of Kentucky.

Maj.-Gen. George W. Morgan, in command of the Seventh Division of the Federal Army of the Ohio, consisting of four brigades, numbering 7,000 men, was at this time in occupation of Cumberland Gap. Smith had flanked the position, entering the State with 12,000 men, leaving Gen. Stevenson with 8,000 in front of the gap. Finding that the Confederate forces had gained access to his rear, and that there was no further use for his command at the gap, Gen. Morgan determined to evacuate it, and attempt a retreat through eastern Kentucky to the Ohio River. This march afforded Morgan an opportunity, which he eagerly seized, to hang upon the flanks of the retreating army and harass it as much as possible.

While Morgan was operating in eastern Kentucky, Duke with his regiment was playing havoc among the raw recruits in the vicinity of Cincinnati. Augusta was captured and burned, and a battalion of Home Guards put to flight. On the 6th of October, Morgan with his brigade, now consisting of three regiments and a battalion numbering 1,500 effectives, left Lexington and took post between Versailles and Frankfort on the flank of Kirby Smith's army, which was in the vicinity of Lawrenceburg. Duke says: "notwithstanding the efforts that were made to induce Kentuckians to enlist as infantry, very few would do so, and those who did, joined regiments which came in with Gen. Smith. Not a single infantry regiment was raised during the time that the Confederate army was in the State. All of the Kentuckians who joined at that time wanted to ride."

Gen. Abe Buford raised three regiments of cavalry under Cols. Butler, Smith and Grigsby, the last two of which were subsequently assigned to Morgan. Duke estimates the number of Kentuckians who enlisted in the Confederate army during the occupation of the State by Bragg and Smith at 5,000.

In the retreat of the Confederate army from Kentucky after the battle of Perryville, Morgan's and Ashby's cavalry formed the rear guard of Gen. Smith's corps as far as Big Hill, when Morgan obtained permission to retire from the State by way of Gallatin. instead of following the main army through Cumberland Gap.

On the 17th of October, believing that the main portion of the Union army was far enough out of his way to permit it, Morgan conceived the idea of capturing Lexington, then held by one regiment, the Fourth Ohio Cavalry. The main body was at Ashland, the home of Henry Clay, about two miles from the town. One or two companies were quartered at the court house. After a brisk fight the entire regiment, between 500 and 600 strong, was captured, and with them a supply of Colt's pistols, which were eagerly appropriated by their captors. From Lexington the column moved by way of Lawrenceburg, Bardstown and Elizabethtown to its field of operations on the Louisville &

Nashville Railroad south of Green River, which was reached on the 24th of October.

On the 4th of November Morgan reached Gallatin, Tenn., having captured nearly 500 prisoners and destroyed many miles of railroad, and at this place added another regiment to his command. This regiment was organized with James Bennett as colonel, W. W. Ward, lieutenant-colonel, and R. A. Alston as major.

In the meantime Breckinridge had arrived at Murfreesboro with his division, and learning that a large quantity of railroad cars were collected at Edgefield, instructed Morgan to attempt their destruction, while Forrest, who was also at Murfreesboro, supported by the Kentucky brigade attacked the works at Nashville from the south; but owing to the vigilance of Gen. J. M. Palmer, commanding the post, the expedition proved a failure.

In the latter part of November, the brigade was strengthened by the arrival of Cluke's and Chenault's regiments, a battalion under command of Maj. Stoner, and the old squadron captured at Lebanon in the spring of 1862, exchanged, and ready for work. Morgan's command now consisted of four regiments and two battalions.

The occupation of Hartsville and Castilian Springs by infantry brigades now effectually shut Morgan off from depredations upon the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, which was run to its utmost capacity in bringing forward supplies to the Army of the Cumberland, which was preparing for a campaign against Bragg's army at Murfreesboro. The brigade at Castilian Springs was commanded by Col. John M. Harlan, a bold and vigilant officer, who kept a sharp lookout for cavalry raids. That at Hartsville, commanded by Col. A. B. Moore, was composed of three regiments of the new levy, the One Hundred and Sixth, and One Hundred and Eighth Ohio, and One Hundred and Fourth Illinois Infantry, 1,200 strong. A battalion of the Second Indiana Cavalry and a small squadron of Kentucky cavalry acted as scouts—as the event proved, to little purpose.

The capture of this place was confided to Morgan, who with Cobb's battery and two regiments, the Second and Ninth Kentucky Infantry of Hanson's brigade, 700 strong, in addition to his own command of 1,500, left Prairie Mills, twenty-five miles distant from Hartsville, on the 7th of December, and by a rapid march encamped that night within five miles of their destination. Morgan planned a complete surprise. The infantry and Cobb's batteries reached the ferry at 10 o'clock, and immediately crossed the river. This force moved forward promptly at break of day, fearing that information would reach Col. Harlan of the movement, and when Col. Duke joined the column with a party of his cavalry it was determined to make the attack at once.

The camp was on a hill two miles in advance of Hartsville, which town was at once occupied by a regiment of cavalry, while two more were formed opposite the right flank of the Union line. Cluke's and Chenault's men, after deducting horse holders, numbered 450, which with the infantry made a force of some 1,250 men for the attack. The One Hundred and Sixth Ohio, which received the attack of the cavalry, never having witnessed a battle, and being deprived of the presence of more experienced troops, broke after the first fire and fell back in disorder. The remaining regiment resisted the advance of the Confederate infantry for a short time, when Col. Moore surrendered. The contest lasted an hour and a half, in which time the Union loss was 50 killed and 100 wounded. Gen. Bragg reported Morgan's loss at 125 killed and wounded.

The tents and everything that could not be carried off were burned, a number of captured wagons were loaded with portable stores and arms and hurried over the river, accompanied by the prisoners, who, contrary to the usual custom, were not parolled. Col. Harlan hearing the firing at once put his brigade in motion and hurried to the assistance of Col. Moore, but, with all the haste he could make, his advance only reached the camp to find it in flames. Pressing forward in pursuit Harlan reached the river only in time to rescue a few wagons that had not had time to cross and to witness the rear of Morgan's column disappear behind the hills on the southern shore.

For this exploit Morgan was promoted brigadier-general. Col. Hanson, who was captured at Donelson, with his regiment, and had just effected his exchange, was also promoted to the same rank, by President Davis. This was probably the zenith of Morgan's fame. His brigade, consisting of seven regiments, with an effective strength of 4,000, had no superior in either army for that dashing courage essential to the cavalry service, and in its ability to endure hardship without murmuring. He was the newly wedded husband of a most accomplished lady, a daughter of Judge Ready, of Murfreesboro, and was the idol of his men.

His fame as a cavalry leader attracted to his banner scores of spirited young men who, finding the service in other commands irksome, sought service in Morgan's cavalry. The command was now organized as a division, composed of two brigades, under command of Cols. Basil W. Duke and William C. P. Breckinridge, as follows:

First Brigade, Col. B. W. Duke; Second Kentucky, Lieut.-Col. Hutchinson; Third Kentucky, Col. Gano; Eighth Kentucky, Col. Cluke; Palmer's Battery of Artillery; Second Brigade, Col. W. C. P. Breckinridge; Ninth Kentucky, Lieut.-Col. Stoner; Tenth Kentucky, Col. Johnson; Eleventh Kentucky, Col. Chenault; Fourteenth Tennessee, Col. Bennett; White's battery of artillery.

The division was reviewed at Alexandria on the 21st of December, when the First Brigade numbered 1,800 effectives, and 200 unarmed. The Second Brigade also had some unarmed men, and was of about the same numerical strength. On the following day the division took up its march for Kentucky, and reached Sand Shoals Ford just before dark. The object of the expedition was the destruction of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad in rear of Rosecrans.

On the 24th the column reached Glasgow, and on the next morning marched out by the Louisville Pike, crossing Green River that night, and encamping at Hammondsville.

Turning toward the railroad, the bridge at Bacon Creek, guarded by not over 100 men (who were captured after an obstinate defense), was burned; the stockade at Nolin was also captured, and the bridge burned. On the morning of the 27th, the division moved upon Elizabethtown, which was garrisoned by a regiment of 600 men. Col. Smith, the commander, returned for answer to Morgan's demand for surrender, that it was the business of a United States officer to fight and not to surrender, but his men seemed to be of a different opinion. After a brisk fight the white flag was run up by a subordinate officer, and the garrison surrendered, and handed over 600 fine rifles to the victorious Confederates. The two great trestle works at Muldraugh's Hill, each eighty feet in height, and 500 feet long, Cane Run bridge, and two bridges on the Lebanon branch, were destroyed.

In the meantime, Harlan's brigade was marching thirty miles a day to reach the Confederates. On the night of the 28th Morgan encamped on the south bank of the Rolling Fork, and early next morning commenced crossing the swollen stream, when a shell burst in his ranks, and Harlan's advance appeared on the hill above them. In the rapid crossing that was soon after effected, several horses were killed by shells bursting among them, and the force was a good deal disorganized, but was concentrated at Bardstown on the same evening.

Col. Duke, having been wounded by a bursting shell, the command devolved upon Col. Breckinridge, who brought off the command with little loss. The concentration of troops in his front at Lebanon, and on his flank at Columbia, with Harlan in his rear, convinced Morgan that a rapid flight would be required to save his command from capture. He therefore made a detour to the right of Lebanon, and by rapid marching, although vigorously pursued by Col. Hoskins, made his escape across the Cumberland, and joined Bragg's army at Tullahoma, to which place it had fallen back after its defeat at Stone River.

Here Morgan's division, with those of Gens. Wharton and Martin, constituted the cavalry corps commanded by Gen. Wheeler. On January 24, 1863, the Second Kentucky lost its commander, Lieut.-Col. Hutchinson, in a skirmish near Woodburg, and Capt. John B. Castleman assumed command of the regiment.

The three months following were spent by the cavalry in picketing the front of Bragg's army. Cols. Cluke and Chenault made a raid into Kentucky, in which they captured Mount Sterling, and subsisted their men for several months, returning to the command after a series of adventures in the mountains of Kentucky. About this time a new regiment was formed by the organization of a number of loose companies, the command of which was given to Col. R. C. Morgan, a brother of the general.

The winter wore away, and the spring was far advanced before any operations, other than preliminary skirmishing, was attempted by the cavalry of either army. Morgan's cavalry had a long front to picket, and brushes with the Union cavalry were of daily occurrence. Duke says: "But in this year the glory and prestige began to pass away from the southern cavalry."

The war department at Washington was slow to see the importance of maintaining a strong cavalry force, not only to guard the long lines of railroad to Louisville, the true base of all military operations in Kentucky and Tennessee, but to act aggressively upon the Confederate lines of communications as far south as Atlanta. It was in vain that Gen. Rosecrans represented the importance of equipping a force of cavalry equal to, if not superior to, that under the orders of Gen. Bragg. He received nothing but rebuffs for his suggestions, until, in despair, he wrote the telegram to Secretary Stanton, which sealed his fate, regretting that there was "not more of military knowledge at the head of the war department." The secretary pocketed the insult, but bided his time for taking revenge. It came after Chickamauga. The organization of "saber brigades," by Gen. Rosecrans, proved to be the foundation of the efficiency of the cavalry of the Army of the Cumberland. A charge with drawn sabers was a new thing to western cavalry, and proved irresistible on many a hotly contested field.

On the 2d of July Morgan's division crossed the Cumberland to embark upon an expedition which ended in its destruction as a military organization. Twelve miles north, at Marrowbone, lay Gen. Judah's cavalry, ostensibly guarding the crossing, but in reality trusting to the high water to prevent Morgan from getting over. Morgan's effective strength was 2,460, exclusive of artillery, of which there were two three-inch Parrotts, and two twelve-pound howitzers. A regiment of Union cavalry was pushed down to the river to dispute the crossing, but Morgan having crossed two regiments, charged upon it and drove it back upon the camp at Marrowbone, which gave the rear regiments time to cross. The division encamped that night about ten miles on the road to Columbia, and early next morning pushed on to the town, where a detachment of Wolford's cavalry was posted, drove it out, and passing through, encamped six miles beyond.

Col. Moore, in command of a Michigan regiment, was stationed at Green River bridge, and hearing of Morgan's approach, made preparations to give him a warm reception. His position was in a horse-shoe bend of the Green River. Behind him was the toe where the bridge crossed, on either flank was the river, and in his front he had formed a strong abatis by felling trees on either side of the road, behind which he threw up a substantial earthwork, 100 yards in length, commanding the road along which Morgan was advancing. Morgan sent two regiments to cross the river and gain possession of the bridge in Col. Moore's rear, then sent a demand for the surrender of the garrison. Col. Moore's reply was: "The 4th of July is a bad day for surrenders." The only response to this greeting was of course a charge, which was made by two regiments. The first rush carried the men into the tangled tree-tops, where they were slaughtered like sheep by the unerring rifles of the Michigan men. Col. Chenault and Maj. Brent were killed, together with thirty-six men, and twice that number wounded. Finding that the capture of the position would cost him as many men as the garrison numbered, Morgan withdrew, and, crossing the river, left his wounded to be cared for by his brave antagonist, of whom Duke says, "he proved himself as humane as he was skillful and gallant."

The column moved through Campbellsville without halting, and encamped five miles from Lebanon, which was garrisoned by the Twentieth Kentucky Infantry, under command of Col. Charles S. Hanson, a brother of Gen. Roger Hanson, of the Confederate army. Two regiments were stationed on the Harrodsburg Road, within easy supporting distance, but did not reach the town until Hanson's regiment, fighting gallantly against vastly superior numbers, was overpowered and obliged to surrender. Avoiding a battle with these regiments, which made their appearance cautiously, Morgan moved rapidly to Bardstown, reaching that place at 4 o'clock on the morning of the 6th of July. Morgan's loss was inconsiderable --some eight or nine killed and some twenty-five or thirty wounded. Among the former were Lieut. Thomas Morgan, a brother of the general, and Lieut. Gardner.

From Bardstown Morgan moved in the direction of the Ohio River, capturing a railroad train within thirty miles of Louisville, and crossing the bridge over Salt River on the morning of the 7th. The secret of Morgan's success in this, as well as in his former raids, was his rapid movements. It was impossible to keep track of him. To aid in mystifying his pursuers as much as possible, Morgan detached five companies to move in different directions through the State, thus for the time throwing Gens. Hobson and Judah off the track of the main body.

Shortly after midnight the column advanced, and at at 10 A. M. reached Brandenburg, on the Ohio River, forty miles below Louisville, where two steamboats, captured by Capts. Taylor and Merriwether, were awaiting the arrival of the division. The Second Kentucky and the Ninth Tennessee were immediately set across the river, leaving their horses behind them, and, forming under the river bank, prepared to protect the crossing of the remainder of the command. While in this position a little gun-boat made its unwelcome appearance, and for a short time threatened to put a stop to the performance, but a few shots from the Parrotts convinced the commander that close quarters were not desirable, and he steamed away up the river for assistance. Before it was obtained Morgan was on the Indiana shore, mounting for a ride of 600 miles through a hostile country, thickly settled, and penetrated in every direction by railroads and telegraphs. The route previously sketched by Morgan, and which was followed with little deviation, led eastward through Southern Indiana from Corydon, through Salem, Vienna, Paris, Vernon, Dupont, Sumansville, to Harrison, Ohio. Morgan reasoned that the boldness of his movement would convince Gen. Burnside that his objective point was either Cincinnati or Columbus, and that smaller towns would be denuded of troops to strengthen the garrisons of these important points. He felt confident of keeping in advance of the cavalry in his rear, as being in advance gave him choice of the horses of the country through which he passed. To throw the department-commander off the track he here again resorted to the tactics that had proved successful in Kentucky. He sent detachments off in various directions, and after a few hours halt at Harrison moved in the direction of Cincinnati, then turning to the left, at night-fall, marched to the north of it, passing near Glendale, and morning broke just as the column neared the Little Miami Railroad. A halt was made near Camp Dennison to feed the horses and burn a pack of government wagons, when the men were again in their saddles, and did not draw rein until they reached Williamsburg, ninety miles from Sumansville, having made the march in thirty-five hours. Here at 4 P. M. the division went into camp and remained through the night. Resuming the march next morning they halted again before night-fall at Wilkesville, and remained until 3 o'clock next morning, when, on moving out of camp, the raiders found themselves harassed on all sides by militia, who, although declining close quarters, inflicted considerable injury with their trusty rifles at a safe distance among the hills.

At 1 o'clock, on the 18th, the command reached Chester, and halted to enable the column to close up. This halt proved disastrous, as Buffington, the point chosen to cross the Ohio, was not reached until after nightfall, and it was decided to wait until next morning. An earthwork had been thrown up to guard the ford, and Morgan was informed that it was manned by 300 men.

While Morgan had, by rapid marching, traversed the State of Ohio, doing little damage to persons or property, Gen. Hobson at the head of a picked cavalry force had reached the Ohio shortly after Morgan had crossed it, and pushing on in his rear reached Chester a few hours after Morgan had left it for Buffington.

Gen. Judah left the stern chase at Bardstown and proceeding to Cincinnati embarked a brigade of infantry and cavalry on transports and steamed up the river to be ready to intercept Morgan's crossing wherever he might attempt it. His force debarked at Pomeroy a short distance below Buffington on the previous day, and marched along the river road keeping abreast of Morgan who was several miles inland.

On the following morning these two commands, each ignorant of the proximity of the other, prepared for an attack upon Morgan's division, now considerably reduced by straggling and exhaustion. Col. Duke was ordered to draw up two of his regiments in readiness to attack the work at dawn of day, and the Parrotts were placed in position to assist the storming party if necessary.

Had Morgan's pickets been more vigilant they would have discovered long before daylight that the work was empty. It was evacuated during the night. The knowledge of this would have been of priceless advantage, but it came too late. The crossing came near being successfully accomplished, however. The steamer "Starlight," loaded with flour, ran aground on Buffington Bar the day before Morgan's arrival. Capt. Wood, of the regular army, on duty as mustering officer at Marietta, took charge of two companies of militia, and taking a steamboat dropped down the river, where he found the "Starlight" aground. He at once landed his men and manned the earthwork, lightened the steamer and towed her out of reach of Morgan, who was reported to be approaching, held the work until midnight, when he ordered it abandoned.

When morning dawned, Duke charged upon the empty works, then started out the Pomeroy Road in search of the retreating garrison. He ran into Judah's advance guard, and attacking with spirit threw it into confusion, capturing one gun and forty or fifty prisoners, and mortally wounding Maj. Daniel McCook, father of Gen. McCook. By Morgan's order, Duke formed two regiments of his brigade across the road upon which Judah was advancing, while Johnson with two regiments faced toward Hobson, who was moving upon him from the north. In the brief engagement that ensued on the Pomeroy Road, Duke lost his Parrott gun and a portion of the Fifth Kentucky. Meantime the gunboat "Moose" under command of Lieut. Fitch had come up and opened fire. Gen. Shackelford moved up the river with his own and Wolford's brigades to cut off escape in that direction. Notwithstanding the great disparity in forces, Duke and Johnson managed to hold Judah and Hobson in check long enough to enable Morgan with the four disengaged regiments to march out of the valley. Duke says: "The scene in the rear was one of indescribable confusion. While the bulk of the regiments that Morgan was drawing off was moving from the field in perfect order, there were many stragglers from each who were circling about the valley in a delirium of fright, clinging instinctively in all their terror to bolts of calico, and holding on to led horses, but changing the direction in which they galloped with every shell which whizzed or burst near them. The long train of wagons and ambulances dashed wildly in the only direction which promised escape, and becoming locked and entangled with each other in their flight many were upset, and terrified horses broke loose from them and plunged wildly through the mass. Some of them, in striving to make their way out of the valley at the northern end, ran foul of the section of howitzers attached to the Second Brigade, and guns and wagons were rolled headlong down a steep ravine. Occasionally a solid shot or shell would strike one and bowl it over like a ten pin."

Having held their position until Morgan was well out of the valley, Duke and Johnson determined to withdraw, and followed their leader. The men, who had been fighting on foot, remounted without confusion and retreated in column of fours from right of companies, and for some distance in good order, but there being but two roads by which to escape the men rushed for them. The gunboat sent its shells into the mass, which had now become a mob, and the Seventh Michigan soon came up and dashed pell mell into the crowd.

Cols. Duke and Smith and some fifty officers and men were here captured. In making his way up the river Morgan ran into Shackelford's brigade, composed of the First, Third and Eighth Kentucky cavalry, near Bashan Church. Shackelford thus graphically describes the encounter: "With drawn sabers gleaming in the beautiful sunlight, and with a yell that filled the foe with terror, they rushed upon him and he fled at their approach. The charge was led by Lieut.-Col. Holloway with the Eighth Kentucky, Maj. Wolfley with the Third Kentucky, and Lieut.-Col. Adams with the First Kentucky Cavalry. I do but simple justice to these brave and gallant officers and the veteran soldiers who followed them in that charge, to say that not in this nor any other war have officers and men acquitted themselves with more credit or manifested more determination or valor."

Morgan sent in a flag of truce asking terms of surrender. Shackelford gave them briefly: "immediate and unconditional surrender." Cols. Richard Morgan, Ward and Hoffman with their regiments, about 700 strong, came in and laid down their arms. Cols. Grigsby and Johnson and Capts. Byrnes and Kilpatrick crossed the river with some 300 and made their escape, leaving about 800 with Morgan. Col. Cluke took charge of one brigade and Maj. Webber of the other, and the column moved in the direction of Blennerhasset's Island, and encamped at the foot of a high hill, with his pursuers in front and rear. When night had fallen, however, he formed his men, partially ascended the mountain, and before they were aware of his flight was far on his way toward liberty. Gen. Shackelford was on his track at early dawn, and at 3 o'clock, on the 20th, caught up with him and a fight ensued. While it was in progress Lieut.-Col. Adams was sent with his regiment and one company of the Third Kentucky to take position on the only road by which it was supposed Morgan could escape. He retired to a high bluff, and there received a flag of truce from Shackelford demanding his surrender, which was accepted by all but about 600, who with Morgan started at once on their way. Gen. Shackelford now called for 1,000 volunteers from his command, with the best horses, who would stay in their saddles as long as he would, without eating or sleeping, until they captured Morgan.

All would have volunteered, but only 500 horses could be found fit for the enterprise. Col. Horace Capron, the veteran commander of the Fourteenth Illinois cavalry, with 159 men, and Col. Wolford, with detachments of all the regiments, made up the column which started in immediate pursuit. Col. Jacobs, with the remainder of the command, took charge of the prisoners and returned to Cincinnati. The hardest ride on record now began. This chase began on the morning of the 21st, and continued day and night until the evening of the 24th, when Capt. Ward, with his company of the Third Kentucky and a detachment of the First under Adjt. Carpenter, came upon Morgan's rear guard at Washington. A bold dash drove Morgan out of the town with a loss of several of his men. Morgan made a stand a mile farther east in a dense wood. Shackelford formed line of battle and drove him two miles across a stream which ran between rugged and precipitous banks.

Morgan tore up the bridges behind him, and took position in the woods beyond on a high-hill. Shackelford's force dashed through the stream on both Morgan's flanks, and again he was obliged to seek safety in flight, burning all bridges as soon as his column had crossed them. All through Friday night pursuers and pursued clung to their jaded and famishing horses, which could hardly be urged out of a walk. Daylight dawned upon both columns moving upon parallel roads a mile from Athens. Half a mile beyond, the roads formed a junction. Shackelford pressed on and gained it first. Morgan turned back and sought refuge in the woods. Meantime re-enforcements under Maj. Way, of the Eighth Michigan, and Maj. Rue, with a detachment of the Ninth Kentucky cavalry, joined Shackelford, who, with fresh horses, gained the advance of Morgan and brought him to bay, enabling Shackelford to feed his horses. After doubling upon his track, and practicing every ruse known to the skillful raider, Morgan surrendered to Gen. Shackelford, with the remainder of his command, on July 25th. When Morgan found that capture was inevitable, he surrendered first to a militia captain with whom he was riding, and who, overjoyed at the prospect of capturing Gen. Morgan, offered him any terms he might name, promising to parole the entire command. Shackelford declined to acknowledge the right of the militiaman and took his prisoners to Cincinnati, where Gen. Burnside sent the enlisted men to military prisons and the officers to the penitentiary at Columbus. The stragglers who managed to make their escape were collected by Cols. Johnson and Grigsby and marched through western Virginia to Morristown in east Tennessee, where they joined the command of Gen. J. S. Williams.

Left to their own devices the thoughts of the prisoners naturally turned upon the subject of the most available means by which to regain their liberty. After canvassing various methods, they finally determined upon that which proved efficacious at the hands of Col. Streight and his comrades in Libby prison—a tunnel. "But to tunnel," says Duke, "through the stone pavement and immense walls of the penitentiary, concealing the work as it progressed, required a bold imagination to conceive such an idea." Bold as it was in conception and hazardous in execution, the work was actually accomplished, and on November 26th, Gen. Morgan and Capts. Hines, Hockersmith, Shelden, Taylor, Bennett and McGee emerged from their prison and started in couples on their way to Dixie. Gen. Morgan and Capt. Hines went straight to the depot, where Hines bought tickets for Cincinnati, and when near the city pulled the rope, applied the brakes and sprang off the train. A boy was found, who for $2 set them across the river, where they were among friends. In Boone County the fugitives were provided with good horses, upon which they at once set out for Tennessee. After twelve months of confinement in various military prisons, Cols. Duke, Ward, Morgan and Tucker, and Majs. Webber, Steele and Higley were exchanged at Charleston, S. C.

Col. Adam B. Johnson, who escaped at Buffington, on arriving in east Tennessee, under instructions from Gen. Buckner issued orders for all men belonging to Morgan's command to report to him at Morristown. Many had been left behind when the Ohio raid was undertaken on account of disability to make the trip, and others had been sent off in detachments, while passing through Kentucky, and found their way back to the Confederate lines. These were collected and organized into two battalions under command of Capts. Kirkpatrick and Dortch. The occupation of east Tennessee by Gen. Burnside caused these detachments to move southward with Gen. Buckner, where they took part under Gen. Forrest in the battle of Chickamauga.

In the spring of 1864, Gen. Morgan was sent to take command of the district of southwestern Virginia, including a portion of east Tennessee. The forces at his disposal were two Kentucky cavalry brigades and the militia of the region. One of these brigades was commanded by Gen. George B. Hodge, and the other by Col. Giltner. The latter had served for a year under Gen. John S. Williams, and was mentioned by Gen. Sam Jones, the former commander of the department, as the best regiment in his command.

In the latter part of May, Morgan organized his command for a raid into Kentucky. His division consisted of three brigades, under command of Col. Giltner, Lieut.-Col. Alston and Col. D. Howard Smith, about 1,800 strong. He took no artillery. The column reached Pound Gap on June 2d, and, brushing away a small party of Union cavalry, pushed rapidly forward toward Mount Sterling, sending detachments in advance to destroy the railroad bridges north and west of Lexington. Two companies were sent forward, as the column neared Mount Sterling, to take position on the Lexington and Paris turnpikes. The town was easily captured, there being but a small force in occupation, and Morgan pushed forward at once for Lexington.

Gen. Burbridge, in command of the district of Kentucky, was absent on an expedition against the salt works in West Virginia, and this fact had seemed to invite Morgan to occupy the State during his absence. He entered Lexington without opposition, burnt the government depot, and captured sufficient horses to remount his dismounted men. Col. Giltner, who was left at Mount Sterling, had a severe fight in which he lost 14 officers and 40 privates killed, 80 severely wounded and over 100 captured. From Lexington Morgan moved through Georgetown to Cynthiana, where, after a short engagement, a garrison 400 strong surrendered. Gen. Hobson, in command of 1,500 men, on his way by cars to re-enforce the garrison, was met by Col. Giltner and held until the arrival of Morgan, when his entire force was captured.

While Morgan was thus moving from point to point capturing everything that came in his way, Gen. Burbridge reached Mount Sterling, and started at once in pursuit of Morgan. He reached Cynthiana on the 12th, after a rapid march, and meeting Giltner's brigade first, on the Paris Road, engaged it. Morgan came up to his support with the remainder of the division, but was soon defeated and driven toward Augusta. Collecting all the force possible in a rapid retreat, Morgan made the best of his way to Virginia. Moving through Flemingsburg and West Liberty, he passed over the mountains and reached Abingdon on the 20th of June. In justice to Morgan's old command Duke says: "On this raid great and inexcusable excesses were committed, but except in two or three flagrant instances they were committed by men who had never before served with Gen. Morgan. The men of his old division and Giltner's fine brigade were rarely guilty."

Returning to his old headquarters at Abingdon, Va., Morgan collected a force of some 1,600 men, and on the 28th of August set out for Jonesboro to assume command in person for an expedition against Gen. Gillem's cavalry division, then posted at Bull's Gap. Reaching Greenville at night he went into camp, intending to attack Gillem the next day. Morgan stopped at the house of Mrs. Williams. A daughter-in-law, Mrs. Lucy Williams, an ardent Union woman, determined to apprise Gen. Gillem of the presence of Morgan, and the position of his forces. This she did, riding through the Confederate lines and on through the darkness to Gillem's camp, ten miles distant, where she at once communicated with that officer, who lost no time in putting his command in motion for Greenville. Leaving Bull's Gap at midnight, he reached the vicinity of the town before daybreak, where, his men being thoroughly conversant with the topography of the country, he succeeded in eluding Morgan's pickets, and the first notification the latter had of their presence was given by a party of 100 cavalrymen, who dashed into Greenville, followed by Gillem's whole force. It was the party that came in first which rode at once to Mrs. Williams' house. Maj. Garrett of his staff and Gen. Morgan left the house together and sought to make their escape, but every avenue was cut off. Taking refuge in the garden of the house, Morgan was shot through the heart.

With the death of their leader, this sketch of the cavalry which bore his name will close. The long lines of railroad connecting the Army of the Cumberland with Louisville, its base of supplies, were the lawful prey of the daring leader and his rough riders, while many an outpost, slumbering in fancied security, were awakened at unconscionably early hours by his summons to surrender. The rapidity of his movements, the boldness of his attacks and the audacity of his raids, will long render his name a household word in his native State.

Recruiting for the Confederate army commenced in Kentucky before any attempt had been made on the part of Union men to organize under the United States flag. Two battalions under Cols. Duncan and Pope served under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston in the Army of the Shenandoah, at the battle of Bull Run.

Early in the summer of 1861, several hundred men repaired to Camp Boone, at which place Gen. Simon B. Buckner had made his headquarters, and enlisted in the army of the young Confederacy. Most of these had been members of the State Guard, and the advantages of scientific training soon became apparent and bore its legitimate fruit in the subsequent efficiency of the first (Confederate) "Kentucky Brigade."

They were organized into three regiments, of infantry known as the Second Kentucky, Col. J. M. Hawes, succeeded soon after by Col. Roger Hanson; the Third, Col. Lloyd Tilghman, succeeded by Col. Thompson; and the Fourth, Col. Robert H. Trabue. As recruits came in, two more regiments were formed, the Fifth, commanded by Col. Thomas Hunt, and the Sixth, under Col. Joseph Lewis. Two batteries of artillery, Cobb's and Byrnes', were assigned to the brigade.

On the 14th of November, 1861, Hon. John C. Breckinridge, recently commissioned brigadier-general in the Confederate army, was ordered by Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston to duty in the Second Division, commanded by Gen. Buckner, who at once assigned him to command of the Kentucky brigade. Gen. Breckinridge assumed command on the 16th of November, and with his brigade soon after took position at Oakland Station on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, where, in connection with Gen. Hindman's brigade, it remained in observation of the movements of the Union troops on the north bank of Green River, whose daily augmenting strength excited lively apprehensions that a forward movement would result in the evacuation of Kentucky by the Confederate army. Under cover of these brigades, however, the fortifications at Bowling Green were pushed forward to completion, and by the latter part of January they were regarded as quite formidable.

The flank movement by which the position at Bowling Green was turned, resulting in the surrender of Fort Donelson and the evacuation of Kentucky, took place in February, and re enforcements being demanded, a portion of Buckner's division, in which the Second Kentucky was included, moved to Fort Donelson, where, after a brave fight, it was surrendered to Gen. Grant on the 16th of February, and consequently took no part in the subsequent operations of the brigade during the ensuing summer.

In the retreat from Bowling Green, Breckinridge's brigade constituted the rear guard, and notwithstanding the demoralization consequent upon a retreat in presence of the enemy, the Kentucky brigade, even though each hour's march took it farther from home and kindred, reached Nashville without the loss of a man from its ranks. On the 13th of February, 1862, in the midst of a driving storm of rain and sleet, the brigade crossed the line into Tennessee, while their comrades of the Second Regiment were lying in the trenches on the right of the line of defense in front of Fort Donelson. Gen. Hardee bivouacked his army in line of battle on the night of the 15th, within ten miles of Nashville, in anticipation of an order to embark for the relief of Donelson, but the morning of the 16th brought news that chilled the hopes of the commander, and sent a thrill of despair to the stoutest heart in his army. Fort Donelson had surrendered. Hardee at once moved forward through Nashville, and on the night of the 16th encamped on the road leading from Nashville southward to Murfreesboro, Tenn. Here Johnston's army was joined by the forces under Gen. George B. Crittenden, which had retreated from Mill Springs, and the masterly retreat commenced that ended at Corinth, Miss., where a junction was made with the troops under Gens. Bragg and Beauregard, and much needed rest given to the weary troops.

On the 21st, the Kentucky brigade, under its accomplished commander, was sent with its battery, ammunition and baggage, to take position at Burnsville, within fifteen miles of Corinth, where it was soon after joined by Statham's and Bowen's brigades of Crittenden's division. This force, consisting, on the 5th of April, of 7,211 officers and men, was called the "Reserve Division," and the command was assigned to Gen. Breckinridge, Col. Trabue assuming command of the Kentucky brigade.

At 5 o'clock on the morning of the 6th of April, Gen. Hardee's advance drove in the pickets of Gen. Prentiss at Shiloh, and the terrible battle began. The second line of battle, under Gen. Bragg, had been pushed forward and intermingled with the front line, and Gen. Breckinridge being called upon to re-enforce the left sent Col. Trabue with his brigade. During the whole of that bloody day the brigade sustained the reputation of Kentucky for martial spirit.

The scene of wild confusion, that reigned on Shiloh battlefield for three hours after the assault upon Prentiss, was never again witnessed by the Army of the Tennessee. Like a pack of hungry wolves upon a sheepfold the yelling Confederates closed upon the Union camps. The air, sulphurous with the smoke of powder, was rent with the crash of musketry, the roar of artillery, and the shouts of officers striving to make themselves heard above the din of battle, in the vain attempt to restore order to their commands. Wounded horses, maddened with pain and wild with fright, rushed across the field or, falling prone upon the ground, crushed their hapless riders beneath their struggling forms. To add to the terror of the scene, and to convince even the coolest and bravest of the hopelessness of the struggle, a never ceasing column of Confederate troops, emerging from the woods, deployed in constantly accumulating force into line of battle in support of those already engaged.

Pressing forward over their fallen comrades, closing the wide gaps torn in their ranks by repeated volleys of artillery and musketry, yelling like demons, they seemed utterly reckless of the leaden hail that strewed the ground with the quivering forms of the dead and dying. Driven back again and again, they rushed forward to the assault with redoubled fury after each bloody repulse. "Cheer, boys, cheer. March away to battle," sang the boys of the Kentucky brigade, as with arms at "right shoulder shift" they moved rapidly to the left to take a hand in the fray. Far away to their right were two other Kentucky regiments, who had covered themselves with glory, fighting under the stars and stripes at Fort Donelson, and now sadly depleted in numbers under the gallant McHenry were holding their ground in Hurlbut's division under a murderous assault. They were the Seventeenth Kentucky, commanded by Lieut.-Col. A. M. Stout, and the Twenty-fifth, under Lieut.-Col. B. H. Bristow. Both of these officers were wounded during the progress of the battle while bravely cheering their men in action.

It was not the fate of these contending Kentuckians to meet at the battle of Shiloh. Soon after entering the woods, Col. Trabue found the ground broken and covered with dense underbrush, compelling him to move cautiously while he covered his front with skirmishers. He soon encountered the left of Gen. Sherman's line, which had fallen back to the Purdy Road, and engaging it drove back a brigade and captured several prisoners from a Missouri Regiment. On his right Col. Tuttle, with his Iowa brigade, in connection with Prentiss on his left, had for hours held the "Hornet's Nest" against repeated attacks from Gen. Cheatham, reenforced by other troops.

Johnston says: "Here, behind a dense thicket on the crest of a hill, was posted a strong force of as hardy troops as ever fought. It was nicknamed by the Confederates the 'Hornet's Nest.' No figure of speech would be too strong to express the deadly peril of an assault upon this natural fortress, whose inaccessible barriers blazed for six hours with sheets of flame, and whose infernal gates poured forth a murderous storm of shot and shell and musket fire, which no living thing could quell or even withstand. Brigade after brigade was led against it, but valor was of no avail. Hindman's brilliant brigades, which had swept everything before them from the field, were shivered into fragments in the shock of the assault and paralyzed for the remainder of the day. A. P. Stewart's regiments made further assaults, but only to retire mangled and disheartened."

During all this time Tuttle's right had been "in the air," with no troops in sight. Gens. Sherman and McClernand were separated from him by a wide interval, and in the absence of the commanding general there was no one to order the closing of the gap. Through this interval in the Union line marched the Kentucky brigade, and closing to the right cut off retreat in the direction of Sherman. Gen. Wallace, who had a few moments before come to this portion of his line, at once gave the order to Tuttle to fall back. In the execution of this order Wallace was killed and a portion of Tuttle's brigade captured. Prentiss' command was soon captured, and the division of Gen. Breckinridge was reunited on the ground where the surrender of 2,000 Union troops promised victory to the Confederate arms. The separate brigades had been for hours fighting toward each other from opposite ends of the Confederate line.

Trabue's brigade formed the extreme left of Bragg's line of defense on the following morning, when, after having withdrawn his troops from the bluff overlooking the Tennessee, Beauregard found himself confronted by a fresh army of 25,000 men under Gen. Buell, and a division of Grant's army newly arrived upon the field. Bragg says in his report "For the gallant and obstinate defense of our left flank, which the enemy constantly endeavored to force, we are indebted to Col. Trabue's small brigade in support of Capt. Barne's battery. Against overwhelming numbers this gallant command maintained its position from the commencement of the action until about 12 o'clock, when, our forces on the right falling back, it was left entirely without support far in front of our whole army. Safety required it to retire. The commanding general ordered a retrograde movement, commencing on the right. This was gradually extended to the left, now held by Ketcham's battery. The enemy evinced no disposition to pursue."

In the subdivision of his department, after the evacuation of Corinth, Miss., Gen. Bragg assigned the Kentucky troops to the district of southern Mississippi and east Louisiana, commanded by Gen. Earl Van Dorn. Baton Rouge, La., had been seized and occupied by Gen. Williams with six regiments of infantry and three batteries of artillery, and the Union fleet had no sooner withdrawn from the bombardment of Vicksburg than Gen. Van Dorn determined upon the recapture of Baton Rouge.

Gen. Breckinridge was assigned to the command of the expedition, which consisted of two divisions under Gens. Clark and Ruggles. The Fourth and Fifth Kentucky served in the First, and the Third, Sixth and Seventh Kentucky in the Second Division.

The troops rendezvoused at Camp Moore, Miss., where they lost a number of men from disease. On the 30th of July, the column, 3,000 strong, commenced the march from Camp Moore. Unaccustomed to the climate, many of the Kentucky and Tennessee troops fell by the wayside, where, under a midsummer sun, tortured with thirst, they experienced the most terrible suffering. The column pushed forward, however, and reached the vicinity of Baton Rouge on the morning of the 5th of August, the ram "Arkansas" having passed Bayou Sara in time to join in the action. A detachment of infantry with Semmes' battery was sent around by the Clinton Road to drive in the pickets and attack as soon as firing opened in front. The attack upon the front was made by Gen. Ruggles with the Third, Sixth and Seventh Kentucky, and Thirty-fifth Alabama, in one brigade, and three Louisiana regiments in the other, in support of Semmes' battery. Col. Thompson, in command of the Kentucky brigade, held his position with great gallantry after the Louisiana troops had been driven back, and pushed steadily forward toward the center of the town. Col. Thompson was wounded early in the action, and the command of the brigade devolved upon Col. Robertson of the Thirty-fifth Alabama. Col. Hunt of the Fifth Kentucky commanded the brigade in which his own and the Sixth Kentucky were incorporated and led it with great intrepidity. On the right, as on the left, the Confederate line advanced steadily until after several hours' fighting they were massed in a grove in rear of the penitentiary, where in the heat of the contest both Gen. Clark and Col. Hunt fell severely wounded. Capt. John A. Buckner, a skillful officer of the staff of Gen. Breckinridge, here assumed command of Hunt's brigade, which began to fall back, stubbornly contesting the ground. In a few minutes, however, the Kentuckians advanced with a cheer, supported by Smith's brigade. Thompson's brigade, having exhausted its ammunition, had retired to a convenient railroad cut, where reforming they were ordered to charge with the bayonet. In executing this order they were met by a terrible storm of shot and shell from the gun-boats, and were withdrawn after heavy loss.

It was now 10 o'clock A. M. The commanding general had listened in vain for the guns of the "Arkansas," not knowing the misfortune that had befallen it. Not more than 1,000 out of 2,600 men remained in the line. Tortured with thirst they obstinately held their positions under fire from the land batteries and gun-boats, which had a raking fire through the streets, waiting vainly for the appearance of the ram, which was relied upon to sweep the river of the Union gun-boats.

The suburbs of the town in which the military camps were located were in their possession, and the work of destroying camp equipage was continued until late in the afternoon, when information reached Gen. Breckinridge that the ram was lying helpless against the right bank of the river, when he at once retired with the remnant of his command. The attack was conducted with spirit by the Confederates, but the Union troops, after a hotly contested fight, finding themselves outnumbered, wisely withdrew under the cover of the gun boats, and from this coigne of vantage witnessed the destruction of their assailants. Gen. Williams fell mortally wounded when the battle was at its fiercest.

Port Hudson was soon after occupied by Gen. Ruggles, and strongly fortified. Gen. Breckinridge moved with his division to Jackson, Miss. His command had been greatly reduced by battle and disease during the ineffectual attack upon Baton Rouge, and time was imperatively demanded to restore the health of the exhausted troops. The Kentucky brigade bore no part in Bragg's Kentucky campaign, but preceded his army to Murfreesboro a short time previous to the battle of Stone River.

By exchange of prisoners, the Second Kentucky, with its gallant commander, Col. Roger Hanson, now brigadier-general, was restored to the service. This regiment, with the Fourth under Col. Traube, the Sixth under Col. Lewis, and the Ninth under Col. Hunt, with Cobb's battery, participated in the battle of Stone River. Gen. Hanson's brigade, the Fourth of Breckinridge's division, occupied the extreme right of Bragg's line in front of Murfreesboro. In the fight of the 31st of December, the brigade performed no other service than to hold its position, which was not attacked, Gen. Rosecrans finding ample occupation for his troops on the right of his line.

About 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the 2d of January, Gen. Bragg sent for Gen. Breckinridge to come to his headquarters for final orders for an attack upon the Union left, that he had decided should be made at once. The two officers met near a large sycamore tree close to the banks of Stone River not far from where it is crossed by the Nashville Pike. Gen. Breckinridge was opposed to the attack as ordered by Gen. Bragg, and tried to dissuade him from it, predicting disaster, as the ground occupied by the main portion of the Union troops on the bluff on the opposite bank of the river, was considerably higher than that over which the attacking force must march, and it was possible for Rosecrans to mass artillery and sweep the whole field. In urging his opinions he drew with a stick on the ground the position of the contending forces. Considerable time was occupied in the discussion, but Bragg remained firm, and finally ended the discussion by an imperative command to move at once to the attack. As Gen. Breckinridge rode forward toward his command, he met Gen. Preston, commanding his Third Brigade, and said: "This attack is made against my judgment, and by the special orders of Gen. Bragg. Of course we must all do our duty and fight the best we can. If it should result in disaster, and I be among the slain, I want you to do justice to my memory, and tell the people that I believed this movement to be very unwise, and that I tried to prevent it."

Among the regiments of Van Cleve's division, occupying the ground between Breckinridge's advance and Stone River, were four Kentucky regiments—the Ninth, Col. B. C. Grider; the Eleventh, Maj. E. S. Motley; the Eighth, Lieut.-Col. R. May, and the Twenty-first, Lieut.-Col. J. C. Evans, the last two mentioned in the brigade commanded by that brave and accomplished soldier, Col. S. W. Price. Promptly at 4 o'clock the artillery in Polk's front gave the signal for the attack, and the movement began. Breckinridge's division, with bayonets fixed and guns loaded, marched with steady step to the assault.

Owing to irregularities in the ground the lines of the two front brigades were crowded together at the center, and when they reached the ground where Price's brigade was posted in line, the Sixth and part of the Second on the left of Hanson's brigade were entirely crowded out by the river; whereupon these troops waded through it and commenced the ascent of the opposite bank. The line moving rapidly forward came upon Drury's battery, under command of Lieut. Livingston, supported by the Eighth Kentucky and the Fifty-first Ohio, which gave it shell and canister as fast as possible, but, finding that with all his efforts to break the line it continued to advance, he limbered up and withdrew his battery across the river. As the guns withdrew Hanson's men charged with a cheer upon the supporting regiments, and here, for the first time, the Kentucky Brigade met Kentuckians in the shock of battle.

The Eighth Kentucky and the Fifty-first Ohio held their ground so well that Col. Gibson, in command of Adams' brigade, deemed it best to ride forward and consult with Gen. Hanson as to when the second line should move to his support. As he approached he saw the general fall from his horse with a mortal wound. His troops wavered, and Col. Gibson instantly gave the command to his brigade to move forward. The overpowering strength of Breckinridge's division soon forced Van Cleve's division, greatly depleted in numbers by the battles of the two preceding days, to fall back across the river.

Maj.-Gen. Thomas L. Crittenden, commanding the left wing of Rosecrans' army, to which this division was attached, observed the retrograde movement from his position on the summit of the bluff on the opposite bank, and turning to his chief of artillery, Lieut.-Col. John Mendenhall, said, "Colonel, can't you do something for those fellows?" "I think so," said Mendenhall, and, turning his horse in the direction of his batteries, limbered up, and, awaiting orders, soon had fifty-four pieces of artillery playing upon the Confederate line.

The deafening roar of artillery, the hoarse shouts of officers, the shrieks of the wounded, and the fall of branches torn from trees by the hissing shells, formed a scene of wild confusion that once witnessed can never be forgotten. There was but one course to pursue, and that was to retreat. The north bank was lined with a superior force ready to receive them upon the points of their bayonets, men were being mowed down in swaths, the bodies of the wounded were torn to pieces by the iron hail that nothing could withstand, and reluctantly, yet in verification of his own prediction, Gen. Breckinridge gave the order to retreat. Meantime Col. John F. Miller, commanding a brigade in Gen. Negley's division, had crossed the river on the right of Breckinridge's line, and, followed by the division of Gen. Jeff. C. Davis and other troops, opened fire upon the retreating Confederates. The pursuit continued until dark, and the field was won by the Union troops. Murfreesboro was evacuated on the 3d, and the Army of the Cumberland moved in on the following day.

At the battle of Chickamauga the Kentucky brigade, under command of Brig.-Gen. Ben Hardin Helm, on the morning of September 29, 1863, occupied the left of Gen. Breckinridge's division, which division held the extreme right of Bragg's line of battle. Stovall's brigade was in the center and Adams' on the right. The Kentucky Brigade, under command of Gen. Helm, was composed of the Second Kentucky, Col. J. W. Hewitt; the Fourth Kentucky, Col. Joseph P. Nuckols; the Sixth Kentucky, Col. J. H. Lewis; the Ninth Kentucky, Col. J. W. Caldwell, and the Forty-first Alabama, Col. M. S. Stansel.

The artillery brigade of this division comprised Cobb's, McCune's and Slocumb's batteries.

The position of the division was on the left of a country road leading from Reed's bridge and striking the Lafayette and Chattanooga Road at Widow Glen's House, at which point Gen. Rosecrans had his headquarters. Adams' brigade extended across this road. The country was wooded, and the front, well protected by a heavy skirmish line, was parallel with the Chattanooga and Lafayette Road. Opposed, was a continuous line of Union skirmishers in advance of the main line, the strength of which remained to be tested. The division formed a portion of the force under Longstreet, which pierced the right center of Rosecrans' line, and contributed to the disaster which compelled the Army of the Cumberland to retire from the field.

Gen. Breckinridge, in his official report, refers as follows to the action of the Kentucky Brigade:

At 9:30 A. M., by order of Lieut.-Gen. Hill, I moved my division forward in search of the enemy. At the distance of 700 yards we came upon him in force, and the battle was opened by Helm's brigade with great fury. The Second and Ninth Kentucky, with three companies of the Forty-first Alabama, encountered the left of a line of breastworks before reaching the Chattanooga Road, and, though assailing them with great courage, were compelled to pause. From some cause the line on my left had not advanced simultaneously with my division, and in consequence, from the form of the enemy's works, these brave troops were, in addition to the fire in front, subjected to a severe enfilading fire from the left. Twice they renewed the assault with the utmost resolution, but were too weak to storm the position. The rest of Helm's brigade, in whose front there were no works, after a short but sharp engagement, routed a line of the enemy, pursued it across the Chattanooga road, and captured a section of artillery posted in the center of the road. This portion of the brigade was now brought under a heavy front and enfilading fire, and being separated from its left and without support, I ordered Col. Joseph H. Lewis, of the Sixth Kentucky, who succeeded to the command upon the fall of Gen. Helm, to withdraw the troops some 200 yards to the rear, reunite the brigade, and change his front slightly to meet the new order of things by throwing forward his right and retiring his left. The movement was made without panic or confusion.

This was one of the bloodiest encounters of the day. Here Gen. Helm, ever ready for action, and endeared to his command by his many virtues, received a mortal wound whilst in the heroic discharge of his duty. Col. J. W. Hewitt, of the Second Kentucky, was killed, acting gallantly at the head of his regiment. Capt. Aston Maderia, Capt. H. B. Rodgers and Capt. Gustavus Dedman, of the Second; Capt. P. V. Daniel, of the Ninth Kentucky, and many other officers and men, met their death before the enemy's works, while Col. Joseph R. Nuckols, of the Fourth Kentucky; Col. J. W. Caldwell, of the Ninth, and many more officers and men, were wounded.

The loss in Helm's brigade during the two days' battle of Chickamauga as reported by Col. Lewis were 63 killed and 408 wounded out of an aggregate present for duty of 1,413 officers and enlisted men.

In the assault upon the ridge held by portions of Crittenden's corps re-enforced later by Granger's reserves, the division of

Gen. William Preston bore a part. In the Third Brigade of this division commanded by Col. J. H. Kelly was the Fifth Kentucky under Col. H. Hawkins. Between 4 and 5 o'clock on the afternoon of the 20th the brigade moved forward to the attack. Col. Kelly reports the attack as follows:

Finding that my ammunition was almost exhausted I sent to the rear for re-enforcements or a supply of ammunition. At this juncture I met Col. R. C. Trigg, commanding brigade, and informed him of the position of the enemy, asking him at the same time to co-operate with me in his capture. He agreed, and formed his line on my left with the intention of swinging the whole force to the right. Just as this movement was begun I was notified by one of his staff that the brigadier-general commanding division wished to see me, and I repaired at once to where he was stationed in the field. During this temporary absence the enemy surrendered to Col. Trigg. Immediately after the surrender a force, supposed to be of the enemy, opened a heavy fire, which created considerable confusion, in which a large number of the enemy were making off. Col. H. Hawkins, Fifth Kentucky, here captured 249 prisoners, including two colonels, one lieutenant-colonel and a number of company officers.

Pursuant to an act of the Confederate congress granting medals and badges of distinction as a reward for courage and good conduct on the field of battle the following soldiers of the Kentucky regiments were selected by their comrades in arms:

Second Regiment of Infantry.—Private, Benjamin F. Parker, Company A; Corporal, Mornix Virden, Company B; Private, John Conley, Company C; Corporal, Frank B. Buckner, Company D; Sergeant, William Frazee, Company E; Sergeant, Henry Fritz, Company F; Private, Louis H. Paradoe, Company G; Private, Oscar Hackley Company I; Private, Frank Taylor, Company K.

Fourth Regiment of Infantry.—Lieutenant, B. T. Smith,* Company A; Lieutenant, John L. Bell,* Company K; Sergeant, R. H. Lindsey (colorbearer), Company D; Corporal, Ephraim R. Smith, Company A; Private, John McCreery, Company B; Private, John R. Brinkley, Company C; Private, Thomas H. Covington,* Company D; Private, William J. Watkins, Company E; Private, Freldling Skeggs, Company F; Private, Alexander Smith, Company G; Private, William N. Ballard, Company H; Private, John H. Blanchard, Company I; Private, Mathias Garrett, Company K.

Fifth Regiment of Infantry.—Lieutenant-Colonel, George W. Connor; Adjutant, Thomas B. Cook; Captain, T. J. Henry, Company C; Captain, Joseph Desha, Company I; Private, Frank H. Hasank, Company A; Private, Samuel South, Company B; Private, Richard Yarbrough, Company E; Sergeant, F. W. Campbell, Company F; Private, Winlock N. Shelton, Company K.

Companies C, D, and I declined making selections.

Sixth Regiment of Infantry.—Second Lieutenant, James H. Cole, Company G; Private, Marcellus S. Mathews, Company D; Private, H. Lowber, Company A; Private, Henry Haman, Company H; Private, John Hinton, Company B; Sergeant, F. P. Randle, Company I.

Companies C, E, and G declined making selections.

Ninth Regiment of Infantry.—Corporal, John L. Dunn (since dead), Company A; Corporal, John W. Carrell, Company D; Private, Norborn G. Gray, Company B; Corporal, Nathan Board (since dead), Company G; Private, Andrew J. Kirtley, Co. C. Other selections declined.

At Missionary Ridge the Kentucky brigade formed a part of the force with which Gen. Cleburne repulsed the persistent attacks made by Gen. Sherman on the right of Gen. Bragg's line. When finally the attack by the Army of the Cumberland swept the left and center from the crest of the ridge, Cleburne fell back, covering the rear of the retreating army on its march to Dalton. No casualties occurred in the brigade, but the loss of Cobb's battery, which was left with Bates' division when the brigade was detatched and sent to the right, was a serious disaster. The two armies separated by Rocky Face Ridge went into winter quarters with little disposition on either side to disturb the peace of the other.

